SCRIPTURE HEROINES.

DEBORAH AND HANNAH: A CONTRAST.

EACH was God's heroine. To one the world
That coveted distinction would concede—
To her who sent her heroes forth to bleed
Beneath the sacred banner she unfurled;
And who, the victory won, her pæan hurled
Forth o'er the fallen,* while the other sat
And chastely sang her meek Magnificat,†

* Judges v. † 1 Sam. ii.

As Messianic dreams her bosom whirled
With hopes maternal. Even so, 'tis now
In titled ones who sway the regal rod,
And sit on earth vicegerents of high God,
That men read queenliness: but Heaven knows how
To blend the twain beneath one stately brow,
To join with earthly majesty its own,
And place maternal virtues on the throne,
Forming a crown whereat both men and angels bow.

THE ELEGY ON SHALLUM.

"Weep ye not for the dead,
Neither bemoan him:
But weep ye sore for him that goeth away:
For he shall return no more,
Nor see his native country."—Jer. xxii. 10.

THIS exquisite little elegy, which was sung for many years in the city of Jerusalem, has a music and a pathos which even the least instructed and least thoughtful reader can hardly fail to recognise. Quite apart from their meaning, the mere words have a charm. They sound like a song. The very tone and rhythm of them might well move a sensitive heart to pensive reflection. Musical in themselves, they readily ally themselves with music; and, indeed, there is one of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," to which they go as naturally as though he had had these words in his mind when he wrote the song.*

And yet I can remember the time when I used to look at them with a kind of despair, feeling a beauty in them for which I could not account, conscious of a meaning in them, and a sadness, that I could not fathom. Who was "the dead" man for whom no lament was to be sung? Of whom did the prophet speak as "him that goeth away?" and where did he go? and what was the tragic fate that overtook him? and what was there in him and in his fate that a whole nation should lament and bemoan him?

To some who read this paper, perhaps, these questions may still be as perplexing as they once were to me. You too may feel the beauty of this most musical and pathetic elegy; but your enjoyment of it may be marred by your partial or entire ignorance of the historical facts which it so melodiously laments. Of these, then, let me give you what account and explanation I can.

From the time of Solomon downwards, the Hebrew State was divided into two great political parties, one of which stood faithful to Jehovah and looked to Him for succour, while the other fell away to the service of heathen gods, and sought to ally themselves now with Assyria and now with Egypt. On the whole, the pagan party prevailed. More than once, indeed, the downward course of the Hebrew Commonwealth was arrested; as, for example, by the reforms of Hezekiah and Josiah: but these feeble barriers were soon swept away by the swelling tide of idolatrous vices and corruptions. During the long reign of Manasseh, the grandfather of Josiah, the very Temple itself was desecrated with the statues, altars, and licentious ritual of heathen gods; foreign alliances were courted, foreign exactions submitted to; and in the very streets of Jerusalem the leading statesmen of Judah might be seen clothed some in the Assyrian and some in the Egyptian garb, ostentatiously parading, by their "foreign apparel," their leanings to this alliance or to that.*

But though the great bulk of the people were vicious and corrupt, and most of their statesmen still more corrupt, there remained a faithful "remnant" which listened to the voice of the prophets, held fast their allegiance to Jehovah, and struggled against the growing corruption of the nation at large. Hated and oppressed, driven to hide themselves in holes and corners during the long tyranny of Manasseh, they came forth, and held up their heads with joy, when the pious Josiah ascended the throne. Josiah proved himself a sincere patriot, zealous for the honour of "the God of the Hebrews." Led by him, the people cleansed the Temple of its pollutions, destroyed the high places on which sacrifices had been offered to idols, and the groves which had been profaned with their dissolute rites. Once more a pure offering was made in a pure Temple; foreign alliances were discarded; the national patriotism was evoked; the law of Moses was sternly enforced; and Jehovah returned and dwelt among His people. The provinces, torn from the kingdom of Judah by neighbouring foes, were reconquered; commerce flowed in wider channels than before; for a time the people tasted the sweets of security, abundance, peace: it almost seemed as though a new day of hope were dawning on the land.

But the evil was too deep-seated for cure. It could only be checked and delayed. From the first the prophets had foreseen that the reform would be but partial, the respite but brief. For more than thirty years, indeed, Josiah waxed stronger and stronger; but even during these years of reform many signs of adverse change were visible. The barbarians swept down from the Scythian wilds and overran the East. The mighty empire of Assyria was crippled and dismembered; its vassals and its enemies rose up against it. Above all, Egypt, which had suffered and lost much by the Assyrian supremacy, bestirred itself. Rejoicing for the time in a singularly able and energetic dynasty of kings, Egypt conquered and annexed many of the Assyrian territories; and, at last, advanced toward Nineveh itself. On his way thither, Pharaoh-Necho, the Egyptian despot, seized some fortified cities in the north of Palestine. Josiah felt himself menaced and endangered. He marched boldly against the Egyptian forces, encountered them on the broad plain of Galilee, on which the fate of Palestine has so often been decided, and was mortally wounded in the field, from which he was carried half dead. He expired of his wounds; and, with him, the last hope of Israel seemed to be extinguished. As man, as king, as "the hope of Israel," Josiah lived long in the affections of his people, who never saw his like again. The day of his death was commemorated for many years; and on this day the singing-men and singing-women of Israel publicly chanted elegies composed in his honour by Jeremiah and other of the prophets.

In the Old Testament there are no less than three references, in three different books of Scripture, to this annual lamentation and to the elegies which were sung at it. In the Book of Chronicles,* we are told that "Jeremiah lamented for Josiah; and all the singing-men and singing-women speak of Josiah in their lamentations to this day, and have made them an ordinance in Israel." In the Book of Lamentations,† one of these elegies is recorded,—a very sweet and pathetic verse: "The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord, was taken in their pits, of whom we had said, Under his shadow we shall live among the heathen." And it is these elegies which Jeremiah, in the verse before us, now bids the people sing no more. They are no more to "weep for the dead" king; they are no longer "to bemoan him," lovely as he was in life, and heroic in death. A new and deeper tragedy demands their tears.

That we may see what this more recent and moving tragedy was, we must complete our story of that troubled time. After his victory over Josiah in Galilee, then, the King of Egypt, instead of advancing against Jerusalem, turned northward, and conquered Damascus, Hamath, and other Syrian towns. The city of Jerusalem thus obtained a brief breathing-space; there was an interval in which her statesmen might decide on the course they would take. As I have said, there were two political parties in the city, the one heathen, the other Hebrew. Each was now headed by a son of Josiah. Eliakim, the elder son, was at the head of the heathen party; Shallum, a younger son, was at the head of the party which stood faithful to the laws and traditions of Israel. At first, while the memory of Josiah was still fresh, and his servants held the reins of power, they had no great difficulty in placing Shallum, although he was a younger son, on the throne of his father. Dissolute and oppressive, a doer of evil, Shallum was nevertheless lavish and ambitious, qualities which commonly win popular liking and applause. Moreover, unworthy as he was of the honour, he was the head and leader of the national, the patriotic, party, and was not himself, I think, without patriotism, though he is denounced as an evil-doer and oppressor. Raised to the throne by the national party, Shallum naturally set himself strongly against making terms with Egypt; "his voice was all for war." By some unexplained stratagem, however, he was enticed into visiting the Egyptian camp in Syria. Here he was treacherously seized, thrown into chains, and sent a prisoner into Egypt. And so, after a reign of only three months, he disappears from history in the darkness of an Egyptian dungeon, in which, "bound in misery and iron," he sadly wore away his life.

In the prophet's conception, this was a far worse fate than death, a fate worthy of a far more passionate lamentation. And, therefore, he bids the people cease their lamentations for Josiah, and sing an elegy for Shallum, his son. "Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan him: but weep ye sore for him that goeth away: for he shall return no more, nor see his native country." And he assigns as a reason for his command, and a sufficient reason: 'For thus saith the Lord touching Shallum the son of Josiah King of Judah, who reigned instead of Josiah his father, who went forth out of this place; He shall not return hither any more: but he shall die in the place whither they have led him captive, and shall see this land no more."

The brief reign of Shallum was the last gleam of hope that lit up the sky of Israel. When he was carried away captive, the heathen party regained its ascendency in Jerusalem, and made their leader, Eliakim, King. Eliakim, a luxurious and godless prince, an utterly base and unworthy son of the good Josiah, willingly became the vassal and tributary of Egypt. And from that time onward, till the sacred land was swept clean from its

* 2 Chron. xxxv. 25.

† Lam. iv. 20. Whether this be the elegy of Josiah is, however, doubtful. Many hold it to be that of Zedekiah. In any case it is worth quoting as a specimen of the elegies which the ancient Hebrews sang year by year.

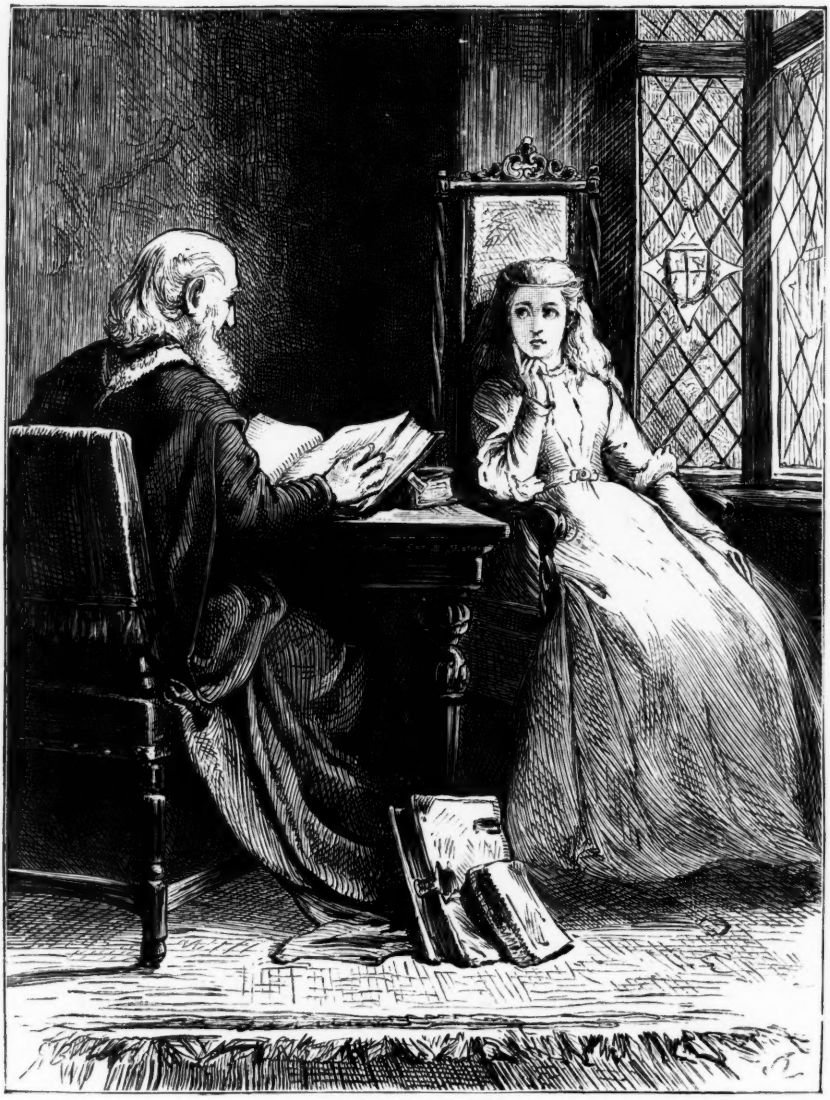
sinful inhabitants, cloud darkened on cloud, until the final storm, the doom-storm, came; and the winds blew, and the floods arose, and the house of Israel, that seemed to be founded on a rock, fell with a crash that reverberates in our hearts to this day. Till the storm came, Shallum lingered in the affections and songs of the people. They loved him for his father's sake, and for the patriotic hopes he had quickened, and which he had time neither to fulfil nor to disappoint. They took the counsel of the prophet concerning him, and made elegies in his honour, and sang them year by year. Ezekiel (xix. 1—4) records one of them, which has a quaint and alien sound to our Western ears, but in which the Oriental races would still find much to delight them.

"O a very lioness is thy mother!
She crouched among lions,
Among young lions she nourished her whelps:
And she brought up one of her whelps;
It became a young lion, and learned to tear the prey,
It devoured men.
But the nations heard of him:
He was taken in their pit,
And they brought him in chains into the land of Egypt."

A young lion of royal strain, caught untimely, and chained, and carried away captive—this was how the people of Israel conceived of Shallum; this was the form in which they bewailed him in their annual elegies. And, even to us, few figures are more pathetic than that of the last real King of Israel languishing in an Egyptian dungeon, and perishing perchance on the very spot in which his great ancestor, Joseph, had slept and dreamed. If we read Jeremiah's words as though they were written on the dungeon wall of that poor discrowned king, or inscribed on his tomb, we can hardly fail to be touched and moved by their pathos:

"Weep ye not for the dead,
Neither bemoan him:
But weep ye sore for him that goeth away:
For he shall return no more,
Nor see his native country."

What a tenderness there is in the words! and what an ardent undying patriotism!



But is there nothing more? Is there no "present truth," no eternal truth, in these words? no lesson, no consolation for us? Surely there is, and it lies on the very surface of the words. Do not we weep for our dead? We need, then, to hear the injunction, "Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan them." Are not those whom we love sometimes carried away by divers lusts, and bound by them,—carried away by them as into "a far country," where only too surely they "come to want?" And do we always lament their sins as much as we should lament their death, and more? If not, we too need to lay to heart the injunction, "Weep ye for them, rather than for the dead, for them who 'go away,' away from God, away from virtue, away from peace, into that land of darkness from which it is so hard to return."

We none of us believe that death is the greatest of evils. We know that it is not an evil at all, but a blessing, for the good; not a loss, but a "great gain." We know, we believe that, of all the evils that can befall a man, the very worst is that he himself should do and become evil, that he should forget God, that he should refuse to let God reign over him; that his life should be ruled by no Divine law, but be driven hither and thither of divers lusts, by uncontrolled passions which, lawlessly indulged, degrade and imbrute him. And yet who would infer our creed from our conduct? Who would infer that we dread sin more than death, and lament it far more bitterly? When a close friend dies, how we weep and mourn, long refusing to be comforted; how we break from our accustomed round of thought and labour; to what trouble and expense we willingly put ourselves: what sacrifices would we not gladly make could we thereby avert the fatal stroke, or bring back the beloved dead to life!

You would almost laugh at me if I were to ask, Do you weep and lament with equal passion when a friend—a child or parent, a husband or wife—falls into sin? Does that come upon you with a shock which drives you from your usual round of thought and duty? Are you willing to go to any cost, to make any sacrifice, in order to recover your friend from the fatal effects of his guilt? Do you mourn for him as for one dead? And yet, must I not ask these questions of you, ask them seriously, urgently? Should there even be any need or room to ask them? If sin is more terrible to you than death, how is it that you are not more terrified by it? how is it that you are not more zealous to avert it, to save men from it, to do your part towards stamping it out of the world?

Call men to a crusade against death, in which there was even the faintest hope of victory, and who would not join it? But call them to a crusade against sin, in which there is not only the hope, but the assurance, of ultimate victory, and of victory over death as well as over sin; and who offers himself for this war? Do you? do I? I think we may begin to have some hope of ourselves when we find that we really fear sin more than death, not for ourselves alone, but for others, and are more hurt to see them do a wrong action than to see them expire, and are even more prone to weep and lament over the guilty than over the dead.

Some of you, since men die daily, have no doubt recently wept for your dead, and bemoaned them, although you know that they have passed through death into life everlasting. Ah! weep no more—at least for them. They are happy now; why should their happiness bring you tears? If faith were perfect in us, if love were perfect, we should not weep for the dead who die in the Lord, for to die in the Lord is to live in the Lord. Sorrow for the pious dead is selfish sorrow, and shows that we are thinking more of ourselves than of them, more of our loss than of their gain, more of the winter of our loneliness and discontent than of the summer of their joy. If you would weep unselfish tears, the tears of love, weep not for those who have gone away from you to be with God; but weep ye sore for those who have gone away from God, though they are still with you. Weep for the sinful, for the lost, who wander through the "far country," seeking rest, and finding none; seeking food, and finding none. Weep for the weak, guilty souls who have sold themselves into the captivity of evil, who have been conquered and bound by some lust of the flesh or of the mind, who loathe their bonds, but cannot break them; who sigh for deliverance, but sadly forbode that they shall "return no more, nor see their native country;" yea, weep for these. For, if you weep for them, you will soon give them more than tears. You will carry them the tidings of salvation. You will tell them of Him who came to "bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness from the house of bondage." You yourselves will labour to help and redeem them, seeking by your kindness to persuade them of His kindness, by your mercy to convince them of His mercy. And in these works of love and compassion you will find a sovereign cordial for your personal sorrows and griefs. Weep for the sinful, and you will no longer idly bemoan the dead. Seek out the lost, and you will no longer bewail your loss. Let love inspire and rule you, and all the selfishness will pass out of your grief, and, with the selfishness, all the pain: you will enter into the sacred and abiding peace of God, who, because He loves all men, has appointed unto all men once to die.

Time is but as the veil in the Temple, which hides "the Holy of Holies" from us. For many of us the veil is already luminous, or half-luminous; we can discern on it the shadows of those who walk within it, in the light of the glory of God. Why should we mourn for them, or for the friends who are called to join them? Soon we too shall pass within the veil, and be transfigured by the Divine glory. Meantime, let us labour, as we wait, till our change comes, seeking to draw others into the outer court of the Temple in which for the present and till we reach "the holiest of all" we are content to worship; and so lose all the pain of waiting, and of parting, in the duties and hopes and joys of a Divine service.

THE IDIOT OF DIXMUYDE.

BY W. H. G. KINGSTON.

CHAPTER I.

WALTER KAPELL, a right worthy and respected citizen of Dixmuyde, in Flanders, was reading from a large open Bible placed on an oak table before him, in an upper room of his house, in that ancient town. The rays of the morning sun which found their way through the richly-carved framework of a bay window fell on the head of a fair young girl, seated on a high-back chair, placed just within its recess. Her light auburn locks, secured round her forehead by a golden band, hung in rich curls over her neck and shoulders. Her large blue eyes were fixed with intense interest on the reader, as if she were drinking in every word he uttered. It was evident from the form of her features and the expression of her countenance that she was Walter Kapell's daughter. She was, and his only child. Her mother, whom he loved with the fondest affection, had been taken from him at her birth, and he regarded the infant she had left behind as his richest treasure. She returned his affection with the most devoted and filial love.

"What blessed words are these, my daughter!" said Walter Kapell, looking up for an instant and gazing on his child. "'By one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.'" He continued reading. "Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin. Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by the new and living way, which He hath consecrated for us, and having a High Priest over the house of God, let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith. Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering; for He is faithful that promised."

Walter Kapell, placing his hand on the book to mark the passage, observed, "How different is this to the teaching of the priests of Rome, who would fain make us believe that unless through their mediation, and by fasts and penances, we should not venture to approach that loving God, who gave us the parable of the prodigal son, showing how He welcomes sinners returning direct to Him.

"See, too, how He values simple faith, as we are taught in the following chapter; how He has ever supported those who adhere to Him, often through trials of cruel mockery, and scourgings, of bonds and imprisonment; how they were stoned, sawn asunder, tempted, slain with the sword, wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented."

"Truly, dear father, we have great need at the present day of the encouragement which the Lord in His love has given us," observed the young girl. "How terrible are the persecutions to which the lovers of His Holy Word are subjected in all directions, by that fearful man, Peter Titelmann, and his companions. May he, through God's mercy, be prevented from coming to this town!"

"Amen, my daughter," said her father; "yet should he come we must be prepared, and let us pray for grace that we may adhere to the truth without wavering, as did they of whom we have been reading."

While they were speaking, cries and shouts were heard at the further end of the street. As the sounds drew nearer, the shrill voices of boys could be distinguished. An expression of alarm passed across the countenance of the young girl.

"What is it, Marie?" asked her father.

She opened the lattice and looked out. "Not what my foolish fancy had supposed," she answered. "I see but a mob of youths and boys. They are shouting and jeering after that poor idiot lad, Hans Kopperzoon. See! he stops and waves his club to drive them back. They fly before him, and when he stops they again begin jeering and shouting, and trying to excite him to fury, and amusing themselves with the strange movements he makes when in a rage. Now he moves on again, and they follow, pressing on him as before. They are seizing stones. He has overtaken one, and seems about to strike him, but withholds his weapon, and merely drives him back with his hand, as if with contempt. They seem not to appreciate the poor idiot's forbearance. Oh, cruel! a stone thrown from a distance has struck him! Others follow the example of the first coward; and now whole showers are falling round him."

"That must not be!" exclaimed Walter Kapell; "I must save the poor youth, idiot though he be, at all risks;" and he hurried from the room. Marie followed him down-stairs.

"Oh, father! let me accompany you, as surely, brutal as they may be, they will not dare to throw stones at a girl, though they may not respect even you."

The citizen, not hearing her, took his hat from a peg on the wall in the entrance passage, and hurried into the street.

Marie, thinking of her father's danger, and regardless of herself, without stopping even to throw a hood over her head, followed him. The poor idiot, in spite of the numerous blows he was receiving from the stones while slowly retreating, turned round every now and then to face his opponents, whirling round his club with which he warded off some of the missiles. Still it was evident from the number of his savage foes increasing every instant, and pressing closer and closer round him, that he would ultimately be overcome, and that any moment a stone larger than the rest striking him on the head might prove fatal.

Walter Kapell, regardless of the danger to which he was exposing himself, rushed up to the side of the idiot, shouting to the mob, among whom a number of savage-looking men had mixed.

"Stand back, mad, cruel people! What harm has this poor youth done? Do you wish to kill him by thus casting stones at his head?"

"He is a sorcerer and wizard: he deserves death!" cried out several voices from among the crowd. "He has bewitched the children and the cows: there is no knowing what mischief he has done."

"Because he has done none," answered Walter Kapell. "He is perfectly harmless, I tell you, and wishes not to injure man, woman, or child, or cattle either. But take yourselves to your homes, and let him go in peace."

Poor Hans, hearing a friendly voice, cast a grateful glance toward Herr Kapell, and ran behind him.

"Beware what you are about, Walter Kapell," cried a man from the crowd. "If you take to protecting wizards and sorcerers, you will have enough to do to look after yourself. Stone them both together," continued the same person, one of those who had lately arrived on the scene.

The first assailants of the idiot, only requiring encouragement, again began to cast stones, but at that moment Marie, seeing the danger of her father, hastened up, and threw herself before him. On seeing this, once more the idiot began to whirl round his club, and warded off several of the missiles, which might otherwise have struck the fair girl.

"Oh, people! are you human beings or savage beasts?" exclaimed the citizen, endeavouring to shield his daughter.

"Shame!" cried several from the crowd. "There is a young girl there; we must not hurt her."

"She is, perchance, in league with the wizard," cried out the same savage who had before spoken. "Treat them all alike!"

Some of those in front, however, struck by the beauty of Marie, now turned round to stop the rest, and allowed time for Walter Kapell to withdraw her, as well as the idiot, within the shelter of their house, the door of which had been left open. So suddenly had the whole affair occurred that the servants, who had been engaged in the back part of the premises, had not been aware of what was taking place. Happily Marie had escaped without a blow, while Walter Kapell himself had suffered but slightly, though the poor idiot was bruised all over, and his face cut by the stones which had struck him.

While Herr Kapell led Hans into a back room, where his hurts might be attended to by his old housekeeper, Marie's faithful nurse, Marie ran upstairs to bring certain salves and bandages from the closet in which those things, with many others, were stored. As she passed the sitting-room, glancing in, she saw, to her astonishment, two persons who were standing over the Bible in which her father had been reading, and while one was examining its contents, the other was apparently engaged in making notes in a book which he held in his hand. Her step was light; their backs were turned toward her. Trembling with alarm, she hastened on to obtain the articles wanted for the poor idiot, intending to tell her father what she had seen on her return. She was some time searching for the things, and when she again passed the room the strangers had disappeared. She hurried down-stairs, and as she reached the passage she saw two figures at the street door. They opened it noiselessly, as if accustomed to such a proceeding, and passed out, closing it again in a like cautious way behind them. Poor Marie's heart trembled, sure that they had come for no good purpose. She was well aware of the dangers to which those who ventured to read the Bible were exposed; it had long been a prohibited book in the dominions of the cruel and bigoted Emperor, Charles V. He had some years before appointed Francis van der Hulst to be Inquisitor General for the Netherlands—a man called by Erasmus, in his sarcastic vein, "a wonderful enemy to learning." He had characterised the coadjutor of the former—Nicholas of Egmond—a Carmelite monk, as "a madman armed with a sword."

These two fearful men had received full powers to cite, arrest, imprison, and torture heretics, without observing the ordinary forms of law, and cause their sentences to be executed without appeal. They were ordered, however, to take the advice of the President of the Grand Council of Mechlin, Laurens by name, a cruel and ignorant man, who hated learning with a more than deadly hatred, and who, consequently, might certainly be relied upon to sustain the severest judgments which the Inquisitor might fulminate. Satisfied with the zeal and energy of these worthies in their endeavour to root out heresy, the Pope of Rome had gladly sanctioned the appointment of the Emperor. Thus the Papal Inquisition had been established in the Provinces. Though these men were ultimately removed, the infamous Van der Hulst being degraded for forging a document, and other styles of roguery, they were succeeded by others equally bloodthirsty and unscrupulous, who employed various officials of the same character, among whom Peter Titelmann was pre-eminent for his outrageous cruelty. Philip had now succeeded the Emperor Charles, as King of Spain and the Netherlands, and had exhibited his devotion to the Holy Roman Catholic Church, and his love for his subjects, by confirming and renewing all the acts of his father. Passing through the most thriving portion of the Netherlands, Titelmann executed his diabolical functions with a swiftness, precision, and even jocularity, which hardly seemed human. Contemporary chronicles describe him as like some grotesque yet terrible goblin, careering through the country by night or day, alone on horseback, smiting the trembling peasants on the head with a great club, spreading dismay far and wide, dragging suspected persons from their fire-sides or their beds, and thrusting them into dungeons, arresting, torturing, strangling, burning, with hardly the shadow of warrant, information, or process. Such was Peter Titelmann, who had already visited some of the neighbouring towns, but had not as yet made his appearance at Dixmuyde. The inhabitants of that place hoped fondly that he would refrain from paying them a visit, which would not fail to be unwelcome to many of the inhabitants.

Poor little Marie had heard a great deal lately about that terrible personage, and thoughts of his fearful character had intruded themselves into her mind even while she was listening to the words of Sacred Writ which her father had been reading. She could not fail therefore to connect the visit of the mysterious strangers who had intruded themselves into the house, and so stealthily again hurried out, with the proceedings of Titelmann. She closed the door with bolt and bar behind them, and then, with the salves and bandages which she had obtained, her limbs trembling and her cheek pallid with fear, entered the chamber to which the poor idiot had been conveyed. She there found her father and her old nurse engaged in bathing the head and limbs of the unfortunate Hans. They had taken off his coat that they might the better examine the hurts he had received on his arms and shoulders.

"That is a dear good girl," exclaimed the nurse, as she turned over the articles which Marie had brought; "you have forgotten nothing that we require. Please hand me that pot of salve, it is the very thing for these sort of injuries; and now those bandages. We will make you more easy, poor Hans. There, do not groan so."

The agitated tone, however, of Marie's voice as she spoke to Margaret attracted at length her father's attention. The poor idiot's hurts having been dressed, Walter Kapell asked his daughter if anything further had happened to alarm her. She then told him of the persons she had seen in the sitting-room. The information naturally made him very anxious. "But are you sure you really saw any one?" he asked. "Were they not, perchance, creatures of the imagination which your alarm might have conjured up? Surely no one would have ventured thus to intrude into our house, unless they had come with the intention of stealing? Did you not see them carrying anything away?"

Marie assured her father that she could not mistake the evidence of her senses.

"We will soon ascertain the truth, then," he said. "Margaret, do you watch over the poor lad, while we go and examine the room."

He and his daughter hastened up-stairs. Nothing had been taken, that they could discover; but the pages of the Bible had been turned over, for Kapell remembered well the part he had left open. "I am afraid you are right, my daughter," he said; "but whether the men you saw were spies or intended to rob us, but were disturbed by your coming, we must be prepared for whatever may happen. We are in God's hands, my daughter. It is a blessed thing to know we are watched over by One who cares for us."

"Yes, my father; but might it not be safer for you to conceal yourself, or seek safety in flight? We have heard how those are treated who venture to read God's Word; and the men I saw may be spies sent by the fearful Inquisitor. Perchance he himself may soon follow, and then what will happen we know not."

"I know very well what may happen," said Walter Kapell, looking upward; "but I will not endeavour to escape the consequences of doing what is right in God's sight. He tells us to search the Scriptures, and to commit our ways unto Him: we have been doing so."

"You are right, my dear father, I know," said Marie; "but yet I should be happier if I knew that you were beyond the reach of that terrible Peter Titelmann. Many have fled from the country to escape his cruelty. I would thankfully accompany you, even if I knew that we were never again to see our dear home."

"The scene you have just gone through, my child, has agitated you, and made you more alarmed than the case demands," said Kapell. "Sit down; I will again read some of this blessed book, and we shall assuredly find comfort and consolation in it." Marie resumed the seat she had quitted when they went to the rescue of the poor idiot, and endeavoured to calm her mind as she listened to the words which fell from her father's lips.

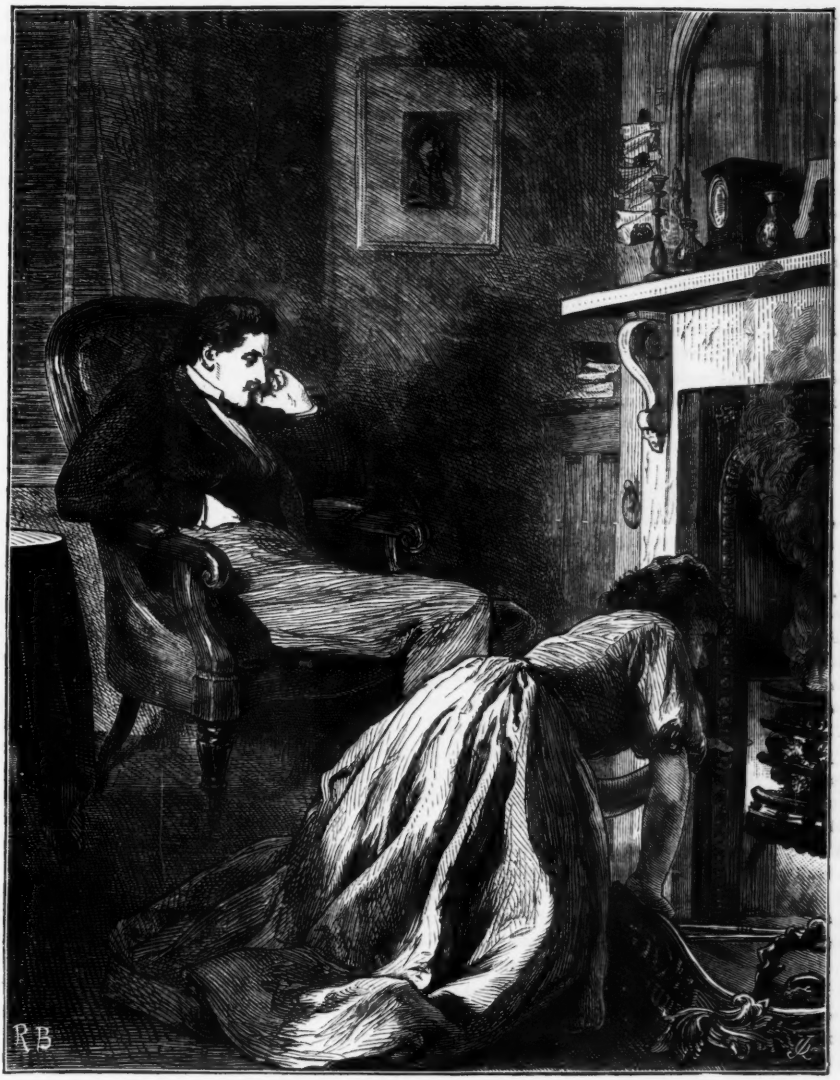
FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.

PHILIP.



"FOOL!"

"At forty man suspects himself a fool," says Young, the sententious. Philip Tenterden suspected it a little earlier, it seemed, for he muttered the objectionable word, evidently casting it in his own teeth, as he passed the mirror on the mantelshelf, and greeted his gloomy reflection there. Then he flung himself into the nearest chair, and from thence surveyed the immediate prospect with determined resignation.

It certainly was not an inviting one. A newly-kindled fire sputtered in the grate, and the room, already full of November fog, was fast filling with the acrid smoke of burning wood. "Fool!" muttered Philip; but for what?—for living the life of a bachelor in London lodgings, or for feeling desperately depressed and miserable on that particular occasion, when there was nothing more than usual in the circumstances, except that the fire refused to burn up and the not very neat-handed Phillis, Mary, had re-lit it so awkwardly that half of the smoke found its way into the room instead of up the chimney. She had also disappeared, leaving behind her a stalactite-looking candle, the light of which made fog and smoke and darkness visible.

Presently, however, the damsel reappeared, carrying a regulator lamp—a very ill-regulated lamp it was, for Mary generally contrived to make it smoke and smell abominably at some period of the evening, besides which, it showed itself capable of a variety of caprices quite incomprehensible to the ordinary intelligence. On the present occasion it simply went out as soon as it was set upon the table, and Mary—who, by the aid of a vivid imagination, could always account for its vagaries—stated apologetically that it had had too much "ile," adding privately what sounded very much like "drat it," as she lifted the glass globe and chimney, and applied a lighted match to the wick. When she had set the lamp agoing, she went down upon her knees and poked the fire with her fingers, and blew it with her breath. And not a word of remonstrance fell from the lips of the figure in the chair—not a word, for he knew that the slightest murmur would bring down upon him a shower of fibs.

Mary was an Irish girl, clean and active and clever enough, but awkward at little things, as if her fingers had an inherited incapacity for dealing with them, an incapacity which extended to her tongue with regard to facts big and little. Several times in his despair Philip had summoned the landlady, but on her appearance his accusations had assumed the mildest form—indeed, they had sounded to the poor woman, unused to so much courtesy, like commendation itself. She laboured under a distressing breathlessness, which made her eyes brighten and dilate, and which gave her, as she leaned heavily against the table with one hand, and held the other before her lips in a deprecating manner, the look of a creature hunted and at bay. Philip was glad to see as little of her as possible.

Mary, having coaxed the fire into burning, proceeded with the ordinary routine of the evening She covered one half of the table with a cloth—a plan which strictly defined the isolation of the meal-maker—and set thereon the materials for a nondescript meal—tea and a mutton chop. Philip Tenterden had given up dining. In this fashion he breakfasted and in this fashion he supped, eating besides a comfortless midday meal in a city dining-room.

He ate his chop and drank his tea slowly and in silence. It seemed indeed a very silent house, in one of those "no thoroughfare" roads, where the grass grows along the edges of the pavement and by the sides of the railings. When the things had been removed, he went to a side-table and took up a book, one he had taken from a lending-library, and sat reading for a time. At length he threw it down in disgust—it might have been with his own mood, but the unfortunate author came in for a share of it. He wished that he had brought work with him—a thing which he often did—but as he had not, he tossed back his hair from his forehead and sat resolutely looking into the fire, daring to do nothing. Yes, daring! for it was not a pleasant airy day-dream that came to take possession of the mind of Philip Tenterden; it was a troop of dark, sad, bitter, perhaps well-nigh maddening thoughts, to which, with a scornful smile lengthening his long, close lips, he said, "Come on."

Philip Tenterden is dark, but certainly not strikingly handsome, he is too long-nosed and lantern-jawed for that; but he has a fine graceful head and beautiful eyes. The lines of his face are neither weak nor sensual. A man who would enjoy keenly and suffer keenly; he sees and fights with the shadows about him, pursues them, entreats them, and does not succeed in dispelling them with the light of common day, or its artificial substitutes, as most of us do. And distrust has come to be the attitude of his soul; perhaps his profession fosters it, for he is junior partner in a firm of City solicitors, Messrs. Austin, Tabor, and Tenterden, and he sees a good deal of naked human nature on one side or the other. And he never gives over suffering because of this: every new instance of falsehood, treachery, overreaching, and wrong which comes before him gives him a new pang. He would fain reverence humanity, and to him its wholesale insincerities and degradations are continually revealed in their darkest colours. Once on a time, with a youthful passion of pity, he had gone down among the poor—the outcast poor of London—and he had found himself floundering in a perfect quagmire of imposture and deceit. "Charity is an impossibility," he had said to himself, turning back into the beaten tracks of respectability, and adding, "all men are liars."

But was there no insincerity in Philip Tenterden's own life? It seemed to some who knew him that there must be, for his conduct and principles were not always reconcilable, at least from without. He was rich—that is to say, rich for his position, having an income of nearly £1,000 a year, and yet he was not liberal—in fact, never gave at all toward any purpose, however laudable, even when he had been betrayed into speaking of it with enthusiasm. Was he a miser? It seemed so to some who knew that he lived in humdrum lodgings at a guinea a week, dressed with extreme plainness, and never entered a place of amusement. "Why do you live in that out-of-the-way place, Tenterden?" said his senior, Mr. Tabor. "I wish you would come up beside us again and be a little more accessible."

But Philip Tenterden shook his head and said he had got accustomed to his solitude and had given up going out in the evening.

It was strange, so many things men think good were open to him; society, local public business, the claims of which he had been wont to advocate and from which he had hurriedly withdrawn, and last (not least) marriage. And he had nothing to say to any of them.

"Depend upon it there is a lady in the case," said Mrs. Tabor in confidence to her husband.

"I thought at one time," said Mr. Tabor, speaking with his usual deliberation, as if he always weighed his words, which was the case—"I thought at one time he was getting fond of our little Lucy."

"You discouraged him rather, I think," said his wife, with the slightest ring of dissatisfaction in her tone. Philip had always been an immense favourite of Mrs. Tabor's.

"I don't know that I did particularly," said Mr. Tabor. "There was no advance on his part enough to be dealt with in a discouraging manner, and Lucy was but a child. You know it is two years nearly since he left the neighbourhood, and we have seen little enough of him since then. Lucy is only nineteen, and we don't want to lose the little one yet, do we?"

"No," replied Mrs. Tabor, warmly; "but there's nobody I would like so much to see her marry as Philip."

Mrs. Tabor was anything but deliberate—a rash, warm-hearted woman. Not that her husband's deliberateness was the result of want of heart. On the contrary, Mr. Tabor was kind and liberal; it was the result of an overwhelming conscientiousness acting upon a naturally slow and cautious temperament.

"I did not know you had gone so far as that," remarked her husband, rather wistfully; "at least in serious intention."

"I don't know about serious intention," she answered, laughing. "He was fond of her when she was ten years old, and he was twenty. They were the best of friends up to two years ago, and I think she misses him."

"Has she said anything to make you think so?" said Mr. Tabor, anxiously.

"No, she says nothing—a far worse sign in a girl like Lucy."

"Well, you know best, mamma," he answered, smiling tenderly; "but I think the child does not look unhappy."

"Oh! thank God, no," said the mother, earnestly. These two had known sorrow in their youth, and their one desire was to shield their daughter from it, though indeed it had not been bad for either of them; it had not been to either of them the sorrow that worketh death. Not death to the body, it seldom does that; but to the soul, with its hopes and loves and aspirations. They had laid their trouble clean away out of sight and hearing, and made their little world as bright and gay as they could make it for their laughing, dancing child.

"That is well," said Mr. Tabor, "for of late I have noticed some things I do not quite approve of in Philip."

"Indeed!" said Mrs. Tabor. "He used to be the best young man you ever had in the office; before he was taken into partnership you had the highest opinion of his business abilities."

"And so I have still," replied her husband; "he transacts every piece of business entrusted to him with ability and zeal, throws his whole heart and soul into it. It is not that. I have noticed a certain graspingness, which is unnatural in youth, and a parsimoniousness which is unfitting and unnecessary. I would not like to give our little one into the keeping of a miserly man. I like a liberal spirit, even if it errs on the side of liberality."

And Mrs. Tabor once more jumped to her own conclusion, and repeated, "Depend upon it he is going to get married, and is saving up for it. You can have nothing to say against that, my dear."

CHAPTER II.

MEMORIES.

PHILIP TENTERDEN'S mode of living did not allow of much variety of occupation. When he had looked for some time into the fire, he went and looked out at the window, to see whether there remained for him the possibility of the only alternative to his lonely sitting, a long lonely walk. At first, of course, he saw the reflection of the room, with its lamp and fire blurred with fog. But he got behind the venetian, and as he watched the street lamp glimmer feebly on the opposite side of the road he decided that the night was not very bad, and that he might venture out. He heard just then the eight o'clock post enter the road. Rat-tat after rat-tat sounded nearer and nearer, but awoke no expectation in his mind. He had no letters that did not go to the City. So he neither stirred nor changed his attitude, even when the postman knocked at his own door. He was standing there when Mary entered with two notes on a little black tray. He advanced to take them, and noted a mark on each, suspiciously like that called "Peter's thumb," but he saw nothing more till the girl had withdrawn. Then he looked at the letters, and as he did so a smile dawned on his face, making it tenderer and more beautiful than one might have fancied. The letter held uppermost, the letter smiled upon so tenderly, was addressed in a pretty hand he knew. He opened it, and it was written in the same, but not in the writer's name. It was a formal invitation to a party on the 28th of the month, purporting to come from the writer's mamma. It was quite extraordinary the amount of attention those four and a half lines seemed to require. He knitted his brows and bit his lips over them, took several turns up and down, stood irresolute, sat down and got up again, and appeared as if he could not dismiss them.

At length he sat down once more, wrote an acceptance, which was informal, and ran:—

"DEAR MRS. TABOR,—Though I have given up party going for some time, I mean to allow myself the pleasure of being present on the 28th.—Yours, always sincerely

"PHILIP TENTERDEN."

But when he had so written he laid the note aside, as if quite uncertain whether he should send it or no, while his face relapsed into the deepest gloom. He took up the other with a look of supreme disgust. It was addressed in a particularly scrawling hand, and written in the same; but it had also the merit of being brief. It ran:—

"DEAR PHIL,—I want to see you immediately about something that has happened. Please come to-night if you can.—Yours affectionately,

"FANNY LOVEJOY."

Over this Philip hesitated not at all. He determined at once to answer the summons, perhaps for the very reason that it would dispose of a disagreeable duty, though he had a certain relish for such, and in five minutes more he was abroad.

He caught a train at the suburban station, about ten minutes' walk from his lodgings, and by dint of expertness reached the other side of London in little more than an hour. Having arrived at the outskirt—that is to say, the last row of buildings that had infringed on the open fields—he had also arrived at his destination; but for full five minutes he paused, looking up at the closely shuttered and curtained windows before him, through which not even a ray of light escaped to cheer him, with tidings of warmth and light within.

The row consisted of a block of three villas, distinguished—or rather quite the reverse of distinguished—by the title of "Park Villas," looking out on the pleasant fields which stretch upwards to Hampstead Heath. They had been built and inhabited by families connected together by the ties of business and friendship, who had migrated thither in a body from the neighbourhood of Finsbury Square.

Mr. Austin, who took possession of No. 1, was the head of the firm of Austin and Tabor, solicitors. He was at that time a bachelor. His partner, Mr. Tabor, brought with him a wife and daughter, a little maid of some nine summers, to No. 2; while Mr. Tenterden, Philip's father, who was an old friend of both partners, occupied No. 3, with his sons Francis and Philip, and his orphan ward, Fanny Lovejoy.

As Philip glanced up at the houses the thought in his mind was not of the changes wrought within and around them by the tide of human vicissitude; it was of sunny slips of garden on Sabbath afternoons, when he sat upon the wall, a long-limbed lad, and teased and petted and pelted with flowers a laughing girl, whose every secret he knew, whose every happiness he shared. Winters must have alternated with summer even in that favoured locality, but they were blotted out of remembrance, only the "sunny memories" lived and clung about the home of Philip's youth.

At length he knocked at No. 3. A great brass plate was on the door bearing upon it the name of Lovejoy, a fancy of Fanny's when she came to live there all by herself. A tidy housemaid admitted him, rather astonished at his late appearance; but looking a welcome when she saw who it was, and ushering him at once into the presence of her mistress.

Fanny rose with an exclamation of pleasure and advanced to meet him, took his hand in her plump fingers and led him to a chair, while a big light-coloured cat caught the ball from which she had been knitting, and played with it, lazily lying on his side on the hearth-rug.

"It was very kind of you to come to-night, very; but I hardly expected you. Indeed, there was no hurry. I didn't say there was, did I, Phil? I forget exactly what I said."

"What has happened?" he asked, releasing his hand. "I see Puck is all right," looking down at the cat. "Has one of the servants been robbing you? or is it a case of virtue in distress you want to see me about?"

"Oh, dear, no—that is, yes. The servants are the best creatures in the world. Thank you."

This last was for the return of the ball, which Philip had picked up, and disentangled from the feet of the stool, just as Miss Lovejoy had upset a basketful of diamond-shaped patches of knitting in search of it.

"Thank you," she repeated, as he picked up the pieces. "This is the fifty-fourth diamond of my fourth quilt. I can't see now to read at night; and I like to sit and think."

"That's more than I do," said Philip. "Your thoughts must be pleasant ones."

"Oh yes," she answered, with a little laugh. "I was thinking before you came in how many people I have known, all dead now. There was father and mother and the little ones, you know, before I came to live with you. Then there was Uncle Joshua and your father and mother, and Dr. Darle and his wife, and our old neighbours the Finches, and the Rev. Mr. What-was-his-name, the young curate, who went to Torquay with his sister."

"Quite enough! Fanny, stop," exclaimed Philip, when she had got so far; "I can't bear that sort of thing, you know."

Fanny was accustomed to Philip's impatience with her speeches, and she placidly paused in her cheerful enumeration.

For the first time in his life, and he had known her as long as he could remember, Philip felt a movement of pathetic interest in Fanny Lovejoy, sitting there with that group of old familiar faces looking at her out of the shadows and peopling her solitude.

It was greater than his own, and growing greater as she advanced on her journey, and one after another old friends dropped off. She was at the age, too, when all the ties of later life are forming; when the little ones are growing up who will lend us their arms to lean upon when our steps begin to be feeble, who will close our eyes in the last darkness, and lean over the verge of our graves; but she had no link to the new generation and no attraction for the old; no light nor heat of intellect or energy to draw a little circle round her out of the advancing darkness.

Fanny had been the oldest daughter in a sickly family, a family in which disease and death had been ever present in their saddest forms. Neither, it might be, had this man sinned, nor his father; but sin there must have been somewhere against those laws written on the tissues of flesh as clearly as on tables of stone, to have introduced those fearful visitations of malformation, sickliness, and idiotcy which had afflicted the Lovejoy family. The unhappy parents, struggling with their own infirmities, had laid down child after child, with aching hearts, acknowledging that it was better so; that death was better than the life which they had transmitted; and in the midst of all this Fanny lived and throve and grew fat and merry, an altogether inconsequent little person, never considered very wise, though her only unwisdom lay in her immense imperturbability, and in her being fat when it was expected that she should be lean, and cheerful when all around her were depressed. Good nature was scrawled in every lineament of her fat face, a good nature which had been set down to stupidity, an opinion justified by a curious incoherence and inconsequence of speech, qualities which did not come out in act or deed. She was not, as a girl, either ill-formed or ugly; but she was unusually fat, and persistently untidy. Her strings were always untied and her buttons unfastened, and she lost things endlessly. And now, before middle age, she was left entirely alone, and entirely independent, a woman who trusted everybody who came near her. She was bound to do something foolish, in the opinion of the one or two people who had any interest in her still, and they watched accordingly; but her confiding trust had hitherto been completely justified.

A friendless orphan at seventeen, she had been left to the care of Philip's father, who was her sole guardian; and for fifteen years of her life she had remained in his house as a daughter. She had three hundred a year at her own disposal; and, after paying a hundred and fifty for her board and that of the servant who waited on her, she spent the remainder in her own slipshod fashion, giving away a large proportion of it in easy charity. But she had been very free and very happy in the Tenterden household, having apparently no ambition and no desires beyond it.

Five years after the removal to Park Villas, Mrs. Tenterden died, a quiet, colourless woman—perhaps because her lot was quiet and colourless—but one who ruled her house like an embodied equity. Mr. Tenterden, a singularly reserved man, exhibited a strange mixture of sorrow and of what appeared relief from restraint when she died. His sons believed that he acted under excitement, for he was demonstrative where he had been hitherto shy, and voluble where he had been silent. Philip, the youngest son, had remained under his father's roof. Articled at seventeen to Messrs. Austin and Tabor, he had remained after his five years' probation on the footing of a future partner, an honour which he obtained after other five years of servitude. Francis, the eldest son, was settled in the North of England as an engineer.

The long-established routine of the widower's household went on as before, under the guidance of Fanny Lovejoy; but Mr. Tenterden himself was failing rapidly, becoming a tremulous, sleepless, sickly man. One day he astonished Philip by saying that he would be glad to see him settled in life before he gave up entirely.

"I am not an unsettled character," Philip had said, with truth; "and I have no immediate wish to marry, if that is what you mean."

Philip laid stress on the word "immediate." He did wish to marry some time, of course. Then what was he waiting for? Was it for the lady? Her he had chosen long ago, and she had kept the door of his heart against all comers; but only the other day his little Lucy had been a child, and he had held back from wooing her with scrupulous delicacy, for younger and tenderer than she seemed either to father or mother, she seemed to him.

Imagine Philip's feelings, therefore, when his father said, with a ghastly attempt to appear jocular, and an ill-concealed anxiety beneath the surface, "You and Fanny might make a match of it."

"What can have put such an idea into your head?" replied the indignant Philip; "an imbecile old woman!" Fanny was not so many years older than himself.

The joke was never repeated in the face of Philip's unmitigated amazement and disgust; but many a time did the young man look at the unconscious Fanny with curious eyes, wondering how such an idea could ever have entered into his father's mind. (To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS, FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

BY THE REV. J. D. GEDGE, M.A., DIOCESAN INSPECTOR OF SCHOOLS.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. NEW SERIES. No. 1. RUTH.

Chapters to be read—Parts of Ruth i.—iv.

INTRODUCTION. Tell the children when Ruth lived—viz., in time of Judges. Ask what nation we have history of in earlier books of Bible, and why they think this story of one girl is told: Ruth iv. 22 shows she was an ancestress of David, and so of Christ.

I. RUTH IN MOAB. Read i. 1—11, and question upon it, so that the circumstances may be fully understood. Remind of the famine in Canaan in Abraham's and Joseph's time (Gen. xii. 10; xlii. 1). Picture Naomi's desolate condition, having lost husband and two sons in a strange land. Death at all times sad, still worse among strangers. Ask questions upon the well-known story of Orpah's return home, and Ruth's cleaving to her mother-in-law. See what it shows on the part of Ruth. (1) Her deep love. Often daughters-in-law do not care for, or behave properly to, mothers-in-law: here there was deep regard and affection, showing proper feeling and behaviour on both sides; a happy picture of family love. (2) Her unselfishness. As far as was likely, Moab would be a better home for her than Judæa, because she would be among her own friends, instead of strangers; but this was not thought of in comparison with her duty and affection towards Naomi (see i. 16—18). True love is always unselfish.

II. Ruth in Bethlehem. (Read i. 19—22). Picture out the arrival at the little village; the stir and excitement; old friends crowding around; the news spreading; Naomi's sorrowful remark that she should be called Marah (or bitter). Refer to Exod. xv. 23: Marah, where the waters were bitter. See how Naomi traces all her troubles to God's providence; so St. Paul tells us how God afflicts His children (Heb. xii. 6, 7), and Christ tells us the same (Matt. x. 37, 38). Now notice Ruth's conduct (read chap. ii.). (1) She was submissive. Though a widow and full grown, she did nothing without consulting Naomi. Like Christ, who for thirty years remained at Nazareth, subject to His earthly parents (Luke ii. 51). (2) She was industrious. She went and gleaned in the fields in order to maintain herself and Naomi. So St. Paul would not be chargeable to his converts, but worked night and day (1 Thess. ii. 9). She was not slothful in business. (3) She was modest. See her proper request to the servant, told by him to his master (ii. 7); her respectful manner of speaking to Boaz when questioned by him (ii. 10, 13), not presuming upon his kindness, not pert, but gentle of speech and respectful in manner. What an example to young servants! and to all in inferior positions. The more modest and retiring, the more Christ-like they become.

Turn now from Ruth to look at Boaz as the model of a good master. (1) He feared God, remembering his Master in heaven (Eph. vi. 9). Notice his salutation to the reapers (ii. 4). (2) He looked after his servants. No true kindness to leave servants alone. See picture of a good mistress among her maidens (Prov. xxxi. 27). (3) He was kind, letting Ruth stay with his servants and share their meal; and directing the reapers to let fall some handfuls for her. How contrary to those reproached for oppressing the fatherless and widow (Isa. i. 23). His was true religion, as described by St. James (i. 27).

III. Ruth married. It will not be necessary to read the third chapter; it will be sufficient to tell the children of Naomi's advice to Ruth to take the opportunity, while Boaz was asleep on a pile of corn, to lie down at his feet, and place his cloak over her, thus claiming his help and protection to a relative. Then explain that Boaz was a kinsman, but not the nearest kinsman, of Elimelech, Naomi's husband. Refer to Deut. xxv. 5—10 for the law of inheritance, explaining that Elimelech's property descending to his son Mahlon, the nearest kinsman ought to marry Ruth, but, as he failed to do so, Boaz, the next of kin, bought his right and married her (read iv. 9—11), thus keeping God's appointed law for preserving property in a family, doing a kindness to a poor kinswoman, and bringing down blessing upon himself.

Practical lessons. (1) How God is the defence of His people. Naomi, without any doubt, returned to her own people, and Ruth with her took Naomi's God for her God, and their confidence was not misplaced. One of God's titles is the "Father of the fatherless and Judge of widows" (Ps. lxviii. 5). (2) How God overrules all for good. Ruth returned with Naomi, poor and destitute, to end by marrying a rich man, the ancestor of the Saviour. So Joseph's being sent to Egypt caused him to become his brethren's saviour. (3) The happiness of a God-fearing family. A beautiful picture—Boaz, the reapers, the gleaners, all living together in peace and love, and receiving blessing from the Lord. An example for us to go and live likewise.

Questions to be answered.

1. How did Ruth express her wish to stay with Naomi?
2. What points in her character did she show?
3. What do you notice of her character while in the fields of Boaz?
4. Describe the character of Boaz.
5. Give texts speaking of the duties of masters and servants.
6. What general lessons may we learn?

IN THE WIND AND THE RAIN.

HE was washing potatoes. Now there are a great many different ways of washing potatoes, for nearly every one eats them and likes them. In civilised London, when we speak of washing potatoes, our thoughts directly travel to a scullery away down-stairs under the ground, a poky, miserable, horrid place, and a cook in a big apron, and a dreadfully serious, cross face, standing hacking away with a knife and saying, "Bother the potatoes! what a time they take to prepare, and how bad they get to be sure!"

But we are going to talk about another and a very different way of preparing the potatoes. Of all the extraordinary cottages you ever saw, I am quite certain that you never saw one like this, which I am going to tell you about. It was perched on a very steep hill, with the ground about it so sloping that on one side you stood on a level with the roof, and this roof was covered with tall grasses and pretty large leaved weeds, which grew thickly round two odd little stumpy chimneys; and the doorway was quite crooked, and if you had entered there, you would have thought you had made a mistake, for there was only a cow-stable to be seen; but through the stable, further on, was a door which led into the kitchen of the house.

The house stood close by a copse of birch-trees, and all amongst heather and bluebells, and passing the house was a splashing, busy little stream; and now I am coming to the potatoes, for a little girl belonging to this most rustic, picturesque cottage had dipped a tin can into a pool of the burn, and was standing beside a rock washing the potatoes. She was not beautiful, not the least bit beautiful—in fact, she was an ugly little girl, and when you hear how she was dressed, you will say that she must have been ridiculously ugly. She had a little cotton jacket of a particularly flaring pattern, and a short homespun petticoat; and tied before her was a long thick apron, which came ever so far below her petticoat, and more than touched the ground—clearly somebody else's apron, and never made for so small a person; no shoes and stockings, and no hat, but thick red hair, a turn-up nose, and ever such a big mouth. Of course, she had some redeeming points, and it is only fair to mention these as well as the less pleasing ones. The big mouth seemed to be made for laughing, and the merry mischievous eyes looked as if they had determined to be happy and bright in spite of anything that might happen, and the well-made limbs were evidently fashioned for work and activity. So impossible was it for this small lady to keep still, that even as she vigorously washed the potatoes she was singing with much emphasis a Scotch reel, and the bare feet were marking time like a couple of capital india-rubber balls.

Two small boys in old tartan kilts, and with a full share of bare legs, were close by on the ground, apparently desirous of strangling one another; an unwound fishing-line was coiled about them, and feet and heads alike became entangled in it.

"Sandy and Tammy," cried the potato washer, pausing in all her occupations, "are you going on with rolling up the line? Do you know what father will say in five minutes if it is not done?"

Sandy and Tammy were both too eager to heed her, and she returned to all her occupations, for a time, until a howl from one of the wearers of kilts made her look round again. The dispute had by no means come to an end, so taking up a bad potato, she threw it with some strength and perfect disinterestedness at both combatants. But it hit Sandy on the ear, and attributing this to some fresh attack on Tammy's part, he seemed to redouble his efforts at strangling him. At this Maggie (the potato washer) gathered up her apron and rushed to the rescue.

"Leave off, you creatures;" but she spoke in such broad Scotch that it is absolutely necessary to translate it into the English language. "I declare, you are for all the world like a couple of otters out of the burn yonder. Are you wanting to eat one another entirely? Look at the line, getting tangled together. If you do not sort it at once you will not get a potato to-day, neither the one nor the other of you. Now, will you leave off, you savages?" And Maggie clutched so vigorously at Sandy's Rob Roy tartan kilt in her endeavours to force them to discontinue their argument, that it was only a wonder that the one large hook which kept his garment about him, held yet firmly in its place.

All at once a strongly-made man, in rough blue jersey and oil-skin cap, made his appearance round the wall of the house, and quicker than words can tell Maggie returned to the potatoes, and Sandy and Tammy to the disentangling of the fishing-line.

The potatoes were soon finished after this, and putting them in a large black pot, with some fresh water from the burn, Maggie carried them into the house, if the queer little erection could be dignified by such a title, for it had more resemblance to a heap of stones than anything else.

Inside the kitchen Maggie found her father, the sailor in the blue jersey whose coming had lately sent Sandy and Tammy about their business in such quick time; he was sitting in an old wooden arm-chair. Now this arm-chair was a sacred institution in the house; it was very solidly made, and on its wooden seat lay a particularly thin cushion, with a very much worn-out cover; but this was the father's chair, and not even Sandy the adventurous or Tammy the daring ever ventured to climb into the seat of it.

At the other side of the kitchen, almost hidden in the wall, was a bed, and on it a little bundle covered over with a shawl; this was the youngest of the family, the baby of a year old.

And now we have seen all the family. Look round as we may, there is not one more to be found—no mother to take care of that little sleeping bundle on the bed, and no other to take care of the house and look after the noisy boys but little Maggie, the merry little ugly girl with the red hair.

"Maggie, lass," said her father, "put plenty of potatoes on, for Peter Morrison is coming by-and-by to get his dinner with us, for we've been busy putting the nets down."

"I will put some more on, father." And then more potato cleaning took place, and when Maggie was putting these in the black pot, her father said again, "Maggie, lass, we shall have to bring in the nets to-night, about one o'clock, and it will be very dark, for there is no moon, and I think there will be wind, and maybe rain by then, and I shall put the light on the rocks before the black cove before we start, and some of them will give it a look at ten o'clock, before they go home to their beds; but if wind and rain came on, something might happen to the light, and it would be better if some one were to give a look to it, maybe about half-past twelve or one, and there is no other body could do it better than yourself, you are canny enough if you can keep awake."

"I will be down, father, in case it rains; but if there is no wind and rain I suppose I need not go."

"It will be right enough if it should keep fine."

Her father watched Maggie as she hopped about the place, tidying up the kitchen, dancing with the baby, who seemed to be nearly as big as herself, managing the unruly boys in a way that at least seemed to be efficacious, and busily preparing the dinner. It certainly was amusing to watch her movements, which were so strangely active, for the bare feet never lost their resemblance to india-rubber balls, which every time they touched the ground bounded off again.

Peter Morrison, faithful to the dinner hour, appeared just at the moment when Maggie had ascertained that the potatoes were cooked to perfection; and when she had drained them in the most knowing way, Maggie placed them in triumph on the table.

In the course of the afternoon, the father of the household and Peter Morrison walked up the hill on which the house stood, to have a look round on sea and sky, to judge, if possible, of coming weather. Closely behind they were followed by Sandy and Tammy, who were admiring the wisdom of their elders, and imitating their movements, and pretending to be weather-wise in their own particularly small way.

Down under the shelter of the hill, outside the cottage amongst the heather and bluebells, Maggie was singing reels and strathspeys to the baby, training his young ears to decidedly Scotch music, occasionally varying the entertainment by a most energetic dance.

Maggie was just thinking to herself that it was time to be infusing the tea, when she saw approaching in the distance, up the steep hill-path to the cottage, three gaily-dressed ladies. Now Maggie had a great regard for appearances, so she hastily untied her huge apron and tucked it into the heather, tried to push the obstinate red hair behind her ears, and then picked up the baby and carried him down to the cottage door, where she stood leaning against the doorway, for she was not going to lose the entertainment of seeing three ladies in three gorgeous costumes, for small Maggie was already woman enough to appreciate dress and colour.

With a dignified air of indifference she watched them approach; then her heart began to beat, for they were clearly coming to the house. Now the house was so much out of the general route that visitors were few and far between. However, she pretended to be wholly unconscious of their approach until one of the three ladies spoke to her.

"I wanted to ask," she said, "whether you have seen such a thing as a small leather bag anywhere about the road in the village?"

"Is it me, ma'am, that you are talking to?" inquired Maggie—a somewhat superfluous question, seeing that the only other person present was the baby in her arms. "No, ma'am, I did not see it."

"Oh, well, in case you hear anything of it, it belongs to me, and I will leave this description of it with you, and you can tell any one of it that you see. Can you read?"

"Book writing, and I have seen pen writing that I could read," said Maggie, doubtfully, and looking at the piece of writing which the stranger handed to her. She looked at it for a moment, and then said very decidedly, "But I could not read your writing."

"I will read it to you. 'Lost, a small leather bag, containing a purse with a good deal of silver and some gold in it, a watch and chain, also several letters and a pocket-handkerchief. Whoever will bring this to Miss Murkinthwaite, at the post-office, will receive ten shillings reward.'"

"Ma guidness me!" was all Maggie's answer.

"Can any one in this house read?" continued the lady.

"Read! my father reads just beautifully; perhaps you would like to step ben the room and see the chair he sits in when he reads all the newspapers?"

The lady declined this offer, and leaving the paper, joined her friends and descended the hill. When she was out of sight, Maggie placed the baby on the ground and spelt over the bit of writing, recalling the words from memory, and fancying which they must be; she found, however, that there was great difficulty in this performance, and she settled things comfortably in her mind by saying to herself that half the words were misspelt.

(To be concluded).

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

1. Show that the Lamentations referred to in 2 Chron. xxxv. 25 are not the Lamentations of Jeremiah now in our possession.

2. Our Lord on one occasion mentioned the parts of the Old Testament that contained statements respecting Himself. On what occasion, and what parts of Scripture did He refer to?

3. Quote the verse from which we learn that Moses was the most eminent of all the prophets that appeared in Israel.

4. During whose reigns did the Syrians and Edomites respectively suffer a defeat in the "Valley of Salt," and what was the amount of their slain?

5. Quote the verse in which the first Syrian invasion of Judah is recorded.

HARVEST HOME IN OLD TIMES.

HERE, where the graceful squirrels spring,
And shake the mast's ripe kernels down,
I watched the dragon-fly's smooth wing
Rest on the bindweed's creamy crown,
In happy days of hoop and swing.
Then the last wagon from the field
Bore its last load along the lane,
And song and laugh and shout were pealed

Like joy-bells o'er the piled-up grain.
Infectious peals of careless mirth
That echoed in the sky's blue dome,
Rang out above the fruitful earth—
The children's shouts of "Harvest Home!"
I loved to see the ribbons stream
About the jocund harvest-sire,
Who rode the leader of the team,
And led the chorus of the choir:
It crowned my very heart's desire,
When, gathered in the large old hall,
What time the gloaming shadows fall,
The group to "supper" would retire.
The long low English board was spread
With rare roast beef, the yeoman's pride,
And toast and tankard side by side,
That all the reapers might be fed.
Right glad was I, right merry-hearted,
Before the revellers departed,
To mingle in their rustic games,
Old pastimes with quaint country names
Some twenty can I now recall,
But none so well as "snapdragon,"
With horse's head, and milk-white pall
To drape the actor of the fun,
Who made the monster chase us all,
A shrieking band, from wall to wall.
How swiftly would my childish cheek
Resign its faintest tinge of red,
And how mine eyes their fear would speak
Whilst gazing on "that awful head!"
Such scenes—like glamour wrought by elves,
As grandames say, in fairy rings—
Seem brighter than their native selves,
If Memory mirrors them, and brings
Before us Youth's Aurora-wings.

THE VISION OF THE INVISIBLE ONE.

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

"For he endured, as seeing Him who is invisible."—Heb. xi. 27.

PART I.

MAN is so constituted as to be powerfully influenced by man; and conscious or unconscious personal influence is, perhaps, the mightiest force which operates in this world, whether for good or evil. The common sentiment of men in reference to this matter has crystallised into a proverb familiar to us all—"Example is more powerful than precept;" and the practical wisdom of these words, which we thoughtlessly copied in childhood, we are more and more perfectly learning by the progressive experience of life. We all feel it to be much better to be shown how to do a thing, than to be told how; better to witness an example than to listen to a precept. It is very well to be told that we ought to pursue a certain course, wherein by the use of specified means we may hope to surmount the difficulties of the way, and attain at last to the object which looms encouragingly through the distance. But how much more good do we get by perusing the life of some man who has actually prosecuted that way, surmounted those obstacles, and attained that eventual reward. We feel much more inclined to set out in such a course after reading the memoir, than after reading a mere hand-book for travellers, describing and giving directions for the same route. The reason is obvious. We feel in the one case what we totally lack in the other, the contagion of personal influence and example.

Now we might expect that God, who has created us so susceptible to personal influence, and so capable of exerting it; and who, moreover, has so ordered human society that no man can live to himself, would, in any revelation which He might vouchsafe to man make large use of this principle; and what we might so naturally expect we do actually find.

The Bible is to a large extent biographical, made up of personal narrative. The great men of the Bible are imperfect incarnations of the truths and principles of the Bible. In them we see imperfectly set forth some of that goodness, beauty, and truth, the full and perfect manifestation of which we meet with in Christ Jesus; and while we are specially to look upon the life of Christ as the model and example of ours, and with reverent steps are to follow where He has led, we are also to be followers, imitators of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.

We cannot doubt this in the presence of the chapter whence the words quoted at the head of this paper are taken. The design of the author of this Epistle, in this place, is to impress upon the minds of his readers the importance and prevailing efficiency of that principle of faith, which is described at the commencement of the chapter as "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." This design he seeks to accomplish by summoning a cloud of illustrious witnesses, who are gathered from all the ages, and who bear significant and concurrent testimony to the practical power of faith.

It is as though he said, Do you want to know what faith is—how faith operates—what it will enable men to accomplish and endure? Do you doubt whether faith can sublime and sustain your lives?—whether in possession and exercise of it you can conquer? See what faith did for these men of old time, "who through faith"—otherwise they were no stronger or better than you—"who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens." These and other marvels they wrought through faith.

These men were living in different ages, under different circumstances, had various characters; each had his own views, purposes, course in life; in many respects they differed as widely as men could differ, but, different as they were, they all agreed in this: they had a perception of the unseen—a firm and earnest faith in the Invisible One. Of them all, it may be said, that they achieved what they did; they endured what they did, as seeing Him who is invisible. There is a key, an explaining principle, to the life of every man. The feature which pre-eminently distinguished the Old Testament worthies to whom, to whose doings and sufferings, we have reference in this chapter, was their vision of the Invisible One; that vision which can be only enjoyed by them who have the faith, the operation of which is here celebrated, and which is itself the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.

This, then, is our subject: "The Vision of the Invisible One;" in considering which, two things are to be noticed:—

I. That this was the influential and sustaining principle in the life of Moses.

II. That this should be the influential and sustaining principle in our lives.

I. Let us notice that this vision of the Invisible One was the influential and sustaining principle in the life of Moses. This fact could not be more distinctly affirmed than it is by these words: "He endured as seeing Him who is invisible." Paradoxical as the statement may at first appear, it presents us with the explaining principle of Moses' life; believe that in everything he was influenced by this vision of the Invisible One, and his life, wonderful still, appears intelligible and harmonious. Exclude all reference to this, and it is dark, enigmatic, inexplicable. Whatever principle of interpretation we may adopt, we cannot but regard the life of Moses as distinguished by features of unusual and even singular interest in its commencement, continuance, and close. By the strong faith and skilful device of his mother he was saved in infancy from the operation of a cruel edict, which devoted to death all the male children of the Hebrews. By a seeming accident he was introduced to the notice of Pharaoh's daughter, and educated in all the wisdom of the period, in the court of the oppressors of his nation, that he might afterwards be the better able to rescue and avenge them.

Entrusted to the care of his mother, he, through his family, retained his connection and sympathy with his own people, and to such an extent, that he was led at last to openly espouse their cause; and so, "when he was come to years, he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompence of the reward."

He then forsook Egypt, and went into the desert of Midian, where he lived a retired pastoral life for many years, and was, like not a few of God's most distinguished servants, trained in solitude for the activities and responsibilities of public life. History tells us how, at the appointed time, Moses became the instrument of delivering Israel from the house of bondage, and was associated with their wonderful exodus from Egypt, and their not less wonderful wanderings in the desert, until at last he died, according to the word of God, within sight of that promised land, to the borders of which he had led the wandering host of Israel, but into which he was not suffered to enter himself.

In whatever way we regard this life of Moses, it must be accounted as one which we cannot reasonably explain by reference to the principles which ordinarily actuate men.

If a man do what men naturally shrink from doing—if he abstain from that which they are naturally inclined to, we must account for this exceptional action and abstinence by reference to some other principle or principles than those which ordinarily operate.

Let us apply this rule to the life of Moses. If we take the principles and motives which ordinarily dominate in the world, we feel at once convinced that they would have led Moses to live a life entirely different from that which he did live. They certainly would not have led him to refuse to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; to choose to suffer affliction with the people of God rather than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; or to esteem the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt. Influenced by the principles which commonly actuate men, he would have chosen what he refused, and have clung to what he forsook.

What, then, was it which supported him under his difficulties,—which enabled him to close his eyes to the fair prospect of worldly advantage,—to be strong in the presence of danger,—to bear the murmurings of the people whom he so faithfully served, and in every respect so honestly, fearlessly, and adequately to discharge his duties? We have the whole thing explained in these words: "He endured as seeing Him who is invisible."

THE IDIOT OF DIXMUYDE.

BY W. H. G. KINGSTON.

CHAPTER II.

THE morning wore on. Walter Kapell went out to attend a meeting of the Municipal Council; and Marie occupied herself in her usual household duties, with the assistance of the good Margaret, her nurse. Her cheek was paler than usual, and whenever a knock was heard she could not help trembling till she had ascertained who had come to the door. When the hour of dinner approached, she anxiously looked for the arrival of her father. It appeared that he was longer than usual. She frequently went to the window, and looked up the street in the direction she expected him to come; still he did not appear. Often and often she gazed up at the round face of the clock in the hall, thinking, though hitherto a true and faithful indicator of time, that it had suddenly taken to follow the evil ways of the world, and was speaking falsely. "It must surely be going slow," she remarked to Margaret. Still the clock went on, tick, tick, tick, in its accustomed manner, quite unconscious of the accusations brought against its veracity.

"No better timekeeper exists in the place, my dear child," answered the old nurse; "I have never known it to lose a minute in a week. Your honoured father will come in good time, though perchance business of importance may have detained him at the Council. Herr Brakelstoup is probably addressing the meeting, and he is a long-winded orator, as we all know."

Still Marie was not reassured. She would have put on her hood, and run up towards the Town Hall, but, anxious as she was to meet her father, she dreaded going out, lest she should encounter the rude mob who had attacked poor Hans; and she had another reason, which perhaps she scarcely liked to acknowledge to herself. She went to the window, however, more frequently than before. Now she looked up the street; now in the other direction. Perhaps her father might have gone round on some other business after leaving the Council. Suddenly, as she was looking out, the colour rose to her cheek and mounted to her brow. A young and certainly not ill-looking cavalier might have been seen walking at a rapid rate, with the scabbard of his sword held in his hand, to prevent it striking his legs, the plume of his hat waving in the wind, while his eyes were turned up towards the window from which she was gazing. Her maiden modesty induced her to draw back slightly; but she did not altogether retire, still being able to watch the cavalier as he approached. He had seen her, and raised his hand to his lips, ascertaining, as he thought, that no one was observing him, and then quickly crossed the street to the side on which the house stood. In another instant a knock was heard. Little Marie's heart fluttered considerably. She sat herself down to try and compose her spirits, but directly afterwards she hastened to the door of the room. Voices were heard below. The deep, low tones of a man's voice reached her ears, as if eagerly speaking; while ever and anon Dame Margaret's shriller voice came up the stairs. Now she thought she would run down, for she was sure if her father was at home the visitor would be admitted; then she stopped. Surely Margaret would not think it necessary to turn him away. He seemed very unwilling to go, at all events, if such was her purpose. Now the visitor's voice grew a little louder and bolder than at first. Marie's heart fluttered more and more. She made a few steps along the passage; then she heard the door closed. "Has he really gone?" she thought. "If he has, he may meet my father, who will assuredly bring him back." But Dame Margaret was not so hard-hearted as Marie had feared. Footsteps were heard in the passage; then they came up-stairs. She caught a glimpse of her old nurse, never very agile in her movements, as she reached the end of the passage. Marie ran back and sat herself down in what she believed a thoroughly dignified and composed attitude; not that she did otherwise than that which was perfectly natural to her. She had taken her knitting in hand, but had scarcely once drawn the thread tight when Margaret appeared at the door, her portly person concealing the figure, though not the face, of the young gentleman who followed closely behind her. "Herr Gellert would come in, he would take no denial; and I hope your honoured father will not blame me for admitting him," said Margaret, not aware apparently that the guest was not only within hearing, but close behind her.

"I am very glad to see Herr Gellert," said Marie, rising and extending her hand; "and I trust my father will soon be at home to assist me in entertaining him."

"Oh! you are there," exclaimed Margaret, turning round and discovering the visitor; "I thought you had remained below till I could announce you to my young lady. Really, Herr Gellert, you seem determined to take the house by storm."

"Pardon me, good Margaret; I thought you had invited me to follow you, or I should not have ventured to act so disrespectfully towards your young mistress. I pray you, will you pardon me?" he added, looking into Marie's face.

Marie did not appear very angry or annoyed, but, on the contrary, smiled as he took her hand, and begged him to take a seat, expressing a hope that her father would soon arrive. "I have been looking for him for an hour or more," she said; "what can have delayed him I know not. Can you conjecture, Herr Gellert? I have been made very nervous, I must own; and perhaps my fears have caused the danger I apprehend to appear greater than it is." She then told him of the events of the morning, and of the mysterious persons who had made their way into the house, and escaped before any one could interrogate them.

The young gentleman looked very grave as she spoke, and did not reply immediately. He was evidently anxious, however, not to alarm her, and seemed to be considering what object could have induced the strangers to come to the house. Meantime, while the young couple were speaking, Dame Margaret stood near the door in a respectful attitude, evidently thinking that, for the sake of propriety, she should not leave them till the arrival of Herr Kapell. Their conversation, it must be owned, did not flow quite so freely as it might have done under other circumstances. The young man seemed occasionally lost in thought; and even when Marie was speaking, he did not appear altogether to understand her, though his eyes were fixed on her countenance with a respectful and admiring glance. His mind was evidently occupied with some matter of importance. He seemed at length aware of his behaviour, and arousing himself, told her that since they had last met he had spent most of his time at Antwerp, except a few weeks, which had been occupied in paying visits to several towns of Holland, to which he had been sent on business by his father, who was a wealthy merchant of the last-mentioned city. "He was well satisfied with the way I conducted matters," he added in a significant tone, "though formerly I must confess having had no great fancy for mercantile pursuits; I was less attentive to them than duty demanded."

Marie looked down on the ground as he spoke. "Antwerp, I have heard, is a very gay city. How different it must be to our quiet little town of Dixmuyde," she observed.

"Yes, in truth," said the young man. "People manage to mix pleasure with business in due proportion. We flatter ourselves that we vie with any of our neighbours in the magnificence of our spectacles. I wish that you could have been present at our last pageant, when the companies of Rhetoricians assembled from all the chief cities of Flanders, to compete for the 'Land-Jewel.' Truly the companies, in their gorgeous apparel, made a brave appearance, though I am proud to say those of the Painters and the Marigold of our own city won general admiration. The first appeared arrayed in garments of purple satin and velvet, forty horsemen heading them, all armed with swords and spears, and habited in short cloaks richly embroidered with silver and lined with satin, and doublets and hose of white satin, white boots, and purple hats with white feathers in them. The two leaders were accompanied by six footmen dressed in purple, four heralds, the same number of banner-carriers, and six trumpeters, besides forty footmen in coats of purple taffeta, with hose and doublets of white satin. But when I praise the magnificence of our companies, I must own that those of the other cities surpassed them in point of numbers, the variety and richness of their dresses, and the devices they carried. That of Brussels, for instance, was accompanied by upwards of twenty chariots, full of men magnificently dressed, and upwards of a hundred horsemen, besides pageants borne on men's shoulders, in which sat a number of young children, dressed in cloth of gold and silver and satin of all colours, preceded by a wonderful array of trumpeters, heralds, footmen, standard-bearers, and men in rich suits of armour."

"Do you seek to turn my brain with these descriptions?" asked Marie, looking up. "You know we see nothing to be compared to the scenes you describe, in this place. I have never moved many leagues from it."

"Oh no—no!" answered Gellert. "I merely seek to interest you, for I fear that you take too gloomy a view of matters; and I would divert your thoughts from the circumstances which seem so greatly to alarm you."

"Thanks, Herr Gellert," said Marie. "But, notwithstanding what you have described, I cannot help being anxious about my father; and I must ask you to go in search of him, and bring me tidings of the cause of his long delay from home."

"I will gladly obey you," said the young man; "and I hope to return very shortly in his company. As I passed through the streets, I saw no cause to suppose that anything was wrong." He rose, and, pressing her hand to his lips, an act which the customs of the times allowed, he retired from the room, accompanied down-stairs by Margaret, who—cautious duenna that she was—had not quitted her post at the door.

While the young man hastened to the court-house, looking eagerly ahead in the hope of espying Walter Kapell, Margaret returned to the room where she had left her patient. Poor Hans was sitting up, staring round him with an astonished and curious look. "Where am I? What kind witch has brought me into this palace?" he exclaimed. "She must have mistaken me for some one else. No one cares for poor Hans."

"Set your mind at rest about that, friend Kopperzoon," said Margaret. "My honoured master and his young daughter are the witches who brought you here; and their kind hearts make them care for you, and make them willing to serve you as best they can."

"Bless them for it! bless them!" exclaimed the poor idiot, still gazing wonderingly round him. "If they will let me, I will work and toil for them to the end of my days."

"A very right spirit," said Margaret, approvingly; "though, to be sure, Hans, I am afraid that your work is not likely to prove of much value."

"Let them try me; they little know what wonderful things I can do. They are the first people who have ever done a kind act to poor Hans, and I would serve them with my best strength and blood, if needs be."

While he was speaking, the door slowly opened, and Marie looked in. Hans caught sight of her countenance. "I knew it must have been a fairy who brought me here, and there she is. I see her! I see her!" he exclaimed.

Marie, on hearing this, very naturally slipped out of the room again before Margaret had discovered her; and Hans persisted, in spite of all she could say, that the very fairy who had done him so kind an act had just appeared to him. He went rambling on for some time, talking all sorts of nonsense, which it is not necessary to repeat, till Margaret, thinking he must be hungry, brought him some food. He ate it ravenously. He seemed to appreciate any act of kindness, and expressed himself in return in a perfectly sane manner. A slight remark, however, was sufficient to present a new idea to his unstable mind, which went wandering away into the strange regions of an exuberant and unregulated fancy. Thus he went on talking and muttering, till he once more fell asleep, his countenance exhibiting a placid look, strangely different from the expression it wore when he was awake, and excited by any cause.

Many doubted whether Hans Kopperzoon was really an idiot. He had often been known to act, not only sanely, but with much judgment and discretion. Some asserted that he was more knave than fool; but as he had never acted a knavish part, those people must have been wrong in their conjectures. Possibly he might have had his sane and insane moments; but even during the latter, he always exhibited a wish to act rightly and to serve those who trusted him. He was eccentric, however, both in his dress and manners; of that there was no doubt; though possibly his eccentricity might have been assumed, for purposes which he thought fit to keep to himself. All that people knew of him was that he had appeared suddenly at Dixmuyde; but no one could tell who he was, or whence he came, or where he had his abode; for that he kept as profoundly secret as other matters relating to himself. Even his name was given to him by others, though willingly adopted, and in time he came to be known as Hans Kopperzoon, the idiot of Dixmuyde.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS, FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. NO. 2. JONAH, THE PROPHET.

Chapters to be read—Jonah i., iii., iv.

INTRODUCTION. — As this subject will probably be altogether new to most of the children, the lesson should be prefaced by a few words of explanation.

Jonah lived about 800 B.C., in the reign of Jeroboam II., King of Israel. A reference to 2 Kings xiv. 25, will show that he prophesied to Israel. Question as to the duties of prophets from past lessons, and refer to Noah, to show that they were frequently sent to warn of approaching danger.

I. JONAH'S FIRST MISSION. (Read Jonah i.) (1) The message. God's voice in some way directed him to go to Nineveh (Note A). For the message, see chap. iii. 4. A definite time of forty days mentioned. So to the people before the flood 120 years (Gen. vi. 3). The reason for its destruction being its wickedness. So our Lord tells us we must repent or perish (Luke xiii. 3). (2) The flight. Caused by fear for his own safety in giving such a message. Refer to Elijah threatened by Jezebel (1 Kings xix. 2). (3) The storm. The story of this having been read and questioned upon, draw out the following points. (a) The sea is under God's control. Most children have seen the sea in a storm; describe its power and irresistible violence. Made by God (Gen. i. 10), aroused by God, calmed by God (Ps. cvii. 25—29). So here the storm, the movements of the great fish (Note B), the calm, all alike directly controlled by God. How this shows His almighty power. Tell the story of Canute rebuking his courtiers, and remind of Christ stilling the tempest. (b) The effect of witnessing God's works. The sailors, in fear, worshipped their false gods, yet convinced by Jonah's words, they did what he told them, after first praying God not to condemn them; and when the calm came "offered a sacrifice, and made vows." So did Naaman when healed (2 Kings v. 17), and the sailors when Christ stilled the tempest (Matt. xiv. 33). (4) The fish's belly. Ask what Jonah could do, and notice his prayer. In his trouble he sought God, and was heard (ii. 2, 4); and promises vows when delivered (ver. 9). This confession and thanksgiving are elements in all true prayer. See Hannah's prayer (1 Sam. ii. 1—8); Mary's (Luke ii. 47, 48). His being here a type of Christ in the grave (Matt. xii. 40).

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) The danger of yielding to fear of man. It brought Jonah into all this trouble. So Peter, afraid of servant's ridicule, thrice denied Christ. Christ gave solemn warning to such (Matt. viii. 38). This a frequent snare to young boys at school, servants in kitchen, afraid of ridicule if pray or read Bible, &c. Must pray for grace to confess Christ before men, and so be owned by Him hereafter. (2) The impossibility of hiding from God. Adam and Eve tried to in the garden, but in vain. (See Ps. cxxxix. 1—10.) Therefore must live and act always remembering how God sees us.

II. JONAH'S SECOND MISSION. (Read chap. iii.) (1) Jonah in the city. Describe the great city, requiring three days to journey through it; the strange prophet calling aloud; the news spreading; groups gathering to hear the news cried aloud; the story reaching the king; the alarm; the king leaving his throne, proclaiming a fast; the public confession and prayer; all the nation stirred as one man; the prayer heard, and judgment delayed. The children will remember the united prayer for the Prince of Wales's recovery, and see what a solemn sight a whole nation praying is; how the angels rejoice (Luke xv. 7), and God pardons. (2) Jonah in solitude. (Read chap. iv.) Ask why Jonah should be angry. Probably because the sparing of the city seemed to discredit his testimony as a prophet. Notice God's reasoning with him, and by the figure of the gourd (Note C) showing him himself. Jonah wished the gourd to be saved, because it affected his comfort; but wished the city to be destroyed, rather than destroy his reputation as a prophet. Show the children how frequent this feeling is; it arises from intense selfishness. Jonah had himself been spared, yet wished the city, with all old and young (iv. 11), to be destroyed. This selfishness his besetting sin. Contrast St. Paul in his preaching and work; never thinking of self, but only how to win sinners to God (1 Thess. ii. 9, 10). See also example of Christ —made Himself of no reputation (Phil. ii. 7; Isa. liii. 3), and died that we might live.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Do God's bidding without caring for results—as Abraham when told to kill his son. (2) Beware of selfishness. Love others, and thou wilt wish for them and do for them all possible good.

Questions to be answered.

1. When did Jonah live, and to whom did he prophesy?
2. Where is he referred to in the New Testament, and how?
3. What lessons may we learn from his flight and punishment?
4. Describe the success of his second mission.
5. What was his besetting sin, and how was it seen?
5. Give examples of unselfishness in working for God.

Note A.—NINEVEH. Originally a colony from Babel (Gen. x. 11); a city of immense size, seeing there were 120,000 children. After this escape Nahum predicted its fall, as did also Zechariah (ii. 13), and Isaiah (xiv. 24). It was taken by Nabopolassar, of Babylon, in B.C. 625, which led to the destruction of the Assyrian kingdom.

Note B.—THE FISH. Probably a shark, which has a large gullet, whereas the whale has a small one. Whales, too, are unknown in the Mediterranean.

Note C.—THE GOURD. The word thus rendered only occurs here. Probably the Ricinus communis, or castor-oil plant. The stems are erect and the leaves are broad, throwing an ample shade, especially when young.

A SIGH FOR THE SUMMER.

FALL—fall, leaves!
Why should you lingering stay?
All the golden sheaves
Have passed from the fields away;
Stubble alone is seen
Where rose the golden grain;
Why should you still remain
When gone is the Summer's green?
Where is the rose, her queen?
Hark! how the low wind grieves
For the lily no longer seen!
Fall—fall, leaves!

Fall—fall, leaves!
Pale is the once gold sun;
Sadly the dull sky grieves
For the glory whose race is run;
Why should the swallow stay?
Songless are bush and bough;
Where is the lark's thrill now,
Now the gold of the air is grey!
Brown is the once green year;
Moaning, the sad air grieves;
All—all is pallid and sere;
Fall—fall, leaves! W. C. BENNETT.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER III.

UNCLE VALENTINE.

TWO or three months elapsed, and one evening Philip was called in from a little party at Mr. Tabor's, to find the whole house in confusion, one servant having been sent for him, and one for the nearest doctor, while Fanny stood crying helplessly over his father's chair, in which the old man was, to all appearance, dying. He had a long illness nevertheless, or rather a long dying; and, as he lingered for months, Fanny watched over him with the greatest devotion. He recovered consciousness, but not the power of speech, or even of motion; so that you could but dimly guess at his meaning by the expression in his eyes.

Both his sons were present at his death-bed; but it was Fanny to whom he looked for everything—literally looked, for she watched his eyes, and knew when he wanted anything. She had raised him on the pillow, with Philip's help, and he was actually making an effort to speak, an effort which became painful to witness as it increased in intensity. He was evidently expiring; but again and again he roused himself, trying to articulate, while one and another bent over him with words of soothing.

"It is nothing he wants," said Fanny. "It is something he has to say. It is you he seeks, both of you, not me;" and she stood back, that his sons might draw nearer.

The long-pleading, fast-fading gaze wandered from one face to the other. Francis remained mute; but Philip stooped and said in clear tones, "Do not trouble yourself about anything. We will try and find out what you would wish to have done, and do it." There was no sign that the words had penetrated the dying ear; but his eyes rested on Philip a few moments longer, and then closed for ever.

Before the funeral the brothers had begun to look into their father's affairs, and to find that they were in a very disordered condition; but on the eve of that event there was a quarrel, and Francis washed his hands of them altogether. On the day after he went away, and all correspondence between the brothers ceased.

Philip Tenterden then prepared to leave his father's house, which, however, Fanny Lovejoy took over, furniture and all. She was rather hurt that Philip should go away, and that he should be so very particular as to a valuation of the things. She liked round numbers, especially with cyphers to them; and her affairs were to be managed by Philip, as they had been managed by his father, so what could it matter that everything should be so rigidly set down to the last sixpence before Fanny commenced housekeeping on her own account.

"Tell me what has happened," said Philip, rather abruptly, breaking the pause.

"Oh yes," cried Fanny, with another little laugh, provoking beyond everything to her listener, who would have given her a certificate of lunacy on the spot, and with a clear conscience. "He has turned up at last; I knew he would."

"Who has turned up at last?" said Philip.

"Uncle Valentine. Papa had a younger brother than Joshua, you know, one who went away and married beneath him, and was never heard of."

"Well, have you seen him?"

"Yes, last Monday; that's, let me see, two days ago. I was going out, but I didn't go, when he came to the door, and asked for Miss Lovejoy—asked if she lived here. The servant said 'Yes,' but didn't ask him in. She asked what he wanted, and he said he wanted to see me. And she said he couldn't, for she thought he was a man selling pencils or pens or something, for he looked rather shabby. But I was listening in my bonnet and cloak, and I heard him say that he was father's own brother, and I ran down-stairs as fast as I could, and asked him to come in."

"How do you know he is not an impostor?" said Philip.

"I knew he was Uncle Valentine," said Fanny, "the moment I heard his voice; so I had him in and fetched him a glass of wine, for he was all of a tremble."

"How did you know him?" asked Philip, interrupting her.

"By his voice; it was so like papa's," replied Fanny.

"But that is not enough. Did he show any knowledge of the family?" asked Philip.

"I told him papa and Uncle Joshua and all the others were dead, and that I was left all by myself; and he told me that he and his family had come down in the world, and were in great need of help just at present."

"I thought that would be the case," said Philip, in a hard tone: "and of what does his family consist?"

"Oh, he has a wife and four children, nearly grown up; the rest are dead, like ours."

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"Well, puss, and how have you enjoyed yourself?"—p. 30.

"He wanted money, of course?" said Philip, quite prepared to find that she had given all that she possessed at the moment to a rank impostor.

"Yes, I suppose so," said Fanny; "but I didn't like to give him a little and send him away like a beggar. A little would not do him any good. He wants enough to set him on his feet, he says."

"Doubtless," said Philip, who was now compelled to admit that it must have been Uncle Valentine of whom he had heard.

"And I thought I would like you to advise me what I ought to do," she added.

"As far as I ever heard," said Philip, "your uncle broke off all connection with his family of his own accord; and he has sought you out now only for what he may get."

"I wish Uncle Joshua had been alive," said Fanny. In his lifetime, the bachelor uncle had been habitual referee on all occasions of difficulty.

"Or your father," she added. "Perhaps, after all, I ought not to have anything to do with them."

Philip was silent for a little. There was a conflict going on in his own mind, and he became for a moment oblivious of his listener, whose round dark eyes were fixed patiently and wistfully on his face.

"No, I cannot go so far as that," he answered, after a time. "These people, if they are what they profess to be, are your nearest relations. The children can have no blame in the matter, and they are your first cousins. I think you ought to see them, and form your own opinion, and help them as far as you can without injury to yourself, for that, remember, would also injure your power of helping them hereafter. Give them what you can spare out of your income, but do not pledge yourself to anything like setting them on their feet. If people can't get on their own feet," he concluded with severity, "it's likely they won't be able to stand on them."

"No, no; I'll take care," said Fanny, joyfully, having received the sanction which she had desired. "I'll take care. You may trust me;" and she laid special emphasis on the last syllable, as if it was impossible to doubt her sagacity and insight. "Father always told me never to touch the capital, and to trust Mr. Tenterden. Do you know, Philip," she added, with solemnity, "I would like to make my will."

Philip answered nothing, and she wandered off into less important matters, certain to return to it at a greater or lesser interval.

Walking home that night—and he walked the whole way, through suburb and bye-way, over bridge and thoroughfare—Philip had food enough for reflection. He strode along, with set, drawn lips and knitted brows, and when he arrived at his own door he actually reeled, and had to grasp the railing. The sensation was not one arising from bodily exhaustion—he was unconscious of fatigue in those lithe strong limbs—but from a concentration of thought, which the sudden stoppage at his own door had jarred.

Mary had kept in his fire, and now asked if he wanted anything, with sleep in her brown, doggish eyes, at once faithful and furtive.

"I'm sorry I've kept you up so late," said Philip, kindly. "I shall not want anything."

Mary could have lain down to sleep at the back of the door for pure appreciation of his courtesy, as she turned away with her "Good night, sir."

It was indeed Uncle Valentine who had turned up—Uncle Valentine, concerning whose beauty and whose gaiety of heart traditions still lingered among the friends of his family—Uncle Valentine, who had set out on the high road of life with such brilliant expectations, such dazzling visions of success. His family had heard from him at first from time to time, each letter more overflowing than the last with hope and happiness. Liverpool was the place where he finally settled, and was lost sight of. There he had begun business as a general merchant, with a partner who had money it was to be hoped, as Valentine had but a few hundred pounds. Friends heard of the beginning of the business, but never of the end of it—at least from him; but the general business was reported to have ended in general bankruptcy, and with the absconding of the partner with the money of the firm, which appeared to have come entirely out of other people's pockets. At the very first sign of failure, Valentine had ceased to communicate with his friends. It was like him to wait for better times, and to go on sure of the future, denying himself everything but hope; but the better times were long of coming. He had been heard of again as a clerk in a Liverpool warehouse, married to the daughter of his lodging-house keeper.

Later, he had gravitated to London; but by that time both his brothers were dead, and the place that had known them in the vast city knew them no more. He had not even heard the names of the people who had received and protected his orphan niece, and he had not been anxious to make inquiries. He had still his fortune to make, and firmly believed that he would make it yet, though his locks were turning grey. He threw up a plodding situation as town traveller to an oil merchant, with £150 a year—on which his family had lived in comparative comfort—in order to turn commission agent, and make fabulous sums by per-centage on a patent invention. The pretty little house and garden had to be given up for a stifling court, for nobody wanted the new invention, and his old post was filled up. Since that time, endless had been the migrations of the family, and legion the agencies which Mr. Lovejoy had held; but the invention had evidently not yet been patented by which his fortune was to be made. But he could now look back upon prosperity as well as forward to it, and that was a gain. The days of his prosperity were those of his small but steady income, and his pretty cottage home, What flowers he used to rear in its garden. To his fancy they were brighter than any ever seen at the most aristocratic flower-show; what luxuries he enjoyed of Mrs. Lovejoy's own making; what holidays he had with the children, who were dressed in all the colours of the rainbow, in wonderful frocks and bonnets, of Mrs. Lovejoy's own construction. He had an excellent wife, and had reason to know it; one who made the most of every sixpence, and who believed in her husband with all her soul.

Alas! that these happy days were over and gone; alas! that she no longer believed in him, though she still made the most of every sixpence, and even helped to earn them. Husband and wife had been falling more and more apart; they had long been sinking deeper and deeper into the slough of poverty. One after another of their children died, always, it seemed, owing to some preventable cause, or rather some cause which poverty alone made unpreventable. They had been very pretty as children, and they grew up absolutely lovely; but the younger ones had been sadly neglected. He tried to teach them himself, and succeeded with the youngest, Ada, who learned without any trouble, remembered everything she learned, and had the voice of an angel. Indeed, all the girls had sweet voices, and picked up every song they could hear, or induce their father to sing to them. They had had a piano in the days of the pretty cottage—one their father had picked up at a sale. It had been Ada's delight as a baby, but not more than it had been her father's. Even after the old piano had to be sold, the singing went on. What cared the blithe young hearts for plainest fare or lack of gay garments; but it had gradually died down, as they grew older, and care fell more heavily, and the voices were seldom heard mingling in glee or chorus, as in more childish days.

They were very silent, and very busy at the hard, ill-paid work, which was their last resource, when their father returned one evening in elastic spirits. He had been coming home of late worn out and depressed, and the change was visible in his brisk gait and happy smile.

"You have had a lucky day, papa," cried Ada, her pale face lighting up all over.

"I should think so," said Mr. Lovejoy, rubbing his hands, and simmering with good tidings; "the luckiest day of my life is this."

"What is it?" asked Geraldine, looking up from her work.

"Do tell us, papa!" cried Ada still more eagerly, laying aside hers altogether.

Mrs. Lovejoy looked up for a moment, and continued her task with an energy of indifference.

"I've found out a cousin of yours, girls—my brother Frank's only daughter, living all by herself in very good style—indeed, she is quite wealthy, I fancy, and without a friend in the world. I am sure if I had known that a daughter of Frank's was left in that lonely way, I would never have rested till I had found her. As it is, it was the merest accident that I discovered her. I saw the name on a door-plate—it's an uncommon name, ours—and I thought I would ask who lived there. I asked a baker's boy, who served the house, and he told me that the lady was single, and I felt sure it was Frank's daughter. I had seen her, you know, when she was a very little girl."

"But how did you know, papa?" said Ada; "it might have been another Miss Lovejoy."

"You can't account for intuitions, Ada; I have had them all my life, my dear," he answered blandly.

Mrs. Lovejoy sniffed.

"And in this instance my intuition was verified, you see; and, what is more wonderful, my niece recognised me at once, and bade me welcome. She was extremely kind."

Mrs. Lovejoy could not help betraying some slight interest; but her husband's relations had been rather a sore point. She thought that in some way or other they might have turned up sooner to help them in their straits, only that she had given up believing in any help by or through her husband.

He was now assailed by a shower of questions: How old was she? What was she like? Was she beautiful?" those were Geraldine's questions. Was she clever? was Ada's.

Mr. Lovejoy found the queries rather difficult to answer. "One thing I feel sure of," he said evasively, shirking the beauty and talent queries, "she is kind—she will help us. I told her that I only wanted to be set upon my feet; with a very little capital I could realise a handsome income on the patent polish for instance—that sold well, if there had been any profit on it."

"And what did she say?" asked Mrs. Lovejoy sharply.

"She said she would gladly do anything in her power. Of course I told her that we did not want anything as a gift—that money affairs even between near relations were matters of business; in all of which she acquiesced. Yes, she was most agreeable," he added warmly, "and she is coming to see you very soon."

"To see us!" cried Ada, joyfully.

"To see us!" echoed Geraldine, ruefully; "I shall have to run up-stairs and hide myself, I'm sure; look at my feet."

"You needn't trouble yourself about your feet, nor yet about your head, Jerry; she'll never look near us," said Mrs. Lovejoy, adding, "make haste, or we shall have to sit up to finish, and waste coal and candle."

CHAPTER IV.

LUCY TABOR.

THE room was already full of guests when Philip presented himself at Mrs. Tabor's, on the 28th. After paying his respects to the busy host and hostess, he took up his station close to the door, a position from which his quick eye could take note of every person present. There, sunk in a low easy chair, was Fanny Lovejoy, airily attired in black net, and fanning herself with a black-and-gold fan. Beside her, seated on a high chair, and also in black, evidently worn as mourning, was a most attractive-looking young lady, fair, slightly drooping, and pensive, and entirely free from preoccupation. Philip catches her eye and bows, then his own wanders off again. The yellow lady with the black hair, the blue lady with the light hair, and the white and pink ladies with the brown hair—that was the rather uncomplimentary fashion in which Philip mentally distinguished the ladies present. When he had come round again to the yellow lady, he turned away his eyes; she whom he sought was not there.

Lucy had not been in the room when he entered, but presently she came up behind him, and frankly saluted him by name. He started perceptibly, for he had been looking the other way; and at this she laughed, saying gaily, "One would think I was a ghost."

"I think you are," he said.

"Why?" she asked.

"I'm not going to tell you," he answered.

"It's one of your riddles. I can guess," she answered, merrily. Such quips and cranks had been a favourite pastime in the old days, when Philip had sat with his legs over the garden wall.

She stood with her head a little on one side, trying to guess. "It's a long time since you were here, but it has nothing to do with that." A pause, "Won't you help me?"

"No," decidedly, from Philip.

"Then I give it up," said Lucy.

"I think you had better," said Philip, grimly.

"I am so glad you came to-night," she went on, putting a world of sweet cordiality into the commonplace words. "You used to be at all our parties;" and she looked, though she did not say, as if they were pleasanter then.

But he did not respond; and when she went away to another corner, he did not follow her, as she hoped and expected—for she wanted a chat with her old kind playfellow—so she held aloof from him, frankly disappointed, as any one might have discovered with very little pains.

It is a difficult matter to describe Lucy, who was neither short nor tall, slim nor stout, dark nor fair. Her features were rather round and childish; but hers was one of those illumined faces which seem transparent to every emotion, where the large clear eyes and soft full lips seem capable of expressing to the utmost the joy of joy, the very woe of woe. As yet, happily, Lucy had lived in the sunshine, and the illumination was one of gladness and of mirth. She was not a sentimental girl. She was too honest to manufacture feeling, and too shy at heart, with all her frankness, to show it; and she was not sarcastic, for sarcasm gives pain, and Lucy could not bear to give pain; neither was she opinionated, as some young ladies are, for she had not two opinions in her dear little head that did not belong to somebody she loved, and she exercised her intellect in making them agree with each other, so as to allow her to hold both when they happened to oppose—and not such a bad exercise of intellect either. But this is a description in negative, which every one who knew Lucy Tabor would protest against, for she had the most perfect individuality in the world.

Philip followed this charming individuality with his eyes, and saw her provided with a companion, a young man whom he knew, a pleasant fellow, and the best of talkers—at least in the opinion of unprejudiced people, which you may have begun to see Philip was not.

"There he goes," thought that gentleman; "just like a barrel-organ—any tune you please. Music, literature, art; art, literature, music;" and he stalked over ostentatiously to where Fanny and her companion sat.

He shook hands with Fanny, who was radiant with good humour, and more ceremoniously with her neighbour, Mrs. Austin, the widow of the late senior partner, whose name was still retained in the firm. Mr. Austin had been old enough to be her father. People had marvelled at the marriage after they came to know her; for she was so unlike the kind of woman who marries from mercenary motives. They rather suspected her of some great sacrifice. Then she had behaved so well to Mr. Austin. She had waited upon him through a long and trying illness with the greatest sweetness; and he, poor man, was anything but sweet. Her temper was angelic, every one said, for the old man had been irritable nigh to madness; and all that she ever did was to leave him quietly to his nurse, and take a walk for the sake of her health, or read for an hour or two in her own room. When he was unusually bad, she shrank and trembled and cried a little, and stayed away as long as she dared. People said she had been sold to him, and it was true; but she had behaved beautifully as wife and widow. This was her first appearance in public after a year of seclusion.

Mrs. Austin was what is called interesting. People liked to be introduced to her, and wanted to know more of her. There was a wonderful sadness in her face, which was, perhaps, its attraction. By the way, she was a perfect contrast to Lucy. Her face was an opaque one, with long and slightly sharp but perfect features, and large, but rather dull grey eyes.

Music had commenced, and was going on vigorously. It was a noisy duet which was being played; and two young ladies appeared to be scolding each other, one on each side of the performer. Philip stood behind Mrs. Austin in gloomy silence. She tried to say something that would lead him to talk, but hardly knew on what subject to begin. Had he read a certain book, the best of the season? He had; and they discussed several in succession.

"You are almost as omnivorous a reader of fiction as I am," he said.

"I should never have guessed it," she replied, smiling. "It is my world, this world of fiction; much more real to me than these living men and women."

"But it is necessary to correct one's ideas by a little knowledge of living men and women," said Philip, smiling.

"But how is one to get it?" she replied. "One knows so little of the people one meets. If I knew their histories, I would cease to be afraid of them."

"Afraid of them!" he repeated. He had hated heartily a good many of his fellow-creatures, but he had feared none. Then he reflected that she was a woman, and might fear where he hated. He had a strong desire to combat her fears, however; and he found himself assuming the attitude of a defender of human nature. "Men are bad enough," he said, "but they are not so bad as fiction paints them. I believe that, in this, imagination outruns reality. Worse things have been imagined than were ever done, I fancy."

"What dreadful things are in the papers, then," she said.

"You ought not to read the papers," he said impulsively. "You must remember that they drain the impurities and crimes of a whole nation into their pages. They represent life even more unfairly than fiction. If I had a sister, I would not allow a newspaper to enter the house."

"You are rather arbitrary, I think," she answered, with brightened eyes. "Do you think women ought to remain ignorant of all evil?"

"No, I am not speaking from the obscurantist point of view; I am simply pleading for a fair representation of life as it really is. When you read the daily papers, you are apt to forget from what a wide area their daily allowance of horror is drawn, and that a large proportion of crimes—all the worst of them, I am inclined to believe—are the result of aberrations of intellect."

Mrs. Austin smiled at his earnestness. "I have not got the length of fancying I may meet a murderer any day," she said. "It is not the passions of my fellow-creatures I am afraid of; it is rather their harsh judgments, their repulsions, their discords."

"And fiction, for its own purposes, exaggerates them all."

"Why do you read so much of it then?" she said, laughing, and showing her white, regular teeth.

He laughed also. "For the sake of company," he answered, "or, to put it grandly, to satisfy my social instincts."

"Are you so lonely, then?" she asked, in a voice full of sympathy.

"Lonely enough," he answered, grimly watching Lucy, who seemed to be enjoying herself quietly; while her companion divided his attentions, keeping however, as Philip could see, the largest share for Lucy.

"Your friends complain of your keeping aloof from them," Mrs. Austin said frankly.

"Do they?" he asked, with sudden eagerness.

"Mr. and Mrs. Tabor especially," she added.

"Yes, they are true friends," he replied, warmly; "they are not subject to the chills and changes of those who turn whichever way the wind blows."

"And Lucy is such a darling," put in Mrs. Austin; "she is just as steadfast and sincere."

Thus they talked while the evening flew on, condescending to little personal matters of likes and dislikes, and finding, as only people who have kept their first youth—though both Philip and Mrs. Austin might to ordinary eyes have appeared to have lost it—find, that they had very much in common, and yet feeling, as only two people who have gained by the loss of youth feel, that it is not necessary to be lovers to enjoy each other's society. These two felt that they could never be strangers again, as, though claiming a longish acquaintanceship, they had hitherto been. Each really knew a little of the other, that little which enables to know more. A certain confidence had been established between them.

Then Mr. Tabor came up, and said, holding out one arm to Mrs. Austin and another to Fanny, who had not spoken a single word during the evening, but had sat beaming and listening, "I have come to offer an arm to each of you, if you will go down to supper."

"I will take Mrs. Austin," said Philip, and he led her away. Just before he spoke he saw Lucy led off by Mr. Wildish.

But Mrs. Austin, who was very fond of Lucy, led him to the seat beside her, which was vacant, and so Philip had to stand and serve before her. He attended to Mrs. Austin's wants, and then he went away and ate a hearty supper of cold chicken and champagne.

When they were all up in the drawing-room again, the same group gathered in the same corner, with the addition of Mr. Tabor. "By the way," he said, addressing Mrs. Austin, "Tenterden here might look over the papers you were speaking to me about." Then, turning to Philip, he explained that Mr. Austin had left a mass of private papers, which it was desirable to go through, and Mrs. Austin required some help in doing so, as it was impossible for her to know what was valuable and what not, many of them relating to the affairs of the firm.

Philip readily promised to devote one or two evenings a week to the task, the time for beginning to be settled by a communication from Mrs. Austin. But suddenly, and without warning, Philip stalked away. He had seen an opportunity—Lucy standing unoccupied and alone—and he reached her just as another music storm set in.

"I haven't found out your riddle yet," said Lucy.

"Have you been trying?" asked Philip.

"Yes, all the evening."

"Hasn't Mr. Wildish helped you?" he said wickedly.

"I did not ask him."

"You are not up in ghosts, Lucy; you might have seen me acting one the other night, looking up at your windows. They were barred and bolted; nothing but blackness to be seen, not a single ray of light greeted me except that of the hall lamp." His tone was one of light mockery, but Lucy looked up with serious eyes, and asked wistfully—

"Why did you not come in?" She knew that he had been with Fanny.

"I was haunting the place where I had lived," said Philip.

"I shall never like to close our shutters again," said Lucy; "I don't much like it as it is."

He had not answered her question; but answering questions does not matter much when every look and every tone is an answer to unspoken questionings, that go deeper than words.

Philip and Lucy kept together for the remainder of the evening. Philip indeed saw nothing and heard nothing, beyond Lucy's happy voice. In vain young Wildish strove to enter the charmed circle; he was obliged to fall back and yield to Philip the claims of old acquaintanceship. That gentleman did not even notice Mrs. Austin go, and he was himself among the last to leave.

"Well, puss, and how have you enjoyed yourself?" said Mr. Tabor, touching Lucy's cheek, where the pure pale colour had deepened; "you don't look sleepy!"

"I thought it rather slow at first," said transparent Lucy, "but it went off very well; don't you think so, mamma?"

"Yes, my love," replied Mrs. Tabor, absently, and looking wistfully at the bright eyes and glowing lips, as bright and as glowing as if there were neither weariness nor woe in all the world, and no need of the night for either rest or weeping.

IN THE WIND AND THE RAIN.

DURING tea-time Maggie's father and Peter Morrison and the boys all talked of nothing else but the missing bag.

"We will be out after tea looking all over the roads," announced Sandy and Tammy.

"And do you think that it is you two creatures that are to find such a thing as this?" said Maggie —"ten shillings and everything!—such a like thing was never before heard of."

"Let them go, poor boys," said their father; "not that it is likely they will find it, but the searching will do them no harm. Now, Peter," he continued, "it's time you and I were off and away; the clouds are glowering over the hill yonder, and I am not pleased with the way that the wind is changing. Now, boys, mind your sister and do your duty; do not be playing daft-like tricks, mind you that. I'm off, Maggie, lass; look after the wean and the house, be wise, and do your duty."

"That is what father is always saying; the one thing with him is, 'do your duty'—just do your duty," thought Maggie, as she stood at the door watching the two men descending the hill-path to the sea.

Shortly afterwards the two boys rushed noisily by, headlong down the hill, in search of the leather bag.

And then Maggie had to attend to all her duties, and considering the size of the house, her duties were many and ceaseless; she never could afford one moment's idleness, and she had become so accustomed to performing all that there was to be done, that it was all a habit, and she never thought that it was a great deal for her small shoulders to bear.

Her happy, merry nature brought her easily and pleasantly through all her duties, and by the time that the baby was asleep and the house tidy, she became aware that it was getting quite dark, and the wind was blowing noisily outside the house, and Sandy and Tammy had not returned.

She opened the outer door and walked out into the dark and listened, whilst the wind blew the red hair about her face and pushed her along the path. By-and-by she heard voices not far before her, and in another moment Sandy and Tammy came up to her, evidently footsore and weary.

"What keeps you two out like this?" demanded Maggie in an authoritative tone; "do you know that it is ten o'clock and dark?"

"We were looking for the bag; but we think it's just a make-up from beginning to end. There is no bag about the roads; and Tammy has cut his foot again. I will not go out with him any more," announced Sandy, "for he is never content until he has cut his foot, and he is just a trouble to me."

"And did you two gentlemen think you were to find the bag?—go you away to your beds, and don't let me hear any more about bags."

As they walked up to the cottage the first drops of rain beat in their faces, and from this moment it came down heavily, and Sandy and Tammy and everybody in the house went to bed.

But the baby woke up with a yell, and Maggie did her best to send him off to sleep again; and whilst she walked up and down the kitchen with him, the wind and the rain beat against the little window.

"Father said he wanted me to go down and see if the light on the rocks was safe, if the wind and the rain came on," she said to herself, as she again laid the baby in his bed; "but it is a terrible night to be out, and surely there will be no need, father is so very careful about fixing it; surely I need not go out to-night."

She thought about it for some time, and then undressed and got into bed. She had almost fallen asleep when the striking of the clock woke her completely—twelve o'clock. There was the wind and the rain again; then Maggie sat up and listened, and thought over and over again: clearly it was her duty to get up and dress herself, and go alone, out into the dark night and the wind and the rain, and, in all probability, on a useless errand, for Maggie had often before performed this very office, and always had found the light burning steadily and securely in its niche in the rocks.

Ah, well, it would be better to go perhaps; and with a sigh, which was all pity for herself, she rose and dressed herself, and lighting the bit of candle in an odd little swinging ship's lantern, she drew an old homespun plaid about her shoulders and red head, and went barefooted on her way.

There was a short cut through the birch-trees, which her father had made for use when he was hurried, and thinking that under the trees she would find shelter from the wind and the rain, she hurried down the rough little path, screwing up her face and bending her head in the storm.

She had got accustomed to its roughness by the time that she arrived at the black cove and the rocks under the wood. On turning round a great rock a tiny spot of light met her eyes, glaring at her and at everything else. There was the light, safe and bright, and she went up to it and looked to see that it was quite firm and dry.

All was well, and then she said, "I knew that father would place it safely, and I have had all this journey in the wind and the rain for nothing. Never mind," and the usual bright, contented light came back to her eyes, "I am glad I have done my duty, as father says, at all events." And over the low wall she went, and would have been swallowed up in the darkness but for her little swinging ship's lantern, which showed her the rough little path worn by her father's constant footsteps to and from home to the sea.

By-and-by her foot slipped on something strange, something that was not wet and cold like the moss and stones, and hastily she turned and with her little lantern peered somewhat curiously on to the path. There lay a small brown object with a round leather handle. Quick as thought active little Maggie picked it up and looked at it. All at once like lightning an idea flashed across her. "Could this be the bag?"—could such an unheard-of piece of good fortune have happened to her, as that she should have found it?

One thing was certain, at any rate, it was a leather bag, and she had found it. And without pausing to think of the hour, or anything else, Maggie turned back and passed out of the wood, and followed the road down to the village, bound for the post-office.

She wondered how she could possibly have missed it on her way down to the shore, but she recollected, if she had not stepped on it now, she should have passed it unheeded by. Her father, too, had gone down to the shore that evening by the other path, and very few people but themselves ever entered that wood.

At the post-office door Maggie's usual vigour and energy did not fail her, and she hammered and knocked, and knocked and hammered until, after a very long time, some one unfastened the door, saying as they did so, "Who is there, making that noise?"

When the door was opened, there was only a very small figure with a lantern to be seen, holding out a brown leather bag.

"Please," said a voice, "is this the bag that is lost?"

"Bless me!—bag; who are you?" was said, and the bag was received by somebody's hands; and then Maggie stood quite still, while a great deal of talk and fuss were going on inside, and then Maggie was asked whether she had found it, and how and when.

And then Maggie, with the shawl about her head, and still standing outside in the wind and the rain, swinging her odd little lantern, told all about it, and ended by asking, in her turn, whether it was the right bag after all.

"Yes; did you not open it?"

"No," said Maggie, aghast.

"Well—well," said somebody, "ten shillings reward was offered for it, and perhaps you will like to have the money;" and something was held out.

Maggie's little disengaged paw was held out and something transferred to it, and the door was shut over the papers you were speaking to me about." Then, turning to Philip, he explained that Mr. Austin had left a mass of private papers, which it was desirable to go through, and Mrs. Austin required some help in doing so, as it was impossible for her to know what was valuable and what not, many of them relating to the affairs of the firm.

in her face. For one moment she stood still, and then, by the light of the lantern, she looked into her hand. There lay something golden and solid, and then she bounded off, the two bare feet more like india-rubber balls than ever.

"What will I do with it? what will I do with it?" she repeated all along the road.

When she was just getting over the wall which led into the wood, she saw a bright light coming along the path from the black cove.

"That's father," thought Maggie; "I'll wait for him."

In a few moments her father joined her. "Well, lass," he said, "are you not home yet? were you down looking after the light?"

"Yes, father; but it was all safe—I knew it would be. Did you get many fish?"

"No, very few; the nets are getting too old; but it costs a terrible lot to buy new ones. But what makes you so late, Maggie?"

And then, with a great deal of pride and delight, Maggie told her story, and her father's congratulations were as hearty as even Maggie could have wished.

"See, now," said he, "what you've got, and all this comes of doing your duty; if you had been sleeping, like Sandy and Tammy, you would never have found the bag. Now those boys are such wild, daft-like creatures that I could not have asked them to be down seeing after the light, it would have been useless."

"Well, father, the boys are very good, but they're young yet," said Maggie, with a certain small motherliness in her tone; "by-and-by you will see the helps they'll be to you with the fishing."

"Well—well, maybe. What will you do with your ten shillings, Maggie?"

"I do not know, father." And they entered the silent cottage, where the children were sleeping.

The next morning, when her father was mending his nets, Maggie told him that she had made up her mind that the ten shillings must go towards some new nets, and although her father at first demurred, he was at length only too glad to give in.

Then Maggie tucked her red hair tightly behind her ears, and tied on the apron, which was too long for her, sang to herself, and kept time with the active bare feet, with a lighter heart than ever, as she washed the potatoes.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

6. From what saying of our Lord does St. Paul derive his argument on the resurrection contained in 1 Cor. xv. 36?

7. Quote passages from the Gospels which show that many things were done and said by our Lord to the apostles which they could not understand at the time.

8. Though St. John does not describe the ascension, yet he records three speeches of Christ referring to it. Give the passages.

9. The word "paradise" occurs three times in the New Testament. Quote the passages.

10. In St. John's address to the church of the Laodiceans, Christ is called by a name which is given Him nowhere else in Scripture. What is it?

11. We are distinctly told the boundaries of the territory of the Amorites which was taken possession of by the Israelites. Give them.

FAR APART.

BENEATH the quaint old bridge you hear
The waves make music as they pass;
And, winding to the elm-tree near,
You see the pathway through the grass,
Where we were wont to walk, alas!

The river wanders as of old
Beneath the shade of willow-trees;
The sunlit waters gleam like gold,
And ripple to the gentle breeze;
But I am far from thee and these!

The sky bends over broad and blue,
And, in the soft and mellow light,
You tread the lane our footsteps knew
In former days, when days were bright:
Do these days bring such sweet delight?

And still that lane with grass is green;
With fragrant flowers the banks are fair;
In golden gloss and silver sheen
The bees still haunt the balmy air;
But you will fail to find me there.

Again, perchance, I may not see
The rustling rows of willow-trees,
(Which lent a leafy canopy
When we strolled underneath at ease;)
For I am far from thee and these!

Our joys forsake us. Soon does Spring
Pass by and for the Summer call;
Soon do the birds lose heart to sing,
When fading leaves in Autumn fall;
And Winter is the end of all. J. R. E.

THE TWO KINGDOMS.

AN ALLEGORY.

KING CARELESS sat in idle state
Within his castle proud and grand,
Though arbiter of many a fate,
His sceptre was but Folly's wand.

All heedless of the trust imposed
By health and wealth and power of youth,
His eyes to duty e'er were closed,
His ears stopt to ungenial truth.

So that the revenue came in,
He marked not how his agents wrought;
What acts of recklessness might win
The gold his greedy coffers caught.

The poor man was to him a beast
Of burthen but for his behest,
And that his wealth might be increased
Even the lowliest were opprest.

And callous natures gathered round
His ample board, and parasites,
With servile lip his praise to sound
And loose their selfish appetites.

They sang his nobleness of birth,
And ate his fare and drank his wine,
And scoffed at everything of worth
While wallowing like a herd of swine.

Art shunned his court, and Science hung
Aloof, where Liberty was not;
The poet's lyre was all unstrung,
Till Ruin stalked by hall and cot.

Queen Careful ruled a neighbouring land
With credit, justice, and success;
Nor harsh nor too relax a hand
Had brought her people happiness.

Faith set upon her noble head
A coronet no wealth could buy;
True majesty was in her tread,
A mother's love beamed from her eye.

The nation's welfare most at heart,
She strove for aye, by word and deed,
Some holy influence to impart,
And succour where there most was need.

And so affection stronger grew,
And health prevailed through all her state;
Ruler and ruled the closer drew,
And in the light of love grew great.

Her peaceful groves Invention sought,
And gave rich harvests to the world;
The scholar and the poet wrought
Where Freedom's banner was unfurled.

Philosophy and Art and Song
Gave pleasures that might never cease;
Right proved a deadly foe to wrong,
And stood the guardian of Peace.

These kingdoms twain but represent
Two precious human lives, and he
On selfish pleasures but intent
Shall surely drift to misery.

Be reckless as to duty now,
And let the passions of thy kind
Run loose, thy members soon shall bow
To any idol sin can find.

Use those high powers which all possess,
In some degree, for sensual joys,
Thou'lt give thy soul but to caress
That which in mere caressing cloys.

Self-love and vain conceit will bring
A host of devils in disguise
Of friends, and in their charmèd ring
Thou'lt take for truth their meanest lies.

They'll sweet, seductive stories tell
To fan the flame that doth destroy;
And when too late, thou'lt know too well
How heartlessly can sin decoy.

But rule the kingdom of thy mind
With constant care, and watch and pray,
And in the end thou'lt surely find Joys that shall never know decay.

Earth was not wholly made a waste
When Adam fell, the Source of Light
Left many a joy for those to taste
Who only would pursue the right.

So as Queen Careful gave her hours
To doing what was just and pure,
Go thou and gather virtue's flowers,
And vice in vain may set its lure.

Secrets shall be revealed to thee
That to the thoughtless are unknown,
And all that mortal man should see
Or compass, shall be all thine own.

JOHN GEO. WATTS.

THE VISION OF THE INVISIBLE ONE.

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

"For he endured, as seeing Him who is invisible."—Heb. xi. 27.

PART II.

MOSES enjoyed a sight of the Invisible One, or at least of that glory which indicated His presence, in a way in which we cannot; and it was by these special manifestations that he was prepared for the special work to which he was called. But setting aside what was exceptional and miraculous, there can be no doubt that Moses was a man who, in a very unusual degree, was influenced by a regard for those things which are unseen and eternal. He was one who set the Lord always before him; and who ever felt himself to be related to and in the very presence of Him who is invisible.

There is no need to point out how, in particular instances, this principle operated in the case of Moses; it is the one explaining principle of his life, and is seen working from its commencement to its close. It was this which enabled him to do what must have been for one in his position very difficult—to take a right view of things. He esteemed the reproach of Christ as greater riches than the treasures in Egypt. It was this which enabled him to make a right choice. He chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. It was this which enabled him to give practical effect to his choice—he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king. It was this which prepared Moses to become God's servant, and sustained him in the presence of all the difficulties and discouragements he had to encounter while actually engaged in God's service. He was called to do a great work, to engage in a very arduous and perilous enterprise—to reprove a king, to oppose the then mightiest dynasty of the world, and to advocate, in the face of all danger and opposition, the cause of his enslaved brethren. He did this, how well and nobly we all know; he did this, enduring the sight of Him who is invisible.

Moses, in going forth from Egypt, did not leave his difficulties behind him; it is not easy for us to form any conception of what he had to do and to bear during the forty years he spent in the wilderness as the leader and commander of that stiff-necked and rebellious people who so often provoked the Lord to anger and jealousy, and who were so ready to murmur against the man who was so entirely devoted to their service. But in the presence and under the pressure of all this he was wonderfully sustained; he endured as seeing Him who is invisible.

The influence of his communion with and vision of the Invisible One was seen in Moses' character, not merely on that remarkable occasion when, coming down from the mount, his face shone with unwonted splendour; but he was a man who must have been ever and everywhere recognised as one who endured as seeing Him who is invisible. It was this which gave character and complexion to his whole career; it was this which made him what he was, and enabled him to do what he did, and to endure what he suffered.

Let us notice next, that such a vision of the Invisible One should be the influential and sustaining principle in our lives. We have not had, nor can we have, such manifestations of the Divine glory as were vouchsafed to Moses, yet there are senses in which we can and must see God, and we ought all to strive after a sight, a continuous sight, of the Invisible One.

There is a certain inferior sense in which we all have, and always have, a vision of the invisible. We are all of us very largely and powerfully influenced by things and persons not seen; not only so, but by things that in their very nature are invisible. We observe many things which have no interest for others, while others see many things that we inattentively pass by. The minds of some have but few points of contact with the surrounding universe, and are almost devoid of sensibility: to them the avenues to almost boundless enjoyment are closed. Others have susceptibility of impression and readiness of perception to an amazing extent. The poet—the painter—the man of genius—is distinguished by the possession of this "vision and faculty divine." Such not only see what others see not, but are the world's interpreters, giving a voice to that which is silent, and affording a vision of that which is unseen. They see thousands of ministering angels, where others only see vacant space. They have forms of beauty walking with them in the garden of the world, where others have only an eye for the fruits and the flowers.

But this, desirable as it is, is not the most desirable vision of the unseen. We should value this faculty and esteem it very highly as God's precious gift, and yet it may be well for us to remember that men may see very much of God as God, as the Designer and Creator of the universe, they may admire His wisdom and power as manifested in His works, and yet leave that unseen and unfelt which it mostly concerns them to see and feel.

We must view God as sustaining a nearer relation to us. As sinners we cannot appreciate God thus; and though we may admire, ours will be a cold or fearful admiration, which will keep us standing afar off. We must be reconciled to God, feel that we are at one with Him, at peace with Him, be able to regard Him as our Father, our Friend, our Redeemer. We must see Him not only as He is made known to us in His works, but as He is made known to us in His Word; so that when we gaze upon His works we may feel that these are all expressive of our Father's character and love.

That which made Moses what he was, was not the mere vision of a material splendour, but a perception of God's character. When Moses besought the Lord to vouchsafe to him some further display of His glory, God declared in reply that He would cause His goodness to pass before him; and now, as ever, in God's goodness are we especially to see God's glory. We, however, have this advantage which Moses had not, we have the revelation of God's goodness and glory in the person of Jesus Christ, His Son. There have we the brightness of the Father's glory, the express image of His person, the image of the invisible God, the glory of the Godhead manifested. All earlier manifestations were but preliminary and preparatory to this; here, without controversy, have we the great mystery of godliness—God manifested in the flesh. In Jesus Christ we have the most real and direct—indeed, the only real and direct manifestation. Here have we the infinite comprehended in the finite, the unimaginable brightness, the unendurable glory, so softened down that we may gaze upon it without being blinded or dazzled, and dwell in its very presence unharmed. Here have we the true Shekinah—God dwelling with man, tabernacling in the flesh—Emmanuel, God with us. Here is God—the Invisible One, whom man cannot see—made visible in Jesus Christ; and so, looking upon Jesus, we have a vision of the Invisible One, more real and satisfying than Moses ever enjoyed.

The question is—have we had this vision of the Invisible One? Have we ever, with any true, saving vision, seen Jesus? There were many who, during His personal ministry, saw Him in one sense, who did not see Him in another: who were blind to His real character, and who, with contemptuous incredulity, set aside His claims. So still; there are many who see the historic Christ, who are acquainted with the facts of His history and the doctrines which He taught, who have no vision of Him as their personal Saviour.

But if we have this vision of God in Christ, of Christ in God, which is the true vision of the Invisible One, a further question arises, and a very important one: what effect will this vision have on us? In what way shall we be influenced by it? We have seen what it did for Moses; that also, if it work rightly, will it do for us.

It will enable us to take a right view of things. Much depends—the whole course and conduct of life may be said to depend upon this; and yet how difficult a thing is it to do! how hard is it to view present objects in any other than the light of this present world! the few trifling objects in the foreground fill up nearly all our canvas. Well, this vision of the Invisible One will enable us to form a correct estimate of those things that are seen; nothing else will enable us to view the things of this life as they should be viewed, and judge justly of the comparative worth of this world and another.

It will enable us to make a right choice. Moses chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of Christ than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, and he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; and if, like Moses, we are led to take a right view of things, we, like him, shall make a right choice; if we but see Jesus, we shall make an instant and a willing choice; we shall elect to serve and follow Him; we shall espouse His cause, and cast in our lot with His people.

This vision of the Invisible One will prepare us to become God's servants, and fit us to do the work to which God calls us. It is a very different work from that in which Moses was engaged, much less arduous; but we need to be trained, equipped, strengthened for it; and we shall only do it well, or do it at all, so long as we feel that we are working in the sight of God, and not of man.

This vision of the Invisible One will uphold us under all the trials and difficulties of our lives. We may lay our account with having to meet in the course of our pilgrimage with much that will be very trying to both faith and patience; we shall endure as seeing Him who is invisible. All will be well if we but see the Lord standing by us and strengthening us.

We find that after Moses' interview with God, the Divine glory was brilliantly reflected from his face; and though he wot not of it, the people were astonished and almost terrified as they looked upon him. So, if we hold habitual communion with God, have a vision of the Invisible One, the effect of our communion will be seen; we shall be recognised as those who have been with Jesus, and "with open (unveiled) face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord."

CHAPTER III.

MARIE had gone back anxiously to watch at the window for her father, with whom she hoped Herr Gellert would meet and return. Nothing unusual seemed to be taking place in the town; the streets were silent and deserted, the inhabitants being generally occupied with their mid-day meal. At last she caught sight of two persons coming down the street. They were still a long way off, but even at that distance she thought she could distinguish the figures of her father and her young admirer. Then other people were seen following. The Council must have sat long, and these must be the members returning to their homes after it had broken up. She was sure that she could not be mistaken. Walter Kapell and Herr Gellert approached rapidly. She hurried down to the street door to welcome them. As she opened it they stood on the steps ready to enter. Their countenances were grave and anxious, her father's especially. Several of the councillors who had been following them passed, walking two and two, and talking earnestly. Walter Kapell bestowed a kiss on his daughter's brow as she expressed her joy at his return, and told him how she had suffered from his protracted absence.

"We had grave matters to speak on, my child; but we will put them aside now. Our friend Gellert will dine with us, and do you tell Margaret to place the meal on the table without delay. He will, I fear, have soon to take his departure."

Kapell, followed by his guest, led the way up-stairs to the sitting-room, where Marie, having performed her mission, quickly joined them.

In spite of Kapell's intentions, he could not help describing to his young friend the matter which had occupied him so long at the Council. "One thing is certain," he observed, "the enemies of our Protestant faith are proceeding to even greater extremities than heretofore. You were with us when, nearly a year ago, we went to hear those two faithful ministers of the Gospel, Faveau and Mallart, preach in the open air, outside the town. Could persons pretending to adhere to the religion of Christ object to the pure and simple doctrines they put forth?"

"No, indeed," answered Gellert. "Not till then was my mind open to the glorious truths of the Christian faith, and when those beautiful hymns of Marot, sung by the assembled multitude, ascended toward heaven, I felt my heart lifted up in a way I had never before known."

"We must not trust to such feelings alone, though, my young friend," remarked Kapell; "unless the reason and heart are convinced and touched, such feelings as you describe may be very transient. But I was about to tell you of what has occurred. On proceeding to Valenciennes, the two ministers, after preaching for some time, were seized by the Government, and several false accusations being brought against them, were cast into prison. They were said to pretend to work miracles, and that in the presence of numerous witnesses they had undertaken to cast out devils. I saw sufficient of them to be certain that such accusations were false; no, their only guilt was that of reading the Bible to those whom they could induce to come and listen to them. Even in this small place many hundreds have been brought, through their means, to a knowledge of the truth. Still they were condemned to suffer death at the stake. That evil-minded and tyrannical minister of our lady governess, the Duchess of Parma—Cardinal Granville—seeing how strongly the minds of the people were moved in their favour, seemed to dread putting their sentence into execution. For six long months they have remained in prison, visited by their friends, while daily the people have crowded the streets, hurling threats of defiance at the authorities, or have pressed about the prison windows, encouraging their beloved ministers, and promising to rescue them in case the attempt should be made to fulfil the sentence. How heartily many here sympathised with their sufferings, you may well suppose. Often we have prayed for their deliverance, and the cardinal, observing the love the people have for them, still seemed afraid of carrying matters to extremities. Only this morning, however, news has come that he had sent down peremptory orders for their execution. The civil authorities at Valenciennes dared not disobey. Arrangements were made in the market-place for burning these true and faithful men. Stakes were fixed in the ground with which to secure them, and huge piles of fagots. As the hour arrived at which they were to be conveyed from their prison to the place of execution, crowds collected from all quarters. Thousands who had heard them preach, asked one another whether they would allow men innocent of any crime thus to be cruelly put to death. Yet the authorities saw no cause to apprehend a disturbance. Some, I doubt not, would have been glad to relieve their consciences, should the people make a successful attempt to rescue the martyrs. Be that as it may, a small guard only was appointed to preserve order and protect the executioners. Undauntedly the two ministers proceeded to the spot where they were to suffer death. They knew in whom they trusted. No coward fear paled their cheeks, or caused their limbs to tremble. The false priests of Rome stood round, in vain exhorting them to recant. They turned a deaf ear to their tempters. Simon Faveau was the first led forward. As the executioner was binding him to the stake, lifting up his eyes to heaven, he uttered the invocation: 'O Eternal Father! save those who trust in Thee.' The crowd, so the report goes, swayed to and fro. They were excited, yet hesitating. Already fire had been put to the fagots, when a woman from amidst the multitude, taking off her shoe, threw it at the funereal pile. There were those in the assembled multitude who had been waiting for this signal. Before the guards could interfere, vast numbers of bold men, rushing upon the barriers which had hitherto separated them from the place of execution, dashed them to the ground; while some grasped the broken bars with which to keep back the guard, others seized the fagots, already blazing up, scattering them in every direction, while those who had no other weapons, tore up the stones from the pavement, to use them as missiles against their foes. The slavish executioners of the savage Inquisitors fled in dismay, but the guard rallying, seized the two ministers, and before they could be rescued, dragged them back to their dungeon. The city authorities, dismayed at the popular outbreak, knew not what to do; but the Inquisitors, true to their character, proposed murdering the ministers in prison and hurling their heads amid the multitude in the streets. To this the authorities would not consent, fearing to raise the popular indignation to such a pitch, that they themselves would be the victims. Evening approaching, the people, in nowise calmed, continued traversing the town, chanting the Psalms of David, when information was given them of the proposal of the Inquisitors. They were now seen moving more rapidly, now pausing, recoiling, sweeping forward, swaying to and fro like the waves of the sea when it is agitated by contending winds. Some among them proposed that they should venture all and attack the prison; not a moment was to be lost. Onward they rushed. The guards, frightened by their menancing front, made but a feeble resistance. The doors were burst in or torn off their hinges. The crowd rushed in, dashing aside all impediments. The guards fled, happily without attempting to destroy their prisoners, as the Inquisitors would doubtlessly have had them do. The two prisoners, like Paul and Silas, were found in their cells singing hymns, undaunted by the wild confusion around them. They were borne off in triumph, and before the authorities could rally their energies, had been conveyed by faithful friends out of the city. Where they have gone no one knows, but it is believed they are in safety. Fearful, however, is the bloody vengeance which the Inquisitors have commenced for the insult offered to their accursed office. Already detachments of Bossu's and Berghen's bands of ordnance, together with a company of the Duke of Aerschot's regiment, have been sent into Valenciennes. The prisons are filled to overflowing with men and women, arrested for having participated in the tumult. The slaughter of these unhappy people has begun. Already ten have been burned at the stake, and an equal number of the higher orders, suspected of instigating them, have been beheaded. When the post set off, thrice that number were about to be murdered by these demons in human form. No one knows where it will end, and all this done because two innocent men were rescued from destruction."

As her father spoke, Marie's cheek grew pale, and her eye wandered anxiously, now at his countenance, now at that of their guest. The effect produced on young Gellert was very different. As he listened to the account the colour mantled in his cheek, and his eye flashed fire.

"A bitter revenge will they bring down on their heads," he exclaimed. "Oh! that our countrymen had the spirit to rise in arms and drive them from the land! Are we tamely to submit thus to be tyrannised over by a handful of foreigners, instigated to their bloody work by the Pope of Rome?"

"Nay—nay, my friend, we cannot defend ourselves with an arm of flesh. Let us seek by earnest prayer the aid of One all powerful to protect us."

"I cannot think, my honoured friend, that we are not justified in drawing the sword in a righteous cause, to defend our lives and dearest liberties from the attacks of tyrants who would enslave, not only our bodies, but our minds and souls," exclaimed the young man.

"Who is there to lead us; under whose banner could we assemble, even if the principle you advocate were the right one, my dear Gellert?" said Kapell. "Those who, from their rank and wealth, might assume the command, either stand aloof, or unite with the oppressors of our country. Such men only as Count Brederode and De la Marck go staggering about the land, mocking at our tyrants, yet doing nothing effectually to oppose them. It was this matter which kept us so long in debate this morning. Two days hence the Rhetoricians were to have held a pageant in the town, and hateful as the Cardinal Granville is, we know full well that he will be turned into ridicule, while neither the Inquisitors, nor monks and nuns, nor the Pope himself, are likely to be spared. I, with others, proposed that the pageant should not be allowed to take place. Such are not the means by which the false system of Rome can be overthrown. They may hold its gross errors and abominations up to ridicule and scorn, and teach the people to hate it, but unless their minds are enlightened by Gospel truth, no stable fortress can be erected against its aggressions and tyrannies. We may exasperate our foes, but we cannot overthrow them. Far greater reason has the system of Rome to dread the sermons and discourses of faithful apostles like Faveau and Mallart, and the free circulation of God's Word, than the noisy opposition of a thousand such men as Brederode and his friends, or all the pasquinades and satires which the Rhetoricians of every town in the country united can produce. I regret to say that the arguments of myself and those who sided with me have been of no avail, and the proposed pageant is to take place. May God protect us, and prevent it from bringing down the fury of our foes upon our heads. Do not you think I am right, my young friend?"

"You almost convince me, though I had never seen the matter in that light before," answered Gellert. "But what does Marie think?"

"I agree with my father as regards the pageant," she answered; "but if I were a man, and summoned to fight for a righteous cause, I do not think I should be content to keep my sword in the scabbard; but, alas! we are weak creatures, and have great need to pray for guidance."

The conversation was interrupted by the appearance of the waiting-maid to announce dinner, at which meal they were joined by two of the Town

Councillors who had sided with Walter Kapell. The conversation, as might be supposed, took a serious turn, and was chiefly on the events of the times. His friends urged their host to prepare for leaving the town, should danger threaten. Both declared that they had made up their minds to set him the example, and to escape to the happier shores of England, where they might enjoy liberty of conscience, and employ their capital and talents to greater advantage than they could at home.

"You are a marked man, Kapell," observed Herr Duffell, one of the guests, "and if the Inquisitors come to our town, you will be the first to be brought before them."

Marie had been engaged in conversation with young Gellert, while these remarks were being made. She overheard them, however, and after the meal was over, and their visitors had retired, tried to persuade her father to follow the advice which had been given him.

Although Gellert had purposed returning to Antwerp the following morning, he easily found an excuse for remaining longer at Dixmuyde. Apparently gay and full of spirits, serious thoughts often occupied his mind. He did not fail to see the danger in which his friends were placed, and he might by remaining be able to assist Walter Kapell, should his aid be required. Every hour, too, that he had been in Marie's company, his admiration for her had increased; and he now felt that she was, even more than he had before supposed, necessary to his happiness. He had not formally demanded her hand from Walter Kapell, but he knew that his intentions were clearly understood. He already possessed his own father's consent, who was, in the first place, anxious that his son should wed, and that he should obtain a bride of Marie's position in the world, and of the wealth which he believed would be hers.

The latter point, however, had not influenced young Gellert in his choice. He had seen and admired her before he knew her name or family. Probably had he been sent by his father to woo a wealthy bride, he would have found some excuse for evading the command, or have looked on her with an unfavourable eye. Marie, who had lived greatly secluded from the world, had met with few young men who were likely to prove his rivals, and they had not long been acquainted before she yielded him her heart. Yet hitherto they had not talked of love, but both were aware that their feelings towards the other were clearly understood. To some it may seem strange that in a time so full of troubles and horrors, such thoughts should have found a place in the hearts of any of the inhabitants of the unhappy Netherlands, but even amid scenes of war and persecution and turmoil and commotion the tender passion still asserts its sway.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER V.

A LAWYER'S LEGACY.

ON Sunday Philip called on the Tabors at the hour when he knew that Lucy would be out teaching her class at the rector's school; and he went away before she returned, to the great relief of Mr. Tabor, who had been made uneasy in his mind by sundry observations which Mrs. Tabor had made on the night of the ball, and who felt—what a good many fathers feel, in spite of modern mammonism—utterly disgusted at the idea of giving up his daughter to any young fellow, however worthy. How could any young fellow be worthy of a creature who had absorbed all the care and affection of two whole lives? how could he possibly have earned a right to such rose-leaf kisses as dropped every evening on the crown of his bald head when Lucy came to bring him in to tea and to coax him out of his guineas—not for herself, that would have been easy, but for some object of charity which he considered doubtful; and the little puss had lighted on this fact, and used it as an argument on occasions like these. "You know, papa," she would say, "you would give me ten times as much for a new dress, if I liked to have it, and I would rather have this and go with an old one. Lucy Tabor liked to shower gifts about her like a fairy princess, for pure delight in giving; and I think, for pure delight in giving, she might one day give herself, if anybody wanted her very much.

"Mr. Tenterden has been here, my love," said her mother, watching the effect of her words; "and he left his kind regards for you."

But Lucy made no remark. She neither turned red nor pale, nor behaved in any way unusual to her. Only she seemed that evening more lavish of her kisses and her smiles; seemed to throw herself more entirely into the sacred Sabbath music which her father loved. The small but perfect circle of husband, wife, and child, spending the evening together and alone in tranquil happiness, seemed as yet independent of the great chain of life, of which, with all its stress and strain, they formed a link.

"You see," said Mr. Tabor, when Lucy had gone to her room, "there is nothing the matter with the child."

"The matter with her!" repeated Mrs. Tabor; "of course not."

"Yet Philip did not seek her to-day as he might have done, if he had chosen," said Mr. Tabor. "He avoided her, I fancy, and she has not drooped in consequence."

"No, that sort of thing does not come on all at once, like a fever, with girls like Lucy. But if she cares at all for Philip, as I think she does, this way of his of keeping at a distance from her and then devoting himself to her, as he did last night, and then leaving her again, will only end in making her love him all the more. I have known more than one instance of a girl having her heart and life completely wasted in this way."

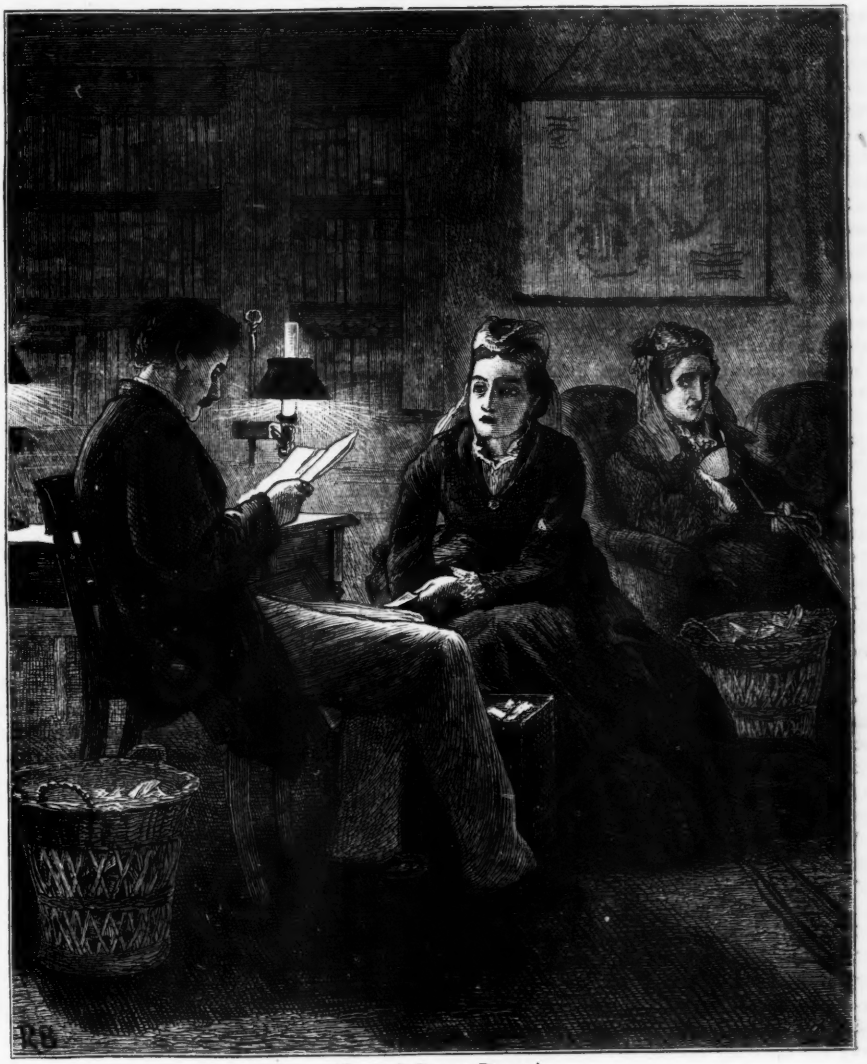
"Remember what an old acquaintance Philip is," said Mr. Tabor; "he would never treat our little girl in that way."

"Not knowingly," said Mrs. Tabor.

"Philip never does anything unknowingly," said Mr. Tabor.

Mrs. Tabor was convinced against her will, and every one knows what that means: she was decidedly of the same opinion still.

Next day Mrs. Austin communicated to Philip, through Mr. Tabor, her desire, if it was convenient, to begin upon the papers at once. After some little consultation, the Thursday following was fixed as the date when the work should begin; and Mrs. Tabor resolved to put on all her armour of defence against the foe who would thus be in such close proximity.



On Thursday evening, accordingly, Philip presented himself at Mrs. Austin's house; but he showed no intention of invading that of her next door neighbour, further than by glancing up at the windows. That glance, however, was enough to cause him first to smile and then to frown. The smile was for Lucy, the frown was for himself. Something more than a fool it was that he called himself when he saw a light streaming through a chink left unclosed in the shutter of what he knew to be Lucy's room, a little sitting-room set apart to her sole use, and opening out of her mother's drawing-room.

Philip was shown into Mrs. Austin's presence. An elderly lady was with her, to whom he was introduced, Mrs. Austin saying simply, "My mother, Mrs. Torrance, Mr. Tenterden." Then they all three adjourned without loss of time to the library, a room which Philip knew well as the usual sitting-room of the late Mr. Austin. A cheerful fire was blazing in the grate, and a couple of shaded reading-lamps were burning on the table. Three chairs were set in the circle of light, but a great leathern one stood back against the wall, among the shadows. It was the chair which had always been occupied by the late master of the house, and Philip had a curious feeling of the harsh old man's presence for a moment.

The papers which Mr. Austin had left behind him, and which were now to be examined for the first time, were contained in a series of black tin boxes, numbered and ranged along the wall under the lowest bookshelf. They agreed to begin with No. 1, and proceed in a thoroughly methodical manner, concerning which Philip gave a few simple directions. He placed the box between them on the floor, and at the side of each a waste-paper basket. Mrs. Austin was to hand over to her companion whatever seemed of the slightest importance, or related to business of which she had no knowledge; while circulars or unimportant notes were to be thrown at once into the basket. Philip, on his part, was to consult Mrs. Austin concerning the more strictly private papers; while he set aside any of the business ones which seemed to him worthy of preservation. Mr. Austin had been one of those men, generally anything but benefactors of their kind, who never destroy a single scrap of paper, written or printed, which comes into their hands. There they lay, papers of thirty years back, done up in bundles, and in packets tied with red tape, or threaded on cord, just as they had been when removed from their dusty pile—circulars, notices of meetings, appointments, drafts of letters and of ancient briefs, notes of cases, instructions to counsel. The baskets at their feet were filled almost in silence. They had not exchanged more than half a dozen brief sentences when Mrs. Austin rang the bell to have them removed and emptied, and they paused to take breath.

Philip had glanced now and then at Mrs. Torrance, seated in the chimney-corner, with an idle desire to know what sort of woman Mrs. Austin's mother might be. Whenever he did so, he found the lady's eyes directed on her work, though if he had glanced up a moment sooner he might have seen them watching her daughter and himself; and yet if he had glanced up a moment sooner the probability is that Mrs. Torrance would have been looking at her work all the same. She held an ivory mesh in her still deft and youthful-looking fingers, and netted with amazing rapidity, fastening every knot with a jerk which seemed to say, "That is a final business." The web at which she worked was stuffed into, and proceeded out of, a linen bag which lay on the floor; and Philip found himself taking an interest in the work which seemed so slight, and yet so strong. It seemed to him as if she was weaving the web of fate. It, too, is slight and strong; made up of the slightest threads of action, twisted ever so little, and yet not to be undone except by the fatal shears.

After the brief pause, Mrs. Austin turned to her task again. She evidently did not desire to play over it; and it was no child's play, for the mass of papers to be got through was immense.

"The baskets at their feet were filled almost in silence"—p. 40.

They had tea a little later, and had to wash their hands in order to partake of it. Mrs. Austin's almost transparent fingers were black, looked blacker than Philip's, with the dust of those bygone years.

After tea they resumed their work once more. At ten o'clock they had filled their baskets three times over, but they had not got through the first of the black boxes. However, Philip then rose and took his leave, and Mrs. Austin acknowledged, with a sigh of fatigue, that she had had enough of it for one evening. The task was to be resumed on that day next week, and so on each week till it was finished.

It certainly was not particularly interesting work, and yet somehow Philip had been interested in it. He took his way homeward under the December stars with a calmer spirit than usual, even after glancing up again at the neighbouring window, and ascertaining that a light was still burning in Lucy's room for the benefit of any homeless ghost who might be roaming near. Why he felt calmer than usual he did not ask himself. It was probably owing to a combination of influences: to his having had no time to brood over his grievances; to his having been surrounded with the subtle atmosphere of womanly refinement, to which he was now a stranger; and to his sense of kindly feeling in having been engaged in helping one so gentle and sweet as Mrs. Austin in the performance of a disagreeable duty.

Philip's grievances, as far as they were known, did not bring him any sympathy. It was known that his father had left nothing,—had even been to some extent insolvent, though to what extent no one knew, as his sons had evidently taken his debts upon their own shoulders. Then he and his brother had quarrelled, and held no communication with each other. But these things did not appear to justify the change in him, or to account for the mode of life he had adopted.

When he had gone, a little colloquy took place concerning him between the ladies he had left.

"My dear, I don't like that young man," said Mrs. Torrance, fastening a knot with an additional jerk.

"Indeed, mamma," said Mrs. Austin, but with very little astonishment. "Mr. Tabor likes him, and trusts him, and so did Mr. Austin," she added.

She did not venture upon any opinion of her own; she knew her mother too well for that. Mrs. Torrance would have simply jerked another knot, and said something which implied that her daughter's remark was quite irrelevant. Mrs. Austin did not even inquire into the reason of her mother's dislike of Mr. Tenterden; but her mother was ready to give it, and did give it.

"I should think he was designing, Ellen," she remarked.

Mrs. Austin replied quietly, "There is nothing to make you think so, mamma."

Mrs. Torrance was evidently rather astonished at the decision of the reply. Her daughter was not ordinarily so decided. She went on, "It strikes me that he is remarkably ready to give up his evenings to this tiresome job. It is not likely that a young man like him has not engagements that are pleasanter—at least if he has not some end in view. You are young, my dear Ellen, and rich, and he might think it an excellent opportunity——"

"Mother," interrupted Ellen Austin, but the word ended in a choking sob.

Mrs. Torrance looked perplexed. "I did not mean to vex you, my dear," she said. "You don't care for him, do you?"

"No, no—it is not that," she answered, but she did not explain. She went and divided the curtains and let them fall and shroud her, as she looked out into the night with a mute pitiful appeal.

Mrs. Torrance netted on faster than ever, glancing up at the curtain that concealed her daughter's figure. Nothing was sacred from that woman's tongue, though she could bid it be silent, tie it with a double knot if she chose; but she knew very well the power of talk over feeling—she knew that rosebuds unfolded leaf by leaf before their time will not open, but die. It was, or had been, the secret of her power over the finer nature of her daughter: the terror of that tongue of hers, not loud, but sharp—sharp, and, if necessary, tipped with poison, the poison of detraction and malice. And at present she was only trying experiments. She did not know how much, if any, of this power remained to her. As a married woman, whose husband had determinedly kept Mrs. Torrance at a distance, Ellen had slipped her neck out of the yoke, and Mrs. Torrance was not quite sure that she would submit to it again. But Ellen felt that she would. It is very easy to despise her for it, but gentleness was the habit of her soul, and obedience to her mother had been the habit of her life. It did not matter that hers was by far the larger nature, in intellect as well as heart, and that sometimes she knew it; her mother's sharp words, her mother's watchful eyes, would constrain her against her judgment and her will, and she would act upon her mother's decisions instead of upon her own, accept her mother's conclusions instead of her own—in fact, hand herself over bodily to every tyranny, while she escaped in the life of the soul. There was in Ellen a defect of will, a defect which had been her father's, and had been his ruin.

CHAPTER VI.

POOR RELATIONS.

According to her promise, and backed up by Philip's advice, Fanny Lovejoy determined to know something more of her long-lost relations. They lived at a considerable distance, and as Fanny was no pedestrian, and was apt to lose her way whenever that feat was possible, she hired a brougham for the occasion, and set out one morning at ten o'clock. Less than an hour's driving took her to their place of abode—one of an endless row of small houses in an unsavoury suburb of district S.E. But the houses, though small and dingy, looked respectable, and did not prepare the visitor for the poverty of the interior. Fanny, like many a woman of her class, knew nothing whatever of the homes where poor men lie.

A tall, gaunt, middle-aged woman opened the door, and opened it only a very little way, informing Fanny, who inquired for Mr. Lovejoy, that her husband and son had gone to business.

"I'm Miss Lovejoy," said Fanny, beaming on her in her usual manner.

Not the ghost of an answering smile dawned on the woman's face, as she said with a sigh, "I'm Mrs. Lovejoy. Will you walk in, miss?"

Crabwise, Fanny got through the narrow doorway and was ushered into the parlour. There was a handful of fire in the grate, and a piece of drugget laid down before the fire; but the room was bare of every comfort else. On a table at the window lay a heap of work, which looked like children's dresses, and two girls sat at the table, each with a small embroidered garment in her hands.

"That is pretty work," said Fanny, advancing, and they both looked up without speaking. "Are these your daughters?" she asked, turning to Mrs. Lovejoy.

"Yes, that's Ada and this is Geraldine," said Mrs. Lovejoy, indicating each; "Beatrice has gone to business."

"I am your cousin," said Fanny again, addressing the girls, and holding out her hand before she took the seat Mrs. Lovejoy had placed for her.

They each looked up with a pair of very bright eyes, and held out to her a little thin chilly hand.

"Now go on with your work," said Mrs. Lovejoy to the girls in a dreary hopeless tone, and they bent their eyes and began sewing together the parts of each little garment.

"I hope I am not hindering you," said Fanny, looking to Mrs. Lovejoy for an answer.

"Well, if you'll excuse me a minute," replied that lady with no excess of politeness.

"Oh, certainly," said Fanny, and Mrs. Lovejoy thereupon disappeared. Fanny was capable of a great deal of silence, and evidently so were the young ladies before her. She had time to examine their faces, and every detail of their dress and surroundings before another word was spoken. She had time to notice that their flimsy gowns were stained, patched, and torn; that they had trumpery earrings in their small ears, and enormous chignons disfiguring their pretty brown heads, that they had slim, graceful figures and clear complexions—Geraldine with rose pink on her cheeks, and Ada pure and pale as a white lily. Fanny's kind heart took in the pair at once. "Have you lived a long time here?" she ventured to ask.

"Oh yes, a very long time," replied Geraldine. "Papa has often wanted us to go away from here, but mamma wouldn't stir, she was tired of moving."

"Well I might be," said Mrs. Lovejoy, re-entering. "I've had ten children, and not two of them born in the same place; and I've buried six, and not laid two of them together."

"Dear me! how sad!" exclaimed Fanny.

"And this house is handy for the City, and for the warehouse where we get our work; and Albert's wife stays with us and helps pay the rent," continued Mrs. Lovejoy, "so the girls and me can live."

"How quickly they work," said Fanny; "I've been watching them. I could not do as much in a day as they have done since I sat down here. Is it well paid now?"

"We have to work from morning to night, all three of us to earn a shilling a day each. I've just been hanging up a few things to dry, and I'll have to make up the time, for they're busy at the warehouse with Christmas orders, and if you try to turn out the work when they're busy, they'll try and keep you on when they're slack,"—she had already found needle and thread, and was making them fly through the stuff.

"But what does Mr. Lovejoy do?" said Fanny, reflectively; "you oughtn't to have to work so hard as that." Fanny held the good old-fashioned notion that money-earning belonged to the man's part in the world's work.

"He's agent for selling something or other—something which nobody ever wants to buy," said Mrs. Lovejoy with a burst.

"Dear me!" said Fanny; "why doesn't he give up selling it then?"

"He has given up things often enough, and worn the shoes off his feet looking for something else, and when he got it it was worse than ever; they wanted the new thing less than the old."

"It must be very disheartening," said Fanny with sincere sympathy.

"Disheartening!" exclaimed Mrs. Lovejoy, who had got upon her great grievance, and was communicative in a cheerless fashion; "I should think so, to keep going and going where nobody wants you, and asking and asking, and never getting. I couldn't live such a life. When the girls or me go to the warehouse, and they say they haven't any work for us, we're hard put to it before we can go back again. It turns me sick to have to beg for it like, and I've seen Ada and Jerry crying before they'd do it. But nothing disheartens Mr. Lovejoy. He's been going to make a fortune every day the last thirty years, and all the time we've been getting worse and worse off, till I wouldn't trust to him any longer, and I only wish I had settled to work before we got so poor and had to part with everything."

"You have a son?" said Fanny, wondering how such poverty had come about.

"Yes, Albert has enough to do with himself. He has a wife and two children, and he hasn't been fortunate." She was not going to be communicative on this subject.

"And they live here?" said Fanny.

"Yes, up-stairs."

"Might I go and see them?" she asked.

"Oh yes," replied Mrs. Lovejoy. "Jerry, take your cousin up to see Emily and the children." Geraldine rose, and it seemed as if her wretched dress would fall from her tall figure as she led the way up the narrow stair. But the rooms when reached were not uncomfortable, though far from tidy; that is to say, they were carpeted, and one furnished as a bedroom, the other as a parlour. Fanny was introduced to a white-faced girl with a superabundance of dark hair, who was suckling a baby; while a little fellow between two and three years old stood by her side, quiet, but with evidences of recent riot all around him. Fanny thought she saw traces of tears on Emily's face, and after a little chat with the passive young creature retreated.

"We sleep up-stairs," said Geraldine, pointing upward as they closed Mrs. Albert's door; and Fanny took it as an invitation to ascend, and did not in the least observe the girl's evident reluctance.

"This is our room, and that is mother's," said the girl, as she opened the doors, blushing crimson and coughing terribly.

"But you don't sleep here?" said uncomprehending Fanny.

"Yes, we do," said the girl, with a suppressed sob. "Mother had to part with the beds when we were slack in the summer-time."

"Dear me!—dear me!" said Fanny, weeping, and stumbling down the steep stairs. "You'll come and see me," she said to the group as she re-entered the parlour.

Mrs. Lovejoy replied that she seldom went from home.

"But you'll let the girls come?" said Fanny. "Could they come and dine with me on Sunday next?"

Mrs. Lovejoy hesitated. "Beatrice might," she replied; "she has boots. But Ada's and Geraldine's are both worn out, and they catch cold with the wet coming in. Other things they can make up for a trifle, but boots are boots."

"You'll let me make my cousins a little present?" said Fanny, shyly. "This is a rather pretty purse;" and she put hers into Geraldine's hand. "You can share what is in it between you;" and saying good-bye, she hurried out of the house, with head and heart both a good deal fuller than they could well hold.

The examination of the contents of the purse took place as soon as the door had closed upon their visitor. Geraldine shook out into the palm of her hand four sovereigns, and six-and-sixpence in silver, and in spite of the impassivity with which she had received her husband's relative, Mrs. Lovejoy trembled with excitement as she saw the glitter of the gold. She had felt very little interest in the advent of her husband's niece. She was only another of the mare's nests which Mr. Lovejoy was perpetually finding, and which, far from supplying the fabulous riches he had believed them to contain, had failed to furnish his family with daily bread. She had listened every day since the new discovery to schemes in which his niece's wealth and his niece's influence bore a part, but in which so much was taken for granted that Mrs. Lovejoy may be pardoned a little impatience, when presented with the results, as quite equivalent to bread-and-butter realities.

Mr. Lovejoy felt assured all his difficulties would now be at an end; but Mrs. Lovejoy refused to believe that hers would ever end on this side the grave. She was utterly faithless as to any good Fanny's advent was likely to produce. She had been misled and tortured all her life by visions of wealth amid ever-increasing poverty. She was a woman who could only enjoy realities. Heaven knew her sufferings had been real enough. As for her husband, he enjoyed delusions: he, for his part, lived on dreams. He would have preferred dry bread and a bare pallet with them, rather than feasting and a canopy of state without them.

Often and often had he neglected the sound advice of his wife to follow the cheats and snares of his foolish fancy. What! accept some ill-paid, easy drudgery, when he might create a great branch of industry, be entreated to accept a partnership in the concern which was indebted to him for its prosperity, extend and multiply the business till it had its agents all over the globe, and die a millionaire! Mrs. Lovejoy, poor woman, had long ceased to believe in this sort of thing, and she actually trembled at the sight of Fanny's gold, as if fresh misfortune might come to her with the realisation of the least part of her husband's new delusion.

But she was recalled to her senses by the question, what was to be done with the money? instantly propounded by Geraldine. She counted it over, halved it, and handed the half to her sister, who at once, and with eyes moist with glad emotion, handed it to her mother. Geraldine retained hers a little longer, returning it to the purse, which she rattled in her hand.

"It would be so nice to spend it. I believe I could spend it all on myself," she said.

"Do you think she meant Beatie to have a share?" said Ada.

"Not at all," replied Geraldine, stoutly. "She said plainly, 'Divide it between you.' Beatie does not need it as we do, and she would keep it all to herself. I'm glad she was not here."

"She is sure to think she ought to have some," said Ada.

"There, mother," said Geraldine, with a sigh of resignation, and tumbling out the money once more, this time into her mother's hand; "you'll let us have what you can spare, won't you, just to make ourselves like other girls?"

"I'll go and buy you each a pair of boots at once," said the mother. "Then there's the rent; we're six weeks behind with that, and we'd better pay it up. And the baker and the grocer."

"Oh, mother! you'll spend it all," said Geraldine, who had had a vision of a smart hat, and saw it fading away from her.

"No, I won't, my dear. You must be decent to go there"—meaning to her cousin's—"and I'll only pay part; it will make them willing to wait for the rest. But what we should have done without this money I don't know."

Mrs. Lovejoy got herself ready with speed, and went out on her various missions with a lighter heart than she had had for many a day—nay, she actually found herself, after the first excitement was over, dreaming of other good things to come from the same source—not for herself, but for her children.

When she was gone, Geraldine ran up-stairs for a few minutes to tell her sister-in-law, and to snatch the baby, to whom she promised, not greatly to his satisfaction it seemed, a new pair of sleeve-ribbons.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS, FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 3. NAAMAN THE SYRIAN.

Scripture to be read—2 Kings v. 1—19.

IN this story many incidental lessons come in, on the duties of servants, &c., but the main lesson of Naaman and his leprosy should be kept quite clear and distinct.

I. NAAMAN'S DISEASE. (Read ver. 1—4.) Ask who Naaman was, and describe his position—next in honour to the King of Syria, and chief captain of his army, like Potiphar to Pharaoh, and Joab to David—great and powerful, rich, with servants and carriages, but a leper. (Note A.) Who could help him? Not his master, much as he valued him; not his false gods; he was to be taught to seek the true God of Israel. Now ask about the little captive maid; describe her position—taken from her home, friends, &c., and made a slave; but she had not forgotten God in a strange land; and, though a child, she realised God's power, and could speak of His goodness. Ask what lessons she teaches of love and trust and willingness to do all she could. She could help her master when none else could. What she did was accepted and blessed, like the woman commended by Christ, who did what she could (Mark xiv. 8).

II. NAAMAN'S MISTAKE. (Read ver. 5—10.) Picture Naaman's feeling when he heard of the prophet—how he would send for the little maid, question her himself, then rush off to the king, eagerly ask for his help. How ready the king was to do all he could, showing how much he valued him. Then ask what mistake Naaman and the king made—taking money to buy a cure, and a command to the King of Israel to heal him. Naaman's visit sure to cause commotion—this rich but leprous man—news of his coming and its object would spread abroad; at last reached the ears of the prophet Elisha; his message; why he wished Naaman to be sent to him—not for his own glory, but to teach him of the true God.

III. NAAMAN'S CURE. (Read ver. 9—14.) Picture the scene at the prophet's house—chariot with horses at the door, servants around, a crowd standing about. What did Naaman expect? A miracle performed upon him, with no effort on his part; and that the prophet would be proud of the honour of doing it for such a great man. What did he get? A message by a servant to wash in the Jordan. Was this rude on the part of Elisha? What did he want to teach him? Naaman thought a great deal of himself, was proud, and knew not the Lord. He must learn that God is no respecter of persons; all must have humility and meekness if they would learn of Him (Matt. xi. 29).

Now picture Naaman's disappointment. (Read ver. 11—14.) Turned away from Elisha's house with no hope, too proud to submit to such a simple cure. Why not wash in one of the fine rivers of his own country? He worked himself into a rage. Who came and spoke to him? This showed he was a kind master, or they would not have dared. Ask how they spoke—(a) wisely, giving good advice, pointing out how easily he would have been willing to do some great thing; and they spoke (b) respectfully, calling him father. How easily they might have inflamed him against the prophet, instead of which they urge him to obey. Then describe the cure—the chariot rolling on to the Jordan—the river of many memories—Israelites crossing, Elijah crossing it—proud Naaman getting down, dipping seven times, and coming out cleansed. His faith and obedience produced a complete and immediate cure.

IV. NAAMAN'S GRATITUDE. (Read ver. 15—19). How would he be likely to feel? Grateful, of course; but would the proud man like to return to the prophet whose message he at first despised? What does his return show? Not only had he become humble, but expressed belief in the true God. This the right effect of all miracles. So when Christ healed ten lepers, one worshipped and gave thanks, who, like Naaman, was a stranger (Luke xvii. 17). How did Naaman want to show his gratitude? Why would not Elisha take the present? He had only done his duty; he did not want reward: so he dismisses him in peace. (Note B.)

V. PRACTICAL LESSONS. (a) Naaman's state of leprosy may remind of the leprosy of sin. Show that all good qualities and endowments of body and mind can profit nothing till this is cured (Isa. i. 5). (b) His bathing in the Jordan will represent the fountain open for sin and uncleanness (Zech. xiii. 1). (c) His reluctance is like the pride of man, which thinks God's way of salvation too simple. We must become as children if we would enter God's kingdom; be born of water and Spirit (John iii. 5). Only those who humble themselves can be saved; like the publican, must own themselves sinners (Luke xviii. 13). (d) His gratitude reminds us of the homage God expects from all His servants in a contrite heart and a devoted life (Rom. xii. 1).

Questions to be answered.

1. Who was Naaman? Describe his greatness and misery.
2. What mistake did he make, and how was it remedied?
3. Show how servants may be useful, and how they should speak to their masters.
4. Describe Naaman's cure.
5. What qualities did he show after he was cured?
6. Of what is all the story typical?

NOTE A.—LEPROSY. There were two kinds; one not so bad as the other, commonly called the "white leprosy," not infectious. This was what Naaman had, as shown by the servants being near him; and also Gehazi, who being punished with Naaman's leprosy "for ever," became white as snow, and afterwards was still in attendance upon the prophet.

NOTE B.—DEPART IN PEACE. A difficulty has been felt about Naaman's asking to be excused for going into the house of Rimmon, just after professing that he would serve none but God. The difficulty will probably not occur to the children; but if it does, it must be explained that he would have to attend the king officially, as a Jewish lord mayor sometimes has to go to church in state where Christ is worshipped. If Naaman did not worship himself, he would not be doing wrong.

THE TRIBUTE OF MONEY.

"DOTH not your Master pay tribute?" With respect to this miracle, we must bear in mind that there was payable from every adult male among the Jews the sum of half a shekel yearly for the treasury of the Temple. There is a regulation to this effect in Exod. xxx. 11—16; but it is far from certain that it was intended to be a yearly payment. It came, however, to be so understood, and was in general paid very willingly to the appointed collectors by all Jews, even by those who dwelt in foreign parts. The sum may be taken as equivalent to fifteen pence. Our Lord was now at Capernaum, His headquarters, where He mostly resided, and during His absence the payment of this Temple tribute had occurred. As He and His disciples passed through the streets the collectors—who were respected men, and not despised like the publicans who collected the Roman taxes—spoke to Peter, and asked him if his Master payed tribute. They addressed him, as he was a householder in the town, and probably Christ lodged with him, and they presumed that he would know his Master's intentions. Some think that an occasion was sought against the Master, designing, if He refused, to represent Him as disaffected towards the Temple service, and His followers as lawless people. Others again are of opinion that they asked this with respect, intimating that if He had any privilege to exempt Him from the payment, they would not insist upon it. Peter promptly answered, "Yes," thus pledging his Master to pay the tax. He knew that it was His custom to comply with the law, and had heard from His own lips that His mission was not to destroy but to fulfil it. Christ had evidently not heard the remarks that passed between the collectors and His apostle, so when they entered the house Peter was about to explain the circumstance that had just occurred, when Jesus anticipated him, and put a question to him in order that His disciples might not be offended at the demand for tribute, when they see that He knows even those things that are done in His absence. The proof He gives of this is by asking the question—

"Of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? of their own children, or of strangers? Peter said unto him, Of strangers. Jesus saith unto him, Then are the children free." Here the argument is very clear—kings do not take tribute of their sons; but the Temple was His Father's house, and therefore no claim could be rightly made upon Him for this tribute. Thus He asserts His right, yet seeing He had taken upon Himself the lowliness of the flesh, He ought to fulfil all righteousness, therefore it was His purpose to pay it, to avoid giving needless offence, and increasing people's prejudices against Himself and His doctrines, and alienate their affections from Him, and lest it should be imputed to Him that He was an enemy of the Temple, and sought its ruin, by setting the example of withholding the tax on which its maintenance chiefly depended, He quietly submitted to the customs of His country, and of the church in which He was born and educated. We notice here how wise and temperate His zeal was; that it did not expend itself in a furious contention for, or opposition to, things of an indifferent nature. But He had not the money—not fifteen pence! No doubt this sum might have been procured some way without much difficulty, and there was no positive need of a miracle to supply the want. But our Lord saw fit to connect in the minds of His disciples this voluntary humiliation on His part, with an act which might re-assert the dignity which might by this concession seem to have been somewhat compromised.

"Lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money: that take, and give unto them for me and thee." In these words are recorded the orders Christ gave to Peter; the effect is not particularly mentioned, but taken for granted, and justly, for with Christ saying and doing are the same thing. Fish are easily caught in this mode in the same lake at this day, and it is not unusual for travellers on reaching any of the towns on its banks, to order a dinner of fish, and presently to see a man returning from the lake with an ample supply which he has taken by a hook and line from the shore. There is no necessity for assuming that the coin was created for the occasion. We know that it is by no means uncommon for fish to catch at anything very bright; and hence there are numerous anecdotes of articles in precious metals being found in fish. The wonder consists, not in the money being in the fish's mouth as foretold by Christ, but in the fact that the first fish that came to the hook contained the precise sum that had been indicated. There is evidence of His Divinity, not only in the foreknowlede of the fact, but in impelling the fish containing this coin, and that one only out of the myriads in the lake, to the hook of Peter. The coin found in the fish's mouth was a stater, which is equivalent to two didrachmæ, and a didrachma was the amount of tribute money to be paid by each one subject to the tax.

As we wonder at Christ's power, may we admire Peter's faith, who was obedient to the command of His Master in no easy matter. In reward for this he was joined with His Lord in the payment. An abundant honour.

RECKLESS JACK.

"TALLY-HO! tally-ho!" cried a youth in hunting-dress. His horse galloped along, clearing hedges and ditches as if the world lay smooth before him. On they went, swift as the birds they frightened in their course, the sun shining brightly upon the hard, frosty ground, everything seeming to conduce to the happiness of horse and rider, who equally enjoyed the sport. Jack used no whip that day. Suddenly they came to a hedge of unusual height. Undaunted, they attempted to clear it, but failed, for the horse's leg caught in a bough, and they went over headlong into a ditch, the rider being thrown right over the animal's head. For the moment he lay stunned. Recovering himself, however, he tried to rise, but finding that he could not, he blew his horn. The horse, poor beast, startled by the noise, darted off at a furious rate, leaving his master alone, exhausted and helpless upon the ground. Fortunately his call had been heard, and a brother huntsman was rapidly approaching the spot whence the sound seemed to proceed.

"I say, Jack, old fellow, who'd have thought of seeing you in this plight? This'll never do. Why, what has become of your horse?" said the new comer, as he dismounted and fastened his steed to a tree.

"Oh, is it you, Charlie? I'm so glad you've come. I'm in such awful agony; I think I'm dying. Do you think you could get a doctor?"

"Well, I don't know, in this out-of-the-way place. Let me have a look at you and see if I can do anything. But how is it you're here at all? I thought your father had forbidden you to hunt again after laming Nellie the other day," said he, proceeding to examine Jack's wounds.

"Yes, I know he did; but as they all went out to-day, I thought it would be a good opportunity for one more ride; but I repent it now. I'm afraid I shall never get well again, I feel so bad; and what is worse I shall never dare to look my father in the face again."

Charlie Montague then began bandaging his arm and leg as best he could with pocket-handkerchiefs, for both were broken, and gave him some water from a flask.

"I wonder you're alive at all," said he; "I don't think I should have been; but, thanks to strength and spirits, there is a chance for you, and you may soon get well. Upon my word, I don't know what we're to do; I can't leave you here alone, that's clear, to go and fetch a doctor, and it's quite certain you must have some one to attend to you properly, or else your wounds will turn out ugly. I'll just follow your example, and blow a stave or two, some one may chance to hear it; but I don't know of anybody nearer than Jones, and his cottage, as you know, is quite a mile and a half off, and what's more, I don't suppose he'd trouble himself to come so far."

However, he blew and blew as if he meant to break the horn, nor did he blow in vain, for at last up came a little old woman, panting and puffing as if she had run for her life.

"Oh, Master Charlie! is it you? I thought some one must be hurt, and so as John was out I came off to see for myself if I could be of any use. Let's see the young gentleman. Law bless me, if it aint Master Jack! Well, I always thought he'd come to harm some day—flesh and blood can't do them things him and his horse were always trying at. Well, well, now to get out of it as best we can, Master Charlie."

Both set to work to try and get Jack to the cottage. They strapped him on the back of Charlie's horse as securely as they could, and went slowly along, one walking on each side to prevent him slipping; they were compelled, however, to stop every now and then, as the motion caused him extreme pain. At length they accomplished their journey, and arrived at their destination just as it was growing dusk. Upon their arrival Jack was laid carefully on the bed, the doctor immediately sent for, one message taken to his home and another to Charlie's, stating what had happened, and that he intended remaining at the cottage that night to render what assistance was in his power.

Jack Rolands was a spirited youth of eighteen, the only son of very rich parents. When very young he had learned to ride, his father being a great sportsman and the owner of a fine stud of horses. They had had the greatest difficulty in keeping him out of danger, for when once on horseback he seemed to lose all restraint, and would ride on in the most reckless manner. Only a week before the accident I have just related he had lamed his father's favourite hunter, in consequence of which he had been forbidden to go out again unless accompanied by some one. But Jack, finding himself alone, as has been told, could not resist the temptation, and knowing the groom had not received orders to the contrary, ordered him to saddle a horse, and started off, as he thought, for a delightful ride. We have seen the consequences.

Late at night Mr. and Mrs. Rolands arrived at the cottage. Jack was too much ashamed to look up as they entered his bedroom, and hid his face under the bed-clothes; but they went up to his bedside and affectionately asked him if he was better, nor did they even allude to his disobedience. This kindness affected him more than the expected reproof would have done; he burst into tears, said how sorry he was for what he had done, and begged for forgiveness.

"We forgive you most heartily, my boy, and thank God your punishment has not been more severe," said the father; "and we shall always feel greatly indebted to Charlie and Mrs. Jones for the great kindness they have shown you."

Jack remained in a very precarious state for some time; the doctor thought he would be lame for life, but owing to his medical skill and careful nursing he at length completely recovered. His accident taught him a great lesson—a lesson which he never forgot. It would perhaps have been better for him at the time if he could have learnt it with less suffering; but it is to be hoped that his experience will prove a warning to others. F. N.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

12. Who used the words, "The battle is not yours, but God's?" and what was the occasion of them?

13. In connection with what event do we read of Jordan for the first time in the Bible?

14. What year of Josiah's reign may be regarded as the critical point of his personal religious awakening?

15. Though we have no particulars of the death of Leah, Jacob's wife, we are distinctly told where she was buried. Quote the passage.

16. Lystra, a city of Lycaonia, was visited on three occasions by St. Paul. Quote the passages in which these visits are mentioned.

17. In the time of Jeroboam the Israelites suffered a fearful defeat at the hands of the children of Judah. What was the cause of Judah's success on this occasion?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 16.

1. The Lamentations of Jeremiah in our Bibles have for their subject the miseries of Jerusalem and his own personal lamentations; and Josiah's name is not once mentioned in them.

2. In Jerusalem. The law of Moses; the prophets; the Psalms (Luke xxiv. 33, 36, 44).

3. "There arose not a prophet since in Israel, like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face" (Deut. xxxiv. 10—12).

4. David. Amaziah. 18,000 and 10,000 men (2 Sam. viii. 13; 2 Kings xiv. 7).

5. "Now in the fourteenth year of King Hezekiah did Sennacherib, King of Assyria, come up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them" (2 Kings xviii. 13).

AT THE BROW OF THE HILL.

STAY, dear, do not cross the stile,
Let us linger a little still;
Rest here at the gate awhile,
Just here at the brow of the hill.

Look back by the way we came—
We can see the path winding down,
Through fields where the kingcups flame
Mid the grass that waits to be mown.

Just there where the popla-s sway
  Lies the pond, and the mill below.
Look back all along the way—
  Every step of the way we know.

Half-hidden among the leaves
  Of the elms where the rooks build high,
The chimneys and gabled eaves
  Take the glow of the rose-red sky—

Red roofs turned to purple dun
  In the crimson of dying day;
And many a summer sun,
  And a winterly gloaming grey,

Has chequered the garden lawn,
  Where the golden lilies grow;
Has glimmered at eve and dawn
  Over fields of untrodden snow;

And many a moon has filled
  When the time of harvest was come,
Since first rooks began to build,
  Since first the old house was a home.

Look back at it all again,
  Let us linger a little still;
One day you may long in vain
  To stand here at the brow of the hill.

The road that we came was sure,
  And shut in from all winds that blow;
Beyond lies the open moor,
  And a country we do not know.

Thus far we came side by side;
  But, when once we have passed the gate,
It may be our ways divide,
  And I am no more your mate.

Look back at it all again,
  Let us linger a little still;
One day we may long in vain
  To stand here at the brow of the hill.

THE IDIOT OF DIXMUYDE.

BY W. H. G. KINGSTON.

CHAPTER IV.

THE inhabitants of Dixmuyde were out making holiday. The streets were thronged with gay groups, moving towards the centre of the town, greeting each other with jokes and laughter, and talking of the trial of rhetorical skill and wit to be exhibited at the "Land-Jewel" about to take place. Unpleasant rumours had, it is true, got about respecting the sanguinary proceedings at Valenciennes and other places, instigated by that faithful servant of the Pope, Cardinal Granville, but many refused to believe them, and others endeavoured to cast the thoughts of them aside for that day at least. They would have their amusement first, and then would be time enough to inquire more particularly as to what had taken place; Valenciennes, too, was a long way off. Their humble little town would probably escape the notice of the Inquisitors. They grieved for the sufferings of their countrymen, but personally they had little reason to be concerned. Such are the thoughts generally of men. The thunder-storm on the horizon creates no alarm, but when the dark clouds come gathering overhead, and the artillery of the sky roars forth, and the forked lightning flashes brightly, then the people begin to tremble and to seek for safety under some sheltering roof. Not a few, however, of the leading citizens wore grave countenances in spite of their efforts to appear at their ease. The information they had received was too well authenticated to allow a doubt in their minds of the fearful events which had occurred. Still, though their hearts were sad, they had resolved to be present at the pageant, lest some motive might be assigned for their absence perilous to their safety.

Banners with various devices, and gay pieces of tapestry hung from the windows, or were suspended across the streets leading to the central place or square of the town. Here on one side rows of seats had been erected rising one above another in a crescent form, with a gay awning stretched over the structure. In front of it were several stages raised some feet above the ground, also with silken canopies overhead, and adorned with flags of various colours and devices. Steps led up to the platforms by which the "Rederykers," the Rhetoricians, or actors might ascend to perform their parts. The intermediate spaces were filled by the populace, who were content to stand to witness the spectacle, while people of inferior rank or wealth occupied the seats, under the awning where they could at their ease listen to the speeches and watch the performances.

Although Walter Kapell had wisely desired to prevent the exhibition, for fear of the sentiments which might be expressed by the Rederykers, who were certain on this occasion to give a free utterance to their opinions, he determined to be present and to share the danger, whatever that might be, with the rest of his townsmen.

Young Max Gellert had managed to find several cogent reasons for remaining at Dixmuyde, and had sent off a despatch to his father, giving him the most cogent reason of all, which he had good hope would be received as valid. He, now in attendance on Marie, formed one of Walter Kapell's party as they proceeded to witness the exhibition of the Rederykers, with Herr Duffel, and his pretty little daughter Bertha and young son Bertrand.

Bertrand was a brave youth, and noted among his companions for his talents. He was to have taken part among the Rhetoricians in the trial of their oratorical powers, but his cautious father, fearing that he would give too free an expression of his opinions, and thereby become the mark of their foes, had forbidden him to take part in the performances of the day. He was too good a son to think of disobeying his father, and had been half inclined to shut himself up in his room and remain there till the pageant was over. Bertha, however, had persuaded him to come with her, but though he did so, he walked along with a downcast look and a silent tongue—very unusual to him—his dissatisfaction with things in general being further increased on observing the attention Max Gellert was paying to Marie, and the favour with which she received it, he himself being a devoted admirer of the young lady.

"Who can he be?" asked Bertrand of his sister. "I should judge from his cool and confident manner that he is some great lord, accustomed to have all the young ladies he meets falling in love with him."

Bertha had heard all about Max Gellert from her father, and her own eyes told her the true state of the case between him and Marie. She was anxious, however, like a good sister to comfort Bertrand and restore him to good humour. "He came here on business for his father and remained for the pageant. He will soon be away again," she observed quietly.

"I wish he had never come," muttered Bertrand. "I did not mind being prevented reciting my verses when I thought I should have been by her side, and might have repeated them to her, but to be cut out by a stranger! it is too bad. Perhaps after all, she may not care to listen to them."

Poor Bertrand, he cared little for the gay bands of Rederykers who passed by, some on horseback, others in chariots or cars, and still more on foot. Neither did Marie or Max Gellert pay them much attention; they were, in truth, too much occupied with each other to remark what was taking place around them. Still those bands were worthy of observation. Silk and satin doublets and cloaks were worn by many a brawny pair of shoulders. Feathered hats were seen above shaggy heads of hair, and white gloves were worn by hands accustomed to wield the sledge-hammer and saw, the pick-axe or mattock. With each band were banners of all colours and numerous devices. On many were the trade emblems of the sturdy artisans who composed the bands, to show that they were not ashamed of their callings. The tailors had their shears exhibited aloft, the carpenters their hammers, the masons their trowels, and so forth. The latter, who outshone most of the rest, had a silver trowel borne at their head, and were greeted with much respect. Not only did each trade form a band of its own, but there were persons in various strange costumes banded together, some appeared as monks and friars, with priests and a cardinal in his robes at their head. All laughed when they saw the latter, and recognised the hated Granville, for they knew full well that he would afford them no little merriment—as much even as the buffoon who moved among the monks, cutting jokes at their expense and playing a variety of antics.

Places in the front row of the canopied crescent had been reserved for the two magistrates and their families, which not without some little exertion were reached. Just as they took their seats the Rederykers began to ascend the platform amid the applauses and shouts of the populace. It would be difficult to describe the dresses of the various characters, some appeared as knights in armour, others as courtiers in silken attire; one band was habited in the costume of the distant East, one in that of Hungary, another in that of France, all having endeavoured to be as magnificent as their means would allow. There was also a king with his ministers and court, and an attendant buffoon, who caused great amusement, especially when he warmly greeted the person evidently representing Cardinal Granville, and walked with him arm-in-arm backwards and forwards across the stage, as if earnestly discussing with him the affairs of state. Other political characters were in like manner brought forward. The general opinion held of the monks was shown by the way their representatives acted on the stage and the sentiments they expressed, but which need not be repeated. Among them was a burly fellow with shaven crown, who from a huge chest at his side produced papers, sealed with the cross keys and triple crown of the Papacy, which he offered for sale, averring that they were indulgences for every possible sin and cures for every known complaint. The fools from the different stages, after listening attentively for a short time to his remarks, scrambled in hot haste towards him and began to purchase eagerly, chuckling gleefully as they described each especial sin which they would now be at liberty to commit. No one else could be found to follow their example, whereat a figure representing Satan, who had been standing at the monk's right hand, seemed much concerned, and hastened to the cardinal to obtain advice.

The recitations of original poetry, and sometimes of prose, formed, however, the chief amusement of the day. They were mostly full of political allusions, and were delivered with much energy and spirit. Bertha, like a good sister, believed that her brother's oration would have been considered superior to all the others—an opinion fully shared in, probably, by that young gentleman. Herr Duffel was thankful that he had prohibited his son from delivering it.

hoping thus to escape the painful consequences of a visit from the hated Inquisitors to the town. Marie and Max would have found it difficult to give any exact account of what had been said; for, though the actors had been moving about before their eyes, and the sound of their voices had reached their ears, even when their own tongues were at rest their thoughts had been too busy with each other to heed what was taking place before them.

CHAPTER V.

WHILE most of the inhabitants of Dixmuyde were thus amusing themselves inside their town, the outer streets were almost deserted, as was the surrounding country. One solitary figure might have been seen proceeding along the high road towards Valenciennes. It was that of a man habited in the cast-off finery of some gay gallant, which had been torn and patched over and over again with pieces of various colours and materials. His long elf locks were covered by a hat with the remnant of a once waving plume stuck in it; while in his hand he carried a thick club, which assisted to help his somewhat tottering steps along the road, though ever and anon he would stop and flourish it round his head, as if he were defending himself from an assault, now turning to one side, now to the other, to meet his supposed foes, shouting out wildly at the same time, and showing his grinning teeth.

"Keep back, villains! keep back! Your weapons can do me no harm; but you shall not touch her. Cowards! would ye hurt a young maiden? Keep back I say! keep back!" Thus poor Hans Kopperzoon went on. There was still a bandage on his head, and another on his arm, showing that he had not recovered from the hurts he had received when rescued from his assailants by Walter Kapell. He had probably made his escape from the magistrate's house when not watched by Margaret, and wandered away, in his aimless mode, into the country.

Suddenly he stopped and peered ahead. He had caught sight of two horsemen approaching the town. Instinctively he drew aside and concealed himself behind some bushes in a wood which bordered the road. He could, however, from between the branches, still observe the horsemen as they jogged forwards on their stout, large-boned Flanders steeds. He could hear their voices, too, even at a distance; for they were talking in loud tones, one of them every now and then giving vent to shouts of still louder laughter, which sounded harsh and discordant as they reached the poor idiot's ears, and made him tremble, he knew not why, from head to foot.

Before long one of the horsemen had ridden round to the other side of the bush, and poor Hans, finding himself discovered, came trembling forth, staring at the two Inquisitors with a bewildered look.

"Tell us, ere I brain you with this club, what do you here? who are you?" shouted the principal Inquisitor, fiercely.

"I came here on my own affairs," answered Hans, awed into calmness; "and if it so please your reverences, I am the lord of broad lands and untold wealth, for I wander where I will, no one stopping me, and I never owned a coin to count."

"The varlet is either a cunning knave or an idiot," cried Titelmann.

"If it please your reverences, the people call me the Idiot of Dixmuyde," said Hans, making a profound bow, with his hat in hand.

"Though idiot he is, he may be of use to us," observed Fabry. "I was on the point of offering a piece of advice when your excellency's keen vision discovered this scatterbrain. If we enter the town by the main street, our arrival will be known, and our game will have time to run to earth. He will be able, undoubtedly, to lead us round through some back way, and we can meet our trusty spies unobserved, and lay our plans for catching the whole of our intended victims in the same net."

"Ah, well-beloved brother, you are ever fertile in devices, especially when the good of the Church is concerned," said Titelmann, with a leer. "See if you can make the fool understand our wishes."

Hans had been attentively listening to all that had been said, and understood quite enough to know that the Protestants of Dixmuyde were in danger. Erratic as was his mind, he was not incapable of reasoning to some purpose; and while he stood gazing, with open mouth and rolling eyes, at the Inquisitors, he bethought himself that by leading them a roundabout road, through narrow lanes, he might, if he could make his escape, leave them to find their way alone, and have time to warn his friends of the danger which threatened them. When, however, Fabry asked if he could act as their guide, after scratching his head, and twisting and turning himself about for some time, he looked up with a stolid glance, as if he had not comprehended the question. The Inquisitor repeated it.

"What reward will your reverences bestow on me should I render you the service you require?" said Hans at length, as if the meaning of what was said had not till then worked its way into his brain.

"A sound cudgelling on your stupid crown, fool, if you refuse to do as you are bid," exclaimed Titelmann, losing patience.

"Two can play at that game, reverend gentleman," cried Hans, springing on one side and flourishing his own club, ready to ward off any blow aimed at him. "An you are peaceably disposed, Hans Kopperzoon will for this nonce do your bidding; but force never made him obey any man, whether with helmet on head, or tonsured crown, or flowing locks, or——"

"Fool, know you not that I can burn you if I please?" exclaimed the Inquisitor, fiercely.

"Truly, reverend sir, I have heard say that there is another personage, who shall be nameless, ever merrily engaged in the same occupation," answered Hans bowing low. "Only he burns those who do his bidding, while you threaten to burn me for not doing it. Alack! alack! between two such honourable and distinguished personages, what will become of poor Hans Kopperzoon, the Idiot of Dixmuyde?"

Titelmann, instead of growing more angry, burst into a loud laugh. "Lead on, fool, and you shall be well rewarded," he shouted out. "Take care, though, that you play us no scurvy tricks, or a broken skull, I promise you, will be the penalty of your folly."

"Though your words sound not over-pleasant to my ears, I will obey you, reverend sir, if you cease to handle that ugly club of yours," answered Hans, shouldering his own weapon, and without more to do, marching on ahead of the horsemen.

After proceeding some distance, he turned off to the right hand by a narrow lane which evidently led round to the other side of the town. The road was uneven, and covered with large loose stones, among which the horseman had some difficulty in picking their way. It appeared, indeed, from the grass growing in thick patches, to be but little used. Hans ran on in front, leaping nimbly from stone to stone, and greatly increasing his distance from the horsemen. Titelmann shouted out to him to slacken his pace, but turning round, he merely beckoned to the two priests to increase their own speed without in the least slackening his. At length he reached a spot where another road branched off from the first, the trees still concealing the town from view. At that instant, Hans, who had been watching the opportunity, slipped round the corner, and set off running as fast as his legs could carry him.

"The fool has outwitted us," exclaimed Titelmann, "In which direction went he, Fabry?"

"I know not," answered the priest. "Had you brained him, as you proposed, we should not have been the losers. However, we must now find our way as best we can."

"I did not suppose that he would have ventured to play us such a trick," said Titelmann.

"No one but a fool would have done so," remarked his companion.

"Ah! friend Fabry, he is only one of many," answered Titelmann. "If fools did not abound, we wise men might find it a hard matter to live."

Thus conversing, the two Inquisitors proceeded along the road, which they supposed would conduct them into Dixmuyde.

CHRIST AND HIS CHURCH:

EXPOSITORY NOTES ON THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

BY THE REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A., CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN, ETC.; AUTHOR OF "AIDS TO PRAYER," ETC.

"Look not upon me, because I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me: my mother's children were angry with me; they made me keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept. Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest, where Thou makest Thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of Thy companions?"—Song of Solomon i. 6, 7.

ON the supposition that has been made with regard to the dramatic structure of this poem,* the first of these verses is a continuation of an address made by the Church to some who are designated as "daughters of Jerusalem." Whoever may be meant by these, they are at least friends of the Bridegroom; and the Church feels it due to them to explain anything in her present circumstances and condition hardly compatible at first sight with that high estate of spiritual glory and attainment which she had claimed as the affianced spouse of Christ, her Lord. "I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem"—black as the "tents of Kedar," comely as the curtains of Solomon. The explanation of this two-sided picture has been given already. It is a figurative representation of the believer even in his best estate—and the more true, the better his spiritual estate is. He is a strange compound of good and evil—an assemblage of spiritual contradictions, with elements in his moral nature so grovelling and low and earthly as to evidence but too plainly the dust from which he was taken, and yet with aspirations so Divine and pure and heavenly as to show that into that dust has been breathed the inspiration of the living God. It will be according to the point of view from which we contemplate him, whether he seem as black, or seem as comely. Only observe, in this parti-coloured view of the Church's spiritual state, the "comely" is her real, true, and abiding complexion; the "blackness" is a separable accident. Seen as man seeth, and, indeed, as when taught by the Spirit, his own heart seeth, the believer is a stained thing, blurred and blotted through and through,—in this sense the believer being, like his Master, without either "form or comeliness." But to the angels, able to look under the obscuring veil, the blackness and blemishes disappear. They see only the reflected brightness of One, who, for beauty, is "chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely." Still this blackness, this confession on the part of the bride to so much of remaining infirmity, is a thing which, while deprecating the unkindness of the censure, the Church deems it well to explain to these daughters of Jerusalem—"Look not upon me, because I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me: my mother's children were angry with me."

First, there is a word of deprecation. "Look not upon me, because I am black;" that is, "do not look slightingly, disdainfully, reproachfully, as if I were black and nothing else." How keenly does the world look out for the faults of professing Christians—for their mistakes, when they err; for their infirmities, when they stumble; for their inconsistencies, when they walk not circumspectly; for their failures, when they are tempted and overcome and fall. And as the eye is quick to discern mere faults, so the heart delights to lay them bare. Men of the world rejoice in iniquity, especially in the failings of good men. It ministers to their self-satisfaction to see how low a man "after God's own heart" can fall. How many better than themselves are to be found they are not careful to inquire: enough if they can find some worse:—"I thank God I am not as other men are, or even as this publican." The Church reproves this fault in the daughters of Jerusalem. "In looking upon me because I am black, thou walkest not charitably." We may all apply the lesson. It is a note that we have attained to the Divine gift of charity when we walk backwards, rather than be brought face to face with a brother's shame; when, though cognisant of his faults, we make as if we did not see them, either hiding the unsightly thing under a bushel, or passing by on the other side. Charity both "covereth" all things and "hopeth all things." That which meets the eye may be "black," but who shall say how much that is fair may be concealed beneath the surface?

But the Church proceeds to give some reasons for her blackness—reasons which, at all events, should protect her from being regarded with anything of unkindness or disdain. "Look not upon me, because I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me;" because, through the many afflictions and tribulations I endure, "my skin is black upon me, and my bones are burned with heat." This sin of looking unkindly upon those who are suffering under God's corrective judgments we find sorely reproved in the case of the Edomites by the prophet Obadiah:—"Thou shouldest not have looked on the day of thy brother in the day that he became a stranger; neither shouldest thou have rejoiced over the children of Judah in the day of their destruction; neither shouldest thou have spoken proudly in the day of distress. . . . . As thou hast done, it shall be done unto thee: thy reward shall return upon thine own head." Let us stand in awe of putting our own interpretations upon Divine judgments, whether in the case of a nation or a man only. To find no other reason for the accumulated miseries of Job than to suppose him to be the slave of some "secret thing;" to believe that no sinners could be so great as those "on whom the tower in Siloam fell;" to conclude that the man on whose hand a viper fastens, after rescue from a wreck, must be "a murderer whom vengeance suffers not to live,"—is not to speak words for God. He rather says of His Church, "I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction." In no other way could He purely purge away her dross, and take away all her tin. None shall be so "white" hereafter as those whom the sun of tribulation hath looked upon. "What are these which are arrayed in white robes? and whence came they? . . . . . And he said to me, These are they which came out of great tribulation."

But there is a special form of sun-scorching to which the Church would attribute some of her blackness—namely, because it had led to the falling away of many from their steadfastness;—"the sun hath looked upon me"—the sun of persecution;—the fires of bigotry and intolerance have scorched me with their burning heat, and from that time the love of many of my children waxed cold. Our Lord, it will be remembered, foretold of some fallings away from the faith which would arise from this cause. "When the sun is up"—that is, as He himself explains it, "when tribulation or persecution ariseth, they are scorched;" and "because they have no root they wither away." Not much does this sun look upon us in our day—at least with any scorching heat. The more dishonour to the Church when a believer cannot bear a little of it; when, from the fear of man, or the apprehension of loss, or the dread of ridicule, or the anticipated forfeiture of this or that man's goodwill, a Christian dares not to be outspoken and honest and consistent with his own principles, but will palter and hesitate, and with bated breath will whisper away his Christianity. Oh! a church will soon become "black" that numbers among her members many who are so soon affrighted and so easily scorched.

Under this head of persecution, however, the Church hints at a particular form of opposition she had been exposed to: "My mother's children were angry with me." It is no new thing in the history of the Church for a man's foes to be "they of his own household." To inherit a common blood and own a common parentage is no security that brethren should dwell together in unity. There will often be children "of the flesh" and children "of the promise" under the same roof; and then it will happen, as with Isaac, that "he that is born after the flesh will persecute him that is born after the spirit." "Even so it is now," we may add with the apostle. No sooner does one member of a family come out from the rest, setting up a higher standard of personal religion, discovering more of sensitiveness than others to the pernicious influences of the world, evincing a greater love for ordinances, or devout retirement, or employment in good works, than there is a strange mustering against that one of all the home forces. It may be in the form of gentle suasion—"Son, spare thyself;"—or in more direct interference and calling off from sacred duties—"Thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to speak with thee;"—or in the taunting sarcasm, "Be not righteous overmuch." Anyhow, he feels the family bond is severed; he becomes "an alien unto his mother's children." Parents, brothers, sisters, friends, realise ye the terrible responsibility of domestic influence! There is a member of Christ's flock who but for you had been not black, but comely. He could have borne the hot sun of worldly persecution, but not the scorching beams of home frowns and home dislike. And persecution is felt more when it proceeds from those who are bound to us by near ties. We take up the language—"It was not an enemy that reproached me, then I could have borne it, but it was even thou, my companion, my guide, and mine own familiar friend." Moses felt the trials of the camp to be harder to bear than the trials of the wilderness; and Paul would not have heeded the fighting with beasts at Ephesus—that being a mere device of pagan cruelty: his great heaviness and continual sorrow of heart was that he could not conciliate his kinsmen according to the flesh: "My mother's children were angry with me."

But the Church assigns another reason for her want of comeliness. She has been over-worked, over-busied, over-anxious in the work given her to do, and this to an extent that has interfered with the sanctified growth of her own character and the proper culture of her own religious spirit: "They made me keeper of the vineyards, but my own vineyard have I not kept." The expression "made me keeper of the vineyards" is interpreted by Jewish commentators to refer to some enforced employment imposed upon the Church by her mother's children which was at once laborious and degrading, according to that prophecy of Isaiah which foretells as a sign of Zion's coming prosperity, "And the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vine-dressers." Enforced or voluntary, the point of the reference is the same, that multiplied and engrossing duties are attended with danger to the religious character. Man's thoughts turn away from God too much of their own accord to make it either wise or safe for him to engage them wholly upon matters which, however lawful in themselves, are still of the earth, earthy. The soul requires to be occasionally called off, in order to institute a formal and serious inquiry into the state of its highest concerns; lest the mind become wholly absorbed with perishable objects, and all its life and elasticity give way under the pressure of its duties and its cares.

"They made me keeper of the vineyards." The expression may refer to those who bear office in the Church of Christ. "My well-beloved hath a vineyard on a very fruitful hill," and honourable is the employment of those who have to dress it. Yet is there a danger to them, also, that overmuch diligence in the keeping of others' vineyards may lead to neglect in the proper culture of their own. Of this danger we find our Lord on one occasion warning His own disciples. They had just returned from a laborious missionary journey, and were recounting their successes, when the Master interposed, "Come ye yourselves apart and rest a while," intimating to them that high and holy and blessed as their employment was, they had work to do for their own souls, which no zeal or labour in doing good to the souls of others could either compensate for or supersede. "We perish in lawful things," says an old proverb. We may go further, and say, "We may perish in sacred things." Without watchfulness and privacy and much prayer, the lamp of the spiritual life will waste away in the minister, even as in others, leaving him to sue fruitlessly to those whose spirituality he had helped to kindle, saying, "Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out."

Still not to ministers only does the warning of the passage apply. According to our vocation and ministry, we are every one of us made "keepers of the vineyards." And it may be that we have tended them with much of watchful care and culture. As parents, we have striven faithfully to bring up our children "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." As Sunday-school teachers and visitors to the poor, we have not been wanting in diligence to bring all whom we could influence to a knowledge of the things which make for their everlasting peace. As men of wealth and influence and position, we have conscientiously laid out our talents to the glory of God and for the good of souls. And, like those disciples returning from the villages of Galilee, we may have had much success granted to our labours, yet the question recurs, how has it fared with our own souls all this time? We are not saved in companies; we must each one stand in his lot; we shall be summoned from the grave, and take our place before the throne one by one. Can the warning be other than well-timed for any of us? You may tell of Christ, and not win Christ; point to the rest, and not enter into the rest. "They made me keeper of the vineyards, but my own vineyard have I not kept."

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

THE FAMILY PARTY.

ALMOST as soon as she got home Fanny Lovejoy sat down and wrote one of her scrawling little notes, asking her uncle, aunt, and cousins to dine with her on Sunday at two o'clock, that being the hour which she fancied would best suit the family. She also wrote asking Philip to come and meet them.

The invitation was not a particularly welcome one to Philip; nevertheless, he resolved to go. "Fanny is a fool," he said to himself, "and there is no knowing what she may do in the way of involving herself; and besides, I ought to know what sort of people they are."

When the day arrived, Fanny made preparations as for a host, having been left in ignorance as to how many she might expect; and at the hour when the churches have emptied, as Fanny, who had just come in, was still untying her bonnet, the party arrived. It consisted of Mr. Lovejoy, with a daughter on each arm, and Albert and Beatrice, detached, bringing up the rear.

Mr. Lovejoy might be shabby, but he was too genteel-looking for the fact to be noticeable, and between Geraldine and Ada he was utterly hidden and in eclipse. These young ladies were wonderful to behold. Their beautiful, richly-shaded brown hair bulged out behind in some mysterious manner, and then flowed over their shoulders, as if to show that no chignon, however monstrous, was capable of containing it. It was plaited across their heads, and fringed over their brows; it was adorned with bright red ribbons, and fastened with great glittering pins; while on the top of all was perched a tiny black felt hat, with three little cock's feathers to match their ribbons. The rest of their costume it will be needless to describe, except that they had lost half a week's sleep on the frills. Nevertheless, under the disfigured heads were the two fresh, smooth, flower-like faces; and Mr. Lovejoy was glad to introduce them into their cousin's drawing-room as into their natural sphere.

Beatrice, the eldest, was better dressed, as far as material, and even taste, went, and was therefore a more pleasing object to look upon; for she, too, was pretty, only a close observer would have noticed that she had keener eyes and a harder mouth. Ada and Geraldine were young and tender yet. On Beatrice her circumstances, perhaps, had begun to tell more. She and Albert did not look as if they belonged to the same family as the others. Ada and Geraldine were shy and silent; Beatrice was self-possessed, and Albert swaggering. They were soon all seated in the drawing-room, waiting for the announcement of dinner and the arrival of Philip. Albert's manner seemed to say, "I am quite at home, you see;" and presently he got up and went to the window. Then he whistled under his breath, and finally said he would step out into the garden and have a cigar.

Ada and Geraldine were but fifteen and sixteen respectively, and could not remember many of the better days of the family to which their father made frequent allusion; Beatrice, who was three-and-twenty, and Albert, who was two years her senior, could. Ten years before, when the latter was a lad of fifteen, they had, to all outward appearance, been tolerably well off. He had received a good education at a commercial school; and being a fair writer, as his father had been, he had been taken into a City warehouse at a salary of twenty-five pounds per annum, to be increased five pounds a year till he was twenty, when its further advance depended on his own exertions. It was a fair enough prospect for a boy in his position; but the employer with whom he had been placed was one of the worst possible men for a weak, self-indulgent lad to come in contact with. He was self-indulgent and strong. Fond of low sensual pleasures, and ever ready to encourage others to be fond of them too; he could do with impunity what weaker men could not do without death or ruin, and his warehouse had turned out youth after youth whose history had ended in one or both of these.

Albert began by spending the whole of his earnings upon himself, and at first he required the money for necessaries—his clothes, his dinners in the City, and his trains. As he got older and richer, he added cigars, occasional soda-and-brandy, and other luxuries. His family at this time becoming poorer and poorer, his mother suggested the propriety of his paying something for his board and lodging, but he put her off, saying, he would soon have double the salary—in fact, his services were priceless, and his expenses were in the meantime heavy. He would however, make it up to her some day. He was obliged to dine at a better place and dress better; dressing better included putting on a handsome ring when he went out, and carrying his glove in his hand to show it off.

His mother had transferred her faith and allegiance from his father to him, and believed in him as long as possible. When that faith ended in bitter disappointment, she laid aside all hope, and almost resented its appearance in any other quarter. Up to that time he had only been a foolish, conceited, dandified youth; but the two years that followed made a rapid change for the worse. There were older men in his set, further gone in vice and folly; and though it was in vice and folly, Albert would not be outdone. The set consisted of choice spirits, who met every morning in the up-town trains, a headachy, dreary lot, smoking the biggest of pipes and swaggering the biggest of swaggers. It made you hopeless to look at them. They met, too, every evening in one of the great corner public-houses to play billiards, drink brandy-and-water, talk idiotic slang, and sing yet more idiotic songs.

Albert's great exertions for his employers were evidently not appreciated as they ought to have been. The truth was that he had no talent for business, and no industry to make up for the want of it. He was invariably late, and would come to the warehouse half asleep besides, the consequence being that at twenty-one he had still but £80 a year.

And on this he chose to marry. His mother, who was breaking her heart over him, hailed it as a forlorn hope for his reformation. She had tried to remonstrate with him; but he had silenced her in such a way that she did not care to repeat the experiment; no one else put forth hand or voice to warn him. How could they—she had kept his delinquencies entirely to herself? Poor mother! often and often had she sat up listening for every footfall, till the last train was in and all was silence, and then gone to bed, trying vainly to believe that (as he was sure to say) he had been kept late and had taken a bed with a friend.

Marriage and its responsibilities might sober him, and she never thought of the fate it was preparing for the girl he had chosen. Albert Lovejoy had a weak sort of beauty about him, which he was doing his best to spoil—the beauty of bright eyes and a fair skin, and a certain young neighbour was supposed to be very fond of him. The family, though steeped in debt by that time, occupied a house in a better quarter, and had furniture which they still called their own. The young people had numerous opportunities of meeting, as the gardens of their respective houses were only divided by a breast-high palisade. Mrs. Lovejoy invited Emily to tea, and otherwise promoted the affair, and Albert at length agreed to get married. He would have gone back at the last, and kept his neck out of the yoke of matrimony, if it had not transpired that Emily Blake had £200 of her own, which she could take possession of on her wedding-day. She was an orphan, and the niece of the couple with whom she lived, who thought Albert, with the prospects he vaunted, a very good match indeed.

Albert had now been three years married, and he had but £80 still, and was not at all likely to have more. Emily's money had melted away and come to nought, except what of it had been invested in the furnishing of their rooms, and she, poor thing, had two little children. She had been very ailing since her marriage, and very fretful, and her husband was equally impatient of both complaints, and he made them the excuse for living a more dissipated life than ever. She was left at home on the present occasion, a sadder sort of Cinderella crying over the fire, because Albert had refused to let her go, for want of a suitable dress he said, but really because her going involved taking the baby, and Albert detested the very sight of it.

Philip had not intended to arrive so early; but when the time came he was unable to stop away. You see he was not a lofty imperturbable being, but an eager-hearted and very movable man. He arrived while Albert was still in the garden, and had not been five minutes in the room when he was seized with inward laughter. It seemed to him that he had been introduced into a company of cockatoos, as his quick eye took in the scene around him. Mr. Lovejoy was narrating some experience of the glorified past, and looked for all the world like an old bird preening his scanty feathers, and all but saying, "You wouldn't believe what a fine fellow I was once upon a time." Then the girls, with the clear eyes and the pantomimic heads, were looking up to their father with unfailing interest and admiration, each with her head a little on one side. A third young lady with side-long glance seemed to be taking an inventory of the furniture. Philip was prepared at once to be amused with the party. The evident innocence and unworldliness of Mr. Lovejoy was pleasant to him. He could not amuse himself with, or at the expense of, unpleasant varieties of his species, and so when Albert sauntered in, smelling of tobaco and looking supreme assurance, his amusement gave place to disgust.

Fanny promptly introduced the new-comer, naming Philip as her oldest friend and the manager of her affairs, for which Philip by no means thanked her.

"Oh," said Mr. Albert, extending his hand, "a gentleman of the legal profession, eh?" and he laughed at what he appeared to think a joke, while Philip preserved a profound gravity, and coldly bowed.

Albert felt oppressed immediately, and inclined to detest the young lawyer, who was acting, in his choice phraseology, "the heavy swell." But they were immediately summoned to dinner, and to dinner they went, in a rather heterogeneous manner.

At table Mr. Lovejoy still kept up the conversation. He talked without ceasing. Everything reminded him of something else, which it did or did not resemble. The company certainly were not half grateful enough to him for his exertions, perhaps because they were so free from effort. The two pretty cockatoos pecked away on each side of him, eating very little and speaking not at all, except to utter every now and then a spasmodic "No, thank you!" which shook their scarlet top-knots.

Beatrice, who sat next to Philip, was equally silent, but more observant, and Albert was speedily absorbed in the good things before him. Philip watched him with no friendly eye, as he drank quantities of beer and sherry, and began to address himself with undue familiarity to the maid who waited.

Unobservant as Fanny was, she was glad when the dinner came to an end, and she did not prolong her stay at the table longer than she could help. When she rose Philip rose also, and they adjourned by common consent to the drawing-room.

Mr. Lovejoy was holding forth to his niece upon the splendid profits to be realised by a patent manure company, for whom he had been briefly engaged, and was making her hair stand on end by a description of the horrible and dangerous processes by which the article was obtained, when Albert sauntered up to Philip, on the other side of the room, and observed with easy familiarity that "the governor there would go on for ever with that jaw of his."

Philip's only answer was a contemptuous stare.

In the pause, Mr. Lovejoy was heard saying, "If you had a little capital to invest, you know, it would yield cent. per cent.—excellent investment." And Fanny was heard to answer simply, and with a directness for which Philip had not given her credit, "I leave all that to Mr. Tenterden, for I don't know anything about investments. My money is all in the funds, I believe."

"Well, that's a pity now—a waste of money, I call it," returned Mr. Lovejoy.

"Let's go and have a cigar," said Albert.

"I don't smoke," replied Philip, feeling as if there was something phantasmagoric in his present surroundings—in the half-tipsy and wholly disagreeable young man, and in the pretty, silent girls, with their preposterous heads, wholly unconscious of anything to be regretted in their own appearance, or in the behaviour of their father and brother.

Philip was conscious of a maddening sense of the mockery of life, which was certainly not diminished when Albert, determined not to be rebuffed, remarked in an undertone that lawyers generally knew a thing or two, and added, still lower, and nodding in Fanny's direction, "Is she well off now?"

Philip exploded. "I do not feel called upon to discuss Miss Lovejoy's affairs with you," he said sternly, immediately walking over to the other side of the room, watched by Beatrice, who had not lost a word, and was not likely to let her brother forget the snubbing he had received.

The fire of momentary anger kindled in the young man's face, but it was quenched in the animal craving to consume something. So he went out and lit his cigar, and paced up and down the garden.

Philip felt that to stay longer was an utter impossibility. He went up to Fanny, made an apology for departing so abruptly, and left, much to her dismay, for simple as she was, she was feeling rather uneasy at the tone of her new relations. As for Philip, he had one of his bad attacks of despondency and gloom, and betook himself to the rather dangerous plan of exhausting his misery by exhausting himself.

CHAPTER VIII.

A NEW CORDELIA.

A FORTNIGHT passed away, and Philip had devoted an evening in each week, as agreed upon, to the task of assisting Mrs. Austin in the disposal of the papers. They had got through two of the black boxes, and had left them absolutely empty. Mrs. Austin was as gentle and gracious as ever; but Philip thought her a trifle more reserved than she had been on the evening when they began their task.

To Philip it was the pleasantest task he had ever undertaken. Mrs. Austin's presence began to act like a charm upon him. He would come in from the walk to her house, with a bitter and restless mood upon him, and before he had been many minutes there the ice was thawing round his heart, he felt himself becoming genial and calm; the attitude of resistance in which he lived continually could not be maintained, and it was a real rest to him to lay it aside.

Mrs. Torrance sat in her corner handling her mesh, knotting the threads of her apparently endless web, and raying malign influence from her eyes; but Philip took no heed. He was so glad to enjoy the presence of one woman, whom he felt to be pure and good—he who had such a need, such a hunger for faith in goodness and purity; and he read them in every form of expression, in every feature, in every word and act of Mrs. Austin's.

Philip did not want Mrs. Torrance out of the way that he might make love to Mrs. Austin; but he would have liked her out of the way to confide in Mrs. Austin, to tell her much that was in his heart, and much that was in his life. He had a craving for her sympathy for which he could not account, seeing he was not in love with her; and, if he had but known it, the craving was mutual.

Poor Ellen, in all her chilled life, had never met any human being whom she liked as she liked Philip Tenterden. It was more than liking, it was an instinct impossible to explain, of mingled trust and tenderness. What she had felt that first evening would perhaps never come to her again—thanks to her mother's tongue—that satisfying sense of safety and happiness. She did not say to herself, "Here is one human being who will not hurt me knowingly or unknowingly," but she felt it, and expanded in it as in light and freedom. Thus they were mutually giving pleasure, and unconsciously the pleasure and satisfaction would ray from the one to the other, in word and smile and lightest touch.

On the third evening a little incident happened which called this mutual feeling into active play. Philip had taken up a packet folded in brown paper and tied with cord, but with nothing unusual about it, and with not even a name to indicate its contents; there was only a date written outside and a black seal. Breaking the seal and cutting the cord he came upon a bundle of yellow letters, written in faded ink, and he had no sooner glanced over the first than he put it back again and handed the packet to Mrs. Austin, saying, "This is private."

She took it from him with a smile, and began also to peruse the letter; but the smile quickly faded and her hand trembled a little.

Philip continued to look at her, as if he awaited her decision. Her downcast eyes were still fixed on the faded page; but she was not seeing, she was striving to force back the coming tears. When he became aware of this, Philip averted his face, and he felt sure that she wept a little, and was anxious to hide her emotion from her mother. After a few minutes she laid the packet down by itself and resumed her task without speaking.

But a little later Mrs. Torrance rose and went out of the room, after searching her bag and muttering, "I thought I had another ball." She had gone up to her room to fetch one. To be bereft of occupation for her tongue was bad enough, but to be left without work for her hands as well was unendurable. Mrs. Torrance suffered from a diseased activity of body and mind.

Then Mrs. Austin rose and took the little packet, and stooped to place it in the fire.

"Will you not look through it first?" said Philip, quickly.

"No," she answered sadly. "He never mentioned her name to me. He would not wish it."

"Still I do not think they should be destroyed unread," he ventured to say; "a mere glance would suffice."

"Will you look over them then, and destroy them one by one?" and she held the packet towards him.

He hesitated. The letter he had read was full of terms of endearment.

"I cannot do it," she urged. "Mr. Tenterden, perhaps you know that my life has not been a happy one. It has had in it more of sorrow than of love. I think he must have loved her, and her only. Oh! I wish he had but told me. It would have made a difference. He did not care for me at all, and I—I would have loved him if he would have let me." Her face was quivering all over with pain.

Philip took the packet from her hands. "I am not too happy, Mrs. Austin," he said; "and therefore I may be allowed to sympathise with you;" and he passed his own hand gently over the hand that lay in his for a moment, thrilling the woman through with a passion of tender pain, which she would gladly have wept out at his feet.

But just then Mrs. Torrance entered. There was a slight elevation of the eyebrows as she saw the changed attitude of the pair, both standing on the hearthrug, and both visibly moved. But neither vouchsafed an explanation. Mrs. Austin made way for her mother, and Philip began unfolding letter after letter, glancing at their contents and committing them to the flames.

"Have you come upon anything particular?" inquired Mrs. Torrance, unable to restrain her curiosity.

"Some early love-letters, mamma," said Mrs. Austin.

"Oh, I should have liked a look at them," said Mrs. Torrance.

"I have not looked at them," replied Mrs. Austin, with gentle emphasis; and Philip coolly finished putting them into the heart of the fire, a proceeding which sealed his fate with Mrs. Torrance.

When the black marble timepiece on the mantelshelf chimed ten, Philip prepared to shut up the box and to say good night, as usual.

Mrs. Torrance interposed. "My dear," she said, addressing her daughter, "you are not thinking of going to work at those papers on Christmas week; surely you will let them stand over for a little."

"I had forgotten, mamma," she answered; and then turning to Philip, with a smile, "I must not think of troubling you for a week or two," she said.

"Pray do not think of me," replied Philip, sincerely; "it is anything but a trouble. You do not know how empty and dull my evenings are, and how pleasant it is to find a use for them. Let me come if you are disengaged."

Mrs. Torrance had never heard such a confident speech from any young man in the course of her life.

"No," we will agree to take a holiday," replied Mrs. Austin. "I shall improvise a little party for this day week, Christmas Eve; and you will come, will you not? I need not send you a formal invitation, there will only be a few mutual friends."

"I will come," said Philip, answering her look of entreaty; but his own had clouded, and he could not add the customary "with pleasure."

"I shall expect you then. We dine at six," she said; and "good nights" were exchanged.

Mrs. Torrance could hardly believe her own ears. Improvise a party without consulting her, and ask this audacious young man on quite an intimate footing! She must really speak seriously to Ellen.

They were no sooner alone than she began, using this time a little diplomacy. "Ellen, my love, you really must beware, or Mr. Tenterden will take your kindness to him for more than it really means. I think I can see—and I'm sure you have often acknowledged how clearly I see into those sort of things—he cares a great deal more for you than you think. If you don't wish to encourage him——"

Mrs. Torrance stopped abruptly, for her daughter had once more moved away—once more shrouded herself in the heavy curtains. It was a habit of hers to look out thus. But she was not this time hiding a hurt, she was looking up to the moon in the clear lofty sky, with a face all transfigured with a strange joy. She was thinking, "Is it so?" and for a moment she realised the sweetness of the hope; but only for a moment. Such happiness was not for her, who had bartered her life away; and there rose before her a vision of Lucy Tabor in all the glow and freshness of her youth, and contrasting herself with the vision, she felt the joy was not for her.

After what seemed to her mother so long a pause that she started to receive an answer, Ellen stepped quietly back to the table. "Mamma," she said, with unusual sternness, "I think you are mistaken; but at any rate, please do not speak in this way again. Let me take people just as I find them; let me make of my life what may still be made of it. I am not likely to err on the side of rashness."

"Very well, Ellen," said Mrs. Torrance, angered more at the tone than at the words, and more at what was unsaid than what was said. "Perhaps I had better leave you. Bessie will take me in, though her husband does all he can to make me uncomfortable. Or there's Julia; she'll want me in the course of a month or so. Poor thing! she can hardly make ends meet, and can't put me up very well, but I'm always welcome. I'll go to Julia's."

Mrs. Austin allowed her mother to run on. Bessie and Julia were her sisters, from whose homes Mrs. Torrance periodically retreated, vowing that, unless in a case of life and death, she would never enter them again.

At this point something possessed Mrs. Torrance to cry, a thing which she was not in the habit of doing. "It's very hard at my time of life," she sobbed, "to be bundled about in this way, and I did think I could have been at peace with you, Ellen."

"Mamma, mamma!" cried Ellen, in the greatest grief, "pray do not speak in that way; you who have been so good to us, have done so much for us. Forgive me, mammy dear;" and she flung herself at her mother's feet.

Mrs. Torrance's ascendency was once more complete. It was quite true she had been a devoted, if not a tender, mother. Many a day and many a night she had worked for her children till her limbs had ached and her eyes grown dim; she had denied herself rest and comfort, and even warmth and food, that they might be warmed and fed; she had sat up stitching, ironing, plaiting, knitting, netting, and crocheting, that they might look fair without and be cosy within; and none of her self-denials and sacrifices were forgotten by this Cordelia of hers. Nor did they appear the less because they were made the most of.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS, FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 4. ELIJAH THE PROPHET. PART I.

Chapters to be read—1 Kings xvii., xviii.

TO THE TEACHER. The incidents in Elijah's life being mostly known, it will not be necessary to dwell upon them all minutely, but rather to use different points in the story for drawing out the lessons of his life.

I. ELIJAH IN PRIVATE. (1) Elijah at Cherith. (Read xvii. 1—7.) Ask the duty of prophets as to warning of evil, referring to Jonah; and show by contrast how Elijah was obedient to God's word. From James v. 17 show that this absence of rain was a punishment at his own request. Show how he was a man of earnest prayer, and how God always answers such, by referring to parable of Unjust Judge (Luke xviii. 7). Ask how he was preserved during the famine. He received "daily bread" in a strange way—as Israelites for forty years in wilderness; teaching that "man does not live by bread only" (Matt. iv. 4). From Ps. cxlvii. 9 show how ravens and all are dependent on God for food, and how He can change their natural instinct at His will. (2) Elijah at Zarephath. (Read ver. 8—25.) When brook dried why sent to strange city? See Luke iv. 24—27. Being rejected in his own country, none were worthy to entertain the prophet. Ask a few questions on the story of the widow, showing how she had faith in the prophet's word, which made her act accordingly, and thence she was rewarded. Show also how Elijah, having trusted God for food day by day, was now assured of food till the close of the famine. Trust in God is never misplaced (Ps. xxxiv. 10). A similar miracle to the meal multiplying is, of course, our Lord's multiplying the loaves. (3) The child raised to life. (Read 17—24.) Notice the following points: (1) Elijah took the child into his own private room, and there alone pleaded earnestly in prayer. (2) Elijah's prayer prevailed with God, as did Jacob's (Gen. xxxii. 28). (3) The effect of the miracle upon the woman in confirming her faith.

II. ELIJAH IN PUBLIC. (1 Kings xviii.) Famine had now lasted more than three years. Picture out the land lying desolate—ground parched, grass all gone, streams empty, cattle and horses dying, even the king himself obliged to go on foot in search of grass. Now Elijah is to come out of obscurity, and God's honour is to be vindicated. (1) Elijah and Ahab. (Read ver. 16—20.) Ahab and his servant Obadiah had divided the land between them to try and find grass for the cattle. As Ahab—hot, tired, and disappointed—is searching, he meets Elijah, and denounces him as the troubler of Israel. Ask why he thought him so? Who prayed for no rain? but why was it withheld? Who then was the real troubler of Israel? Refer to 1 Kings viii. 35. Notice Elijah's boldness. Not the least afraid of Ahab—tells him of his sin, and bids him summon the false prophets. (2) Elijah and the prophets of Baal. If the story is not known, read it first, and then bring out the following points: (a) The place, Mount Carmel, a rocky prominence overhanging the sea, from which the water was obtained to pour over the sacrifice (ver. 33). (b) The people. Ahab the king, 450 prophets of Baal, and 400 prophets of the groves—i.e., 850 false prophets in all, on one side, and Elijah alone on the other—a large party of the Israelites looking on. (c) The question (ver. 21). Shows many were undecided. A test proposed that might convince all which was true God. Had God ever answered by fire before? (2 Chron. vii. 1.) (d) The first sacrifice. Describe Baal's prophets sacrificing their bullock—crying to Baal all day—no answer—their frenzy—cutting themselves with stones—leaping on the altar—Elijah mocking them. (e) The second sacrifice. Picture the people drawing near—their eager excitement of suspense—Elijah repairing the altar—cutting up his bullock—drenching the altar with water, to allay any suspicion of false play—all ready. (f) Elijah's prayer at the time of evening sacrifice. He appeals to God by the past. Ask the children how God was best known to Jews—as God of Abraham, &c. Ask why God should send down fire—viz., to vindicate His own honour, and show that Elijah was His prophet. Which came first? So in Lord's prayer; we ask first, "Thy will be done," and then "give us . . . daily bread." (g) The fire. Picture the excitement when the fire descended, and as God's minister, or servant (Ps. civ. 4), licked up the water as well as burnt the sacrifice. (h) The effect. What would the people think? There could be no doubt; so with one act they fell down and worshipped. What was to be done with false prophets? (Deut. xiii. 9.) So they were all put to death, and Elijah was established as a prophet.

III. ELIJAH ALONE WITH GOD. (Read ver. 42—46.) Excitement over, false prophets slain, people dispersed, king gone to eat and drink, Elijah stays to pray. Punishment had done its work; God was again worshipped. What would he pray for? Servant sent to watch if clouds gathered. How often did he pray? What did this show? His earnestness spoken of James v. 18. At last perseverance rewarded, and rain came.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. What does the whole of these two stories teach? (1) Trust in God is never misplaced. Elijah trusted for food, drink, protection, rain—all granted. (2) The necessity for decision. This may be pressed home to the children. What are first thoughts given to? Pleasure, sin, vanity, &c. If so, are worshipping other gods; must love God first and best. (3) The efficacy of prayer. This prayerfulness Elijah's great characteristic. Is it ours? (4) Importance of boldness in serving God. Elijah always rebuked sin. So should children among companions, schoolfellows, &c. A promise to those who confess Christ before men.

Questions to be asked.

1. Give an account in your own words of Elijah's life in private.
2. Describe briefly the scene on Mount Carmel.
3. Where is he referred to in the New Testament as a man of prayer?
4. Which commandment condemns idolatry, and how does it do so?
5. On what other occasion did fire descend from heaven?
6. What practical lessons may we learn?

HARRY'S RASH WISH,

AND HOW THE FAIRIES GRANTED IT. BY THE HON. MRS. GREENE.

CHAPTER I.

"I HATE babies! I wish there were no such things in the world!" cried little Harry Thompson, as, having finished his first inspection of the new owner of the nursery cot, he tripped across the floor with his little bare feet and climbed into bed. "I wish, nurse, you'd take that nasty cradle out of the room, and bring back my rocking-horse instead."

"Indeed, Master Harry! I aint a goin' to do nothing of the kind, and I am ashamed of you, that I am, speakin' in such a heartless way of your little sister," replied nurse, reproachfully; "it is not so many years ago since you were a rocking in the same cradle yourself, and a very peevish, cross little baby you were—always a screamin' or a whinin' at summat or other."

"I am sure I was never half so red or so ugly, or so small," cried Harry, taking his fairy tale book from the head of his little wooden crib, and thrusting it under his pillow. "What good are babies? they can't fight, or kill lions or tigers or buffaloes, or read fairy tale books, or do anything useful."

"I can't say as how I see much use in readin' the silly stuff as is printed nowadays in fairy tale books," replied nurse, rather contemptuously; "and if I was you, Master Harry, I'd be thinking of saying my prayers when I put my head down on my pillow, instead of gabbling about hobgoblins and such like."

"Hobgoblins and fairies are not one scrap like each other, so there you are wrong, nurse," cried Harry, triumphantly; "hobgoblins are like ghosts, —indeed, they are generally ghosts, with long white sheets and green eyes, and very hideous; but fairies are most beautiful things, with wings and yellow hair, and shining dresses, and wands, and they can come in and out of a room, and make people invisible, or do anything they like."

"I wish, then, they'd make you invisible, Master Harry, or do something with you to keep you quiet, for there's not much chance of the baby sleepin' while you keep up such a chatter and nonsense; put your head down on your pillow now, and don't let me hear another word till the mornin'."

After this admonition from nurse there was silence in the nursery for a few minutes; but until Harry was actually asleep he could seldom cease talking, and presently he began again in a kind of loud whisper, "I wish—I wish—oh! how I do wish something."

"What do you wish, Master Harry? is it a slice of the cake that I have in the press?" asked nurse, who after all was not an unkindly soul; and she rose and walked towards the cupboard.

"No, no, I did not mean the cake—though I should like a bit of that very much; but I wish so much I could be a fairy just for one night—only for a single night, and then I know what I should do."

"What would you do?" and nurse having cut a slice from the cake placed it in Harry's outstretched hand.

"I would turn all the babies in the world into mice or rats or butter, as the enchanter did to the queen and her children in the golden bower, and then cats would eat them, and people would catch them, and soon there would be no more of them, and I should have my rocking-horse back in the nursery instead of that nasty cradle."

"Well—well, if ever I heard such an idea!" murmured nurse to herself with a smile; "a turnin' of babies into mice and such like. I doubt but you'd be repentin' of your wish after a bit, if the fairies were just to take you at your word."

This speech of nurse's hardly reached Harry's ears, for having finished his cake, he was already half way into the land of dreams; he tried to answer her, but could not, and though his eyes were still blinking a little, and he could hear the singing of the kettle on the hob, yet he had an uncomfortable vision of seeing the baby crawl slowly out of the cradle on to the floor, and having looked all around it furtively, suddenly creep up the side of the nursery press and disappear, squeezing itself through the well-known mouse-hole out of which Harry had that very day picked the piece of cork placed there by the nursemaid Lizzie.

Harry did not like looking any longer lest he should see it come out again, so he turned on his pillow and covered his face with his hands. But this was only a dream, such a thing could not really happen, and soon—very soon—Harry's eyelids closed altogether; he heard no longer the singing of the tea-kettle or the creak of the cradle rockers, and when nurse came to replace the quilt which had fallen from his bed, he was fast asleep with his arm under his head, and his red-brown curls hanging in wonderful confusion over his pillow.

It was not very long after this that nurse herself began to yawn and to grow sleepy. Having glanced at the clock, she put her knitting aside in the work-basket, and took the spectacles from her nose; she then lit the night-light and replaced the piece of cork in the cupboard, and all her preparations for the night being completed, she raised the infant in her arms from the cradle, and as she looked into its little quiet face, she could not but smile over Harry's strange wish, that there might be no more babies in the world.

Soon the nursery was as still as might be; there were no angry gusts of wind that night rushing against the panes of glass or moaning in the chimney. The kettle sang itself quietly to sleep in the fender, the cinders creaked and tinkled and fell into the grate below, till at length the red glow died out, and the grate became black and sombre as everything else around it. The night-light flickered a little at first, and cast strange shadows on the wall, but soon its light also sank beneath its yellow rim, and only a faint glowing circle on the ceiling above showed that it still burned; it was a night for people to sleep, and to sleep deeply.

And very deeply little Harry slept, with his head pressed into his pillow and his arm thrust under it, holding in loving embrace his much-prized fairy tale book. Had he not slept so very soundly, he might perhaps have seen—or perhaps, indeed, even in his sleep he did see—the fairies one by one, as the clock struck twelve, creeping out between the leaves of his book and climbing over the side of his bed, letting themselves stealthily down upon the floor.

I think Harry must either have felt them squeezing themselves out of the book, or he must have seen them, as they clambered down, for he raised himself on his elbow, and though his eyes appeared to be shut, still he seemed to follow all their movements.

And such a strange-looking lot as they were to be sure—enchanters and witches and gnomes, and lots of old well-known friends, such as Ali Baba and his forty thieves, and the Yellow Dwarf, and Beauty and the Beast walking arm-in-arm, and Cinderella, whose train was carried by her two sisters; and at the head of the procession Little Snowwhite, whose mother had so long wished that she might be born, and when she was born she was so lovely—oh! so lovely. Harry could scarcely take his eyes off her; yes, it was quite plain to see that Harry was awake now, for he was so busy counting them, as they walked slowly past his bed, each with a wand in his or her hand, and so loudly did he number them, two and two and two, that nurse from her bed cried, "Hush—hush! be quiet there, Master Harry, with your two and two; this is the time for sleep, and not to be adding up your figures;" but then the curtains of nurse's bed were drawn, and she could not see the fairies all filing along so grandly and in such order, creeping up the legs of the nursery table, till at last they were all gathered in a crowd upon the top.

Harry counted them twice over; there were just a hundred of them; and now, as they all joined hand in hand and made a circle round the night-light, he could see them much plainer, such gorgeous robes and dazzling dresses, and more resplendent than all the rest, Little Snowwhite in a dress of pure silver; she did not join hands with the others, but stood just inside the circle waiting as it were till they had taken their places.

Then some strange kind of ceremony began, which interested Harry so much that he got up upon his knees, and stretched his head as far as he could to watch them. Little Snowwhite seemed to be making a speech, for she waved her hand to and fro, and clasped her hands, and appeared as if she were in some great trouble; and sometimes she pointed her wand, which was shaped like a spear, at the night-light and sometimes Harry thought she pointed it at him, till all at once she seemed to waver and flicker as it were from side to side, and to totter, and though two knights rushed out from the circle and tried to catch her, they were too late, for she slipped through their arms like water, and sank into a little white heap on the table, just for all the world like a flake of snow.

This seemed to cause a great hubbub and commotion, the circle was quite broken up, and a crowd of angry faces gathered round the glass which held the night-light, and Harry could see that they were all plunging their spears or wands into the boiling grease; and as each successive gnome or fairy drew it out it seemed to him they looked furiously across the room at him, and such a buzz and hum began, and surging of heads round the light, that Harry grew quite terrified and crept back under the clothes, where he would have hidden his face also, only the night-light seemed to grow frightened as well at all the row and fuss they were making around it, for it gave two or three great leaps of red flame in its socket, and then went suddenly out with a splutter and crackle, leaving the room in total darkness, and all the fairies in dismay and confusion.

Nor could Harry feel quite comfortable himself, for he disliked very much being in the dark, especially with such a lot of angry fairies creeping about the room like wasps, and as the thought of wasps came into his head he heard suddenly a great simmering and humming and buzzing, and he knew that all the gnomes and creatures were creeping up the side of his bed again as fast as ever they could, in great hurry and confusion, and as each of them passed by his face to creep back under the pillow, they hissed out some words into his ear that sounded to him like "Sleep, sleep, sleep," and at the same moment plunged the sharp point of their wands into his eyelids, till at last, when the hundredth gnome had buzzed the word "sleep" into his ear, he did, strange to say, fall sound asleep, and into such a very long deep sleep as I hope you and I may never experience for ourselves. IN THE ORGAN-LOFT.

STILL where the mystic silence,
Pulsing so sweetly soft,
Reigns through the lumbered chamber
Of the old organ-loft—
Save when a faint susurrus
Sighs from the outer croft:

Dark where the deathly shadows
Stealing by nave and aisle,
Deep in their folds of sable
Mantle the stately pile,
Save when the western sunbeams
Flicker a parting smile.

Sore with a piercing sorrow,
Stung with a rankling smart,
Welling the founts of feeling,
Bursting the stricken heart,—
Yea, as a deer that sobbeth,
Struck by the hunter's dart;

Here as to stanch the bleeding
Drank I the organ-tone,
Drank of the mighty music,
Here in the all alone
Came to me peace from heaven,
Out from the Mercy-Throne.

Here as in gentlest accents
Whispered the soft sweet strain,
Soft as the sighs of autumn,
Sweet as the summer rain,
Stanching the inward bleeding,
Healing the biting pain;

Here as in grand vibration
Thundered that harmony,
Swelling the heart with throbbings,
As swelleth a restless sea,—
Bringing peace to the weary
Soul with its mystery;

Pulses of lovelier music,
Strains with a grander roll,
Welling the secret fountains,
Into the spirit stole,
Fusing a heavenly unction
Over the stricken soul.

* * * * *

What was that mystic chiming
Softly that stole along,
When the sonorous anthem
Tremored its thunder strong,— Strangely, with trancing sweetness
Chanting an undersong?

Even as sweet vibrations
Thrilled from the key-board quire,
Pulsing with magic silence
Through an electric wire,
Strike in a distant organ
Tones of majestic fire;

So through the infinite regions
Pulsing in love's gold cord,
Even the notes of anguish
Struck on the heart's key-board,
Striketh, meseems, far deeper
Notes in a Grander Chord.

And as the farther thunder
Throbbed from the organ throats
Answers the saddened wistful
Plaint of the nearer notes—
Answers with hopeful anthems;
So, as it downwards floats.

Softly, the heavenly music
Melts with its mystic chime
Hearts in a wondrous sweetness,
Spirits in thoughts sublime—
Thoughts of the far-off country,
Thoughts of the future time.

THE IDIOT OF DIXMUYDE.

BY WILLIAM H. G. KINGSTON.

CHAPTER VI.

THE Rhetoricians were still engaged in their trial of skill, when Marie's eye was attracted by the strange figure of Hans making his way among the crowd. Little attention was paid him, many possibly supposing that he was one of the Rederykers, who had taken the fancy to dress himself up in a tatterdemalion costume, for the purpose of representing some particular character or other. Hans worked his way thus without impediment among the crowd, till he came close under where Walter Kapell and his family were seated. The magistrate, his attention being engaged with the actors, had not observed him.

"What can he want?" asked Max, to whom Marie had pointed out the idiot.

"I suspect from his manner that he has something to communicate," she observed. "Try if you can hear what he says."

Hans seemed to understand that they were speaking about him. Getting close up to them, with his fingers on his lips, he beckoned to Max to bend over and listen to him. "Hist! hist! noble sir," he whispered; I know all about it. You can do more for your friends than they would care to do for themselves. Take them out of Dixmuyde ere another sun rises in the sky."

"Why do you wish them to go so speedily, friend?" asked Max.

"Because Hans is a fool, and fools see strange things," he answered. "Hans saw not long since two figures riding along the road. They had hoofs on their feet and horns on their heads, and were threatening to play some scurvy tricks with the people of this place, in obedience to Satan, the master they serve. Poor Hans is called a fool; but if you take not his advice, there will be a greater in the world than he is. But why does poor Hans prate on thus? He must go back, and find his reverend friends; he may perchance learn something more of what they are about, and such knowledge will not come amiss at all events."

Max knew that there would be no use in cross-questioning the poor idiot, who seemed, indeed, so eager to be off again that he would scarcely stop to utter the last words. Marie and Max watched him as he threaded his way among the crowd, till he was once more free of them; and then he set off at full speed in the direction from whence he had come. He had already gained the outside of the town, and was hurrying along the narrow lane leading to it, when he saw before him the two Inquisitors, who were looking about them, as if uncertain whether they were pursuing the right road. He chuckled to himself when he perceived this. "Ah! ah! the fool has outwitted the wise men this time," he muttered. "Most reverend sirs, how comes it that your noble steeds cannot keep pace with a poor crippled idiot? What could I do more than hobble along, thinking you were following, when, lo and behold! turning round, you were not there; so I e'en had to run back and try to find your reverences. Now I have found you, an it please you to tell me the mansion or hostelry to which you are bound, I will lead you to it; every house and every hovel in Dixmuyde is equally well known to Hans Kopperzoon."

"The fool is not so great a fool after all," said Titelmann to his companion.

"He may be a greater knave than we take him to be," replied Fabry; "he must needs be looked after."

"I wait the commands of your reverences," said Hans, taking off his hat and bowing low as he spoke.

"Lead us then to the house of Master Nicholas Barra," said the Inquisitor Titelmann, "you doubtless know the street."

"That do I, reverend sir, by the token that not long since worthy Master Barra, in the spirit of kindness, kicked me down the steps of his mansion."

"You were probably sitting on them, stopping his way, and deserved the rebuff," observed Fabry.

"I took it at all events, and went my way," muttered Hans as he ran on once more in front of the horsemen. "I love not Master Barra the more for it though, nor his guests either."

The pathway somewhat improved as it neared the town, and the horsemen were able to keep pace with the idiot, who in a short time led them up to the gateway of a large but gloomy house at the back of the town.

"Is this the mansion of Master Barra?" asked the Inquisitor Titelmann.

"An it please your reverence I know of no other," said Hans; "and having done my duty in conducting you thus far, with all due submission I must remind you to do yours, to cross my hand with the coin you promised."

As Hans spoke he cautiously kept his eye on the countenance and right arm of the Inquisitor, prepared, should either exhibit hostile intention or act, to spring aside out of the way.

"You would have coin, knave, would you?" said the Inquisitor. "Come again in a day or two, and you shall have a double fee; as yet we know not whether you have led us aright. Ring yonder bell, and we will learn whether this is truly the house of Master Barra or not."

"He would brain me if I were to doubt his word," muttered Hans, tugging away at the iron bell-pull.

No answer came, and the chief Inquisitor began to grow impatient. At length a slide in the gate was pulled aside, and the wizened face of an old woman appeared. She looked inquiringly at the strangers, as if doubting whether or not to admit them. A few words from the chief Inquisitor were, however, sufficient to make her begin drawing aside the bars with trembling hands, when, with the assistance of Hans, the gates being thrown open, the Inquisitors rode into the small stone-paved court-yard.

"Alack—alack! who is to take their horses?" muttered the old woman; "the men are all gone to the pageant and have left me alone."

"Never fear, mother, I will take care of their reverences' horses," said Hans; "although Master Barra loves me not, judging by his deeds, I am ready to do him a good turn and act the part of his horse-boy."

The two Inquisitors, like other people after a long journey, being anxious to get into their evening quarters, left their steeds in the charge of Hans and entered the house. He walked the animals up and down for some time, and then, tired of the occupation, secured their bridles to some iron rings in the wall, and noiselessly crept up the steps to the house. He went along a passage, peering cautiously on either side, till he reached a room of considerable size. He looked in; no one was there.

"Ah—ah! mischief has been brewed here before now," he muttered, as he walked forward on tiptoe, glancing over his shoulders to ascertain that no one was following. At the further end was a large raised seat or chair of state covered with damask. He drew the drapery aside. There was ample space for him to conceal himself beneath it.

"If they find poor Hans they will kill him," he said to himself; "that will not matter much, however; if he can hear their plots and plans, idiot as they call him, he may foil them." Saying this, he crawled in, carefully drawing the drapery so as entirely to conceal himself.

CHAPTER VII.

The pageant was over; the people were dispersing to their homes, most of them in high glee, and laughing at the jokes which had been uttered. Marie and Max Gellert had agreed not to speak to Herr Kapell till they had got home, of what had occurred. Poor Marie felt very much alarmed; her heart had been foreboding evil since the visit of the two strangers, though the presence of Max had greatly contributed to dispel her fears for the time. He was to have left Dixmuyde next morning; but would he go now, while danger threatened them? She would ask him to stay.

"If you had commanded me to go, I would have disobeyed you," was his answer. "If those fearful Inquisitors have really come hither, your father will be among the first they will seize as their prey. I say this, Marie, that you may join your entreaties to mine, that he will allow me before the night passes by to conduct him to a place of safety," said Max; "and I would urge you, Marie, to fly likewise. They might be content to leave you if they could seize your father; but should he escape, then we know not what cruelties they may commit."

But they found that her father was not to be persuaded.

"My dear daughter, my young friend, understand that we should never fear to face danger when duty commands us to remain," answered Walter Kapell. "In these times of trouble, I may yet be of use to my fellow-townsmen. Would that they had followed my advice, and given up the performance of that foolish pageant, and our foes would at least have had less excuse for persecuting us."

"But the mischief is done," urged Max. "If the Inquisitors have really come to the place, as the poor idiot supposes, you undoubtedly will be among the first seized. Their object is always to strike terror into the hearts of the people by destroying those who may become their leaders and advisers. Oh! listen to Marie."

"My dear father," said Marie, "he speaks the truth. Remember those mysterious visitors of the other day; that they came with treacherous intent there is no doubt. Think how many have already suffered even for having a Bible in their houses."

Marie and her lover continued in the same strain for some time, advancing every argument they could think of to induce Herr Kapell to make his escape while there might be time; but he remained inflexible. He had the same answer to all their expostulations: "I believe it my duty to continue at my post."

"Now, my young friend," he said at length to Max, "I must urge you to return to your hostelry. Come here to-morrow morning before you take your departure as you proposed doing, and I trust that you will find we have still been unmolested."

Poor Marie could restrain her feelings no longer, but burst into tears; again and again she entreated her father to provide for his safety. "Oh! reflect, my beloved father," she exclaimed at length, having reserved her strongest argument to the last, "if you are seized and dragged off to prison, I must bear you company—if not for your own sake, for mine. I entreat you to follow the advice we offer," and she looked up into his face with streaming eyes. "It is for myself, the child you love, I plead."

Max Gellert could scarcely restrain himself when he found that the magistrate still remained determined. He was indeed very much inclined to lose patience with him; still he could not but admire his firm resolution to remain at the post of duty, as he believed it. At length Max was compelled to obey the magistrate's commands, and bidding him and Marie farewell, with a heavy heart he left the house, and the door was closed behind him. He was still undecided how to act. At first he was inclined to walk up and down during the night, performing the duty of a sentinel. He could not tear himself away from the spot. He had made several turns, looking up ever and anon at the windows of Walter Kapell's house, and considering whether he should not go back and make yet another effort. Then he reflected that it might be wiser first to proceed on to his inn, and make the arrangements he had proposed for their flight. He might do this without causing suspicion, as it was known that he had intended starting on his journey the following morning, and he might easily find an excuse for commencing it at an earlier hour than he had fixed on.

As soon as he had come to this resolution, giving one more glance up at the window, hoping that he might get a glimpse even of the shadow of Marie's figure, he hurried forward. He had not got far when he observed through the gloom a figure stealing along towards him, close to the wall, as if to shun observation. He instinctively put his hand on the hilt of his sword ready to draw and defend himself should he be attacked, as was not at all unlikely in those times. He and the stranger had got close up to each other. For a moment he supposed the latter to be a cavalier like himself, but a second glance showed the tattered and fantastic costume of Hans Kopperzoon. The idiot stopped and gazed at him earnestly.

"Hist! hist!" he said, "who are you, an honest man or a rogue?"

"An honest man I hope," answered Max.

"I believe I have seen you before, my friend. I know you by your voice now," said Hans; "I can trust you. I am on my way to those we would both wish to serve. Our friends are in terrible danger. The poor idiot can, however, help those who are kind to him, as well as can many a wiser man. Why have they not taken my advice? I warned them before, and hoped that by this time they would be far away from this unhappy town. I suspect, young sir, however, if they had gone you would be bearing them company. Are they still in their house?"

Max was surprised to hear one supposed to be a mere idiot speak thus sanely, and at once told him that he had in vain endeavoured to persuade Walter Kapell and his daughter to leave Dixmuyde.

"Then the fool must see if his arguments can produce more effect than a wise man's," said Hans, chuckling, as was his custom at times when he spoke.

"If you are bound to Walter Kapell's, I will return with you," said Max.

"A sensible resolve," answered Hans. "Come along, gentle sir. If our friends are found within their own doors by sunrise to-morrow, they will be clutched by the talons of those ill-favoured birds of prey who with their dark wings are now flying over this unhappy land of ours."

"I pray that you may persuade Herr Kapell of this," said Max; "but you must find stronger arguments than I used."

"I can tell him that I heard Titelmann himself issue an order for his and his fair daughter's apprehension, this very night," whispered Hans. "If he will not believe me, I will tell him he is more mad than I am, and shall be much inclined to lift him up on my shoulders and carry him off by main force. Come along, young sir, or we may have the Inquisitors' hounds baying at our heels before we reach the house."

Max, with his strange companion by his side, hurried back towards the house he had just left, looking anxiously around to ascertain if any one was following. Even now it might be too late, he feared, but he resolved to defend Marie and her father with his life.

He and Hans reached Walter Kapell's abode as he hoped unobserved. Margaret opened the door in answer to their knock. Her countenance was pale and anxious.

"Come in," she said, "Oh! Herr Gellert, what has brought you back?"

"This honest fellow, and I would see your master forthwith," he said.

"Come up, come up then," said Margaret, "my poor young mistress is in a sad state; I never saw her so moved. What has happened?"

"You are a faithful friend, Dame Margaret, and I would that you could assist in persuading your master to fly from hence without a moment's delay."

"Fly! whither can my master fly?" she exclaimed.

"To Antwerp, and from thence to the happier shores of England." This was said as Max and Hans followed Margaret up-stairs.

Notwithstanding his daughter's agitation, Walter Kapell was perfectly calm. He cross-questioned Hans narrowly about the information he brought, and was at length convinced that the idiot had really heard the Inquisitors issue the order for his apprehension, and that it was not a fancy of his brain. Marie clasped her hands with thankfulness when she heard her father agree to follow Max Gellert's advice. While she and Margaret hastened to make preparations for their sudden journey, Walter Kapell put up his money and certain valuables, especially some belonging to his wife which he desired to carry with him. No time was wasted, however, and in a very few minutes Marie appeared, habited for a journey on horseback, when Walter Kapell, with his cloak thrown around him and carrying his sword in his hand, declared himself ready to proceed.

Poor Margaret could not restrain her tears. "Go—go, my dear young lady," she said, embracing Marie. "I will remain and guard the house. They may put me to the torture, and drive my poor life out of my body, before I will tell them where you are gone."

"What dreadful words are those!" said Marie as she returned Margaret's caress.

"I should not have spoken them," said her kind nurse; "they will scarcely interfere with me. Do not be alarmed on my account. Now Heaven protect you. I would not delay you a moment. I am sure that brave young gentleman will fight for you as long as he has a drop of blood in his veins."

As Dame Margaret uttered these words the whole party issued from the house, when she immediately closed the door behind them, barring and bolting it as her master had desired her to do.

Max supporting Marie, with Walter Kapell on the other side of her, hurried along towards the "Black Boar," his inn, where he hoped soon to have his horses saddled and ready to proceed on their journey. Immediately they left the house, the idiot, touching Max Gellert on the shoulder, whispered, "Herr Duffel is kind to Hans; Hans must give him warning of the danger which threatens him," and before Max could turn round, the idiot had glided away into the darkness.

Marie entreated her father and lover to hurry their steps.

"I can move as fast as either of you," she said, "do not delay for my sake."

The "Black Boar" was at some distance from Walter Kapell's house, being conveniently situated on the high road which passed through the outskirts of Dixmuyde. To Marie the distance appeared far greater than she expected to find it. Her heart beat quickly with agitation; for she dreaded lest they might meet any one who would stop them, or inquire where they were going at that late hour.

"In a few minutes more we shall be at the inn," whispered Max.

As he spoke, three persons in cloaks were seen approaching from the direction in which they were going. They must either meet them, or turn back and take another road. The very act, however, of retreating might be dangerous, should the persons approaching be foes. The instant Max saw them his suspicions were aroused, for he in no way liked their appearance.

"Herr Kapell," he said, "be ready to draw and defend yourself should we be attacked."

He had scarcely spoken when the strangers began to move quickly towards them. "Who are you, thus wandering through the streets at night?" demanded one of the strangers.

"I might well ask you the same question," answered Max, promptly. "Surely it is allowable for peaceable citizens to return home after a visit to a friend."

"We must know who you are before we let you pass," said the same person who had before spoken.

"And I must know by what authority you venture to question us before I answer you," exclaimed Max, placing himself in front of Marie and her father.

"By the authority of the Emperor and the Holy Inquisition," was the answer. "You must accompany us, and satisfy the Inquisitors respecting the object which has taken you from your homes at this hour."

"What if we refuse to yield to the summons?" exclaimed Max, drawing his sword, and holding it ready for use.

"We are three to two, for we take not the girl into account," answered the stranger, gruffly. He seemed, however, not very eager to meet the point of Max's weapon.

"Oh! let us pass, whoever you are," exclaimed Marie, trembling from head to foot, though endeavouring to retain her composure. "Surely you would not hinder us from proceeding on our way."

"You may have been out attending some meeting of heretics, or preachings, and knowing your guilt may be about leaving the town," said the stranger. "Put up your sword, young sir, or it may be the worse for you."

"Not till you allow us to pass unmolested," answered Max.

The three men, who had drawn their weapons, now advanced. Max placed himself before Marie, keeping his assailants at bay. While one, who showed himself to be a good swordsman, attacked him, the other two assailed Walter Kapell. The magistrate, who had been a man of peace all his life, was but little accustomed to use a sword. His weapon was whirled from his grasp, and his two assailants rushing in, seized his arms and began dragging him away.

CHRIST AND HIS CHURCH:

BY THE REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A., CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN, ETC.; AUTHOR OF "AIDS TO PRAYER," ETC.

"Look not upon me, because I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me: my mother's children were angry with me; they made me keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept. Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest, where Thou makest Thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of Thy companions?"—Song of Solomon i. 6, 7.

AT this point there is an abrupt transition in the dialogue; and though it is still the Church speaking, her address is no longer to the daughters of Jerusalem, but to Christ Himself, and to Him in earnest prayer, that, by the reviving and refreshing influences of His Word and Spirit, He would comfort her under the infirmities she had just been compelled to bewail:—"Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest, where Thou makest Thy flock to rest at noon."

"O Thou whom my soul loveth." Love to Christ is the key-note of this song in all its parts. The experience of it by the true believer stands for all comfort, all assurance, all promise. It is the source of his joy: "We will rejoice and be glad in Thee." It is the ground of his confidence: "I am my Beloved's, and my Beloved is mine." It is the pledge of his unfailing constancy: "I held Him, and would not let Him go." It is his uplifted standard against all misgivings and fears: "Set me as a seal upon Thine heart, as a seal upon Thine arm; for love is strong as death. . . . Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it." And a like place belongs to this love to Christ under the Gospel. Peter felt there was only one thing which could commend him to his Divine Master: "Lord, Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love Thee dearly." * But this would commend his faithfulness, for love to the Lord Jesus Christ is the inclusive grace, the paramount grace, the representative grace, so to speak, standing for all that makes the true disciple. Love enters more or less into all the fruits of the Spirit, and all the graces of the Christian character. What is "joy," but love happy in its object? or "peace," but love cherishing the Lord's parting gift? or "long-suffering," but love bearing the cross after Jesus? or "gentleness," but love bearing provocations meekly, and taking them without a murmur for His sake? What is "hope," but love resting on her anchor? What is "faith," but love mounting on eagle's wings to her home in heaven? What is "repentance," but love washing the Redeemer's feet with tears? What is "obedience," but love offering its best and choicest on the altar of self-sacrifice, and spending life in asking the question, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" "Whom not having seen, ye love," says the apostle; and loving, we believe in; and loving, we lean upon; and loving, we follow after; and loving, we run to for food, for guidance, for shelter, for rest. "Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest, where Thou makest Thy flock to rest at noon."

"Where Thou feedest Thy flock." As intimated in a former paper, the scene of the composition is laid in a pastoral country, and therefore, with perfect naturalness, Christ is addressed as a shepherd. We all feel that no image could be more tender or suggestive than this. In its spiritual applications it conveys an assurance to us of everything we could either need or desire—all love, care, providence, sympathy, devotion, watchfulness—the services of men and the ministry of angels—preservation in danger and protection from foes. It is an image which gathers up into one all Christ's titles, and condenses into one all His blessed offices; and causes to centre and meet in one blaze of brightness all promise, prophecy, vision, type—all that could inspire affection, or draw forth a deep and devoted trust:—"He shall feed His flock like a shepherd. He shall gather the lambs with His arm, and carry them in His bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young."

And observe, it is "Thy flock" concerning which the Church desires to be informed; those who had been once neglected and scattered abroad; those whom Christ had sought, and found, and laid on His shoulders rejoicing; those on whom He had set the seal of a peculiar propriety as each one "passed under the hand of him that telleth them." These He guides when they err, feeds when they hunger, refreshes when they faint, binds up when they are sick and wounded, shields and shelters when they are tempted and assailed. "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them." Know them through and through; know all their thoughts, desires, affections, purposes; all their fears, infirmities, struggles, doubts; all their temptations, trials, dangers, discouragements. And I know them all; none are overlooked; none are neglected; none perish. There is an unbroken succession of living agencies at work for them, beginning from the moment the lamb was first found of the Bishop of souls, until, brought again from the dead by "the Great Shepherd of the sheep," it shall be folded everlastingly with the redeemed flock of God. Mighty and marvellous provision all this for the sheep of His pasture. "Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest them," how Thou feedest them, and what Thou feedest them upon.

"Tell me where Thou feedest them." To this it may be answered generally, on the fruitful hills of grace and truth, in the rich valleys of Gospel promise, by the still waters of the river of life. But a more particular answer may be obtained from the sixth chapter, where we read: "My Beloved is gone down into His garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the gardens." Here, by "gardens," as we learn from other Scriptures, is meant the place of ordinances; the Church with its prayers and preachings and visible ministries; the hallowed spot where God holds discourse with souls; "communes with them from the mercy seat;" breaks to them, morning by morning, the crumbs of life and immortality. In these, therefore, we may eat and be filled. "Eat, O friends, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved." "They shall be abundantly satisfied with the goodness of Thy house." And how dost Thou feed them? Mediately by under shepherds, no doubt, who have it in charge "in season and out of season," to feed the flock of God, and to minister those ordinances, those "breasts of consolation," out of which the people are to draw precious life. Yet would those breasts be "dry," and that food be mere husk and stalk, if it were not for the accompanying influences of the all-quickening Spirit, taking of the things of Christ, making the promise a living thing, filling the hungry soul with the strong meat of the Word, and causing "the wholesome doctrines of our Lord Jesus Christ" to be "sweeter than honey and the honeycomb." And hence, efficiently and actually and in very deed, the food wherewith Christ makes His flock to feed is Himself. They feed on Him; grow up in Him; live by Him. His flesh is meat indeed, and His blood is drink indeed. He brings them into His banqueting-house; and while "His banner over them is love," He spreads their tables with angels' food. He feeds them with the manna that comes down from heaven. Their souls delight themselves with the fatness of grace and promise; and with flagons of consolation, better than wine, their hearts are made merry and glad. Would not the Church be satisfied with such an answer to the inquiry, "Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest Thy flock?"

But not feedest them only; tell me also "where Thou makest Thy flock to rest at noon." A good shepherd makes provision for his flock at all seasons—sees that they have pasture for the morning, shade for the noon, a safe fold at night. So likewise does Christ provide for those who are His people, and the sheep of His pasture. In the day-time of life He feeds them; in the night of the grave He enfolds them; and when the sun of tribulation lights upon them, or any heat, He leads them to "quiet resting-places."

"And a man shall be as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest, as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." "Tell me, therefore," says the Church, "where Thou makest Thy flock to rest at noon."

By "noon," here, we clearly understand a time of temptation, or affliction, or persecution—that scorching season, to the malign influences of which the Church had already attributed much of her lost comeliness. And, therefore, she here proposes the anxious inquiry, "Tell me where dost Thou lead Thy flocks at noon," when they are "in heaviness through manifold temptations;"—when the arrows of Satan are hot, and fierce, and violent; when saints are cast into the furnace of affliction; when neglect, and hate, and scorn burn up their "spirit as it were a fire-brand?" What shelter hast thou for one smitten of God and chastened? for one with heart and home desolate, stay and staff gone, life's one bright thing taken from him, left in the great world alone? Thou hast refreshments, coverts, resting-places—what are they for those who are under God's thick cloud—a cloud that it seems no prayer can pass through,—who walk in darkness and have no light,—who are bruised, burdened, broken down utterly under a crushing sense of the Divine displeasure; who pray, and pray not,—who believe, and believe not,—desponding, though not in despair,—faint, though still pursuing? Under the shadow of what rock can they repose who are exposed to this noon-tide heat? "Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou makest Thy flock to rest at noon."

To such questions we know the Bridegroom can make full answer. Under all forms of scorching heat when the soul is faint,—under affliction, or temptation, or desponding thoughts, Christ has many resting-places, protecting shelters, refuges we may always run into and be safe. We find them in the tenderness of His sympathy, in the boundlessness of His compassions, in the unfathomed depths of His love. We find them in the consolations of His Spirit, in the sufficiency of His grace; in the pledged oath and seal of the everlasting covenant. We find them in the illimitable reach of His sacrifice, in the power of His resurrection, in the might of His ascended priesthood, and in His plighted Word to be with us "even unto the end of the world." All these are noon-tide resting-places, still waters beside which Christ leads the people of His flock. And they may lie down there, and take their rest, having the everlasting arms underneath them, and beholding on every side of them the green pastures of the flock of God. Such a rest we all feel the need of sometimes. We all have our noon to pass through—when Satan assaults, and crosses irritate, and wrongs chafe, and expectation fails;—when we want to get away from ourselves and out of ourselves—out of the sound of a fretting and fatiguing world to some calm retreat, where we can know nothing but the ripple of "the waters of Siloam which flow softly," and the still, small voice of the Beloved whispering, "Peace!" And thus we see that He who is our food is our rest also. "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want." He provides the pasture, and He prepares the shade. He spreads our table in the wilderness, and He shows us a place where we may lie down at noon. And the pasture and the couch are one. "He that eateth me shall live by me," is His answer to the fainting soul who asks, "Tell me where Thou feedest." If the inquiry be pressed further, "And where Thou makest Thy flock to rest at noon," a voice replies, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest"—rest, and more than rest, as the Church found: "I sat down under His shadow with great delight."

And then mark the reasons why the Church is so anxious to be fed where Christ's people feed, and to rest only where His people rest—namely, that if she should wander very far either from Him or them, there was danger that she might "make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience," and become joined unto the world. Let me be with Thy flock, for "why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of Thy companions? or rather of those who pretend to be Thy companions and are not?"

Observe here one of the marks of a true believer—namely, that he has a holy shrinking from all hurtful contacts; prays to be kept at a distance from all soul-destroying influences; has a godly dread of the world—of going too near to it—of being too much mixed up with it—of throwing himself too much into the groove of its fashions, and pleasures, and principles, and ways. And this we should do, not so much from fear of the world as from distrust of ourselves. A Christian's footing is never so sure as when he is under a constant fear of falling; as when the spirit of self-reliance is cast out; as when a sense of weakness makes him to walk softly, and, leaning hard on Christ, he cries, "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe." And there are two dangers the Church is afraid of, if she should turn aside, if she should miss her way and get out of the footprints of the flock—namely, that she should feed in treacherous pastures, or lie down in a delusive rest. Away from Christ and the place where His people feed, she would be ever spending money for that which is not bread, which would minister to no holy longings, satisfy none of the aspirations of the human spirit, feeding "with ashes" the cravings of an immortal nature, and flinging the mocked and disappointed soul back upon herself, "as when a hungry man dreameth, and behold he eateth; but he awaketh, and his soul is empty."

And as the pastures are not wholesome, so the rest does not refresh. "The bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself upon it." He may lie down on it, but it is only to be "scared with dreams, and terrified with visions." His eyes are closed, but it is by the world's opiate, not by the children's sleep. It is a broken slumber, not peaceful rest. "Seeing, then," reasons the Church, "that in Christ we have rest, and all rest—rest from the disquietudes of an anxious heart; rest from the fears of a sin-burdened conscience; rest from the oppressions of the tempter's noontide heat; rest in that sheltering bosom where I may cast all my sins and sorrows, why should I turn aside by the flocks of Thy companions?" And believers now must reason in like manner. We know that, in regard of our spiritual life, all comfort, all growth, all safety, all peace, must consist in our being near to Christ, and feeling that He is near to us. We must strive habitually after a sense of His indwelling presence, as the life of our life, and the soul of our strength. If we be His flock, we shall lack nothing. Through much trial we shall be led, it may be, and through much weariness, but He will assuredly bring us home at last. If we are gentle, His eye will guide us; if we are wayward, His staff will be laid upon us; if unwittingly we stray from His side, He will restore our souls, never leaving us, never forsaking us, till He has brought us to those heavenly pastures where He feeds his flock, or where, under the shelter of the everlasting hills, He makes them to rest at noon.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

WAS IT WELL DONE?

PHILIP had accepted two invitations for Christmas week—viz., to dine at Mrs. Austin's on Christmas Eve, and on the following day at his partner Mr. Tabor's. The company assembled in Mrs. Austin's drawing-room, which he was the last to enter, consisted of the Tabors, Fanny Lovejoy, and the incumbent of the district church—all friends, as Mrs. Austin had said, and they went to dinner in the following order: the clergyman, Mr. Huntingdon, took Mrs. Austin, Mr. Tabor took Mrs. Torrance, and Philip took Mrs. Tabor, Lucy and Miss Lovejoy bringing up the rear. But at table Philip was seated between the two latter. Philip could not well have been placed in a position more trying to him. There he was, seated between an attraction which he had the strongest determination to repel, and a repulsion which he had the good grace to desire at least to conceal. Philip was certainly very unfair to Fanny; but he was by no means fair in many things. Mrs. Tabor, watching her darling, and seeing the look of sweet content which dawned upon her face as she took her seat beside him, felt mightily indignant at his unfairness. That impulsive little woman had the strongest desire to cross over from her place, and bodily protect her little Lucy by taking her away from his side. If he didn't want to marry Lucy, why didn't he go and marry somebody else and make an end of himself?" she had said, to her husband's amusement, for the subject had been renewed more than once between them. She felt sure that in some way he had been tampering with the child's affections. "After all, he may be only waiting to have something more to offer her," suggested Mr. Tabor.

"As if we would only part with her to the highest bidder!" cried Mrs. Tabor, indignantly. "He has a great deal more than you had when I engaged myself to you," she added; "you had only three hundred a year."

"And you had nothing at all," said Mr. Tabor, fondly. "But, my love, I tell you frankly, I don't understand Philip. He has not been open with me lately about his affairs; it is just possible, however, that he may be saving in order to marry. You know young people nowadays can't set up house on a hundred or two as we did, and Philip had less than nothing to start with."

Lucy had begun to prattle to Philip in her soft fresh voice, and he answered in almost savage monosyllables, the effect of the restraint he was putting on himself, for he at least had made up his mind that he was not in a position to marry Lucy Tabor, and he had as great a horror of tampering with the girl's affections as Mrs. Tabor could possibly have desired.

Fanny went on eating her dinner in silence. Poor Fanny, she stood just a little in awe of Philip, and had done so ever since his boyhood, when he had been both disagreeably conscientious and conscientiously disagreeable, and had frequently in these moods fallen foul of the slipshod Fanny. She loved him, but it was from household use and wont, and because she was of a loving nature; but he had been more or less to her a veritable enfant terrible. Also at the present moment Fanny had upon her mind a feather bed—not metaphorical but actual, a feather bed with all the appurtenances thereof, and sundry other articles of furniture, which she had sent off to her uncle's house out of her own. And though these things were strictly hers to do with as she would, she felt quite as guilty as many another would who had stolen them, and also, though she was not under the slightest compulsion to tell Philip what she had done, she had a well-founded conviction that out it would come.

Gradually Lucy began to wonder at Philip. She glanced up at him from time to time, puzzled at first, and then hurt—grievously hurt, so hurt that her heart seemed in her throat, and she could scarcely swallow a morsel. Lucy had in former days been petted by Philip. She had sat on his knee. He had stroked her hair and her hands with a peculiar caressing touch, which the child had loved; and though they had met but seldom recently, there was outwardly the old frankness between them still. Even at her party the other night, though he had held aloof at first, he had come to her at last, and had stayed by her, making her heart beat fast with pleasure. What had she done to offend him? She could not account for it at all.

And yet it was not difficult to account for Philip's conduct. He had resolved to give up all idea of Lucy, and had begun to banish her image from his very thoughts, when that unlucky party placed him once more so near her that to resist the attraction became impossible. He had resisted it as long as he could, and then getting warm with excitement he yielded, and for the rest of the evening had defied all prudence and self-control, though he heard their voices plainly enough. But he had determined never to risk so much again, for what he put in peril was not only his own honour but Lucy's happiness.

Therefore he answered abruptly, moodily, even harshly, the remarks which Lucy addressed to him, and made her feel that she had never been so unhappy in the whole course of her life. Poor Mrs. Austin, engrossed by Mr. Huntingdon, little thought of the discomfort of at least three of her guests.

Mr. Huntingdon was a large, fair, comfortable-looking young man, with an air of great self-satisfaction; that would have been Philip's description of him. But the ladies around him, and they were but a sample of some hundreds, would have pronounced it an inexcusably unfair one. He was of course the idol of a circle, naturally and necessarily, for he was the only creature to whom, from the dead level of their suburban society, they could lift their eyes. And he was by no means an unpleasing object. He was good, he was handsome, he was tolerably cultivated, and he had about him a manly simplicity, which his admirers were doing their best to spoil. He was poor, and the church was not endowed. He was remunerated for his labours by a moiety of the seat-rents. It was therefore necessary to keep up the congregation, in order to keep out of debt. He had to get up, and to keep up, an amount of fervour which he found it difficult to maintain—at least, in the atmosphere of the St. Luke's congregation. It was very difficult to sustain any fervour at all in the presence of that sea of millinery, blooming faces and shiny pates of comfortable papas, who asked him to dine with them, and discussed passing events, while they guarded against the least allusion to those spiritual matters which were the work of the clergyman's life. No one in that congregation appeared to have any troubles—no one appeared to have any sins. Our clergyman, who longed to do battle with real evil in men's lives and souls, found himself fighting with shadows. It took the heart out of him, for his was the heart of a worker, not of a preacher; he was no preacher—few are. He took occasion to lament his lukewarmness openly, and it had a great effect. He was held to be quite apostolic; his church filled, and he became popular, and was of course tempted to preach in the style which made him so. Every effort which he made after thorough sincerity of life seemed to lead him further from it.

When the three gentlemen were left to themselves, Mr. Huntingdon succeeded in leading the conversation into a more serious channel than usual; and in the course of it Philip broached some opinions which startled the clergyman, as coming from one who considered that he had a right to be held a member of the Church of England. Philip was not sorry to startle Mr. Huntingdon. He was not a perfect character; he was out of temper with himself and things in general, and he gave undue prominence to what rested in his mind as speculation rather than belief. And when Philip asserted that he believed a great many people were going about in the world without souls, having literally and truly lost them, Mr. Huntingdon set him down as dangerous, and all the more dangerous that he attempted to support the theory by reason, and even by the authority of Scripture. Mr. Huntingdon knew nothing of Philip's life; but even if he had known it to be more blameless than most, he would never have endorsed the maxim, "He can't be wrong whose life is in the right." He would, on the contrary, have held most conscientiously to the converse, that his life could not be right who was in the wrong with his creed.

Mr. Tabor, always cautious and peace-loving, seeing how matters were going between the two young men, made a motion to join the ladies. These ideas of Philip's revealed to him a new, and rather uncomfortable phase of his junior partner's mind.

So they adjourned to the drawing-room, and Mr. Huntingdon at once made his way to the place where Mrs. Austin was seated by the side of Mrs. Tabor. Mr. Tabor went over and joined Fanny and Mrs. Torrance; and the former seized upon the opportunity to give him an account of her uncle and cousins. Lucy had been playing already, and Mrs. Austin had begged her to go on. Common politeness required the unattached Philip to go and turn over the leaves of her music for her, which he accordingly did.

"Sing us something, Lucy," cried her father, when she paused, and Lucy sang. Mr. Tabor, listening (for he loved his daughter's music), caught a depth of tone in it which he had never heard before; and he could not help exclaiming when she had finished the song, "Well done, Lucy!"

Was it well done? It was the pain at her heart that wrung the music out. She was being taught to love by love's suffering instead of by its joy, though as yet she did not know that it was so. When she had finished her song, she smiled as she thanked Philip and turned away, and he allowed her to pass over to her mother's side. It was Lucy's first sorrow, and her first dissimulation was to hide it, which the girl did heroically.

Shortly after, the Tabors went away and broke up the little party. Once at home, Lucy kissed her father and mother with a semblance of her old gaiety, and ran up-stairs to her own room. But in her own room she knelt for a long time quite dumbly. She had no words for the pain within her. The thought in her heart was only, "Why do I suffer thus?"

On the morrow Lucy joined in the household greetings, and walked to church with her father, a little paler than her wont, which was all that showed outwardly of the change within. The last time she had sat there with her parents, listening to the Christmas service, she had been a mere child—so it seemed to herself; she could look back upon herself as so different. Only now had she come into a separate existence, with a life and experience of her own, and it was pain. And yet the pain was a quickening one, as if she had passed from winter into spring—had come forth into bud and blossom, though the wind was cold, and the frost might blight and wither.

In the evening at her father's house the company was the same, with two additions—Mr. Wildish, and a young doctor who had settled in the neighbourhood; both units, like Philip and Fanny, who had no circle to gather to. But under the new arrangement, necessitated by these added units, a complete change was wrought upon the rest. The party was as lively and merry as Mrs. Austin's had been chill and dismal. Lucy was seated between Arthur Wildish and the doctor; the latter robustly sanguine, as a young physician ought to be, the former, who was of Celtic blood, with a quite un-English flow of enthusiasm and spirits; and on the surface Lucy was gay. Even Philip, seated by Mrs. Austin, was charmed into accord with the general geniality.

It was only at the close of the evening that he discovered, or thought he discovered in Mr. Wildish a tendency to hover about Lucy, as a bee hovers round a blossom, and that he found it necessary to stand beside her, to protect her from his buzzing.

Philip could not help smiling, when he found that the subject of the conversation which had roused his jealousy was working men's clubs. "Confess that you know rather more about the inhabitants of the Fiji Islands, Lucy, than about the habits of working men," said Philip.

"I fear it is true," said Lucy, "but I can listen; and Mr. Wildish has been telling me a great deal about them. He has been giving me an account of a club he has helped to establish, where they go to read the newspapers and amuse themselves."

"And I assure you," said Wildish, turning to Philip, "that some of them are as nice, intelligent fellows as you could wish to meet."

"I don't see anything remarkable in that," said Philip. "There is far greater equality of intelligence among men than we are apt to suppose; and I wonder that working men can endure to be treated like a parcel of children, and petted and patted on the back perpetually."

"Our club is to be self-supporting," said Wildish, "all that we have done is to initiate it."

"Whatever is worth doing for them, they can do for themselves if they choose," said Philip; "and if they don't choose, there is no good done at all."

"May not we, who have leisure and cultivation, help them to choose?" said Wildish, eagerly.

"Working men will soon be the most leisurely class in the kingdom," said Philip. "What man who is going to do anything for himself sets out by working only nine hours a day?"

"But surely nine hours is enough to devote to hard manual labour?" said Wildish.

"No, it isn't, unless a man wants to do something harder," said Philip.

"Too bad," cried Wildish, laughing; "all work and no play you know."

"What are the things you think best worth having, Wildish?" asked Philip. "Money?"

"No."

"Ah, well, that's because you have enough of it; but suppose you had not enough of it, and could get nothing that you wanted without it?"

"Well, we'll say money then," said Wildish.

"After that education, social consideration, the right to rise into any position for which you were fitted—these are the best things as regards this life. They are within reach of the working men, but they must work harder, and deny themselves more than, as a class, they have any idea of, in order to get them."

"I don't see how that bears upon our argument," said Wildish. "You are against working mens' clubs."

"No, I am not," said Philip.

"Well, you are against people of education, people of the upper classes, helping to establish them?"

"No again. I am only in favour of working men doing that, and far greater things, for themselves."

"But their wants claim our consideration, do they not?" said Wildish.

"And I want them to claim a far higher consideration," said Philip.

"Mr. Wildish would lead them to higher things," broke in Lucy, blushing.

At this Mr. Wildish looked radiant.

"And Philip," she added, turning to him, "I know you want to be able to treat them as true equals, and to meet them wherever men may meet as such."

"What are you disputing so vehemently, with Miss Tabor for umpire?" said the doctor, coming up.

Mr. Wildish gave the information.

"Then you ought to beg Miss Tabor's pardon for discussing such a subject with her," returned the doctor, whose manners and ideas were somewhat underbred.

"No, indeed," said Lucy, earnestly, and not in the least intending to flatter Mr. Wildish, "I have been very much interested."

But the doctor had broken up the discussion, and Lucy was called upon to sing; so the little group separated immediately, nor did it form again, only when Philip was saying good-bye, and Lucy found herself beside him for a moment out of the others' hearing, she took courage to whisper, "Are you offended with me, Philip?"

"Have I been cross to you, Lucy?" he said, for answer.

"Something very like it," she replied, between laughing and crying.

"Forgive me," he whispered; "I am very wretched."

There was no time for more. Her eyes had questioned, but he could not answer; and the effect of his words he could not possibly foresee. Their effect was to make Lucy forget her own grievance and dwell completely upon his, giving up her whole heart to yearning tenderness.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS, FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. NEW SERIES. No. 4. ELIJAH THE PROPHET. PART II.

Chapters to be read—1 Kings xix.; 2 Kings ii.

INTRODUCTION.—Before beginning this lesson ask a few questions upon the last, so as to bring out strongly the quality of boldness which Elijah displayed in meeting Ahab and the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel; thus prepare the children for the contrast presented by this lesson, in which Elijah is found despondent.

I. ELIJAH IN THE WILDERNESS. (Read xix. 1—8.) Ask what became of the people after the events on Mount Carmel. Ahab tells Jezebel, who is furious with Elijah and threatens his life; the people dispersed, stirred with new feelings of devotion to God. Elijah left alone; how would he feel? Lonely, afraid, depressed after the previous excitement, wishes to die, as of no use to any one. See how God deals with him. (1) The food. He went to Beersheba, the extremity of the land, and leaving his servant, went on alone to the wilderness. Is awoke by an angel twice; food is prepared for him, and he is thus strengthened for the long journey of forty days before him. Ask of whom this reminds us. Christ dreading being left alone (John xvi. 32), takes His three disciples—leaves them while He goes on to the garden alone—prays—and is strengthened by an angel for the work before Him (Luke xxii. 43). So always before any great work God in answer to prayer will strengthen His children. Remind of Jacob before meeting Esau (Gen. xxxii. 24), Moses on Mount Horeb (Exod. ii.), Joshua before taking Jericho (Josh. v. 13). This an encouragement to seek earnestly that we may find help in time of need. (2) The cave. (Read 9—13.) Ask why Elijah was brought to Horeb; who fasted there forty days before when receiving instructions from God? Notice God's question to him. He had come away from his work and duties in Judah, and was doing nothing in the wilderness. His answer defends his conduct; showing how he had been jealous for God, but was now left alone and in danger of his life. Ask the children what they think of the answer. Was it sufficient excuse for neglect of duty? Refer to other prophets alone. Noah before the flood, John the Baptist in the wilderness. Ask what signs of God's protection Elijah had already received; his faith somewhat failed. Refer to Abraham's distrust of God when he called Sarah his sister (Gen. xii. 11), Peter's faith failing on the sea (Matt. xiv. 29). Now see how God revived Elijah's faith by showing His power. Try and make the children realise the scene. Show a picture, if possible, of the mountains of Horeb. Point out the peak of Sinai, describe the wind tearing the rocks, hurling down masses; then the earthquake, as when the law was given; then the fire, as when Moses was on the mount; and then God's power having been seen, God's voice must be heard. (3) The voice. (Read 13—18.) Ask what the wind, &c., would teach Elijah. How almighty God is, therefore He could destroy his enemies—deliver His servant; the still, small voice would speak to his heart and conscience. Notice the same question and answer put, and then notice God's reply. The prophet must go back to his work (ver. 15), but he must anoint his successor. Ask children why Elijah was to be taken away, showing by his translation that it was rather in mercy than punishment. Also ask about the 7,000 who had not worshipped Baal. How surprised Elijah must have been, and also how thankful; not like Jonah, who was angry. Ask what this teaches—viz., that Elijah's faithful work for God had not been in vain, and how it should encourage us to persevere.

II. ELIJAH'S TRANSLATION. (Read 2 Kings ii. 1—11.) The story being probably well known, notice the following points: Elijah's translation was known before it happened (ver. 5), probably by direct intimation from God to encourage His prophet. Notice how Elisha went with him first to Bethel, so often called the "house of God;" then to Jericho, the great city which may represent the world; and lastly to Jordan, typical of death. At each place Elisha is offered to leave Elijah, but prefers to go on with him, and at last is with him when taken up. Show how this may be considered as allegorical. We must follow Christ to the house of prayer, then find His presence in the world. He will be with us in death (Ps. xxiii. 4), and we shall share His glory (Rom. viii. 17).

III. ELIJAH A TYPE (1) OF JOHN THE BAPTIST. (a) In his manner of life: living in the wilderness; his dress similar (2 Kings i. 8; Matt. iii. 4). (b) In his work as prophet: foretelling the future, rebuking a wicked king—the one Ahab, the other Herod. (c) In his character: both being alike bold, fearless, and yet humble. (d) In his death: both being cut off in prime of life and full career of usefulness, and succeeded by a greater prophet. See Mal. iv. 5; Matt. xi. 14. (2) OF JESUS CHRIST. (1) In his holiness, no sin being recorded of him, though of course not wholly sinless, as Jesus was. (2) In his translation. As Elijah was accompanied by his successor, upon whom a double portion of his spirit descended, so refer to the ascension (Acts i.). Ask the details. The ascension was known beforehand (Ps. lxviii. 18)—the disciples were with Christ—saw Him ascend—and on day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 2) the Holy Ghost descended in large measure.

IV. PRACTICAL LESSONS. Elijah's life teaches us (1) Perseverance amid all discouragements and opposition; for our work shall have success, and for ourselves a crown of glory (Rev. ii. 10). (2) Boldness, to rebuke sin and be decided for God. This requires great faith and prayer, but shall be owned and rewarded before men and angels (Matt. x. 32).

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe in your own words Elijah's journey in the wilderness.
2. How long was his fast? Who else fasted a similar time?
3. How did God reveal Himself, and how did He speak to him?
4. What was Elijah's general character, and when did it partially fail him?
5. Describe his translation.
6. Of what two persons was Elijah typical, and how?
7. What two practical lessons may we learn?

HARRY'S RASH WISH,

AND HOW THE FAIRIES GRANTED IT. BY THE HON. MRS. GREENE.

CHAPTER II.

IT was a bitterly cold morning, a red foggy sun, and the ground covered with many inches of snow, when at length Harry, having yawned and stretched himself many scores of times, opened his eyes and thought to himself that it was perhaps time to get up. The sleet was drifting against the unshuttered windows, the room was grey and gloomy inside also, but in the yard beneath the cocks were crowing lustily, proclaiming aloud in no faltering tones, that though the day was dull, it was time to be up and stirring. Harry had given a promise to his elder brother Jack that when he had to return to school the rabbits in the hutch in the harness-room should not be forgotten, but have their food given to them every morning early before breakfast, and now Jack was gone and Harry had to fulfil his promise, so without waiting for nurse's usual summons, or the advent of Lizzie the nursemaid with the bath and hot water, he determined to get up and dress himself, and with another yawn, which nearly stretched his mouth from ear to ear, he thrust his hand under the far corner of his pillow for the grey worsted stockings, where he had placed them the night before, intending to make his feet hot and toasty before putting them on the uncarpeted floor.

But how was this? some one must have changed the stockings he wore yesterday, and put another pair full of holes under his pillow, for the moment he thrust his foot into one of them, out came both his toe and heel through the sole, and the ribbed top came off with such a jerk in his hands that it threw him right back upon his pillow.

"Somebody has been playing a trick upon me, and a very silly trick too," muttered Harry, half angrily, as he sat up in his bed again and tried whether the second stocking was in the same sad condition as its fellow; but matters were even worse with it, for in his efforts to draw it up his leg, the whole foot came right off at the ankle, and remained suspended on Harry's toes, while the leg part flew suddenly into as many holes, as if it had been cut in pieces purposely with a pair of scissers.

"Who on earth can have played such a silly trick?" cried Harry again, as he indignantly kicked the foot of the stocking over the edge of the bed, "especially when I have only to walk across the room to the press to get out another pair. It's one comfort, whoever did it won't hear the end of it from nurse for some time—that they won't!" and Harry, regardless of the cold, clambered out of his bed upon the floor, and crossed the room towards the old oak press which held the children's linen. "But I say," shivered Harry, as he gazed around him in some bewilderment, "Lizzie has not even lit the fire yet, I never saw the grate look so black and empty; and what can have become of the cradle?" and Harry, stooping down over the spot where the cradle had stood when he last saw it, raised up a heavy piece of cumbersome, painted wood, the shape or form of which he could not at first make out, but which, after long inspection, looked to him like a roughly-carved horse's head. A few hairs still stuck to the crest of the mane, and the painted eyeballs, though worm-eaten and dull, had a sad, meaningless stare in them, very unlike the fiery orbs of his own beloved rocking-horse, whose absence from the nursery he had so bitterly bemoaned.

"Phew!" sneered Harry, replacing the heavy piece of wood on the ground as gently as he might, lest he should wake the baby, "phew! I suppose Lizzie has dragged this ugly old head out of the lumber-pit in the yard to make firewood of; I am sure I wish she had it on the fire this moment, I do; it's so wretchedly cold and raw, and so cheerless and dull an old nursery I never was in, without as much as a piece of carpet to stand on;" and, walking delicately on his heels, Harry turned again towards the oaken press in search of his hose.

This press was usually locked, and had a very cranky key, that required much patient turning and twisting before the lock would yield to its pressure, but this morning the door of the press stood open—indeed, it seemed to have got some kind of wrench, for it hung forward and downward, as if depending from a single hinge, and Harry moved it gently enough aside, fearing from its position it might fall upon his feet.

"Gracious me! what on earth has nurse been doing?—why the press is nearly empty!" cried Harry, standing upon his tip toes so as to see up to the higher shelves. "Why, what has become of my new knickerbocker suit, and all my other things? they could not be rolled up in this filthy bundle;" and Harry thrust his hand into the corner of the middle shelf, where there seemed to be a heap of some mouldy clothes; but quickly as he pushed in his hand, he drew it quicker forth, for out rushed, first, a huge fat mouse with a long horny tail, and immediately afterwards such a host of woodlice and earwigs as made Harry spring several paces back from the press, and shake his little nightdress frantically, to free himself from the host of unpleasant living creatures that had suddenly fallen upon it.

"Nurse! nurse!" cried poor Harry in great dismay and distress, "what has happened to the press? some one has taken all our nice clothes out, and put in a lot of dirty rubbish! Nurse, you must awake and get up, for robbers or people must have been here in the night and stolen everything! Nurse, nurse! do you hear? I'm calling you."

But there was no responsive sound from the bed; nurse must have been in a very sound sleep, for she never stirred, or even turned round at poor Harry's terrified appeal, and only for a faint whining sound, like the waking yawn of his new-born sister, Harry would have thought that nurse must be already up.

"Nurse," he pleaded still more piteously, as the cold struck up through his bones, and his teeth chattered in his head, "do let me get into your bed for a while, I am half frozen with cold, and I can't find any clothes to put on; do let me just creep in at the foot, and I'll promise not to disturb the baby."

So Harry, shivering and shuddering, sat upon his heels and gazed earnestly into the darkness, trying to make out the exact position of nurse and baby in the bed, so that he might clamber safely into a warmer nook; but by-and-by, as he could see things a little better, it seemed to him that he must be mistaken as to nurse's being asleep, for he was certain he saw her eyes wide open and staring at him in a horrible glaring kind of way, which made his blood, cold as it was already, run like ice through his veins.

"What's the matter, nurse?" he asked, timidly; "why are you staring at me in that way? I asked leave to get into your bed, and you did not say no;" but the eyes only glared more fiercely than before, and nurse said never a word.

"Nurse—nurse! why don't you answer me? You are frightening me on purpose; it's very unkind of you. I can't stay here if you don't say something;" and at last, with a cry born both of fear and anger, Harry tore back the curtain of the bed with one sudden wrench and beheld—oh! horrible sight—neither his nurse nor little sister asleep upon their pillows, but in their place a large tabby cat, gazing steadily at him with scared eyeballs, from a heap of dirty feathers, and surrounded by a mewing circle of tabby kittens.

Poor—poor Harry, what a little object he looked.

gathered up at the foot of the bed, trembling from head to feet, and still holding in his grasp the faded curtain of the bed, which had come off the pole in his hands.

For a moment or so Harry seemed uncertain what to do, surprise, fear, utter bewilderment, kept him rooted to the spot, while a host of vague questions rushed through his mind. What had happened? where was he? was he in his own nursery at all? had he wandered in his sleep into some strange house, or could robbers have come in the night and stolen every one and everything away? for even the chairs and tables in the room, he now remarked were absent from their usual places.

It would be well for him to find out whether he was in his own home or not; one glance out of the window would be sufficient to recognise the garden, with its pretty circular flower-bed and close-clipped yew hedges; and giving one frightened glance at the cat, whose eyes seemed to follow all his movements, Harry crawled back over the footboard and approached the window.

Yes, it was his own house—there could be no doubt about it; there were the mountains opposite, so familiar to his eye; they looked a little strange, to be sure, wrapped up in their white sheet of snow, but still he could not mistake them, nor the familiar windmill on the top of the peak, and the great pine wood in the cleft of the hill, where Jack had often gone off in search of squirrels and rare nests; and here Harry's eyes travelled downwards to the garden which lay beneath the nursery windows, in the corner of which his brother had also built a summer-house during his last holidays, and covered it with cones and bright pebbles from the brook which ran at the foot of the place.

But where was the summer-house now? Harry could not see it, though he strained his eyes across the snow till they ached; it seemed to him as if the branches of the lilac-trees must have grown ever so much taller, for they hid it quite from his view; either that, or those who had robbed the house had robbed the garden also, for even the very garden-seats of rustic wood were missing from their shady corners, and everything had a strange uncared-for look which the unusual amount of snow could not account for. But just at this moment, as Harry was about to turn back disappointed from his survey, something stirred below in the garden, some living thing rushed suddenly from under the holly bushes and darted beneath the thickest part of the yew hedge, sputtering up the snow as it hurried past and making a dark track across it.

Harry wondered what it could have been, for it was smaller than their dog Tray, and many times larger than a bird; he remained therefore at the window watching earnestly to see if it would move again, but though now and then a spray of the yew-tree stirred, and a clump of snow fell from its branches to the ground, for some time there was no further sign of life within its precincts.

At last, with another rush and a scurry, out came the wild creature again, and this time, as its goal was much farther off, Harry had ample time to see it; and not only did he see it, but gave a loud scream, for what was it after all but Jack's handsome lop-eared rabbit, which had been committed to his charge, and which must have escaped from its hutch, and there it was now, rushing blindly, madly down the river-walk.

Just as madly and blindly did Harry rush out upon the landing and down the two flights of steps which led to the hall. He had no further clothing than his nightdress, and no boots or stockings on his feet; but what did all this matter, in comparison with the fact that the black-and-white rabbit, for which Jack had given his whole year's savings, had escaped from its house and was loose in the garden?

Harry took the last three steps of the stair at a flying leap in his haste to reach the garden; but, as the old proverb says, "more haste, worse speed," instead of coming down safely on his feet, Harry seemed to land, first of all, on something warm, large, and hairy, which, emitting a cry, rolled over on its side and sent him sprawling on his face and hands into the vestibule.

SHEPHERDS watching in the fields,
In the daisied fields of night,
We bring succour swift and sure,
Fainting penitents to cure;
Guide them back with love and light,
Fold them on the wold of Right.

Sound the timbrel, fill the reed,
Let the pealing anthem lead,
Well-forth with triumphant sound
When the erring one is found,
Found! Found!

Homeward then we joyful rise,
Bear glad tidings to the skies,
Cleave the clouds like carrier-dove,
Pass the golden gates of Love,
Found! Found!

THE IDIOT OF DIXMUYDE.

BY WILLIAM H. G. KINGSTON.

CHAPTER VIII.

MARIE, not having observed what had occurred, remained close to Max, ready to throw herself before him should he be overmatched. Max, indeed, had to exert all his skill to parry the thrusts of his antagonist; a false step on the slippery pavement would have caused his destruction.

The officer of the Inquisition (for such he seemed to be) was a strongly-built, powerful man, and continued his assaults evidently with the intention of tiring out Max. Poor Marie felt ready to sink with alarm.

While Max and his assailant were thus engaged, Marie saw several persons coming round the corner of the street. They stopped for a moment, when two figures came hurrying up. Alas! they might be fresh foes.

One of them sprang forward, and she then recognised Hans Kopperzoon, who, flourishing his club, made a stroke at the head of Max Gellert's opponent. The man's quick ear had, however, caught the sound of his footsteps, and he sprang aside in time to avoid the blow; seeing also another person coming up, and that the day was turned against him, he retreated, followed, however, by the idiot and the other newcomer, who proved to be Bertrand Duffel. Before they could overtake him, however, he had disappeared in the darkness. Not till then did Marie miss her father. "Oh! where is he—where is he?" she exclaimed. "Oh, Max! oh, Bertrand! follow and bring him back. Can those dreadful men have made him their prisoner?"

Bertrand hesitated for a moment. "My father and sister are there, we will conduct you to them, then endeavour to ascertain what has happened to Herr Kapell."

The two young men then led Marie up to where Herr Duffel and Bertha with an attendant were standing.

"They have him!" exclaimed Hans; "the bloodhounds have caught in their bloody fangs the best man in Dixmuyde. Alack, alack, young sirs, he is beyond your reach by this time: but, hist! we will see if the fool can yet outwit the wise men; but if we stay here we shall deserve little credit for wisdom."

Poor Marie could with difficulty be restrained from running in the direction she supposed her father had been taken; Bertha, indeed, had to hold her, assisted by Herr Duffel.

"What is now to be done?" said that worthy man, turning to Max. "We had received warning from poor Hans here that the officers of the Inquisition were about to visit our house, and we were escaping to the residence of a faithful friend, where we hoped to find horses to fly immediately from the place; but now it seems but too probable that, if we make the attempt, we shall be pursued; and if we go to our friend's house, we shall only bring destruction on his head."

"Then, worthy sirs, take the poor idiot's advice," said Hans; "he has a burrow, though neither large nor magnificent, where no one will think of looking for you, and perchance while the hounds are hunting in another direction, the sly foxes may creep out, and make their escape."

Not a moment was to be lost; yet Marie could with difficulty be persuaded to accompany Herr Duffel and Bertha, who were anxious to follow the advice given by Hans. "But my father—my dear father! will no one attempt his rescue?" she exclaimed. "Oh, Max Gellert! surely you would not desert him!"

"Indeed, no," answered Max; "I would first see you in safety, and then I promise you I will do my utmost to rescue him."

"And so will I," exclaimed Bertrand. "Herr Gellert, I will accompany you, and act as you may advise."

"Well spoken, young sirs," exclaimed Hans. "And now you have arrived at that wise resolution lose no more time, but follow the poor idiot, who will lead you to his abode. Happily, it is not far off, and we may get to earth before the huntsmen come up." Saying this, Hans sprang forward, followed by the rest of the party. He quickly threaded several narrow lanes, when the fugitives found themselves outside the town. The thick branches of the trees which hung overhead made it difficult for them to see the road; and they could but just distinguish his figure as he went leaping on before, frequently disappearing. Still they went on, expecting again to see him.

"Hist! hist!" said a voice close to them; "turn to the right. Take my hand, Herr Duffel, and you, good people, follow." Herr Duffel put out his hand, which Hans grasped. "Stoop low, worthy sir, or you may find it a hard matter to enter my abode."

Bertha followed her father, holding poor Marie by the hand. The entrance being surrounded by underwood, which grew both on the bank and at its base, prevented the approach being seen. The whole party being inside, Hans told them to wait while he blocked up the entrance. This done, he struck a light, when they found themselves in a cave of a dozen feet or more deep, and somewhat less in breadth, the earth being supported by a few rough timbers. It was not altogether destitute of furniture, for there were several three-legged stools and a table; while at the farther end was a heap of leaves and dried grass, which probably served the owner for a couch.

"No one in the whole of Dixmuyde knows my abode," whispered Hans; "you are as safe here as if you were a thousand feet deep in the earth. Though the Inquisitors themselves passed close by it this morning, they never suspected that there was near at hand a place where Hans could hide away his friends from their search. Rest here, therefore, fair ladies and gentle sirs, and Hans will go out and find food for his guests."

Herr Duffel, however, entreated that he would not venture. He probably thought that, notwithstanding Hans' boast, the cavern might be discovered by the keen eyes of the Inquisitors' officials, should he be seen going backwards and forwards in that direction. The man, also, who had been put to flight by the idiot's cudgel would certainly be diligently on the search for him, and not rest till he had discovered his hiding-place.

Poor Hans did the honours of his abode with considerable courtesy, entreating his guests to be seated, and apologising for the rough style of his furniture. "Poor Hans has no great banquet to spread before you, he observed, producing from the shelf several pieces of broken bread, with a jug of water, as he spoke; "this may stay your hunger, however, and 'with such food as we have we should be content,' as the preacher says."

For some minutes the party were silent, occupied with their own sad thoughts. At length Marie looked up. "Have you forgotten my father?" she said to Max.

"I was considering by what means he might be rescued," answered her lover; "but I put it to Herr Duffel whether he would not first have you placed in safety, and I would then endeavour to find means for setting him at liberty."

"I know I speak the mind of my friend," said Herr Duffel, thus appealed to; "I will remain here, if Max Gellert and my son will undertake to escort you and Bertha to Antwerp. On my daughter I will lay my commands to go, and, acting as your father's friend, I would insist on your accompanying her."

"Oh! no—no!" exclaimed Marie; "whatever be my father's fate, I will share it."

"The poor fool will settle the question," said Hans, who had been casting his wild, staring eyes first at one speaker and then at the other; "it may be that he can do more to rescue Herr Kapell than either of these wise young sirs. And now, as he is master of this mansion, he bids you try and get some rest, while he sallies forth to learn how matters go in the world outside." Saying this, Hans went to the entrance of the cave, and, showing Max and Bertrand how they were to close it behind him, slipped noiselessly out.

Anxious as both the young men were to follow Marie's wishes, they felt the hopelessness of doing so with any good result, and therefore resolved to wait the return of the seeming idiot, though idiot they could scarcely believe him to be.

Hour after hour passed by. There was a store of oil which enabled them to keep a small lamp alight. Their watches told them that day had returned, though no gleam from the outer world entered the cavern. They were thankful at length to take some of the dry crusts which Hans had offered them. The day passed slowly by. They spoke but seldom, and then in low tones, for fear of being heard by any casual passer-by. At length there was a slight movement in the bushes which closed the entrance to the cave, and Hans' wild head was seen as he pushed back a portion to allow of his entrance. He closed the aperture behind him, and advanced towards where the party were seated. He did not speak, however, but touching Herr Duffel on the shoulder, drew him aside to the further end of the cave. He there for some time whispered in his ear, glancing every now and then around to ascertain if he was not overheard. Herr Duffel spoke a few words in reply, and then returned to the table.

"To you, my young friend," he said, putting his hand on Max's shoulder, "and to you, my son, I commit a solemn charge. I act for my friend, Walter Kapell, and lay my commands on his daughter, and on you, Bertha, to go from hence to-night. These young men will escort you, and will defend you with their lives. May Heaven protect you, for vain is the help of man. Hans tells me that the horses are ready, and are waiting for you even now a short distance hence. The friend to whom we are going has provided steeds for Bertha and Bertrand. Now go forth, my children, while I remain here; the journey is too long for me to undertake, and I should impede your progress, probably sacrificing both you and myself."

"But my father!" exclaimed Marie, "is he still in the power of the Inquisitors?"

"Hans has promised not to tell," said the idiot; "perchance even now he is in safety: go forth and obey his wishes. Hans must say no more."

With a heavy heart, and still doubting whether she was not being deceived, Marie allowed Max Gellert to lead her forth from the cavern, followed by Bertrand and his sister, Hans going before to show them the way.

It was already quite dark, indeed, without a guide they could not have found the path through the thick wood.

Bertrand and his sister had always been accustomed to obey their father, and therefore, although unwilling to leave him alone in the cave, had not hesitated to do as he commanded them.

Poor Marie went forward, still hoping from what Hans had said, that she should ere long meet her father, buoyed up with the thought that he had escaped. They had been charged not to speak, and therefore she was afraid even of putting a question to Max as to whether he supposed they should meet with Herr Kapell.

They had gone on thus in silence for half an hour or more, when Hans stopped them. "There are the horses in yonder grove," he whispered; "mount and away; pull not bridle till you have placed many a league between yourselves and Dixmuyde; Hans will go back to his friends and look after them."

"But my father! I thought I was to find him," exclaimed Marie.

"Hush—hush! speak not so loud, my dear young lady," said the idiot; "Hans will look after Walter Kapell. Now away—away! lose not another precious moment."

Marie found herself lifted into the saddle, a cloak being thrown around her, with Max Gellert by her side, guiding the animal by a leading-rein. Bertrand had in the meantime placed his sister on horseback. Guided by the person who had had charge of the steeds, they set off at full speed towards the north.

"Farewell, young friends, farewell," muttered Hans, as he watched them till they disappeared in the gloom of night; "I will now go back to my duty. Alack—alack! the times are sad and out of joint. They say Hans is mad; far madder are those who serve Satan, and are content with the miserable wages he gives them."

(To be concluded.)

EXTRACTS FROM AN EXPOSITOR'S NOTEBOOK.—II.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL COX, NOTTINGHAM, AUTHOR OF "A DAY WITH CHRIST," ETC. ETC.

THE HEALER OF MEN.

WERE I to write a "Life of Christ," I think the motto on its title-page would be this simple sentence from St. Luke's Gospel,* "The power of the Lord† wrought in Him to heal." For the Lord Jesus was emphatically "the Saviour of the body," that He might be the Saviour of the soul. From the very first His ministry was a ministry of healing; i.e., as the word implies, a ministry which restored men to health; for heal, hale, and health are but various forms of the same word; to heal is to give health, or to make men hale. As we trace Him through His beneficent career, we find Him for ever curing men of whatsoever disease they had, causing the blind to see, the deaf to hear, the lame to walk, cleansing the leprous, giving strength to the impotent, raising the dead.

It may be doubted if we often dwell on this aspect of His ministry, or so dwell on it as to be sensible of its supreme importance. Yet if for a moment we reflect how changed and marred the Gospel would be were all trace of His works of healing cut out; if we reflect how, from a Man instinct with tender sympathies and Divine energies, He would thus be reduced to a mere rabbi, and from a Saviour to a mere teacher, we shall at once feel that the main stress of His ministry was turned in this direction; that what most of all distinguishes Him from other great teachers, and persuades us that He verily came from God, is precisely the fact that He healed men of their infirmities and diseases. And, indeed, if no other sources were open to us, yet from His mere sayings, from the emphasis He lays upon them, we might learn what weight to attach to these works of mercy. He Himself claims that, if men will not believe on Him because of His words—words such as man never spake or heard before—they should yield to the superior force of His deeds, and believe on Him for His works' sake. When John the Baptist, torn with doubt amid the rigours and depressions of his dungeon, sends to ask, "Art Thou in very deed the Coming One for whom we are looking, or must we look for another?" our Lord's reply was simply this: "In that same hour He cured many of diseases, and plagues, and evil spirits, and unto many blind He gave sight." Then turning to the disciples of the Baptist, he said, "Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard; how that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised;" and thus "the Gospel is preached to the poor." His reply virtually is, "These works of healing prove that I am the promised and expected Healer." He does nothing but restore men to health; and on this, on this alone, He bases His claim to be the Christ of God.

Here, then, we may see what weight He Himself attached to the fact that "the power of the Lord wrought in Him to heal." And seeing that He bases His whole Messianic claim on this single fact, we begin perhaps to ask, "Why? Why does

* Luke v. 17. † The Lord, i.e., Jehovah, or God.

He rest spiritual claims on physical evidence? Why must He heal the bodies of men in order to prove Himself the Saviour of their souls?"

Now if we would answer that question, we must draw a distinction which at first may seem simply curious and fanciful, but which is really very important and helpful,—the distinction between the healer and the physician. The distinction, slight as it looks, is radical and profound. The healer is, literally and strictly, one who restores men to health, not by scientific remedies, but by his personal influence; by shedding his life, health, and vigour into their weakened frames, or by occult mysterious arts—by incantations, by sacrifices, by herbs gathered under certain phases of the moon, or by availing himself of certain auspicious conjunctions of the stars. In ancient times, and even down to the Middle Ages, these mysterious supernatural charms or influences formed the staple of medical science and practice in every land, and those who were proficient in them were properly called healers, men who could give health. On the other hand, the physician, instead of employing, or professing to employ, supernatural means, is a student and observer of Nature, as his very name implies: for the word "physician" is derived from the Greek word φυσις a word which means "Nature," or "the whole physical universe." The physician uses physic, i.e., natural ingredients which operate in a natural way. He studies the constitution of man, and the effects of certain herbs, drugs, exercises upon it; and he applies the knowledge thus obtained to the cure of disease. Instead of muttering a charm, or consulting the signs of the zodiac, or bidding us offer a sacrifice to the gods, he gives us certain medicines such as our case demands; the only sacrifice he requires of us is a sacrifice to himself —in the shape of fees. In all civilised communities the physician, the disciple of Nature, now bears rule. But the uncivilised people even in civilised communities still attach great worth to charms, to omens, to the various medical fetishes which they have received by tradition from their forefathers, or from their grandmothers: while all savage tribes and races have their conjurors, their holy men, their medicine-men—half priest, half doctor, whole impostor—who are still "healers" in the original sense of the word, and depend on incantations, omens, and sacrifices. Nevertheless, even among these wretched impostors there are to be found some who have true secrets of healing, or who, by that mysterious influence which man exerts on man, achieve many wonderful cures.

We smile at the English rustic, who believes in charms for warts; at the Italian peasant, who attributes his own or his children's maladies to the baneful power of a neighbour's squint; at the African savage, who, when he falls sick, seeks to appease an angry god by giving a cow to his priest. And it is well that we should smile at these superstitions; only, lest our smile should be too supercilious, let us remember and blush for the corresponding superstitions which we ourselves may hold, although we laugh at them—superstitions about spilling salt, for example, or cutting friendship with a knife, or sitting down thirteen to a table, or doing honour to our dead by hideous and costly funeral mummeries; superstitions which many Christian people, not born fools, partly accredit, although in us they show as gross as any fetish worship in the African tribes. We do well to smile, except when we should weep or frown, at superstitions such as these. But we should do better still were we to search into their origin and significance. And, if we look deep enough, we shall find that this conception of a healer as distinct from a physician has, not only a very ancient origin, but also a very solid foundation in fact and truth.

We ask, How came all men once, and for long ages, to think that physical diseases had their root in the supernatural, and could only be cured by supernatural means and influences? The answer, the first answer, is:—That there appears to be, and not only to have been in the past, a primitive intuition, a conviction innate to man and ineradicable, that bodily diseases are signs of God's displeasure against moral offences; that the body, and the fruit of the body, suffer for the sin of the soul. From this profound conviction it is an easy inference, that, if the God whom we have offended can be appeased, if the soul can thus be cleansed from its sin, the body will be cured of its sickness, the moral health will carry physical health with it, just as the moral disease brought physical disease. We need not talk of past ages and savage races: do not we ourselves know that, at least in many cases, moral offences have the worst physical consequences, undermining health, fatally depressing the vital powers? And where we cannot see these injurious or fatal results, do we not still suspect that they do and must tread on the heels of offence? We can trace no connection perhaps between a certain bodily sickness and any definite violation of moral law; but, nevertheless, do we not feel that sin is somehow at the root of all sickness? do we not instinctively connect the two? do we not admit that a diseased frame tends to produce morbid moods of the soul? that a healthy body is an immense help toward keeping our souls in health? and that if once the soul were wholly freed from sin, the body would at last recover a perfect soundness and never know the foul touch of disease again?

And here, though I cannot stay to dwell on it, or even to hint at the many conclusions to which it might lead us, let me suggest for leisurely consideration, a fact which seems to have almost escaped notice—viz., that the Lord Jesus, the perfect Man, the only Man who never at any time transgressed the Father's commandments, had a perfect bodily health all through a life exhausted with toils and suffering such as no other man ever endured. He might be bruised, pierced, killed; but He could take no infection of disease; He knew no physical taint. It is not simply that no sickness, no bodily ailment or defect is recorded of Him: we instinctively feel that we cannot so much as conceive of His pure body as profaned by infection, that such a conception would alter our whole thought of Him.

That fact of itself speaks volumes for our native and inbred conviction, that health of body is in the closest connection with health of soul, that physical disease is a sign of moral disorder. "The whole man quivers in the shock of sin. The crystalline order of soul and body is shattered by the same blow." So, at least, in common with all men, we instinctively believe.

And have we no warrant for our faith in the Inspired Word? nay, in the teaching of Christ Himself? Surely we have. The whole history of man as recorded in the Bible is the history of a creature—nay, of a creation—made subject to disorder and corruption by the sin of the transgressor, and redeemed into physical order and life by the obedience of Him who came to do His Father's will and to hide His law in our hearts. In His treatment of the sick who came to Him for healing, the Lord Jesus shows us in many ways that He, too, believed, as we believe, in sin as the root of sickness, and held that, when once this evil root was plucked out, health would return. How often did He say to some poor sufferer, "Thy sins are forgiven thee," saying nothing about health of body, though health came back as He spoke. How often did He attribute the diseases and plagues of men to the presence of evil spirits tormented into unwonted activity as He drew nigh. How often did He virtually bid those whom He had healed, "Go, sin no more; keep the law which you have broken," and thus imply that past diseases were the fruit of sin, and that future sins would bring even more terrible forms of disease upon them.

However we may interpret these facts, or some of them, we must admit them as proofs that the Lord Jesus, who surely knew more than we do, both of the natural and the supernatural, held moral evil to be the cause of physical disorder, moral health to be at least the beginning of restored physical health, and even physical health to be a long step toward the health of the soul. In short, He confirms the instinct, or intuition, which leads us to connect bodily sickness with spiritual offence, and which finds expression even in the rudest pagan savage, who seeks healing by invoking the aid of spirits greater than his own, or by offering a sacrifice to an offended deity.

Now this instinct, which we have such good reason to trust, demands a Healer, not a Physician. If our cure is to be perfect, if we are ever to rise into perfect health even of body, we must have more than a physician who can write prescriptions and apply physical remedies to physical diseases. We must have a Healer who, while Lord of Nature, is also Lord of that which is above Nature; who can give us, not medicine, but health; and who, that He may give us health, can search into all the hurts of the soul, and control all the influences by which the soul is affected. What we want is the mens sana in sano corpore, a hale soul in a hale body; a soul so full of vital health that it will heal the body and keep it in perfect soundness.

Such a Healer, thanks to the tender mercy of God, we have in the Lord Jesus Christ. Himself sinless, therefore of a perfect health, with nothing in Him that evil could claim, and therefore nothing on which infection could lay its foul grasp; able, indeed, to "lay down" the life which none could "take from" Him:—free from sin, from disease, from bondage to death, He came to make us "partakers of His Divine nature," to infuse into us His perfect health, to redeem us into His perfect freedom.

But if this was the scope and aim of His earthly ministry, if He came on an errand so sublime, so intensely spiritual, why does He from the very first occupy Himself with the lower labour of healing men's bodies, with taking away disease rather than taking away sin; with delivering men from their sicknesses and infirmities, rather than with redeeming them from their transgressions?

The common answer to this question is, that He thus devotes Himself to works of healing in order to conciliate men—to gain influence with them; in order that, when He has prepossessed them in His favour, He may speak to them on high spiritual themes, and win them to trust their souls in His hands who has already saved their bodies. And on this ground we are urged to minister to the physical wants and pains of men, so taking them at a wise advantage, and not alienating them from the truths we have to teach by our indifference to their bodily ailments and needs. And in a sense, to a certain extent, no doubt this is a true answer. Assuredly we ought to minister to the physical wants and pains of men; to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to tend the sick; and having done our "works of healing," we should also preach the Gospel to them. Assuredly the Lord Jesus did win influence and an easier reception for His words by His kind constant care for men's bodies, and was able to lead many to faith, who, but for His help, would hardly have listened to Him. Nevertheless I cannot admit that He set this acquisition of influence distinctly before Him as a motive, as a mark at which He was to aim: there was too much heart in His works for that. I rather believe that, instead of seeking an ulterior advantage, He was simply moved by a Divine pity to alleviate, or to remove, the pains or deprivations of them that were sick. He was man, and felt for man. He was God; and how but by healing could He show Himself to be one with the Father, who has hidden such marvellous recuperative energies in our bodies, and stored up medicinal virtues in the water we drink, in the food we eat, in the air we breathe, in the herbs we gather, in the very rocks on which we tread? He was Love; and what should Love do but help just where help is most needed and will be most welcome?

But Love works wisely, even where it works without a thought of prudence. And if the Lord Jesus had set Himself to persuade us that He was the Saviour of souls, what more sagacious course could He have taken than by showing Himself the Saviour of our bodies? How could He have more commended Himself to us, as the very Healer we require, than by visibly giving health? Spiritual processes are hard to grasp. The mysteries of the spiritual life—as, for example, the regeneration and sanctification of the soul—are beyond the reach of men, who have been left to grope after God, if haply they might find Him. But we can all understand a work of healing. We can all admire the grace and kindness of One who listens to every cry, and gives health to the sick without fee or reward. The blind who saw, the deaf who heard, the lame who walked, the lepers who were cleansed, did not these speak for Christ, and win many to come to Him and hear Him for themselves? Do they not still speak to us from the Gospels—that strange motley crowd of halt and blind, dumb and deaf, which Christ drew round Him, and tell us how kind He is, how willing to help us in our lowest no less than in our highest needs?

As we consider these works wrought on the body, our instinct tells us that He who could, suddenly, and by a word, remove the visible results of sin, must have a strange power over the soul as well as over the body. Our thoughts are led on, and up, along the line which connects body and soul, physical and spiritual haleness, till at last we find in Christ the Healer for whom the world waited, for whom the whole creation groans, of whom we also are in imminent need. He who can give health to the body by a word must have under control all those dark spiritual powers by which our souls are polluted and betrayed; and therefore we may come to Him for saving health, health of spirit as well as health of body, and by His grace be redeemed from all evil.

Finally. These works of healing wrought on the body were nevertheless spiritual works. In curing the poor of their diseases, Christ also preached the Gospel to the poor. For the miracles are parables as well as miracles; parables as beautiful and impressive as any which fell from the lips of the Lord. They spake, they still speak, the truths by which our souls are saved. So truly and immediately do they speak to the spirit in us, that we constantly put a spiritual interpretation on them without being aware of it. As we read of the blind man restored to sight, or the deaf man listening with unstopped ear, or the lame man leaping after Christ into the Temple, we feel that we use no mere figure of speech if we say: We, too, were once blind and had no eyes for the Divine realities, and Christ opened our eyes; we, too, were once deaf to the true harmonies of life, and Christ unstopped our ears; we, too, were once lame, and halted uncertainly in the path of obedience; but Christ has given us strength to walk, and sometimes even to run, in the way of His commandments. If we speak of leprosy or death, it is uncertain till our sentence be complete whether we are not speaking of the inward uncleanness which cleaves to us, or of our insensibility to things spiritual and Divine. In short, all the miracles are parables; all the healing works wrought by Christ on the bodies of men have a voice which speaks to us of that great spiritual redemption which He came to accomplish.

And because His works of healing assure us of His grace, His willingness to minister to our needs; because help for the body implies help for the soul; because in curing physical diseases the Lord Jesus revealed His power to redeem us from spiritual infirmities, we bless God that His power wrought in Christ to heal, we sing and give praise to the great Healer and Redeemer of men.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

CHAPTER X.

ARTHUR WILDISH.

THE year was about six weeks old when Philip and Mrs. Austin resumed their interrupted task; and Philip, on his part, resumed it with alacrity. He was beginning to feel the mode of life which he had adopted very irksome in its isolation, and very narrowing in its denials. It was cutting him off from the sympathy even of the men whom he met in the hours of business. He could feel a taunt as acutely as most men, and he did not escape being taunted on his parsimony on more than one occasion. A certain tone of unfriendliness began to appear against him among some. Those who persisted in being friendly were, if possible, a still greater trouble to him. Young Wildish was one of these; and he was fated just then to see a good deal of Wildish. On one pretext or another the young man began to haunt the chambers of Messrs. Tabor and Tenterden. Mr. Tabor, it is true, had been lately putting some work in his way, and had been very friendly to him, owing to the warm recommendation of an old friend of his own. Philip had already seen Wildish more than once depart homewards with Mr. Tabor, the young man leaning on the elder's arm, and he could follow him in imagination into the bright and genial atmosphere of Lucy's home, and into the light of Lucy's presence. And going back to that shabby lodging of his, and to the company of his own hard thoughts, was not very pleasant after that.

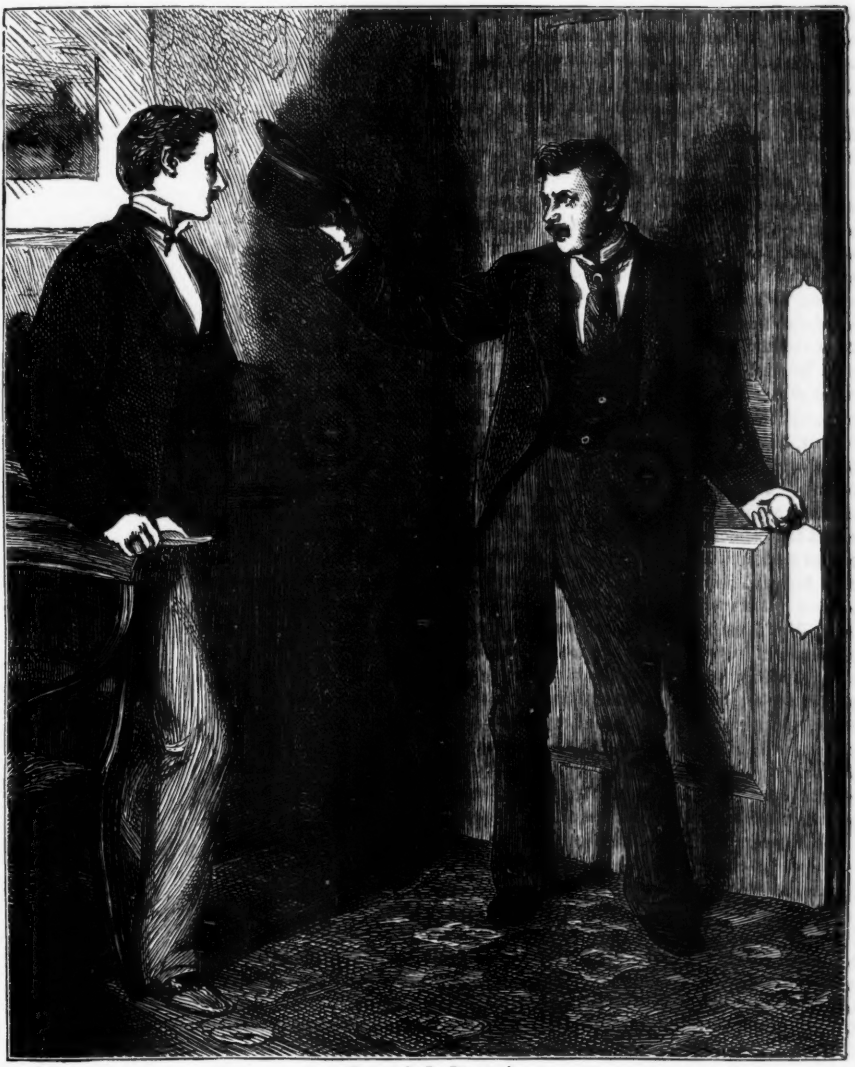
Then Wildish had taken it into his head to obtain Philip's special favour, and it was very difficult to resist his advances, made as they were without calculation and without warning. It was difficult to resist the flash of a pair of frank eyes, blue as wild hyacinths, the grasp of a warm hand that had the feel of true fellowship, and the words, simple and manly enough, but with a strange ring in them, coming from one young man to another, in which he sought Philip's friendship—"I want you to be my friend, Tenterden. There's nobody I like so well. Let's go and dine together," or, "You'll come and hear me read my paper at the S. S. A.?"

And Philip went and heard him read his paper "On Co-operation;" (for Wildish was an enthusiast in social reform, and talked and wrote the wildest Ruskinese,) and having heard him, got up in his most savage mood and, as poor Wildish said, "knocked down the heads of his neatly got-up paper like a row of nine-pins."

"I wish you had chosen the bar," said Wildish, after the meeting, linking his arm in Philip's, as his manner was. "You could have done anything—risen to the woolsack. And now to show you I don't bear malice I'll take you to a capital place for a little supper."

"You'll do no such thing," said Philip. "I don't want you to spend your money."

"Nonsense! I've more than I can spend," said Wildish.



"Then found something, and confound those theories of yours. Good night;" and he left poor Wildish looking as wistful as a woman. And then he went back to him and volunteered to go home with him to his luxurious West-end lodgings, with a tender care that the younger man, with his riches and his freedom and his innocence, might not fall a prey to the many temptations of the great city, and the feeling unconsciously tinged Philip's tone towards him, and brought forth in return some affectionate sallies that almost made Philip blush. And before they parted Wildish confided to him his admiration for Lucy Tabor, for which piece of presumption Philip could have boxed his ears.

Those evenings with Mrs. Austin began to appear to Philip like a haven of refuge, and he was glad to receive the little note which recalled him.

When he went he found Mrs. Austin alone, and she explained that since she had written—indeed, that very morning, her mother had been called away. But it seemed to make no difference; they did very well without Mrs. Torrance, and went on with their task just as if she had been there. Perhaps they heard one another's voices a little oftener, or more frequently made a little digression from the business in hand; but they were hardly aware that they did. Neither of them had ever come in contact with a mind so deeply in accord with their own. Neither had ever felt companionship so perfect or so sweet.

At the close of the next evening they had begun to calculate how long it would take them to finish the papers that remained, and Philip had boldly said he should be sorry to see the end of them.

After this it was inevitable that they should think of each other after they parted for the night. Philip, walking homeward, thought there was even yet a possibility of happiness for him in the future if this one woman would consent to love him and to help him. The same obstacle existed in Mrs. Austin's case as in Lucy's—she was rich. Philip was suffering from some form or other of pecuniary embarrassment. He thought of her help even more than of her love. And yet why would it be more honourable to seek to marry her than to seek to marry Lucy? Perhaps it was that he set a greater value on Lucy's love, which was as yet an altogether unknown quantity; whatever it might be, unless he could enter the lists at once he had not the slightest chance of it.

The Wildish affair was rushing rapidly to a conclusion, and that irrepressible being was evidently, and doubtless with good reason, full of hope. He had even begun to speak to Philip of what was necessary and desirable in the way of settlements—not mentioning any names—and of what was requisite in the shape of a mansion for a newly-married man with a few thousands a year to begin with. He even showed an exasperating interest in the shop windows, as he and Philip walked together to exchange a volume at Mudie's.

Now the truth was that Wildish had boldly attacked Mr. Tabor, and taken him at a disadvantage. He had asked to be received on the footing of Lucy's lover, and it was all in vain that Mr. Tabor protested sincerely, but laughingly, that he would rather see him no more, as he had no wish to get rid of his daughter. It was too bad, he said, to ask him to encourage a deliberate robber. But the young man pleaded that somebody or other would rob him of his treasure soon, and if he had no objection to his person or fortune, it was but fair to let him try. He had been quite open. He had not spoken to Lucy at all. Mr. Tabor took that into the most favourable consideration. Mrs. Tabor went over to his side with enthusiasm, with that infatuation which mothers have for seeing their daughters married; and there he was, staying with the Tabors from Saturday to Monday, and dining there once or twice a week besides. And Lucy was always glad to see him, and never once set down his frequent visits to her own account. It was not the first time a friendless young man had been made free of her father's house. He was a companion of her own age, and Lucy enjoyed his companionship, and the fulness of that companionship, and the impulsive kindliness of Arthur Wildish's manner quite covered the tenderness of his love—indeed, warm-hearted as he was, Wildish had not the peculiar quality of tenderness, and he did not miss its manifestation in Lucy. He was, as Philip saw, full of hope, and Mr. Tabor had already conveyed several hints to his junior partner of how matters appeared to stand.

It was hard lines for Philip, and he felt it, and gave himself quite enough of pity to keep his pain thoroughly alive and stinging — a species of self-torture in which we all indulge more or less. But on the whole he bore it like a man. He had lost his greatest stake and another had won, and all the issues of the game would be different—nay, his very interest in it was partly gone; but he was not going to give up. Blankness he could not endure; rather, from the nature of his mind, blankness was an impossibility to him. He must look forward to something, and he looked forward to a friendship with Mrs. Austin, a life-long friendship, not without love. He would never be able to love her as he loved Lucy. Little Lucy, who had grown up before him from child to woman, had grown into his soul. And perhaps he was right. The fresh untried nature, wrapped in tender mystery, has a perpetual and peculiar charm, and must be treated with all tenderness, and to pour out tenderness was in Philip's nature. Mrs. Austin had suffered, and they could have fellowship in suffering, which was quite another thing. He could tell her all the circumstances of his case when the time came, make demands upon her sympathy, and at length marry her when freed from his secret embarrassments.

It did not strike him that he was going rather empty-handed to her from whom he expected so much. Poor Ellen, she had had quite enough of chill negation in her life, and just then she was entertaining far other dreams—dreams which were shedding a rare, late splendour over her life—a life in which she moved freely because in perfect harmony with the mind of her companion, and in which she could sacrifice herself with complete satisfaction, making his life the channel for the fulness of her own.

CHAPTER XI.

IS FANNY TO BE FLEECED?

Meantime Fanny Lovejoy's new-found relations had been giving her a great deal of anxiety. Never had they been so unfortunate, according to Mr. Lovejoy, whose imagination always illuminated the past and the future, and Fanny did not know that he had repeated the same phrase a hundred times under the pressure of present trial. In the first place, work was scarce, and Mrs. Lovejoy and her two daughters were thrown idle. It was of no use going from warehouse to warehouse, their stocks were complete for the season, and each had the same dreary answer, "Nothing to do." It was in vain that Mr. Lovejoy received an advance—that is to say, borrowed from his employer on the goods of his which he was going to sell and didn't, the daily needs of the family swallowed up everything. Beatrice gave a proportion of her earnings, by no means more than sufficient for what she received, and could not be induced, even by the sight of her mother's and sisters' sufferings, to give more. It was absolutely necessary for them to eat, and when they came to the last loaf—that is, the last loaf which they were allowed to eat on credit—something had to be "put away" to get money to buy the next. That something was Fanny's feather bed, followed by Fanny's warm blankets, given up just when their warmth was most grateful to the poor souls, whose nourishment consisted of tea and bread.

Hearing nothing of them for several weeks, Fanny had gone to see them, and had found things in this plight. Mr. Lovejoy would have concealed the fact that the gifts of his niece were gone; but Mrs. Lovejoy was bent upon telling, that she might not have it on her mind, and Mr. Lovejoy had covered her retreat by a rapid fire of talk concerning the hopes and expectations of the coming spring, when work would be abundant and sales unprecedented. Fanny thought the girls looked very dreary. They were dirty and dejected, and both had colds, and it made their cousin's kind heart sick to think that they were suffering from want of the food and warmth which she had in abundance. In her shy way she gave Mrs. Lovejoy money for immediate necessities, and was going away, when the thought occurred to her that she might take one of the girls to be a kind of companion, and she mentioned it at once, saying, "One of the girls might come and stay with me, as they are doing nothing. It would be a nice change for either Ada or Geraldine; and if we liked each other we need not be in a hurry to part, you know."

Mr. Lovejoy was delighted. Which of them would Fanny prefer to have?

Neither of the girls spoke. Ada looked at her father wistfully, and Geraldine looked at her mother, with an eager light in her eyes, which said plainly, "Let me go."

Mrs. Lovejoy was suffering a pang new in her maternal experience; death had taken her children, and she had parted with them painfully enough, but it was almost more painful to have them choose to go away from her thus. And yet it would be wrong in her to refuse to let one go—never to come back to share her troubles any more, and so never to be her real daughter any more. She knew it would end in this way and in no other. For what had she to share with them? only when Geraldine looked at her so, it broke her heart.

"Ada had better go," said Mr. Lovejoy, seeing that no one spoke.

"Oh, father, don't send me," Ada found courage to say; "I want to stay with you."

"Jerry, you want to go?" said her mother.

"Yes, mother," said the girl, frankly; "but it's best, as papa says, for Ada to go. I can get work sooner than Ada. She can't go about to the shops as I can, and she can't help you so well. Let Ada go."

"You shall settle it among yourselves," said Fanny, taking her leave of them; "only one of you will come," and she nodded to her young cousins; "you know you needn't stay if you don't like living with me."

And they settled it speedily enough; Ada was to go. It was some consolation to Mrs. Lovejoy that the lot fell to the unwilling Ada, who parted from her old home with regrets and lamentations not very flattering to her new one. And immediately the seemingly quiet and passive girl was installed in Fanny's cosy home, and became part and parcel of the furniture of Fanny's life. Fanny was very good to her; but she was rather distressed that her gifts made no impression on the girl—not that she wanted gratitude; but her unresponsive acceptance seemed to argue a heart that had no response to make. But it was not long before Fanny found the spring that unlocked it. When she proposed the smallest kindness to her father or mother, or to her sister Geraldine, the girl's wistful eyes gathered light and her pale face alacrity and brightness. Fanny's union with the family became closer every day—closer than she had ever contemplated. Ada was never so happy as when she was allowed to go and see "them at home," and she was therefore allowed to go as often as she chose, or when she was not allowed to go, for she fell rather ill on Fanny's hands, one or other of the family came to see her. Through Ada all the details of their poverty became known to Fanny. The only one of the family concerning whom Ada was reticent was her brother Albert, of him she never spoke at all.

But one day Ada was favoured with a call from Albert, and she happened to be alone to receive him. He came swaggering into the room where she sat reading, and the girl received him coldly, without any of that kindling of eye and face which showed when she was pleased. "What have you come for?" she said, rising; "is somebody ill?"

"No," he said; "why should you think somebody must be ill?"

"I only wondered what had brought you here," she replied.

"The train brought me," he answered rudely. Albert Lovejoy's manners were the manners of his set, and they were by no means conciliatory.

Ada waited for him to speak after that.

"I'm not welcome to your ladyship, I see," he said mockingly; "I'm come a begging, you suppose, don't you? Come, Ada," he added in another tone, I want you to do something for me. I'm terribly down on my luck. I want you to get the old girl to lend me ten or a dozen pounds. My month's screw will be paid next week, and I'll pay it back—I will indeed."

"What do you want the money for, Albert?" she said, looking quickly at him, all her passiveness gone, and speaking with a decision that seemed quite new in her.

He flushed as he answered, "To make up some money I lost last week; ten pounds out of petty cash. I'm a lucky fellow," he added, with a forced laugh, "am I not? There's no end of a row in our place over anything of the sort—just as if fellows were thieves."

"Did you lose this money or spend it, Albert?" asked his sister.

"I've told you I lost it," replied Albert, sulkily. (It was true, he had lost it—at play.) "I'll lose my situation over this paltry piece of business," he went on—"that is, if I can't pay up the money; and I can't afford to lose it. I could do a great deal better for myself, of course; but I can't go out like an unmarried man, and they know it too," he swaggered.

At this juncture Fanny appeared, and both brother and sister kept silence.

"How is Emily?" said Fanny, kindly, when she had shaken hands with Albert, who was her least frequent visitor—indeed, she had never seen him since the Sunday he dined there. "Why did you not bring her with you?"

"Beg to be excused," he said, with an attempt at waggery. "Em'ly cries from morning to night, and the baby from night to morning."

"Dear me!" said Fanny; "they must be ill."

"If Em'ly could be set up a little," said Ada, with the wisdom of fifteen, "the baby would get better, and cease fretting."

Albert laughed, but not pleasantly, and Fanny asked him to be seated, but he continued to stand.

"I've been telling Ada what I came for," he said. "I've been very unlucky, and lost ten pounds of my employer's money, and I want you to lend it to me for a week or two."

"Dear me!" said Fanny, reddening; "I'm sorry I've not got so much in the house. It's in the second half of the quarter," she added, apologetically, "and you know I draw my income quarterly—that is, Mr. Tenterden brings it to me." Fanny did not say that her quarter's income had not lasted out, so great had been the drafts already made upon her.

"It's very hard," said Albert, in an injured tone.

Fanny quite felt she was doing him an injury when he recapitulated the likelihood of his losing his situation and being suspected of dishonesty.

Ada had remained neutral till now.

"Mother will be in a fine way if I get disgraced," said her brother, looking at her; and her face became eager in a moment.

"What can I do?" asked the helpless Fanny.

Nobody answered her; but Ada, seeing her perplexity, went over to her side and crouched down by her chair.

Albert did not offer to go. It was very painful to Fanny, and becoming every moment more painful. She must make a final decision. It was this he was waiting for. Fanny found it impossible to make the decision against him.

"Dear me! dear me!" she kept repeating; and then it occurred to her to say, "but surely the gentleman would wait if it was all explained to him."

"No, I assure you he won't wait; you don't know what business is," said Albert. "The governor is hard as nails. He wouldn't believe I had lost it if I went down on my knees to him."

"Could you wait till to-morrow?" asked Fanny, at the last of her defences, and thinking within herself that she would borrow the money somewhere.

"It'll be all up with me if I wait till to-morrow," he said, thinking that the present opportunity must not be allowed to slip.

Then Fanny rose and went to her desk, and wrote a little note to Philip Tenterden, in which she asked him to give the bearer ten pounds, adding that the said bearer would explain to him the necessities of the case.

Albert accepted the solution, though not very cheerfully, and went away, going straight to Philip's quarters, which, as it took some time, and the evening was far advanced, he did not reach till after that gentleman's return.

Their mutual antagonism was apparent at the first encounter. They did not offer to shake hands. Philip took the note held forth by Albert, and coldly motioned him to a seat. Very coldly he then requested the explanation mentioned in the note.

"I don't know what you mean by an explanation," swaggered Albert.

"You will see by reading this;" and Philip handed back to him Fanny's little note.

"The explanation is, that I lost the money, and it was not mine to lose, and must be made good at once," said Albert, sulkily.

"But how did you lose it?" asked Philip.

"That's none of your business," said Albert, losing his temper completely. "It's not your money I'm asking a loan of."

While this was going on a rapid argument had been passing through Philip's mind. "These people are fleecing Fanny," he thought; "and I ought not to allow her to be fleeced." Then he answered, "I cannot let you have this money; Miss Lovejoy has already drawn her quarter's interest, and I must see her before I can advance another."

"You see what she says!" cried Albert, passionately.

"I do."

"And you won't let me have it?"

"I will not."

"I should like to know what right you have to refuse. She can take her money out of your hands any day," was Albert's rejoinder.

But Philip stood his ground, and to this he merely bowed.

And Albert took his departure, muttering threats and insinuations, in which Philip caught and winced at the words, "You'll repent of this."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS, FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 5. GIDEON.

Chapters to be read—Judges vi., vii.

INTRODUCTION.—Ask a few questions as to the Israelites' settlement in Canaan, and refer to Judges ii. 7—12 for their condition after Joshua's death. Describe their condition—the land fairly distributed, each with his own plot of land—vine and fig-tree—and all might have been well. What caused trouble? Commanded to destroy natives of country, but indolently did not do so; made alliances, which led to learning their idolatry. Ask how they had been already punished at Sinai for this. Ask what are God's three sore judgments—war, famine, pestilence (2 Sam. xxiv. 13). Which was sent now upon the Israelites, and why? Show how God's judgments are retributive: the nations spared became their greatest curse. At time when Gideon lived had been oppressed by Midianites for seven years. Ask effect of enemies being in country; refer to distress of France in late war, lasting only six months. What could Israelites do? At last cried to God. Ask what He had already done for them, and His promises that none shall ever seek in vain. Ask who the judges were, and for what purpose sent. They were deliverers, as Samson from Philistines, and many others: judges, as Deborah and others; and they acted occasionally as priests, in the absence of a settled place of worship and priesthood. Thus we shall see Gideon, though of tribe of Manasseh and not Levi, was directed to offer burnt-sacrifice.

I. GIDEON'S CALL. (Read Judges vi. 11—24.) Notice the following points: the dread of the Midianites causing Gideon to thresh the wheat secretly; the visit of the angel. Gideon, not knowing who he was (ver. 22), thought it only a man, called him "my lord"—i.e., sir." Notice the similarity between his visitation and that of the Virgin Mary (Luke i. 11), and of the conversation to that between God and Moses when he was sent to Pharaoh. Ask what it was a call to do, and how could Gideon hope to slay the Midianites. Probably Gideon thought this was some great man proposing a scheme for destroying the enemy, and that he was to help him. Show how great was Gideon's (a) humility; thinking himself unworthy—just such humility as John the Baptist's when called to baptise Christ (Matt. iii. 16). Notice also his (b) hospitality in bringing food for the stranger—just as Abraham had done (Gen. xviii. 5): both entertained angels unawares (Heb. xiii. 2). Ask how God accepted the offering; refer to Elijah at Mount Carmel, to show how God was wont to send fire: the result was to increase his (c) faith. Afraid of death because had seen angel; when God said, "Peace be to thee," he believed, and unbidden offered sacrifice. So when Christ appeared to apostles on the sea, and after His resurrection, His words of peace calmed their fears and increased their faith.

II. GIDEON WORKING AT HOME. (Read vi. 25—32.) Ask what he was called to do—two kinds of work—put down idolatry and destroy Midianites. Where was he to begin? Why at his father's house? Point out what this would show on Gideon's part—(a) boldness, to destroy his father's idol and grove; (b) determination to do exactly what God bade him; and at the same time show that his faith at present was weak—did it at night; like Nicodemus, who came to Christ (John iii. 2), but point out how, when this was done, his faith grew strong, and he boldly stood out for God under the influence of His Spirit (ver. 34). Now describe the scene at Gideon's house: family awake—altar of Baal found destroyed—the alarm and confusion—the inquiry. One of the ten servants who helped Gideon tells the message to his father, to kill him. His father's wise answer, that Baal, a god, can plead for himself; the result—Gideon's life spared and a strong feeling excited in his favour.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Religion must begin at home. Children often wish to do things for God away from home. Show how must first bring influence to bear upon home life, trying to check any wrong-doings at home, and then may expect God's blessing in other parts. (2) The blessing of prompt obedience. Gideon, in fear and trembling, did what he was told, and the result was that the whole people followed him. So Nicodemus at first came by night, then spoke boldly for Christ in the Sanhedrim, then helped Joseph to bury Him. So always, boldness for God will be blessed. Bring this home to children—boys stopping bad language in school or workshops, refusing to join in doing wrong, will be respected and gain influence.

III. GIDEON'S WORK ABROAD. (1) The signs. (Read vi. 36—40.) Ask what signs had been granted to Moses (Exod. iii.), and show how gracious God was in granting Gideon the exact signs he asked for, and how it would encourage him to persevere. (2) The preparation. (Read vii. 1—8.) Ask the number of Gideon's army (ver. 3), would 32,000 be too many against the countless hosts of Midianites? and yet must be reduced. Why? Ask how Jericho had been taken. What did God want to show the people? His sovereignty. How were the numbers twice reduced, till 300 only were left. (3) The dream. (Read 9—15.) Ask how Gideon might feel with this handful of men; how he was encouraged; and the effect, that he worshipped the Lord. (4) The battle. (Read 19—23.) Picture out the scene—dark night; watch of enemy lately set; Gideon's army, in three companies of 100 each, stealing along; lamps concealed in jugs in left hand, trumpets in right hand; the signal—the jugs suddenly broken, lamps blazing, trumpets sounding; the alarm; the enemy, in sudden surprise, slaying each other; the rout and pursuit (vii. 24—25; viii. 4).

PRACTICAL LESSONS. Israelites would learn that "God saveth not with many or with few." We may learn to trust all our concerns in God's hands; when things seem darkest, and all against us, He can help by Himself.

IV. GIDEON'S OLD AGE. (Read viii. 22—27.) Ask who was the Israelites' king, and why, therefore, Gideon declined. Show how the least departure from God's ways leads to sin; second commandment forbids graven images of God; but Gideon's golden ephod (Note) probably had representations of God on it, and led Israelites to sin (ver. 27); showing how careful even best men must be not to cause offence (Matt. xviii. 7). At last died honoured and respected (ver. 32).

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the condition of the Israelites in the time of the judges.
2. What were the ordinary duties of the judges?
3. Give an account of Gideon's call.
4. What three qualities did Gideon show?
5. What was Gideon's work at home, and what two qualities did he exhibit?
6. Name two practical lessons to be learned.
7. What was Gideon's work abroad, and how was his faith encouraged?
8. What fault did he commit in his old age?

NOTE.—EPHOD. A short cloak covering the shoulders and breast: ordinarily of linen, but the high priest's was to be of gold, blue, purple and fine linen. The Egyptian ephod was covered with idolatrous figures, which Gideon probably copied.

HARRY'S RASH WISH,

AND HOW THE FAIRIES GRANTED IT. BY THE HON. MRS. GREENE.

CHAPTER III.

WHAT could it have been? surely that stupid old Tray had not remained lying on the rug when he heard some one running down the stairs? No, old Tray was far too careful of his limbs to have quietly run such a risk; and as Harry rubbed the palms of his blue hands and his poor bruised knees, he could not resist turning back to see what had been the cause of his fall, and there in the inner hall, at the foot of the stairs, still seemingly much annoyed at what had occurred, lay an old goat, with long beard and solemn eyes, licking with an earnest solicitude the side of its body on which Harry had so unceremoniously descended.

So many extraordinary things had occurred this morning, that this almost astounding sight did not produce as great an effect on his mind as it might otherwise have done, so having for a moment tried to unravel the why and the wherefore in his puzzled brain, Harry gave it up and hurried down the narrow vestibule passage to the hall door, eager above all to rescue old Lop-ears from an untimely end, and save his reputation in the eyes of Jack.

Judging by the noise of nibbling, scratching, scrabbling, and skirmishing about in the passage, the mice seemed to be holding an early parliament, but all fled at the sound of the boy's eager footsteps, and no further impediment presented itself till Harry actually stood outside, knee-deep in the cold snow which lay heaped up in the vestibule.

Here, indeed, he did pause, poor child, and looked around him in dismay and utter bewilderment. He did not even seem to feel the cold, or to be sensible of the scantiness of his attire; his whole mind had evidently become absorbed in the endeavour to take in the extraordinary position of everything around him, and to arrive at some conclusion as to how it had all happened.

First, right across his path lay one of the great stone pillars which supported the portico; another, though not actually fallen, leaned in a helpless way against its neighbour; and the portico itself in many places seemed crumbled and fallen away. Nor was this the only token of ruin or disaster; the staunch oak-tree, between whose branches hung the children's swing, and at whose base was built the circular seat, so secluded and sociable, lay also on its side, a fallen giant, with the snow piled high on its gnarled roots; and the very wall which bounded the pleasure ground itself seemed nothing now but an irregular heap of stones, with great gaps leading out upon the highway.

"There must have been an earthquake in the night; some awful thing must have happened while I was asleep!" cried Harry, trembling from head to foot as he gazed around him. "Perhaps every one but myself has been killed;" and as this terrible thought occurred to his mind, his lip quivered and the cry burst from his lips, "Papa—mamma, where are you? what has become of you? what has happened?" but only a kind of hollow echo seemed to rush up through the empty house which answered him mournfully, "Where are you—where are you?"

Harry darted back into the house, down the dark vestibule to the foot of the stairs, eager to ascertain if they had really responded to his cry; but the goat had now taken possession of the lowest step and would not allow him to pass by, and though he shouted and screamed to his father and mother, and all who ought to have heard and answered him, there was not a sound to be heard, but the scurrying hither and thither of mice and other wild but timid animals.

Harry again took refuge in the open air, and more frightened and confused at every step, made his way towards the yard leading to the garden. Here there was not the same dismal loneliness, but still greater seemed the confusion and disorder. In the centre of the yard, under cover of the horse mill roof, there were at least a dozen cows lying down lazily chewing the cud, and gazing calmly out through their large, thoughtful eyes; scores of cocks and hens were pecking and scraping in the snow, or crowing hoarsely in defiance of each other, and as to Jack's lop-eared rabbits, there were not scores, but hundreds of them bobbing in and out of old sheds and outhouses, or pursuing each other in wild skirmishes across the yard.

This strange sight, and the thought of Jack's delight and pride at being the possessor of so many rabbits, gave a momentary check to poor Harry's stupefied terror. He tried to choose some of them, and catch them; but they were wary and swift of limb, and after several fruitless efforts he was obliged to give up and rest himself, sitting down on the old stone trough by the pump, for his knees trembled, his feet ached with the cold, and the sleet, which was still falling in long, slanting lines from the heavy clouds above, seemed to cut him through and through.

How long he sat there, leaning his poor tired head against the iron handle, he could not tell; the cold had so numbed him, he did not care to move, and the thought of returning to the empty, desolate house, was more dreadful to him than anything else. There was some companionship at least in the cows and the fowls, and the lop-eared rabbits, but what would it be when night came on again, and the red sun behind the snow clouds gave no more light? and Harry, suddenly thinking of this, covered his face with his hands, and though he was a hero, a soldier, a brave boy, to whom tears were a real pain, and a more real disgrace, he burst out into such loud and piteous sobs, that even the cows stopped chewing the cud to listen, and the hens, who had been pecking at his little blue toes in the snow, fled from him in fear and surprise.

All the long morning not one soul had entered the yard, usually alive with workmen, and resounding with cheery farm sounds of the flail, or the whetting of the scythe, or the tinkle of the milk-cans. Not a human footstep had been heard in the lane close beside him, or the whistle of a passer-by; it was as if the whole place had been suddenly forsaken in the night, and some ban had fallen upon it. Supposing he were to wander a little way down the road, and see if all were changed in the outer world, as well as in his own home and his own house? he could not feel more lonely and miserable than he did now, go where he would, and he might meet with some one who would have pity on him and give him shelter in his helpless, lonely condition.

So at length, the sun being now on the decline, and the darkness coming on with giant strides, Harry rose from beside the pump and walked straight out through the gap in the hedge into the lane beyond. This lane led to the main road on the one side, and right up the mountain on the other, and for some seconds he hesitated which way he would go, but at length something determined him to choose the more secluded of the two roads, and without further delay he turned, tired as he was, and breasted the furzy hill.

It was a puff of blue smoke curling up from a distant cabin roof on the mountain-side that had attracted poor Harry's attention, and made hope stir suddenly in his breast; had not he often read in books before now of lost children, poor wandering babes being called back to life and energy by the sight of just such a wreath of pale smoke emerging from a hut where lived some good old dame, or tender hearted ruffian? Was it not so with Willy the Woodman and his dog Cæsar? and did not Hop-o'-my-Thumb, when he had given up all for lost, spy just such a friendly beacon, and find rest and cheer for the night? and as each fresh tale of fairy lore rose up comfortingly before his mind, he quickened his pace, and passed on through the still drifting snow and increasing darkness to the cottage on the moor. Not one living soul did he meet on all this long and toilsome walk; all the cabins by the roadside were deserted, and most of them in ruins; not a creature wished him God speed, or held out a welcoming hand; it was like walking through a dead world, without life or sound, save when an owl screeched at him from the ivy, or a startled rook flapped about overhead in the snow-laden branches.

At last—yes, at last—after, oh! such a weary climb—Harry came in full view of the cabin. No light burned as yet within its window, but still up from the chimney issued a ghostly cloud of smoke. Harry now having reached the longed-for goal, almost feared to advance further. What if out of the darkness were to spring some creature more terrible than the darkness itself—some evil gnome or black enchanter? But this was not the experience of little bewildered Willy, nor the fate that awaited the other heroes or heroines of his favourite books, and gathering up all the courage left within his little perished frame, Harry pushed open the gate that separated the cabin from the road, and going up the narrow path, knocked timidly at the door.

At first there was no answer, nor till the knock was repeated many times did he hear any one move within; but at last there was a stir, a kind of groan, and a trembling voice cried querulously, "Eh! what's that?—what's that a knockin' itself against the door? I cannot rise to see. Some poor wild thing driven, na doot, by the cold to seek shelter within; but I canna' rise to see. Be off with you, whate'er you are, and do not come troublin' me more."

But Harry could not turn back now; if he did not find the rest and shelter he had so long toiled for, he felt he must lie down and die. The sleet was coming down more pitilessly than ever, and a piercing wind had sprung up upon the moors; no, there was no turning back, he must go and seek the fate within, let it be what it might.

Once again, therefore, Harry knocked, and pushing against the door with all his force, it slowly yielded to his pressure, the rusty hinges creaked, the panels groaned at the unusual strain put upon them, but still the opening grew wider and wider, till at length he stood inside the portal, trying with dazed eyes and beating heart to fathom the darkness within.

That there was some living inhabitant of the cabin he could not doubt, he had heard the voice, and he could even distinguish already something in shape and form like a human figure crouching on a bench by the side of a waning fire; but whether it was some homely countryman, ready and willing to give him help when he should hear his sad tale, or some evil being lying in wait for his destruction, he could not by any means discern.

Whatever it was, let it be man or woman, witch or enchanter, the opening of the door did not seem to make any impression upon it, for there was no movement of surprise, or raising of the angry, querulous voice he had heard when outside. All the energies of the strange being seemed centred about the fire, for as Harry still looked earnestly in its direction, he could see two long shrivelled arms, stretched out over the embers, and the head bent low down almost to the knees, as if to draw in with its breath the dull heat emitted by the dying fire.

"It must be the Old Man of the Mountain, of whom I was reading yesterday in my fairy tale book," murmured Harry to himself with a shudder, as a sudden leap of flame in the grate revealed still more clearly the outlines of the figure before him. And a strange figure it was, with shoulders twisted and distorted, a long grey beard hanging almost to its very feet as it leaned forward, and matted locks of white hair, which nearly hid from sight a face wrinkled and yellow like a withered apple.

"The Old Man of the Mountain, the Old Man of the Mountain, it can be no other! Had not I better make my escape before he looks up and discovers me, and perhaps leaps upon my back and strangles me?" muttered Harry, anxiously, and he gazed from the figure to the open door, where the sleet was still beating in remorselessly, and from the door to the aged figure in front of him.

Yes, it was better to make his escape if he could, even in the face of the cold and the wind, the snow and the darkness, and the utter loneliness without; with the warning of Sindbad the Sailor before his eyes, it were folly to remain within the reach of such a heartless man as this, death itself might be even more to be desired than to be chained to such a being for life.

At this moment, while Harry hesitated whether to go or stay, the figure moved, it raised its head, withdrew its hands from their outstretched position over the fire, and looked Harry full in the face.

Harry would have made his escape now if he could, but he could not, his numbed feet and legs seemed to have lost all power of movement, and he stood opposite the old man, as if frozen to the spot, gazing into the fire in an agony of fright.

THE MINISTRY OF YOUTH.

"The time is short."

I OFTEN think that we are wrong,
That in this varied world of ours
We seek to gather nought but flowers,
And leave the weeds till we are strong.

We love them not, these ruined forms—
These wrecks of beauty—flowers run wild;
We ask not what their life beguiled,—
Alluring streams or howling storms.

We too much love the bright and sweet,
And do not pity where we hate;
We stretch no hand to reinstate
The withered things beneath our feet.

Yet God made these as wheat, not tares;
As incense flowers, not baneful weed.
Of each and all the Lord hath need
To turn men's blasphemies to prayers!

We greatly err who little know
The trials which these souls distrest,
And wrought rebellion in their breast;
We only mark their overthrow.

We too had fallen but for Him
Who would not let the bruised reed break;
Who gave us strength when all was weak,
Who gave us light when all was dim.

Shall we on our uprightness lean,
And with self-pure and moteless eyes
Condemn a brother's leprosies,
And cry 'gainst him, "Unclean, unclean?"

I know not where your lot is cast,
In lonely hamlets or in crowds;
I warn you but of gathering clouds;
The longest day must close at last.

One thing I know, that there abound
Works which your hands, though weak, may do.
Shrink! and a Voice shall cry 'gainst you,
"Ye are but cumberers of the ground!

"Your faith is dead, and ye shall die;
Without one effort to do good
For Him who spared not His own blood,
Your faith is fine-wrought blasphemy!"

"Here was he born, here lived, here died,"
May rest on some decaying stone;
But no memorial of deeds done
To glorify Christ crucified!

And yet we hide our powers of youth
Deep buried 'neath a weight of earth,
Entrusted talents seeking birth
That they may combat with untruth.

We leave them till we grow more old,
Till we are stronger for the fight;
Till we ourselves have more of light,
We leave them till "the tale is told."

Yea, till "the tale is told," and then
We mourn for all our early powers;
We mourn for all those idled hours,
We fain would have our youth again.

It is no wild, unheard-of dream,
That e'en a child hath labours here,
Before old age's sepulchre
Declares, "Ye are not what ye seem!"

And therefore, thou sweet child, with face
As yet unlined by furrowing tears,
Yet strangely sad beyond its years,
Bethink thee of thy work and place!

Words from thy lips methinks might teach
The stubborn ear, the hardened heart,
And enter to that inner part
Which subtler wisdom could not reach.

So rocks the power of waters own,
It is not that the drops have strength,
But they are constant, and at length
Find entrance to the heart of stone.

Fear not, though met in angry mood;
Shrink not, thy Saviour did not shrink;
The cup He drained wilt thou not drink?
Arise! like Him be doing good.

Only beware the setting sun;
Thou hast thy little cross to bear,
There is a crown thy brows may wear
When thou thy weed-strewn course hast run!

CECIL MOORE.

THE IDIOT OF DIXMUYDE.

BY WILLIAM H. G. KINGSTON.

CHAPTER IX.

WALTER KAPELL was seated on a low bench in a dark, damp, vault-like chamber. The window, which was high up in the wall, had been strongly barred, a faint gleam of light only coming down through it. Where he was he could not tell, but he only knew from the appearance of the place that it was not in the common prison. As he was being carried off by the officers of the Inquisition, he suddenly found his eyes bound, and thus, utterly unable to resist, he was dragged along for a considerable distance; after which, being led through several long passages, he found himself thrust down into the chamber he now occupied. Had he not known the cruel character of the Inquisitors, he might have supposed himself the victim of some mistake; but he knew full well that, seized by them, he must be prepared for the worst. His chief anxiety was about his sweet daughter; for himself, he was ready to suffer whatever Heaven might permit.

Several days passed; but cut off from the whole outer world, he had been unable to learn what had happened in it. In vain he attempted to ascertain anything from those who brought him his scanty food. Had his daughter really escaped? He would have given untold wealth, had he possessed it, to know the truth.

His cell was in darkness, and night had come on, and the faint gleam which during the day struggled in had entirely disappeared. The door creaked on its hinges, and four dark, cloaked persons entered the cell. One of them produced a light; but their faces were concealed by masks, and the large cloaks they wore.

"Walter Kapell, your conscience may enable you to guess the crimes of which you are accused, yet the Holy Inquisition can pardon crime, and restore the criminal to favour, when full confession is made and repentance is felt. Are you prepared to acknowledge your guilt?"

"I own to be very guilty in the sight of God, but I know not of what crime towards my fellow-men I can be accused. Towards them, to the best of my power, I have always acted uprightly and honestly."

"You have offended against the laws of the holy Church," said the masked speaker: "you have read the forbidden book, and you are accused of holding heretical opinions. Think of these matters. To-morrow you will be brought up before the Board of Inquisitors; and if you refuse then to acknowledge your sins, means will be taken such as our holy Church allows to compel you. Be wise then, like your friend. Your daughter—it is known you love her—has already confessed her folly, and will to-morrow be set at liberty."

"My daughter!" exclaimed Walter Kapell, gasping for breath; "my daughter! is she in the power of those fiends?"

"Speak not blasphemy, Walter Kapell," said the voice.

The officers of the Inquisition, so the magistrate supposed them to be, remained some time in his cell; but as he knew well that anything he might say would be brought up against him, he restrained his feelings, and replied cautiously to all the questions put to him.

The principal speaker had, after some time, turned to leave the cell; but one of the persons who had entered lingered for a moment, and then, suddenly stepping back, placed a paper in his hands, making a sign that he should conceal it. The next moment he was left in darkness. Why was this paper given him? It seemed a cruel mockery when, thus left in darkness, he was unable to read it. Could it be a message from his daughter? All night long he remained awake, wishing for the return of day, when by the ray of light which came down from above he might be able to decipher the contents of the paper. Was it not rather perhaps some cruel device to keep him awake, and thus weaken his nerves? The longest night, even to the most weary watcher, has an end. Gradually a faint light stole into the gloomy chamber; it increased more and more, till, eagerly taking the paper, he spread it out so as to catch the full strength of the ray as it came in through the barred window. Could he believe the words he saw on the paper? No longer he feared what his tormentors might have prepared for him. The words he saw written were: "She whom you love is in safety; fear not for her. Destroy this when you have read it." Doing as he was requested, Walter Kapell tore the paper into a thousand pieces, and stamped them well into the ground. "Now," he said, returning to his seat on which he had spent the night, "I fear not what man can do unto me; I will trust to the Lord alway."

The cruelties practised by the Inquisition in Spain on its hapless victims are well known. The Inquisitor Titelmann proceeded with a less studied but more savage barbarity towards those placed in his power. Bread and water was the only food allowed to the unfortunate citizen of Dixmuyde. When at length it was considered that his courage would be sufficiently abated, and his nerves weakened, he was suddenly dragged out of his cell by a band of masked officials, and confronted with the Inquisitor, who had already made his name terrible in the country.

"Walter Kapell, you are accused and found guilty of reading the Bible and holding heretical opinions. Have you any reason to offer why you should not suffer the penalty due to your guilt?" exclaimed Titelmann, savagely glancing at him.

"I have but obeyed the commands of my Lord and Master, who said, 'Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which speak of Me,'" answered the prisoner, boldly.

"That command, if such there be, was only given to the priests of the Church," exclaimed Titelmann. "You acknowledge your guilt, then?"

"I dare not speak otherwise," said Walter Kapell, calmly. "I know whom I serve, and He has said, 'He who confesses Me before men, him will the Son of man confess before the angels of God.'"

"If not for your own sake, for that of your daughter, recant your errors, foolish man," cried the Inquisitor. "You love your child, I am told; she is in our power, and will share your punishment. If you confess your errors, she will imitate your example, and the life of one you love will be preserved."

Walter Kapell gazed at the Inquisitor with unmoved eye. "I love my child dearly," he answered, "but I love her soul still more. The flames with which you threaten me will not induce me to imperil her soul, even if I believed that she was in your power."

"Take the heretic away. To the stake with him! to the stake with him!" exclaimed Titelmann, stamping with his foot. "Bring up another prisoner: we must make quick work with these pestiferous heretics."

Greatly to Walter Kapell's sorrow, as he was being removed he saw his friend Herr Duffel dragged up, as he had been, before the savage Inquisitor. They exchanged glances as they passed each other. "Be firm, friend," said Walter Kapell. "Pray for me that I may hold to the truth," was the answer.

Herr Duffel was questioned much in the same way that Walter Kapell had been, and, though a man of less physical courage, remained equally firm to the faith he professed. The fate of both had long been settled, and nothing either could have said would have saved them from the terrible doom prepared for them. Already in the public square, where the gay pageant had but a few days before been acted, the stakes were fixed and fagots piled up. The Inquisitors believed that by thus putting to death two of the principal citizens, the rest of the populace would be frightened into submission, and that the timid ones would come forward and accuse others for the sake of preserving their own lives. Thus Titelmann invariably acted, though not always as successfully as he expected. Furious when disappointed, he would order the arrest of many persons frequently when no sort of accusation had been brought against them. No time was allowed the victims to prepare for death; they were considered unworthy of any advantage it might be supposed they would thus obtain.

Large crowds, drawn by various motives, were collected in the square. Titelmann and his brother Inquisitors, with numerous officials, were seated on the platform, covered by an awning on one side. In the centre were two stakes, with iron chains and piles of fagots, while a body of soldiers in the Imperial uniform stood round in silence. The crowd witnessed the approach of the mournful procession. Two of their principal magistrates, with their heads bare and chains on their arms, were seen advancing, surrounded by a body of armed men. Walter Kapell came first, with firm step and head erect. Both he and his companion were accompanied by two priests of Rome, but they refused to listen to their exhortations. "You may mean me well," said Walter Kapell, in answer to the priests, "but I repeat, I know Whom I serve; if He thinks fit to allow my mortal body to be consumed, I know that He has prepared a mansion in the heavens, to which He beckons me with loving arms."

"Oh! the abominable heretic!" cried one of the priests; "are no true Catholics prepared to stop this blasphemy?" and at his bidding a soldier thrust the end of his pike into the martyr's mouth, for the purpose of preventing him from speaking.

The place of execution was reached, when the priests, seeing that all their efforts were vain, retired to a distance, leaving their victims to the secular power.

With savage roughness the two sufferers were now seized by the brutal executioners, who dragged their cloaks and coats from off their backs. They were quickly bound to the stakes, and the fagots piled up around them. At a signal from Titelmann, who seemed to delight in witnessing the sufferings of his victims, the fire was kindled. At that moment a movement was seen in the crowd. The people moved aside, and from their midst a figure sprang forward, flourishing wildly a club, which kept at a distance all who attempted to stop him. It was Hans Kopperzoon.

"Back—back! you accursed murderers! that man has done no wrong," he shrieked out; "he has protected my life—he has given me shelter—he has supplied me with food when I was hungry; stand aside, I say, and let me save his life, or let me perish with him."

Already the smoke was ascending from the pile; Walter Kapell's eyes were turned upwards towards that pure sky through which his soul was about to soar. Before Hans could reach him his head was seen to drop, and he and his companion were enveloped in the cruel flames and dark smoke. Savage as were the guard, even they seemed moved with compassion for the poor idiot, and seizing hold of him dragged him forth from the flames, although not without difficulty could the fire which had seized his clothes be extinguished. The crowd swayed to and fro, and many eager to save the poor idiot, who had been so long among them, surrounded him and bore him away in their midst. In vain Titelmann ordered him to be searched for and brought into his presence; he had disappeared, and no one could tell where he had gone.

Two days afterwards the Inquisitors and several magistrates, whom fear had induced to join them, were seated in conclave. Fresh victims were being sought out, for the savage Inquisitors' thirst for blood was not yet quenched. As they were expecting the arrival of some prisoners, a loud cry was heard at the door, and the guards stationed there flying right and left, there appeared a wild-looking, scarcely human figure. Many recognised Hans Kopperzoon, the idiot, now apparently more mad, uncouth, and strange than usual. On his shoulder he bore a burden; it was that of a fleshless and charred skeleton. "There, murderers!" he exclaimed, springing forward and casting the object at the feet of the magistrates, "you have eaten his flesh; now eat his bones!" Having uttered these words, he gave vent to the most fearful shrieks, and keeping at bay with his formidable club all who attempted to stop him, he made his way out of the hall. Fleet as the wind he ran down the street, his shrieks still reaching the ears of those who had allowed his patron to be put to death. No one ventured to stop him; he fled through the streets, he reached the confines of the town, and never from that day forward was Hans Kopperzoon seen in Dixmuyde.

Many years afterwards, when some workmen were digging into a bank to erect a country house for one of the magistrates of the city, a skeleton was found with a club grasped in its hand. The idiot had reached his cavern, and had there lain down to die in peace.

At the time that the flames lighted by the savage Inquisitors of the Pope were consuming the two martyrs at Dixmuyde, a boat was crossing the British Channel. The wind was from the south, the sea smooth, and the boat glided rapidly towards the shores of England, where many a foreigner, persecuted for religious faith, has found a safe asylum. Among the passengers were two fair girls and two young men.

"But, my dear Max, do you think we shall find my father in safety there?" asked Marie Kapell, who sat with her hand clasped in her lover's.

"I trust that he has already escaped from his foes, and that we shall ere long meet in that land of freedom," answered Max Gellert, somewhat evasively. He had had doubts from the first whether Walter Kapell had really, as Hans Kopperzoon had asserted, obtained his freedom. He knew that he had acted according to the wishes of his friend in escorting his daughter far away from their persecutors. The boat reached Southampton in a few hours, and on the following day, in the Lutheran church of that ancient town, Max Gellert and Marie Kapell were united in the bonds of holy matrimony by its venerable pastor. Their names appear in the earliest existing records of the chapel. Bertha resided with her friend till she was married. Max meantime established himself in business, and taking Bertrand as partner, who after a time followed his sister's example, they became flourishing foreign merchants.

Many months passed before Max Gellert heard of the fate of the two martyrs. He broke the news gently to his young wife and their friends.

"Think where they are now," he added. "Happy as we esteem ourselves, how far more so are they! what glory—what bliss unspeakable are they enjoying, such as we can never know till we join them in heaven!"

THE END.

THE BIRTH-PLACE OF DAVID AND OF CHRIST.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM HANNA, D.D., LL.D., EDINBURGH.

DAVID and Jesus were both born at Bethlehem. But is there any good ground either positively to believe or plausibly to conjecture that the two births took place, not only within or close to the same village, but actually in the same dwelling, or within the limits of the same enclosure? It is to help the reader to give his own answer to this question that we offer the following remarks.

David was born in the house of his father Jesse, who was the grandson of Boaz, "a mighty man of wealth" in Bethlehem (Ruth ii. 1). Boaz was the sixth in direct descent from Pharez, whose name and the prosperity of whose house had become so proverbial in Israel, that when all "the people in the gate, and the elders" of Bethlehem, answered to the appeal of Boaz touching his marriage with Ruth, they said, "The Lord make the woman that is to come into thine house like Rachel and Leah, which two did build the house of Israel: and do thou worthily in Ephratah, and be famous in Bethlehem: and let thy house be like the house of Pharez, whom Tamar bare unto Judah" (Ruth iv. 11, 12). During the generations which intervened between Judah and David, the house of Pharez seems to have reached the culminating point of its prosperity at the time of the exodus and in the person of Nahash, the grandfather of Boaz. When Moses and Aaron, in taking the first census of the people in the wilderness, selected one man from each tribe to assist them, "these were the renowned of the congregation, princes of the tribes of their fathers, heads of thousands in Israel" (Numb. i. 16), and Nahshon, "prince of the children of Judah" (1 Chron. ii. 10), was the one chosen to represent the tribe of Judah. He ranked thus only abreast of the other eleven. But when, at the consecration of the altar, the twelve presented their offerings day by day successively, "he that offered his offering the first day was Nahshon the son of Amminadab" (Numb. vii. 12). Again, when the tents were pitched around the tabernacle, the post of honour, "on the east side towards the rising of the sun" (Numb. ii. 3), was assigned to Nahshon and his tribe; and when all the people set forward on their march, "in the first place went the standard of the tribe of Judah: and over his host was Nahshon the son of Amminadab" (Numb. x. 14). Taking it further into account that he was married to Elisheba, the sister of Aaron (Exod. vi. 23), Nahshon not only appears as the head of his tribe, but as standing next to Moses and Aaron, the third man in rank of all the host. These family honours he did not transmit entire to his descendants. Boaz did not occupy the same station in the Commonwealth that his grandfather filled, but there seems no reason to doubt that he continued to be the head of the tribe, and was the chief inhabitant of Bethlehem. David's birth-place was thus the house of the sheikh, or head man of the village. As in those early days, there would be no khan (or inn) at Bethlehem, the duty of entertaining travellers and strangers would fall to be discharged by the sheikh. As Abraham did within his tent at Mamre, so would Boaz, and Obed, and Jesse do within their house at Bethlehem. This house, with its adjoining threshing-floor, was situated exactly in the position most favourable to such exercises of hospitality, lying outside the village, upon a spur or slope of one of those swelling heights on which the village was perched, looking down upon those rich corn-fields, in which Ruth followed the reapers—which the traveller still looks down upon from the Church of the Nativity, and which testify to their identity by their continued fertility, being, in fact, among the few corn-fields of any depth or richness of soil which the hill country of Judea offers to the eye. "Wash thyself," said Naomi to Ruth, when they were both living within the village, "and put thy raiment upon thee, and get thee down: but make not thyself known unto the man, until he have done eating and drinking . . . . And she went down, and did according to all that her mother in law bade her" (Ruth iii. 3—6). The strange adventure of the night over, and his resolution taken, "Boaz went up to the gate, and sat him down there."

This house of Boaz was the home of David's birth and boyhood. We learn little or nothing from him or from his life either about it, or about any of the localities in its immediate neighbourhood. That the haunts of early days made a deep impression upon such a spirit as his we cannot doubt, but with the single exception of the words that burst from his parched lips in the cave of Adullam, "Oh, that one would bring me water to drink out of the well of Bethlehem, at the gate!" no expression of that attachment survives from which any information as to localities could be gathered. He left Bethlehem whilst yet a youth, and never returned to live there. But we can well imagine that when raised to the throne, the acknowledged head of the tribe of Judah, that part at least of the old family estate by which this headship was indicated would pass into his hands and be at his disposal. He made one remarkable disposition of it. It was toward the close of his eventful career. Chased by the rebellion of Absalom from Jerusalem, he fled across the Jordan to Mahanaim. One grand old chieftain of Gilead, older than himself, who had seen much of life and its vicissitudes, was among the first to hold out the hand of affection and help to the weeping, homeless fugitive. A provision was at once made by Barzillai and his friends for all David's own wants and those of his followers. They "brought beds, and basons, and earthen vessels, and wheat, and barley, and flour, and parched corn, and beans, and lentiles, and parched pulse, and honey, and butter, and sheep, and cheese of kine, for David, and for the people that were with him, to eat: for they said, The people is hungry, and weary, and thirsty" (2 Sam. xvii. 28, 29). But beyond that tie of gratitude which such spontaneous and profuse generosity created, another and stronger link bound David to Barzillai. He found, in him a spirit kindred in all its higher aspirations to his own. And so when the turn of fortune came, and David was summoned back once more to occupy the throne, and when Barzillai had accompanied him so far on his journey as to the Jordan, David entreated him to go forward, and live with him as one of his own family at Jerusalem (2 Sam. xix. 33). The offer was courteously, gratefully, pathetically refused. "And Barzillai said unto the king, How long have I to live, that I should go up with the king unto Jerusalem? I am this day fourscore years old: and can I discern between good and evil? can thy servant taste what I eat or what I drink? can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women? wherefore then should thy servant be yet a burden unto my lord the king? and why should the king recompense it me with such a reward? Let thy servant, I pray thee, turn back again, that I may die in mine own city, and be buried by the grave of my father and of my mother. But behold thy servant Chimham; let him go over with my lord the king; and to do him what shall seem good unto thee. And the king answered, Chimham shall go over with me, and I will do to him that which shall seem good unto thee: and whatsoever thou shalt require of me, that will I do for thee" (2 Sam. xix 34, 38). True to his word and promise, David took Barzillai's son Chimham with him to Jerusalem, gave him a place at his table, on his death-bed specially commended him to the care of Solomon (1 Kings ii. 7), and "appears," says a writer on this subject, "to have bestowed on him a possession at Bethlehem, on which in later times an inn (or khan) was standing, well known as the starting-point for travellers from Jerusalem to Egypt."

The later times to which Mr. Grove refers were the troublous days that followed the siege and capture and destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. A large portion of the population, embracing the principal families, had been carried away into captivity, but a Chaldean colony was planted in Judea, and under its oversight a remnant of the old inhabitants was left to till the land and keep the vineyards. Over this remnant Gedaliah, a Jew, was made governor, the prophet Jeremiah being permitted to remain by his side. The governor did not long enjoy his honours. A conspiracy was formed to take away his life. He was warned again and again, but he would not believe that Ishmael, one of his own brethren, could be guilty of such a crime, and he fell a victim to his unsuspicious trust. The deed was foully done, the treachery and cruelty that accompanied its execution being so revolting to the great body of his fellow-countrymen, that when Johanan undertook the office of avenger, Ishmael was deserted and forced into instant flight. But now a terror of the Chaldeans fell upon Johanan and his friends. Soon as it was known at Babylon that the governor appointed by the king, and the Chaldean soldiers set round him as his body-guard, had been so inhumanly and perfidiously slaughtered, would not a swift and summary, perhaps indiscriminate vengeance be visited upon the deed? Pursued by the phantom of this alarm, and carrying along with them Jeremiah, whose life had been singularly preserved, Johanan and his chief followers fled in haste from Mizpah, on the way down into Egypt. At Bethlehem, the first stage on their journey southward, they paused. Dissembling in their hearts, they resolved to inquire of the Lord whether they should carry out their purpose of escaping into Egypt. At their desire Jeremiah gave ten days to this inquiry. The place in which this consultation, so long and so memorable, and which had such disastrous issues, took place is thus described in Jer. xli. 17: "And they departed, and dwelt in the habitation of Chimham, which is by Bethlehem, to go to enter into Egypt." We have good authority for asserting that the Hebrew word here rendered "habitation" denotes a khan (or inn).* The house assigned by David to the son of Barzillai had, in course of time, been turned to such a use. Nothing could be more natural. In patriarchal times, when travellers were few and traffic limited, the sheikh of the tribe or village might take on him the task of entertaining strangers, regarding its discharge as a privilege and pleasure. But as traffic increased, and the great roads along which it was carried on became defined, there sprung up along all the leading thoroughfares khans (or inns); in many cases at first but rude constructions, little more than walled enclosures sufficient to give shelter from the heat by day and protection from robbers or beasts of prey by night. As the need became greater and the means of meeting it expanded, the generosity of merchants, princes, and kings was turned into this channel, and many caravanserais of imposing magnitude arose, the remains of which are scattered over Syria. One feature was common to them all. "There are no inns," says Volney, in his travels in the East—i.e., in the Western acceptation of the term, with host, and waiters, and housemaids, beds prepared and food provided &c.; "but the cities and commonly the villages, have a large building called a kan (or kervanserai), which serves as an asylum for all travellers. These houses of reception are always built without the precincts of towns, and consist of four wings round a square court, which serves by way of enclosure for the beasts of burden." When once it was determined to have such a khan (or inn) at Bethlehem, the house of Chimham would at once present itself as meeting this requirement. It is described as standing close to yet outside Bethlehem, such being the exact force of the Hebrew expression translated by Bethlehem, in the passage already quoted from Jeremiah. How this building came to be so appropriated, and what changes were made in it to fit it for its new use, it is of course impossible for us now to say, but this once done, its character would secure its continuance, its abiding unchanged for so long at least as a public khan was needed at Bethlehem: for to the khan of the East there attached a kind of sanctity, like to that which guards the modern hospital; no buildings being better protected in times of war, none less changeable as to the site which, once fixed, was almost immutable; and none the memory of whose position, even when in the lapse of ages they crumbled into ruins, has been more faithfully preserved; as the still existing names of so many of them testify—Khan Mineyeh, Khan Hashbeya, Khan Hathur, &c. &c. Considering its size and its position relative to Jerusalem, we may be almost certain that there never could have been more than one such inn at Bethlehem, and that the house of Chimham was no other than the inn of Joseph and Mary. In point of fact had the projecting eminence lying outside Bethlehem to the eastward been simply covered with ruins, bearing the name Khan Chimham, no one would have ever doubted that there once stood the inn of the Nativity, the inn of Jeremiah, the house that David gave to the son of Barzillai. But in a position exactly answering to the descriptions already quoted of the situation occupied by the houses of Boaz and of Chimham, there now stands the most ancient of all existing Christian churches, erected by the Empress Helena A.D. 327. Does this venerable pile cover the ground on which the house of Chimham stood? It was raised over the reputed birth-place of our Lord. The peculiarities of its position, its natural character and office, above all the great incident of Christ's birth, would surely be enough to preserve so long a knowledge of the site of the Khan of Bethlehem, even supposing that its semi-sacredness had not screened it from the devastations of the Roman wars, and that in those wars it had been swept away, and that the grove of Adonis

* "Consederunt in habitatione vel publico diversorio Chamaami prope Bethlehem." (Calmet's Commentaries, V.T. t. ix., p. 327.) "Geruth, an 'inn,' from gur, 'to turn aside.' (Compare Latin, deversorium.) The word occurs but once, Jer. xli. 17 (habitation), to denote the khan (or caravanserai) of Chimham, the son of Barzillai, by the side of Bethlehem, on the road from Jerusalem to Egypt."—"Sinai and Palestine," Appendix, § 90, p. 529.

planted by the Emperor Hadrian covered its site, but for one circumstance we are persuaded that it would have been universally and on good ground believed that the Church of the Nativity now stands where the inn once stood.*

Nor would the mere assignment of a cave as the place of the great birth been held of itself as creating any great difficulty of belief. "Like all limestone formations, the hills of Palestine abound in caves," and a cave in the limestone rock on which Bethlehem stands may have been used as a stable for cattle attached to the inn. A very early and for a long period the universal tradition of the primitive Church pointed to a grotto as the scene of the nativity. Justin Martyr was himself a native of Syria, born little more than eighty years after Christ's death (A.D. 114), in a town of Samaria not more than a day's journey from Bethlehem. In his dialogue with Trypho he says: "But when the child was born in Bethlehem, since Joseph could not find a lodging in that village, he took up his quarters in a certain cave near the village, and while they were there Mary brought forth the Christ and placed Him in a manger." Origen refers to this as the constant and undisputed tradition of the place in the generation following that of Justin Martyr; and Eusebius and Socrates did the same in the succeeding century.† Helena had the authentic, express, and universal faith of the Christian society to act upon when she built her church over the cave connected with the old inn of Bethlehem. Jerome, whose means of information were so ample, at once and unhesitatingly accepted the tradition as correct, and (A.D. 386) took up his abode close by in that cell where for thirty years he lived and prayed and wrote and fasted, and in which he died.

With such evidence in favour of Christ's birth having taken place in the cave-stable of an inn, is it unreasonable to believe that had the one shown beneath the Basilica been likely to have been so used there had been a general concurrence of belief in favour of its having been the place of the great event? But the character, form, and position of this cave, not a natural one, but hewn out of the rock, lying far down beneath the surface, unapproachable by cattle, has awakened incredulity, in some cases generated positive and strong disbelief. "There is no access to it," says Dr. Stewart, "except by two flights of steps; and this I consider the only objection to accepting the tradition, as it is quite impossible that horses, asses, or other animals could have made their way down these stairs into the stable." "I confess," says Dr. Wilson, "that its effect upon us, as far as the exact spot is concerned, was nearly completely lost by our entire persuasion that the Saviour was not born in a subterranean cavern like this, difficult of access to cattle, but in an approachable stable attached to the khan (or inn) in which the virgin mother could not be accommodated."

The same objection makes Tristram hesitate, Stanley doubt, Grove repudiate. But is this one objection of sufficient weight to overcome all the antecedent probability in favour of the tradition? Who can tell us what changes have taken place since the nativity, seriously affecting the position of this cave in relation to the adjoining tenements, and its capability of easy access? Even had nothing been done previously by the hand of time or the rude violence of war, the very clearing and levelling of the ground to form fit foundations for so large an edifice, may have involved not only many alterations of the surface, but much hewing of the rock. Dean Stanley and Mr. Grove are both inclined to believe that the Khan of Bethlehem having been swept away in the convulsions of the Jewish war, and all knowledge of the exact locality of the nativity having perished, when it was desired at last to give a local habitation to the event, the strong existing tendency to connect memorable incidents with grottoes came into play—the old tradition of Justin Martyr was revived, and a cave in the neighbourhood of Bethlehem easily found and fixed upon. Had it been so, had the choice been free among all the grottoes that lie round the village, we cannot well understand the selection of one apparently so unsuitable. Not only, however, had a cave to be chosen, but that cave one close to the old khan. The khan itself might have been swept away, and the cave choked up and forgotten. But is it possible, with so much tradition and living Christian literature indicating the locality, that in the period intervening between the nativity and the days of Constantine, all knowledge of where the Khan of Bethlehem stood had perished? Had it been but an ordinary khan, with no historical remembrances connected with it, its antiquity and the well-known peculiarities of its position would have kept up the remembrance of its site. The old Jewish associations connected with it must have helped to preserve this memory. The first generation of Christians

* Calmet, Mr. Grove, and Dean Stanley are all ready to admit that the house of Chimham was in all likelihood the inn of Joseph and Mary. "Eusebius Cæsariensis docet, publico in diversorio natum esse Christum Jesum, prope mœnia Bethlehem; quod fortasse idem fuit cum hoc Jeremiæ." (Calmet's Commentaries, V.T., vol. ix., p. 527.) Mr. Grove writes: "By the time of the captivity the Inn of Chimham by (גֵּרוּת = close to) Bethlehem appears to have become the recognised point of departure for travellers to Egypt (Jer. xli. 17.) A caravanserai (or khan), perhaps the identical one which existed there at the time of our Lord." Dean Stanley says: "By Bethlehem" in ancient times was the caravanserai (or khan) of Chimham, son of Barzillai, for those who would go to enter into Egypt; and from Bethlehem, it may be from that same caravanserai, Joseph "arose, and took the young child and its mother and departed into Egypt."

may not have been so careful about preserving what did not appear to them to be perishable; but certainly from the time of Justin Martyr downward a strong feeling of the Christian heart clung to the place where the Lord was born, and was not likely to let the knowledge of it die out. It was different from what it was with so many of the holy places in and about Jerusalem, the siege and destruction of which effaced all traces of the particular localities, and that anterior to the time that the care for preserving the remembrance of them grew up. Here at Bethlehem tradition had a very simple office to discharge. So long as it stood outside the village walls, the khan would be there to tell its own story, and when it perished its ruins might long remain; and if they were supplanted in the time of Hadrian by the erection of a heathen sanctuary upon so conspicuous and memorable a site, would that have a tendency to obliterate the memory of the old edifice? rather would it not help to fix and perpetuate it? We are very confident that for many hundred years many old villagers of Bethlehem could have guided a stranger without hesitation to well-known ground; and the site of the khan fixed, that of the stable became so far fixed also.

Giving such weight as it seems capable of bearing to each part of the evidence, we are inclined to believe that the Convent of Bethlehem spreads itself over the very ground which the khan (or inn) occupied, and that somewhere immediately adjoining—not, it may be, in the exact spot now shown—was the stable and the manger in which the young child lay. That this khan (or inn) was the same with that of Chimham in which Jeremiah consulted, we can scarcely doubt. To identify it with the house of Jesse and of Boaz, may seem more difficult. The links of evidence at this end of the chain are undoubtedly weaker than at the other; yet if we once admit that the house assigned by David to Chimham was part of the patrimonial property at Bethlehem, we are very naturally, if not necessarily, led on to the conclusion, that the place of the birth of David and of David's Lord lay within the embrace of one and the same homestead.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XII.

DRIFT.

DURING the past weeks the private history of the Lovejoy family had been a very sad one. The old couple who had brought up Albert's wife had some time before retired to Brighton, and Emily had been asked to bring her children and spend the Christmas week with them. As the money necessary for the journey was sent, and more might be forthcoming, her husband had suffered her to go.

So Emily went, and stayed a fortnight instead of a week, and was petted and made much of by her old friends. The poor thing cried a great deal even there. She cried with gratitude, she cried with excitement, she cried with pleasure, just as at home she cried with weariness and vexation. But the cause was physical, and did not arise from temper at all. She needed rest and quiet to heal her fretted nerves, and fresh air and tempting food to restore her strength, and before the fortnight had elapsed, under these influences her tears had ceased to flow. But her uncle had made up his mind to see her home, and he did, for there had come out the pitiful fact, that she was afraid to return after having stayed a week longer than was fixed. Her uncle could not understand her. He feared some positive ill-treatment; he did not know that she shrank from an unkind word more than some would shrink from a blow.

It was late when they reached home, and Mrs. Lovejoy herself opened the door.

"I came to take care of George," said the old gentleman, getting out of the cab with the little fellow sleeping on his shoulder.

This would have been reason good in Mrs. Lovejoy's eyes at any other time, for she doated on the child, but being in an irritable mood she muttered something about it's being a pity when people could not take care of their own children. She had always considered her daughter-in-law a poor creature.

"I'm sure you look well," she went on, greeting Emily as if she grudged the poor girl her faint roses.

Emily's lips quivered, but she got out with the baby and went into the parlour. "Where is Albert?" she asked.

"He's not at home," replied Albert's mother; "it's rather dull work staying at home when other people are away enjoying themselves."

Emily began to cry.

"Be good, dear mamma,—be good," said little George, who had roused himself, and was looking round brightly.

It was what she said to him when he cried, and she might have made answer in his own baby phrase, "I can't be good."

Mrs. Lovejoy gave her a candle, and her uncle, who had been settling with the cabman, followed her up-stairs. There she sat down and cried afresh. The baby stared in wonderment, the child stood wistfully at her knees, and the old man patted her shoulder.

There are some people who may be poisoned, stabbed, slain, without either drug or knife, on whom other people's harsh tempers act as doses of irritant poison, whom other people's sharp tongues wound with cureless wounds that bleed inwardly, and take life away slowly but surely. Such a one was Emily Blake. There was another element in the young wife's grief. Her husband had not even cared to be at home to welcome her. She had loved him so fondly, admired him so much in her childish fashion, and it was so hard to feel that he cared for her not in the least. She knew she had no influence over him, and she could not know that not an angel from heaven would have had power to influence him now. Young as he was, he was being tied and bound with the chain of self-indulgence, till it would come to body and soul parting company before he could be set free.

When at length Albert came home he met his wife and children without a single greeting. With trembling and tears Emily wished that she had never gone away. What had she done to deserve such a home-coming as this, and what had he been doing in her absence? Surely he was altered for the worse.

Yes, hard as Mrs. Lovejoy was, she was to be pitied. Albert had spent the fortnight in one continued debauch. Some nights he had not come home at all. If his wife had little power over him, she, poor mother, had less. He would not listen to the slightest remonstrance of hers, and at his father's authority he mocked. As a consequence of that fortnight's behaviour he had already received notice of dismissal from his employer's service.

Albert Lovejoy's downward career was not arrested by the discipline of adversity. His health indeed was slightly improved by enforced abstinence from brandy and tobacco, but his temper was worse than ever. He would sit at home whole days, making the poor women miserable. The little child could not move about at play without irritating him, and he would insist on sending him out of the room where he was. If the baby cried, he would shout at the unconscious creature in the meaningless jargon of his tribe, but with a look which terrified his helpless wife. "Hold that noise, or I will kill you!" If Emily had been given to reading works medical and psychological, she would certainly have pronounced him mad. As it was, she kept the children as much as possible out of his way, especially the boy, who, accustomed to the gentleness of his mother and the doting fondness of his grandmamma, resented his father's harsh tones and angry looks with little tremblings and poutings of the lip, which generally ended in a prolonged roar, as a slap or a punch accelerated the catastrophe. Then the master of the house would go forth, declaring that he was driven out of doors with the din. At length he carried his unkindness to the children to such a pitch, that even Emily rebelled. Little George (he was but a baby still) had been fretful and feverish, suffering from some of the ills that baby flesh is heir to—probably the cutting of a double tooth. A little thing would make him cry, and his movements were more restless than usual. He chose to drum upon the table with a spoon. It was tea-time, and his father was there. Albert seized the plaything, and flung it to the other side of the table.

At first the child began to laugh, as at a novel and agreeable diversion, but looking in his father's face his little heart was seized with a sudden sense of wrong, his little lip began to quiver. His mamma had always allowed him to drum as much as he pleased. His grandmamma had even furnished him, on occasion, with a little tray on which to make music yet more delectable. He lifted up his little hand and struck at his father.

A white flash of anger rose on Albert Lovejoy's foolish face, and he dealt the little one a blow on the cheek with the full force of his open hand, leaving crimson marks of his fingers on the soft baby cheek.

Emily flew to her boy, who was screaming with rage and pain, and sheltered him in her arms. For the first time in her life she turned and defied the aggressor. "If you do that again," she cried, all white and trembling, "I'll leave you and beg my way to Brighton."

Poor young wife, she had not energy enough left in her to get as far as the next street. Then she added her own hysterical weeping to the cries and sobs of the unappeasable infant. Even his mother denounced him when she came up to ascertain the cause of so much wailing.

"By George!" he exclaimed, "here's no end of a row;" and sullenly, without a word of pacification or apology, he took his hat and departed from the house.

Night came, and he did not return. Emily kept on at her needlework till morning, when she fell asleep with weariness and sorrow.

Mother and daughter-in-law crept about the house next day in mortal terror of what the day might bring forth. The others were abroad. Beatrice was at work as usual. Both Mr. Lovejoy and Geraldine had gone to make inquiries. But the day passed, and nothing had been heard of him. This was the worst that had happened yet, and the two who suffered most became friends in their great calamity. Towards night their dread grew sickening. Some accident had certainly befallen him. He was lying in some hospital, dying, or dead; or still more dreadful, he had gone to the bottom of the river in a fit of suicidal mania.

Once Mr. Lovejoy thought he was on the point of finding him, as he walked between the double row of sufferers to the bed of one who lay insensible and unknown; one who had been brought into the hospital yesterday from a terrible street accident, the breaking of a chain which was swinging a stone up to the cornice of a new building. But it was not he. Some one else was missing in some corner of the vast city; some one else was waiting for the unknown sufferer, and suffering too.

It was towards the close of the third day, when Mr. Lovejoy had given information to the police, that Albert made his appearance—a woful spectacle of wrecked and blasted youth. His wife and mother received him without question or reproach, thanking God in their hearts that he had come back at all. His watch and much-valued trinkets were gone. No one asked how or where. What use in asking? Silence comes with despair.

Then all at once a situation offered. True, it was with a man so characterless that he could not obtain any one to help him that had either character or self-respect; a man as violent as he was unscrupulous; as resentful of being over-reached himself, as he was ready to over-reach others. Into this man's establishment Albert Lovejoy went to supply the vacancy caused by a sudden dismissal—no unusual occurrence there.

On some parts of the coast—those exposed to the long wash of great seas—each little bay or indentation is paved with a different kind of shell or pebble. The great ocean has sorted them out as it were, one by one, and flung them into various receptacles, according to their size and weight. And the ocean of life sorts out individuals in much the same fashion. They, too, are drifted into this position or that, according to their weight and quality. Albert Lovejoy's new associates, who had entered their master's service on much the same footing as himself, were all more or less fast and loose young men, given to music-saloons, billiards, and little suppers; and they were immediately bent upon having one of these little suppers at Albert's expense.

Now Albert had not so much as a shilling to spare; he had not even wherewithal to pay for his dinners, and he could not solace himself with imaginary ones as his father could. He felt the actual hunger, and more than that, he felt keenly the shame of impecuniosity. The lack of his watch and trinkets made him actually shrink as a dog does who has recently lost his tail. His companions would have been quite content with a promise from him to stand treat when he received his wages. They knew what it was to be "not very flush of coin." But Albert had once been the "nob" of his set, and it was galling to begin among new men an acknowledged pauper.

It was the third evening of his engagement, and he did not come home at the usual time. The warehouse shut at seven, and at that hour Emily put her children to bed, and made her room a little tidy for his return. She then sat down to sew and to wait. Half-past eight came; the warehouse might be shut, but plenty of work goes on with closed doors. Albert might be detained. Nine, ten, and still he had not come.

The rest of the family had supper and went to bed. Mrs. Lovejoy came up to sit with Emily. Nearly another hour, and neither she nor her mother-in-law had spoken. Emily had eaten nothing, which was making her low and faint.

"I hope he isn't going to stay out all night again," said Mrs. Lovejoy, in an injured tone, laying down the last stocking to be mended.

It was too much for Emily; she burst into tears, and quitted the room, going into the dark one opposite that she might indulge more freely.

Meantime Albert had had his little supper, and paid for it—a heavy price for poor enjoyment, if, indeed, it could be called enjoyment. It was by no means a costly entertainment as far as money went; it did not consist of ortolans and champagne, but of oysters and beefsteak-pie, pale ale, cigars, and brandy. Four sat down to it, and it cost but fourteen shillings.

But where did the money come from? Albert paid the bill with a Bank of England note for ten pounds, and put his name on the back of it with a flourish. Where did he get it? That very morning he had passed the workshop of one of the customers of his former master, and the man, standing in the doorway, had hailed him as he passed. Not knowing that he had left his former employment, he asked him to receive the sum of ten pounds on account. The man was not a very good payer. "I had better give it you while I can," he said; "money's a great temptation."

And Albert took the money, handing the man a receipt for it in due form; and it came into his head that he might borrow it for a few days. He would spend only as much of it as he could replace at the end of the week, and nobody would be a bit the wiser.

The party at the "Dove and Rainbow" had broken up early. They had not had a particularly jolly evening. Albert Lovejoy had not been successful in his capacity of host. In truth, it was a very dull affair—an affair of stupid jokes, joyless laughter, and unmeaning talk. The night was cold and raw, and each went shivering home out of the steaming room. Albert staggered on the threshold, but not with drink, and his teeth rattled in his head.

But how glad his mother and Emily were to hear his latchkey in the lock a little after eleven! The wife's face brightened more than a girl's who expects her lover, as she flew to the door to meet him, and he was welcomed as if he had been the best of men and husbands—indeed, as the best of men and husbands are not often welcomed. Next day, at his departure, he received a gentle hint to return earlier if possible—a hint to which he replied impatiently enough, but still to the effect that he would return early. Nevertheless the same dreary waiting was in store for Emily, who this evening waited alone.

About the same hour Albert returned, but looking so wild and ghastly that a nervous dread seized the poor young wife, and made her tremble like an aspen. That night Albert had been gambling. He had been desperately uncomfortable all day about the money in his possession, and in the evening it occurred to him that he might try his luck with it, win back what he had spent, and hasten to pay it over to its rightful owners. He was accounted a good hand at billiards. He did not lose invariably. His winnings and his losings over a given space of time would indeed have fairly balanced themselves; but he had thought more of the winnings than of the losings, and they seemed the greatest. It was the old story. He went to the biggest place he knew, won at first, then lost, got nervous, and could not regain; playing desperately for some sort of retrieval, and leaving off when he was obliged with very little money, and of hope none at all. He had spent more than he could make up in many weeks.

The day after he left his place of business early, on the plea of illness (a plea real enough too), and tried, as we have seen, to borrow the ten pounds of Fanny.

CHAPTER XIII.

INTERRUPTIONS.

It was the busiest hour of the day at Messrs. Tabor and Tenterden's. In the outer office, which was entered by a glass door, pens were going rapidly. In each of the deep window recesses was a desk, whose occupant was availing himself of whatever light was to be had. With less of light, but apparently more of leisure, another clerk looked over papers at a central erection full of drawers and pigeon holes, while a messenger sat on a bench and waited. This outer office opened into a larger and more cheerful apartment, in which sat Philip Tenterden, who, after all sorts of interruptions, had just sat down to finish one or two important letters for the post. Out of Philip's room a door led into a narrow passage, on the opposite side of which opened Mr. Tabor's room, and another. This passage had a separate outlet on the landing, so that clients on confidential business, though ushered in by the outer office, might pass from their hearing direct.

Another interruption, and Philip raised his head with a gesture of impatience. It was Arthur Wildish, who came forward in irreproachable attire, as Philip could see, but in somewhat subdued spirits. "I want to catch the four o'clock post," said Philip, unceremoniously after giving his hand; "you won't mind my going on with my letters?"

"No, I'm going directly. I only looked in in passing. I want a word with Mr. Tabor."

"He is disengaged," said Philip, nodding in the direction of the opposite door.

Mr. Wildish loitered, looking as if he had something to say, but meeting with no encouragement he said good-bye, and went out by the other door.

But the interruption, slight as it had been, proved fatal to the letter upon which Philip was engaged. It was some time before it was proceeded with at all, and then it was in a manner so unsatisfactory that it had to be torn up and re-written. When it was re-written, and Philip touched his bell and gave it to the messenger without a moment to lose, a hectic flame was burning on his cheeks, from the force which he had had to put upon his wandering thoughts. He came back again to his seat and tried to concentrate his mind upon some other matter, but failed, and finally rose and went out of his room, and into that of his senior partner, who he concluded had gone out. He had heard him at the door with Wildish some time ago. But no, there was Mr. Tabor, in the unusual attitude of contemplating the points of his toes, seated opposite the fire with his feet on the fender, doing nothing.

"I thought you were gone," said Philip; "I came in for Fisher's letters."

"Oh, that can stand over," said Mr. Tabor, evidently disinclined for business. "Wildish has gone up without me;" and Mr. Tabor sighed unconsciously, and fidgeted in his chair. "He wanted the start of me to-night, it appears," he added, in a tone which was almost an invitation to further inquiry. But Philip made none.

Why should he ask what that young fellow wanted, when he left Mr. Tabor behind in order to reach Mr. Tabor's own house in its master's absence, when he knew it perfectly well, had divined with a lightning flash of intelligence from the moment Wildish had entered his room? Mr. Tabor wanted sympathy at that moment, and sympathy was the last thing Philip was capable of giving. Mr. Tabor was feeling the mere fact of his presence not being wanted at that particular moment, even in his own home, very much as a schoolboy feels at being out of the game. Hence the attitude of abandon so unprecedented in the methodical, painstaking, hardworking lawyer.

He was told to stand aside politely, and allow the creature whom he had accounted his very own to pass into the possession of another, and be from henceforth his only in name. He was also suffering from a great regret. The thing he loved next to his daughter was his business—not the profit of it, that was really and truly a secondary consideration with him—but the business itself, which he and his dead partner had built up by dint of rare probity and industry, and which he had often in the days gone by wished for a son to inherit. The next best thing he had coveted was that his only daughter should marry the business, in the shape of his younger partner and successor; and he had cherished in his heart quite a fatherly love for Philip in consequence. And in this matter Philip had disappointed him, and disappointed him to his own hurt. He would have liked Philip to understand something of this, but Philip at that moment seemed to understand nothing. He seemed to be labouring under an unusual density, while all the time he was alive to the last fibre of consciousness. He was traversing every inch of the road with young Wildish, following him into the very presence of Lucy; but his imagination refused to go further, though he felt that he should know the very moment when the momentous question was asked and answered.

So the opportunity passed, and Mr. Tabor proceeded homewards, intending to take a turn on the heath before entering his house, in order not to interrupt the lovers till they had settled that little affair of a lifetime. Philip, too, went home to dress, and go to Mrs. Austin's. For one evening he remembered the engagement without pleasure. Even that had not power to distract his thoughts. He would have preferred a twelve miles' walk under the frosty stars. He quarrelled with a man who elbowed him at the train, and his fellow-travellers set him down as the person in fault because his brow was like a thunder-cloud, while the fat and selfish aggressor made himself comfortable in his corner. He was altogether in an electric condition, ready to flash out at a touch.

THE LAUNCH.

BY W. C. BENNETT, AUTHOR OF "SONGS FOR SAILORS."

NOW, now they strike the shores away,
And as away they're struck,
The noble ship
Adown the slip
Takes water like a duck.
No hitch—no stay,
She floats away,
How well her work she knows!
And noble work
She will not shirk
Where'er the free wind blows.

Good luck to her, where'er she sail;
God guard the lass, I say;
May never rock
Her timbers shock,
Or sea sweep spar away;
Oh, may the wave
Ne'er be her grave,
Winds waft her round the world,
Still, still to work,
And never shirk,
Till in port her sails are furled.

HARRY'S RASH WISH,

AND HOW THE FAIRIES GRANTED IT. BY THE HON. MRS. GREENE.

CHAPTER IV.

AND such a strange old face it was, wrinkled and sunken and carewern, and with eyes that looked at one as it were through a fog, but which, clouded by age or trouble, seemed to conceal no angry fire or cruel revengeful purpose.

Nay, there was something curiously simple in the face of the old man, almost like a child's, as he sat gazing and gazing at Harry in a sort of amazement, and by-and-by stretching his hands out over Harry's head, as he had done a moment before over the fire, he murmured something which Harry could not hear, and tears came up into his dim eyes and ran down his cheeks.

At this Harry seemed to lose all fear, and he began to question his companion, to ask him his name, and to know if he might remain under the shelter of his roof for the night, but received to all his questions never an answer, save that the old man drew him nearer and nearer as he spoke, and gazed at him still more earnestly, muttering to himself all the while words which to Harry's ear had no meaning. "A hundred years—aye, a hundred years since I saw the like; a hundred years, my pretty one, since I saw a face like thine;" and so on the same words it might be a score of times.

But presently he seemed to notice that Harry's feet and hands were numbed with cold, and that he needed warmth and shelter; for with tottering steps he rose and closed the open door, and threw some wood upon the fire, and having done this, he drew the child down on the settle beside him, and began to chafe his little hands between his own horny palms, and muttering still for ever to himself the same words—"A hundred years—aye, a hundred years, and full, since I saw the like."

"Since you saw what?" asked Harry at length, driven to despair by the monotony of his companion's remarks, and hoping to gain some information; "what is it you have not seen for a hundred years?"

"The like o' thee—the like o' thee; I have not seen the face o' a child like thee for nigh a hundred year."

"Why, what is there curious about me?" asked Harry, uneasily; "how am I unlike other children?"

"Poor innocent," murmured the old man, compassionately, "he speaks o' other children, as if he had seen a many o' them. Why, dear heart, one has not seen the smilin' face o' a babe i' this wicked world for a hundred year—not for a hundred year, and a lonesome world it has been without them; all the bright laughs, and the innocent tears, and the pretty dimples in their cheeks all gone, all flown away in the little babies, it was amost enough to break one's heart, to see all the empty cradles a standin' by the fireside, and the mothers a walkin' about wi' nothin' i' their arms, and no song of love in their mouths, instead o' singin' their wee ones to sleep o' their breasts wi' sweet songs and kisses."

"I don't understand what you mean," said Harry, plaintively, as he noticed tears rising again in his companion's eyes; "why, I am not very old, and I have seen hundreds and thousands of children and babies. Why, I have a little sister of my own who is only a few days old."

"Then if that be so," replied the old man, gloomily, "thou must have dropped into a strange world in the middle o' the night; thou must have fallen fro' the sky i' the flakes of snow, or risen from thy grave i' the kirkyard, for not one babe has been born in this world of ours for a hundred years, not for a hundred years since the night when the fairies walked abroad i' the fields and houses, and granted many a wicked wish to them as had wicked wishes i' their mouths and hearts."

"When was that?—tell me more about it all," asked Harry, eagerly, as some dim recollection came creeping over his mind, which made him feel unhappy and ill at ease; could it be possible that he had really passed into some new world in the middle of the night, or could he have been sleeping in his grave, or elsewhere, for a hundred years, and that now that he was awake again all he loved were gone, dead, perhaps, and buried—his mother, his father, Jack—oh! not Jack—Jack—with his rosy cheeks and ringing laugh, he could not be dead and gone and hidden from sight! and the baby—the little cosy baby with the dimple in its cheek, and the tiny hands stretched out so helplessly? All these strange sad thoughts had arisen like ghosts themselves to haunt him, and he waited eagerly but fearfully for the reply to his question, "When did all this happen?"

"It happened o' a night—let me see," and the old man paused a moment and ran his fingers through his long grey hair—"aye, it happened just a hundred year ago, come last night. The fairies, they say, do fly in swarms o' nights when the moon is at her full, and play their pranks all over the earth with beast and fowl and such like, and then they come creepin' at dead o' night into the houses and makin' such mischief as is in their power to make, granting to silly folk their silly wishes, and harmin' those besides who never harm them. However, as I heard tell, for I was but a lad then, just turned o' fifteen—ay, you may look at me wi' your wide-open eyes in wonder, lad, for a hundred and fifteen years old I am this blessed day. I would I had died when I was a babe, I do," broke in the old man with a sob, "for to live on all alone i' the world is weary work, without seeing the face o' a living being; but to finish what I had i' my mind to tell you. One of these nights with the big moon a glowin' in the sky overhead, they all came a buzzin' and a swarmin' about the countryside here, and seeing what harm they could do quiet folk, till by-and-by a host of them walked in at twelve o' the clock to a house down yon i' the valley, where there lived, I heard tell, an honest gentleman and his wife and some little folk."

"And what?" asked Harry, with eyes which blazed red in the fire-light, and cheeks whiter than the snow outside; "and what—what—what were you going to say?"

"Eh, dear lamb, don't thee a look at me so, it were better I told thee no more; I feel thy wee hand a tremblin' like a bird."

"Go on—go on," urged Harry, "I must hear it all."

"Well, an thou must, thou must, I suppose," replied the old man, sadly; "I was never a good hand at contradicting o' children, and as I say, there was a wee chap had fallen asleep i' his cot, with some foolish wish in his mouth, for I cannot a think he had it rightly set in his head; he had some foolish wish, as I say, on his lips, as how he would there were no more babies i' the world, or something o' the kind, and like a poor innocent lamb he bleated out his idle fancy to some one who sat by him, and the fairies, who were a clustering round his head like a swarm o'bees, just caught up the very words as he spake them, "he would that no more babies would be sent into the world;" and so as I was told, they not only carried out his silly babbling words, but they made away wi' the poor child himself, at least his cot was empty next morning, and though his father and mother hunted the world up and down, they never saw his pretty face again. Some said as how the nurse was also to blame, for she had wished the fairies would make the little chap invisible; but, be that as it may, they never saw him more—never never: they stole the pretty bird from his nest, they did, the thieves——"

"What was the boy's name?" asked Harry, in a voice so low, so sad, so trembling, it would never have reached the old man's ears had it not been so full of pain.

"His name—nay, I misdoubt if I can call it to mind, but bide a bit and I will try. There is many a thing as happened long ago I remember better than I do o' late years, but bide a while and I will try." And while he waited Harry's poor little brain seemed to spin round and round with misery—the empty nursery at home—the forsaken house—the lonely world—the biting cold and drifting sleet, with no one to love him or care for him but this one old man, who soon must die himself, and all for why?

"Ay—ay, I mind it now, I mind it now; his name was——"

But before these words could leave the old man's lips, Harry leaped from the bench with a scream; his pain was too great to bear longer, his agony of mind too keen for endurance. "Don't say it was Harry, don't say it was me!" he shrieked with such bitterness, that the old man appeared to shrink and wither away from before his sight, the walls of the cabin rocked, the snow seemed to hiss outside in its fury, and then some one shouted into Harry's ears with a voice which sounded like a peal of thunder,

Awake, Master Harry! awake, it is time for you to get up, you have slept quite long enough!"

Ay, one would think so; a hundred years is a good long sleep for a little boy of five years old, and as Harry awoke and rubbed his eyes in utter bewilderment as to where he was, where was he, think you? Why, in his own snug nursery, the fire was burning brightly in the shining grate; the kettle, not the snow, was hissing on the hob; the tea was made already, and slices of nice white bread-and-butter were cut and temptingly laid upon a plate; the cradle was in a corner by the fire; nurse, singing happily, sat plying the rockers with her foot; how cosy, how bright, how comfortable, they all looked!

And so our old friend Harry had his breakfast in bed, Lizzie gave it to him on a little tray, and nurse laughed as she poured out his tea, and said he must have been dreaming in the night, he tumbled about so, and screeched like, and she did not wish to rouse him in the morning, as he seemed to have fallen into an easier sleep.

And so he had been dreaming, poor Harry, though he did not tell nurse what the terrible dream was all about; but, when he was washed and dressed, and his curls were all combed out and smoothed, before he left the nursery he paused and leaned over the little pink-lined cradle where his sister lay fast asleep, and looking at her for a long time, he stooped down and gave her such a kiss on her little dimpled cheek, that nurse looked up in amazement; but Harry in his own heart knew why.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

36. Quote a verse from Isaiah in which each division of the fourfold office of Christ is enumerated.

37. When our Lord speaks of the lasting punishment for offences committed, He quotes a passage from Isaiah's prophecy.

38. There is a passage in one of the greater prophets which seems to be the basis on which St. Paul's description of the Christian armour is founded. Quote it.

39. A passage from Habakkuk is quoted by St. Paul in the Acts of the Apostles. Give it.

40. The prophet Zechariah in describing the mourning of those who shall see Christ at His second coming, borrows a simile from a fact in Jewish history.

SCRIPTURE HEROINES.

DORCAS.

"Tabitha, arise."—Acts ix. 40.

THE bright eye filmed, the busy hands were still,
The active form, hushed in its last long sleep,
Lay in an upper chamber. Loud and deep
The lamentations which the lone home fill.
When straight the minister of God's high will Sped to his mission: and the tears were dry,
And brightness lit once more each lustrous eye.
Again the ready hands displayed their skill.

"Not dead, but sleeping"—such the motto grand
Which o'er each Christian sleeper must abide Since Christ, the First-fruits of the Risen, died,
And dying rose, to draw them with scarred hand—
Scarred with the records of man's cruelty,
Scarred to ensure our immortality—
O'er death's dark waves to exercise command,
And beckon our beloved on to the deathless land.

MAURICE DAVIES.

ON AN ERRAND OF MERCY.

"Can two walk together unless they be agreed?"

WE parted, with no whispered hope
Of meeting on the morrow—
She went to flutter through the world,
And I to wrestle with my sorrow.

And yet we loved—oh, story trite
That careless lip full oft profaneth!
Oh, story told of human hearts
Until it nothing new containeth!

Who stays to think what records drear
Of troubled hours, of idols broken,
Of disappointments hardly borne,
In those few simple words are spoken!

Why parted we? so fair, so dear—
Ay, when was maiden fairer, dearer?
My child-friend first, each passing year
But drew us nearer still, and nearer.

Why parted we? the deed was hers;
With every earthly gift surrounded,
She shrank from treading that strait way
By which my surer joys were bounded.

We sundered, yet she oft looked back;
Did she not see I would have given
For her dear sake my very life,
But not, oh! not my hopes of heaven!

Two years, though long, not comfortless;
Though trial-fraught, not wholly dreary;
Who toils for others best forgets
At lonely hours to fret and weary.

One day across my path she came
On mercy's errand, basket laden;
What mission casts a fairer grace
About a bonny English maiden?

We clasped hands—the snow fell fast,
But little recked we of the weather
The while her gentle lips avowed
What now has bound our lives together.

Changed, yet more dear, for those soft eyes
Have oft been dimmed with care and weeping;
Yet in their depths enmirrored dwells
A pure soul given to God's keeping.

Changed, yet more dear, in trusting love,
Our long-deferred vows are plighted;
Ah! blest those lives, come weal, come woe,
In one sure Hope that are united!

THE CHURCH AND HUMAN SOCIETY.

I.—THE BROTHERHOOD OF MEN.

BY THE REV. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., PRINCIPAL OF KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON, AND CANON OF WORCESTER.

"Sirs, ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to another?"—Acts vii. 26.

THIS is the question which rises in every thoughtful and earnest heart, when it contemplates human life as it ought to be and as it is. It is the question which Christians, above all others, must ask, in proportion as they understand what is meant by their Christianity. In fact, the whole operation of the Church of Christ may be said to consist in the preaching by word and realising by grace of two main truths—the great truth of the Brotherhood of men, and the greater truth of the Fatherhood of God. Not that these truths ought to be for a moment separated from each other in theory, as indeed they never have been separated in practice. The knowledge of the lesser truth is an education for the understanding of the greater; the greater truth is the Diviner principle which gives solidity and perfection to the lesser. But still they may be distinguished. In teaching the Fatherhood of God, religion ascends to that heavenly region to which all other knowledge can but look up more or less successfully. In teaching the Brotherhood of men, the practical knowledge of which is the secret of all true civilisation, she still remains in this visible world; she only assumes the leadership of many associated forces, which all work together for one common end. And accordingly for a thorough consideration of the whole subject, it is better first to dwell on the realisation of the brotherhood of men, as one great reason for the very existence of the Church; and then to pass from this to that direct revelation of the heavenly Father, without which the brotherhood of men, as history has shown, cannot be realised; and if it were realised, could not satisfy the highest aspirations, or meet the profoundest needs of the soul.

The brotherhood of men—it is a truth which, in theory, every man admits; and which, in fact, it is impossible for any one who looks at human nature to deny. It means not only that men are bound together by a network of mutual needs, so that, especially in our advanced and complicated civilisation, it is absolutely impossible for any man "to live and die to himself," without at every moment receiving influence from others, and at every moment giving out influence upon others, either for evil or for good. Nor does it only mean that men are united by mutual affections and sympathies, so that in an undisturbed and unpolluted nature it is as natural to love as it is to breathe, and that, even in the midst of weakness and of sin, self-sacrifice is as true to our higher, as selfishness to our lower nature. It expresses an ultimate truth which underlies both these, of which the existence of mutual needs is a sign, and the existence of mutual affections a recognition. That ultimate truth is the fact, that there is a real substantial unity through what we call "ties" in human nature—that the community of blood in the family, community of race in the nation, the community of nature in humanity at large, imply an inherent and effective power, more subtle indeed, but not less real, than the force of attraction, or the forces of electricity or light. This unity, so profoundly natural, expresses itself in moral and spiritual energies; and the remonstrance, "Sirs, ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to another?" is no sentimental appeal, but one based on solid grounds of reason and of duty. This is the truth, which men have sought to embody in that "Fraternity," without which the celebrated formula of "Liberty and Equality" would not only be imperfect, but actually uncivilised and barbarian, as regarding each man only as a separate unit. It is a commonplace in all philosophies and religions; there is probably no educated or thoughtful man, certainly there is no Christian, who will dare to deny it.

But yet the state of society as we actually see it, is such that the very term of brotherhood sounds almost like a satire. I do not speak only of the breaches and wounds of unity caused by actual crime, as it breaks out in sensuality and dishonesty, in violence and robbery and murder. These things, although they are too frequent, we all know to be monstrous and exceptional; and if they ever cease to be exceptional, society itself must come to an end. Nor do I even speak of wars—whether those which embroil different nations, or those more wretched wars which divide a people against itself. These again are, like individual crimes, terrible exceptions. Like the eruption, the earthquake, the hurricane in Nature, they may be overruled to good—to clear the air, to give a needful outlet for pent-up spiritual forces; but in themselves they are anomalies, and their prevalence would be destruction. I speak rather of the tendency to division, inequality, antagonism, which seems inherent in the very progress of civilisation itself. The existence in London, above all other cities, of these fatal divisions, these terrible inequalities, at once scares us, and urges us to struggle against them for the very life of society. There are quarters of our great wealthy city so poor, so destitute, so neglected, that before them all thoughtful men, who care for their country and their kind, stand absolutely aghast. When we turn from the spectacle of wealth and brilliancy and culture at one end of London, to the squalor and misery and almost savage degradation at the other, it seems a mockery to say to our people, "Ye are brethren; why care ye not one for the other?"

Now it is clear to us that in some sense this growth of inequalities is natural and inevitable, if the personal inequality, which exists, quite as truly as equality, among men by nature, is allowed freely to develop itself, and be perpetuated by free inheritance of its accumulated results from generation to generation. If an artificial equality be produced, and if all institutions which seem to interfere with it are taken away, still, provided that individual liberty be left, the natural inequality will speedily assert itself, between the strong and the weak, the wise and the foolish, the industrious and the idle, the iron will and the soft, yielding nature. Each generation as it succeeds must increase the inequality. One class inherits all advantages of circumstance, of education, of opportunity, so that it starts on a high level to attain one higher still. Another seems, as we say, to have no chance; the circumstances of their homes, their education, their work in life, all combine to depress them. Thus there is a double increase of the inequality of which we have spoken. All the characteristics of modern life—the all but unlimited freedom given to each man—the rapid growth of material civilisation and the means of wealth—the process which is accumulating our people in the great towns, while the country is gradually drained of its inhabitants—all these tend to stimulate the upheaval of one stratum of society and the subsidence of the other, till great gulfs of separation seem to open under our very feet, and grow wider and deeper with a terrible rapidity.

But what must we do? Are we to stand by in mere wonder and despondency while this evil grows upon us, and wait helplessly for the day when some awful convulsion shall restore all to a level—the dead level of destruction? Shall we still go on listening to those who tell us that unchecked individualism, or free trade in everything—material, political, and moral—is too sacred to be touched, and perhaps quote the old proverb which declares that, if "every man is for himself," "God will be for us all;" that is, that His laws will work themselves out for good, although the agents under them see not, and care not to see, anything beyond what profits themselves? It seems to me that all our deeper thinking and deeper feeling men are more and more inclined to shrink from this course of timidity and indolence. They are beginning to see that mere individualism recognises only that side of human nature in which each man is alone, and neglects the other side, in which the unity of humankind is represented. They feel that, at the risk of being, like Moses, denounced as presumptuous, and hated as disturbers of peace, they must still throw themselves between those who should be brethren, but who are gradually stiffening into estrangement, or hardening into antagonism, and cry out, "Sirs, ye are brethren after all, will ye not do something to preserve or restore your brotherhood?"

There are those who, impatient of that balance of powers which seems to be the rule alike of the physical and moral world, would cut the Gordian knot at once by actual law; they would virtually crush individual liberty and energy, and thus arrest the progress of our race; they would insist that all men should not only be made equal, but be kept equal; they would take away, or limit, all certain tenure of property for a man himself, or for those whom he loves better than himself; they would eventually invade even the shrine of home, and deny the sacredness of the family, and the marriage-tie which is its bond. Such socialistic dreams have floated before the eyes of philosophers and theorists from the days of Plato downwards. Vain we know them to be, as all those sweeping and logical systems are vain, which ignore one side of the constitution of human nature. Vain—worse than vain—have been the attempts to realise them on any great scale as a basis of society. But who that looks on the present state of English or European society, can wonder that those who are poor enough to feel poverty, and yet not so poor as to be crushed by it—educated enough to see the evil, and not so educated as to understand that it cannot be destroyed by a simple process of eradication—that such men should cry out that these theories offer the only hope and happiness for the mass of men, and that accordingly the few must give way to the many, and the individual be bound and sacrificed on the altar of society? Certainly these eager and painful cravings, these visionary but not ignoble theories, must be met by some other method than mere denunciation and repression. It will not be enough to silence their voices; there must be some greater and nobler voice, in the presence of which they will be hushed, because they will be needless.

But leaving individual liberty unchained, and recognising accordingly the fact that there will be inequalities in wealth, privilege, and power, what can we do?

There is one form of brotherhood among us, which belongs to the nation as a nation, expressing itself through law. It can do much, it might perhaps do more, for its weaker members. It can take away all oppressive laws, which stereotype inequalities of class, and so it can give each man a fair chance of showing the power that is in him, and following the vocation which corresponds to it. It can put within the reach of the very poorest the means of education; it can provide for the people the opportunities of recreation and cultivation; it can in some degree, though with much cautious hesitation, attempt to protect the uneducated against themselves—against their own selfishness or their own folly. Besides all this, the State steps in, by the action of its poor laws, to save men from the extremes of suffering and starvation. It might step in, we sometimes think, to cure those wretched circumstances of the dwellings of the poor, sinning against health of mind and body alike, which are at the bottom of much of the intemperance, much of the pauperism, much of the crime, which disgrace our civilisation.

All this the nation, as a nation, can do; this in some measure it has done; this in greater measure it must do. Certainly it is true, as has been lately said, that social questions, even more than political, press upon us now. Certainly it is beginning to be felt that those who make the laws should consider whether the existence of unchecked and undirected freedom may not be too dearly purchased; whether it may not be necessary, to a degree from which hitherto we have shrunk, to limit in some measure its action, and to claim for it some sacrifice for the good of the whole. Freedom, after all, is not an end, but a means, as for the true culture of the individual, so for the true civilisation of the race. Are there not times when direction is needed for the right harmony of the two objects? when the fierce jostle of competition, and the short-sighted eagerness of the individual, must be curbed by the iron voice of the Law, crying out, though it be sternly and coldly, "Sirs, ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to another?"

But there is a brotherhood of heart and soul, which no national tie can wholly represent, and which must express itself in something freer, larger, more spiritual, than the iron stiffness of law. It rests on what we term the sense of humanity—the recognition of a certain unity of men as men, not only as regards action, but as regards the inmost thought and feeling. Such brotherhood will not show itself only in the bond of duty, in which each feels his own individuality and rights, even while he gives their due to others, and which, therefore, is like a great cincture, keeping together a number of atoms, each perfectly distinct, even though it touch and press upon the others. It will express itself even more fully in the spirit of love, which is an actual sinking, ignoring, denying of self; which is not like an external cincture, but rather like the network of an organism, binding all absolutely together, so that one blood throbs and one feeling thrills through all.

Such a brotherhood as this is essentially spiritual; and where is it to be found? Where, as a matter of fact, has it ever been found through all human history in any living and energetic form, except in the sense of a religious unity, in which men are bound to each other, because they are bound to God? The Church of Christ, so far as it has been true to its calling, has proclaimed and realised this brotherhood. If it had fulfilled that calling perfectly, I am bold to say that there would be at this moment no fatal breaches of unity, no great yawning gulfs of division in our society. Order, degrees, inequalities there would be, but shading off into each other, and having a deep unity underlying them all. And one thing appears certain, that, if the Church does not do this work of unity, there is no other power that can do it—that, if society is to be saved from utter disruption, the Church must rise more adequately to the exceeding greatness of the time, and to the yet more exceeding greatness of her high calling.

She needs no new truth or rite; she needs but more fully and vitally to realise the old. What can be needed to teach the brotherhood of men beyond the knowledge of Christ as coming down from heaven to live, to die, to rise again, for all humanity alike? as pleading at the right hand of God now for every child of man? as coming hereafter to judge all, and in that judgment to declare Himself so perfectly one with us, that all done and left undone, to the poorest and simplest, is done or left undone to Him? The "enthusiasm for humanity," of which we hear so much as the religion of the future, if it be directed to an abstraction, is vague and ineffective; if it be turned to the living men, who form society, is either narrow and capricious, or shallow and diluted. There is but one enthusiasm, which is deeply personal and yet absolutely universal, and that is the enthusiasm for humanity as embodied in the Christian. And again, what can be more effectual in realising that brotherhood, than the simple and universal organisation of the Church, knowing no distinction of class or age, of race or nation, calling all alike to its baptism, gathering all to one common worship, inviting all to join as equals at one holy table? No! we need to invent nothing new; we need simply to awake to the meaning of that which is old. Even as the Church is, we find in it the only brotherhood that we can trust to; but if it were what it should be, we should need no other voice to stay the conflict between brethren. For the voice of Christ, heard through His Church, is not the stern voice of law, but it is the deep and gentle voice of the Spirit, penetrating the soul and reaching to the very depths of its being.

It is, then, the mission of the Church to teach true fraternity, even as it teaches the true liberty of each individual soul, and true equality of all before the face of God. It has indeed a higher mission (of which we must speak hereafter), but how wonderfully it is fitted for this! I do not speak only of its inherent principles, but also of its actual ministrations, as we see them in every Christian country. In every quarter of the land it plants men, whose whole object and calling in life is to promote the spiritual good of their brethren; who cannot help recognising and proclaiming a spiritual brotherhood; who can foster that which is wanted above all things, and without which mere almsgiving alone can do little good, and may do much harm—mutual knowledge and sympathy between the rich and poor, the educated and uneducated; who can stimulate all kinds of good work in self-help and mutual help; who can show the ignorant and the vicious and the neglected, that there is the possibility of a higher life for them, and that there is a higher Power who cares for them. All this it does, and, as subsidiary to this spiritual work, it raises churches to be the common homes of the people of God, and schools on Sunday and on weekday to be the places of a true education of the little ones. Who can doubt that, even from this human point of view, it is a noble and a glorious work? And in spite of the imperfections which must attach both to any system and to those who work it, who, that knows the facts, will deny that there is in that action a marvellous vitality, and a true blessing of God? and that again and again, when law fails because it is too rigid, and public opinion and philanthropy because they are too vague, it has not only taught but realised the truth, that all men are brethren because all men are Christ's?

But, still, that glorious office is but imperfectly discharged; still, therefore, it is a duty pressing urgently on all who have power to think and act, and especially on those who have still the unexhausted treasure of youth, and to whom this generation belongs—to strive and pray for better things. We gaze almost in terror on the critical nature of these times, in respect of the strongly-marked divisions, the mutual ignorance, the growing antagonism of class and class. We know that the one truth which can remedy this—the truth of the brotherhood of men—is one which can be taught and realised in many ways, and that whatever light we have on this great subject is a call to be up and doing in the cause, even if it costs us something, even if it costs us much. But if we believe—as being Christians we cannot but believe—that only by spreading the Gospel and giving new energy to the Church of Christ can the work be done thoroughly and perfectly, as it has been done in ages past, it is for us to strive and pray that we may live up to our Christian profession, and follow the mind of Christ*—first, in the spirit of humility, which always gives up self that it may bless others; and, next, in the spirit, which, wherever it is needful, bears the cross, in order that it may redeem and save!

THE TESTIMONY OF JESUS THE SPIRIT OF PROPHECY.

BY THE REV. HUGH M'SORLEY, M.A., VICAR OF ST. PAUL'S, TOTTENHAM.

IT is well known that the prophets of the Old Testament are divided into two classes, the greater and the less; and it is curious to notice that the name of Jehovah forms one of the constituent parts of Isaiah and Jeremiah, while the name of El, or God, forms one of the constituent parts of Ezekiel and Daniel. This incorporation of the names of the Great Being who was adored by the Jewish nation with the highest worship is well worthy of notice. Jah, the "Eternal One," and El, the "Covenant-Keeper," were thus made elements of some of the proper names of the people of that favoured nation, who thereby bore upon their souls marks, as it were, of holiness to the Lord, proofs of the eternity of their Great Father. What results should have followed from this hallowed dedication may readily be imagined. And yet the awful sentence was pronounced, that the people so highly favoured, and so greatly blessed, after all, had only a name to live, while they were really dead!

We are not to regard the names of the prophets in the Old Testament as we should the blocks and fragments of an unfinished edifice, or the débris of some mighty tempest, scattered up and down on the sea-shore. I candidly confess I have often been puzzled at the names; I could make nothing whatever out of them. Now, however, I look upon them quite differently. I think I see order, I think I see arrangement, I think I see beauty in the whole, for, if I be not much mistaken, I can trace the finger of God in every one of them. There is not a word that I write which lies beyond the comprehension of an English scholar. A good concordance will supply all that is necessary to follow me in these observations. And here I would remark, that a rich reward is stored up for all real students of the Word of God. I can imagine a man's heart swelling with excitement as he succeeds in some enterprise which he had undertaken, and as success crowned his efforts, his cup of joy began to overflow. But of all the mental pleasures with which we can possibly be blessed, I regard those as the sweetest and the holiest which have their origin in the garden of the Lord, the only paradise left to us now on earth. In this Eden of ours we still can find the Lily of the Valley and the Rose of Sharon. Here we can behold the Olive which when pressed in the olive-mill, the spiritual Gethsemane, produces a balm for every wound, and a cordial for our fears. Here is the Shrub which, when bruised, sent forth a perfume redolent with sweetness, and intended to render our whole race acceptable to Heaven. To the man who desires recreation for his soul, to the man who desires instruction for his mind, to the man who longs to become wise unto salvation, I would recommend the study of the Word of God, not running over it by chapters and by books, but by taking a single word at a time, and examining well that word, and sure I am that the study will be both profitable and pleasant.

I purpose now glancing at the writings of the prophets from Isaiah to Malachi, and going through them all. And I will endeavour to ascertain the meanings of the names, and unless I be much mistaken, we shall find that, even in the name, "the testimony of Jesus is the Spirit of prophecy." This question has nothing to do with the interpretation of prophecy. I do not attempt to fix chronology. All that I intend here is to ascertain the meaning of the names, and to apply such meanings to Him about whom the prophets wrote.

ISAIAH — The Salvation of Jehovah, is a title sufficient for its purpose; for what book in the whole of the Old Testament points out more than this the salvation of Jehovah? The very first chapter shows the great need of salvation, pointing out the existence, even in God's own people, of a universal corruption: the Saviour by whose stripes we are healed is described in the fifty-third chapter: the freeness and fulness of His mercy may be seen in the fifty-fifth chapter: the nullity of rites and ceremonies in the sixty-sixth chapter. Thus, "the salvation of Jehovah" is the subject-matter of the whole book, and He who effects salvation for His people is "Jesus," essentially the "Saviour."

JEREMIAH — The Exaltation of Jehovah, or the one raised up by Jehovah. His appointment to the office in the first chapter indicates the suitability of the name. But Moses foretold of Christ (Deut. xviii. 15). "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto Him ye shall hearken." And we find reference to this same prophecy of Moses in St. Matthew's Gospel (xvi. 14): "Some say that Thou art John the Baptist; some, Elias; and others, Jeremias, or one of the prophets." And then, when we remember that it was on account of His sufferings and degradation that the man Christ Jesus was exalted to the right hand of God, far above all principality and power, and that He had a name given to Him which is above every name, and that having been put to death, He was raised up from the dead, and by His resurrection was proved to be the Son of God, we may see a little more clearly the appropriateness of the name Jeremiah to the finished work of Christ.

EZEKIEL—The Strength or Might of God. And, we would ask, is not this an accurate description of Christ? In the great prophecy of Isaiah (ix. 6) regarding Christ, among the titles enumerated is this, "the Mighty God," and in the Epistle to the Romans (ix. 5) He is described as being "God over all" (therefore strong and mighty), "blessed for ever." He, the Captain of our salvation, surely must have had "strength," else how could He have coped with the enemies of our salvation? He must have "might," now, seeing that "by Him all things consist" (Col. i. 17). Well, then, does the work of Jesus seem appropriately described by Ezekiel, "the strength" or "might of God."

DANIEL—God of Judgment, or God-judge. How appropriate this to Him who will yet judge the world in righteousness! before whose judgment-seat all must appear! If there be anything more clearly revealed than another in the writings of the New Testament, it is this, that Jesus is to be our "Judge."

HOSEA — Causing to save, or Saviour; almost identical with "Jesus, only it wants the first letter J; for "Jesus," although commonly regarded as "Salvator, or Saviour," is not properly rendered by either of these words. Indeed, "Jesus" cannot be rendered by any one equivalent word in English, as it signifies "Jehovah-Saviour." However, Hosea, or "Saviour," sufficiently indicates the deliverance from bondage of God's people. They had been delivered from Egypt, and from Babylon, and although ten of the tribes may seem lost, yet lost they are not; they will appear again. Hosea was sent to God's people, and his own name indicated God's intention towards them; but that intention will be fully shown when Jesus, the true Hosea, shall have brought up His people, not merely from the bondage of Egypt, or Babylon, but from the still greater and more degrading bondage of sin and Satan, the prison and the grave.

JOEL — A Beginner. Who does not here, on observing the meaning of this name, revert instantly to the first verse of St. John's Gospel? "In the beginning was the Word;" or to St. Paul's declaration about Christ, that "He is before all things?" (Col. i. 17.) How appropriate, then, for Jesus is the name of Joel, "the Beginner!"

AMOS—Burdened. Who ever, before or since, was so burdened as Jesus? Who ever bore such a load as He did? Was it not on Him that the Lord laid the burden of our sins? Who was so oppressed as He? And while He endured a load of grief and shame, and bore the pains of death and hell, He did all this—i.e., He tasted death for every man by the grace of God (Heb. ii. 9).

OBADIAH — Servant of Jehovah, instantly recalls to our mind, "Behold my Servant, whom I uphold; mine Elect, in whom my soul delighteth: I have put my Spirit upon Him: He shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles" (Isa. xlii. 1). We cannot fail to think of our (the true) Obadiah, "who made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant" (Phil. ii. 7), and who did the drudgery of a servant. Truly Jesus is our "Obadiah!"

JONAH—A Dove, the very emblem of innocence. Cruden, in his Concordance, says, "The Holy Spirit appeared at the baptism of our Saviour in the form of a dove (Matt. iii. 16), to signify what Christ is to His people, (1) In His own nature to them that come to Him, meek, harmless, loving. (2) In the execution of His office, even He by whom the Father is pacified, and who brings the good tidings of the assuaging the deluge of wrath, as the dove did on the retiring of the waters to Noah. (3) What He is in the operations of His Spirit upon His people, that they are made meek, harmless, and lowly as doves."

MICAH—Who is this? This is very significant of Him, who, when He came unto His own, His own received Him not. They knew not who He was! and when He appeared among them, riding on an ass, all Jerusalem was moved, saying, "Who is this?" (Matt. xxi. 10.) Perhaps there is something connected with this name wrapped up in the prophecy of Isaiah (lxiii. 1) commencing thus:—"Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in His apparel, travelling in the greatness of His strength? I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save."

NAHUM—Comforter, is surely applicable in an especial manner to Him whose name is > "A balm for every wound,

> A cordial for our fears;"

and whose chief delight it is to comfort His people, and whose desire is to hear their cry, and to answer them. When He unrolled in the synagogue of Nazareth the great prophecy of Isaiah, in which He was foretold as the Messiah, among the various offices which He was to fulfil, was this: "To comfort all that mourn" (Isa. lxi. 2).

HABAKKUK—An Embracer. And what is Jesus to the lost and the wretched? Who stretches out His arms ready to receive the outcast? who embraces with purest love the fallen and unfortunate — the miserable and forlorn? How appropriate therefore is the name Habakkuk to Him who seeks and saves the lost, and whose cry is, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

ZEPHANIAH — Concealed of Jehovah, points directly to the "great mystery of godliness," which had been hidden from the foundation of the world. Was not the incarnate God concealed from the eye of man? Was not Jesus when born concealed in Egypt? Was He not concealed for thirty years? and even when He publicly appeared among men, His nature and mission were concealed from many. And they were peculiarly blessed whose eyes saw, and whose minds understood what then was revealed to them. We are only happy when our life is hid with Christ in God.

HAGGAI—My Solemn Feast. And is Jesus not such to every true believer? Does not every true believer feast on Him, appropriate Him to his own soul's comfort and life? This feast is not carnal; it is purely and essentially spiritual. It is to be enjoyed daily, not merely in sacramental moments, but in spiritual power. Hence the true believer prays that Christ may dwell in his heart by faith—the only way in which He can dwell in the heart. Hence, further, the believer prays that Christ may dwell in him, and he in Christ; and as the only way in which he could possibly hope to dwell in Christ is spiritually, therefore the only way in which he hopes and prays for Christ's indwelling in his own heart is spiritually. At the contemplation of this, Haggai, "my Solemn Feast," becomes a prophet doubly dear to every true believer.

ZECHARIAH—Remembrance of Jehovah. When Jehovah looks upon Jesus, He is put in remembrance of all His suffering; just as the blood of sprinkling on the Passover-night put the destroying angel in remembrance of the act of saving faith on the part of the inmates of such houses as were so sprinkled. "Put me in remembrance" by no means supposes forgetfulness on the part of God. It is a means to an appointed end; and if we be saved, it must be by means of our Zechariah.

MALACHI—My Messenger, is the name of a book pointing out John the Baptist as the Messenger who was to go before the Lord, making His paths straight. Still, I think, we shall lose much of the beauty and teaching of the book if we overlook the truth enunciated by St. Paul, that Jesus is the Apostle (the Sent One, the Messenger of God), as well as the High Priest of our profession. He is to us a Messenger for good, and from God, and therefore the true "Malachi."

We may thus see how a deep meaning underlies the word of prophecy. Jesus seems to be the great theme of prophecy. Although the prophets frequently spoke of present things, yet there was a pregnancy of meaning in their words which they themselves at the time did not in every instance understand. We should bless God for their writings, and should read them carefully and endeavour, by the aid of the Spirit who first inspired these writings, to comprehend them in all their fulness; and if the attempt now made to introduce more readers to the sacred oracles of God should be successful, the pleasure which I have already felt will be increased tenfold. Without God's blessing on His own Word, vain will be the teaching of man. May God, for Jesus's sake, bless His own Word to our endless joy!

CHAPTER XIV.

A HARD LIFE.

MRS. AUSTIN received Philip with her usual gracious calm, but he was not to be soothed by it; and it was not long before she noticed his irritability, restlessness, and gloom. They set to work as usual, but Philip's gloom and restlessness increased, and affected Mrs. Austin, in spite of herself.

Their joint labours were drawing to a close. The box whose contents they were engaged upon was the last save one. At the bottom of it Philip came upon a legal-looking document tied with red tape, and looking at the endorsement found it to be the draft of a marriage settlement, sketched out by Mr. Austin on behalf of his wife. "This you had better keep with your other papers," he said, handing it over to his companion.

She looked at it. "I do not suppose it is of any use," she replied, after glancing over it. This was afterwards altered; her voice was agitated. "Will you tear it up?" she added.

He proceeded to do so, when a letter fell out of the folds of the paper and fluttered to the floor.

Mrs. Austin caught it. "A letter of my father's," she said, looking at it. "Poor father!" she murmured, with a look of profound pity.

"Was he unfortunate?" said Philip, "for if so we have this too in common."

"Very," she answered. "He became bankrupt; not a splendid bankrupt, like those who led him into speculation, whose wives had handsome settlements,

"'I am so sorry,' she murmured"—p. 123.

and never dropped their carriages, or put a stop to their engagements, because their husbands could not pay a tithe of what they owed. He was a broken man, and died a clerk in the office of a tradesman."

"Which was a great deal more honourable, Mrs. Austin," said Philip, "than if he had done as those you mention, and secured himself at the expense of his creditors. The easy release from debt which dishonest men may obtain is a public scandal. It is lowering the whole tone of public morality. Peers take the lead in insolvency nowadays. Every peer who enters the Bankruptcy Court should come out of it stripped of his titles and honours at the least. It is the honest man who loses everything, and to him bankruptcy can hardly be embittered."

"It was very bitter to us, Mr. Tenterden. We were an exceedingly attached family, and felt keenly for each other, and especially for our father, who broke down completely. He had not the kind of power which resists pressure."

"Did he die before your marriage?" asked Philip.

"No," she answered; "it bought him a year or two of repose."

Philip looked the question he did not ask.

"My marriage secured to my parents a hundred a year," she said quickly. "My mother has it still."

"Oh, I see!" exclaimed Philip.

Mrs. Austin looked distressed. "There was no undue pressure put upon me," she explained. "I did it quite willingly—nay, gladly; but I did it in utter ignorance of all that it involved. Oh, Mr. Tenterden! good men must despise a woman who sells herself for so much money—that was what I did."

"The woman is despicable enough," said Philip, "who does it to obtain for herself the things that money will buy—meats, drinks, dresses, houses, fine company, servants, &c.; but that is not your case, Mrs. Austin. No one has a right to despise you, and it would be impossible to any one who knows you. But perhaps there was some one you cared for which made the sacrifice harder."

"No," she answered, sadly; "but when he brought me here, away from home, I drooped and pined; I could not help it. I became home-sick. He resented it. He was a man of harsh and despotic temper, and he made little effort to win me. He settled into sternness and gloomy reserve, aggravated latterly by severe suffering."

"Yes, your life must have been a hard one," said Philip.

"It would have made me wicked," she said, "if I had not learnt to love him after a fashion. And oh! how I missed him—miss him still! He made the duty of my life; and a life without a duty is drearier than a life without a pleasure."

"That I can imagine," he replied; "and that you at least would shape your life to any duty, however hard; but with a man it is different. A duty which binds him down, and leaves him no room to shape his life for himself, becomes intolerable. My father was not a bankrupt," he said, "but he died wholly insolvent, leaving me a legacy of debt which it will take the best part of my life to clear myself from. I am glad that you should know this, though no one else does; it will explain some things which may seem strange to you, I believe;" and he laughed a little bitterly. "I have already acquired a character for miserliness, but that is a small matter; it is hard, however, that the only happiness I could have cared for, the happiness of making a home for the girl I loved, should be beyond my reach; that I have nothing to offer any woman, and may never have."

Ellen's heart beat fast, and a hot flush went up over her face, as she tried to answer steadily, "She whom you love might think it enough if you offered only yourself."

"You forget," he said bitterly, "I have not even myself to offer."

There was a pause, during which Ellen suffered the choking sensation like something drowning in the heart, which comes with the sudden extinction of a hope which has never seen the light. She sat still, and made no sign till it was gone. Then she said, gently, pleading for that other, "She might wait till you were free."

"She—she is gone from me already," he answered abruptly.

What hindered her then to comfort him? She had the impulse—the impulse to lavish herself and all that was most precious to her in the effort, but the words would not come. It was impossible for her to break through the fence of her womanly reserve. She sat before him dumb and restrained, and never had he been so distant and so cold. Absorbed in his own feelings, he had not thought of hers.

A loud knock at the outer door broke the silence. Mrs. Austin started. "I wonder if that is my mother!" she exclaimed; "I expected her home in a day or two, but she must have returned earlier."

It was Fanny, who, with a shawl thrown over her head, and followed by Ada in similar costume, had come in from next door to speak to Philip.

CHAPTER XV.

PERPETUAL FRIENDSHIP.

ARTHUR WILDISH had dashed up to Hampton as fast as a hansome could carry him. Lucy was at home, and alone. She had been lying on the hearthrug, a great white fleecy one, reading, with Muff, a black, silky terrier, keeping her company. Arthur and she were great friends, yet she hoped she had jumped up in time to avoid discovery, and she hastened to say, "Mamma is out," with a pretty little blush born of a consciousness that Muff and she were a little dishevelled in aspect, as she had been intending to run away and dress for dinner, only her book was too entrancing to be left.

Arthur was rash enough not to have considered what he would say. To have had something to say would have been useful, even if he hadn't said it, closing a few of the many possible approaches to a great subject.

"Have you seen my father?" asked Lucy, innocently.

"Yes, I left him in his room. He will be up at the usual hour," said Arthur.

"And why are you so early?" she asked; "have you got nothing to do?"

"I have come to see you," he answered gaily, and smiling at her fondly; but the gaiety and the fondness being mixed up together, left Lucy quite unconscious still.

"May I run away from you for a few minutes?" she said. "Muff has a fancy for pulling out my pins," and she stooped and picked up a pin with a silver star at the end of it, the neighbour of which was fastened in the plaits of her brown hair.

"No, I can't spare you just now," said Arthur, the audacious, "I have something particular to say to you."

She stood in front of him with clear questioning eyes and laughing lips, and said, "What is it? have you got a brief? or are you going to the bush to be a squatter?"

Nothing daunted, Arthur answered, "Neither the one nor the other, Lucy. I love you——"

"Oh, why——" she exclaimed, moving backwards, not knowing in the least what she said, and looking in her movement like a startled fawn.

"Why!" he answered gaily; "was there ever such a question? because I love you, and have a hundred other becauses all summed up in that; because you are what you are, so sweet and good; because you are like music that I want to set my life to—must, for it will go to no other; because I think we would be so happy that we must make the whole old world a bit happier and better for us. Eh, Lucy," and his blue eyes kindled and suffused as he moved nearer and held out both hands to her, saying, "Lucy, will you be my wife?"

She shrank away still further, crying, "Oh, Mr. Wildish, I cannot—I cannot!"

"Don't you like me, Lucy?" he asked, sorely dismayed.

"Like you—oh yes, I like you a great deal," she answered; "but that is different."

"But if you like me a great deal, you may love me in time," he said, with reviving hope. "I will wait, Lucy; I will make you love me."

"Oh no—no!" she answered, as if she feared the very possibility.

Her little work-table stood there, and she had slid behind it. He sat down on the chair before it, and covered his face with his hands. Was he crying? she thought so, and trembled in the silence. He was suffering, she could see that, and she could not bear to see suffering, far less to inflict it. She drew near to him, and laid a timid hand on his arm. "I am so sorry," she murmured, close at his ear.

He raised his head, and the tears came when she saw his face. It was pale and fixed; she had never seen a face so changed, for she had never seen sudden disappointment and heart-suffering, and Arthur Wildish was suffering keenly according to his nature. Lucy could not restrain her tears, nor stand by refusing to comfort him. "It was enough to drive a fellow mad, though," he said to himself, for she slipped a slender hand into his, and whispered, her face all one vivid crimson, "If I had not loved some one else long ago, I am sure I could have loved you."

Long ago! She had loved long ago, this bright, child-like girl. What was the meaning of it? Her parents could know nothing about it. Was she engaged? he asked.

"Oh no! please do not speak of it," she answered, in the deepest agitation; "no one knows. I hardly knew myself till now; he does not care for me."

"My poor darling!" and Arthur Wildish heaped passionate kisses on the trembling hand he held.

"We may still be friends, may we not?" she asked, withdrawing her hand gently, and with a deprecating look.

"Friends!" he replied; and was going to say, "I will never be anything but your lover, Lucy," only that look of hers checked him, and he vowed everlasting friendship instead. Both were acting in perfect good faith, and a blessed unconsciousness of what the wisdom of the world would rate their proceeding at, and they once more clasped hands over their compact. Then Lucy fled; she had heard her mother coming, and could not meet her for once in her life.

Mrs. Tabor found Arthur alone in the drawing-room, and was not a little puzzled at hearing that he had just parted from Lucy, and was not going to stay the evening as usual. It seemed to her that something must have happened, and she made a very shrewd guess as to what that something was; but she could argue little from the gentleman's appearance, which was certainly graver, but not much more dejected than usual.

On his arrival at home, Mr. Tabor was still more astonished to find Mr. Wildish gone, a fact from which, with his superior knowledge, he could draw only one conclusion—namely, that Lucy had rejected him. The young lady in question delayed her appearance till dinner was on the table, and not a word could be said. She had a suspiciously heightened colour, and a dilation of the eyes which told of some excitement, but nothing more. Late in the evening she got behind her papa's chair, and prefacing her speech with a kiss on the top of his head, told him, what he knew already, that Mr. Wildish had been there, and dashing into the subject with trembling haste, said simply, "Papa, he wanted me to marry him."

"And you wouldn't?" said her father, helping her out.

"No; but we are friends," she replied.

"Oh!" said her father, with some significance. "Well, I am glad you are not ready to leave me for the first jackanapes who holds up a finger to you, though Wildish is an excellent young fellow."

Another kiss from Lucy, and she tripped away from her father to encounter a far more trying tête-à-tête with her mother in the drawing-room, out of which she came forth triumphantly, by reason of her mother's pressing exclusively on the advantages of the match, which Lucy, who really loved her home, and was not discontented with her lot, was honestly incapable of feeling.

Meantime Arthur Wildish, rattling homeward, made up his mind in the midst of his defeat to win in the end. But who could he be—the insensate mortal who had gained such a hidden treasure as the heart of Lucy Tabor, and neither knew nor cared? He cast about in his mind who it could be. He conjured up all the young men whom he had seen at the hospitable house of the Tabors, a house of old-fashioned, solid hospitalities—not of flimsy modern ones, and he could think of no one. Philip Tenterden crossed his mind, but was rejected as too old and too grave. At length he remembered Mr. Huntingdon. "Of course, it's the clergyman," he said to himself, and he proceeded to depreciate clergymen in general, and this clergyman in particular. But this tangible rival gave birth to the pangs of jealousy. He did not know what to do with himself. He dined at a restaurant, and then dropped into the streets, a unit in the vast London crowds, ever hurrying to and fro, driven by all sorts of strange necessities. Life assumed a new aspect to the spirit of the enthusiastic, idealistic young man—an aspect terrible and hopeless. He began to drink the cup of youthful misery, and to perceive the attraction of recklessness and despair.

CHAPTER XVI.

A BITTER NIGHT.

Once more Albert Lovejoy failed to appear at home at the usual hour; and as time went on and he did not come, a dumb anguish, which seemed to dry up her tears, took possession of his poor little wife. About ten o'clock, when the children had been asleep for hours, there came a knock at the door, and she hastened down to see if it concerned her husband.

Geraldine had already opened the door, and was answering some one as well as she could for coughing. When she had shut the door again Emily came forward. "I thought it might be about Albert," she said; "I feel as if something must have happened to him this time."

"So it is about Albert," replied Geraldine; "that man was asking for him, and he has been walking up and down and looking up at the windows for I don't know how long. He looks just like a thief or housebreaker, Emily," she added.

"Nonsense, Jerry," said her sister-in-law; "we're too poor for thieves to be looking after us. But what did he want with Albert?"

"I don't know," replied Geraldine; "he only asked if he was at home, and I told him no, but that we expected him every minute."

"Is he coming back then?" said Emily.

"I don't know. Let's see if he is there still," said Geraldine. "We are all in the kitchen to-night, and I went into the parlour in the dark, that was how I saw him."

They went into the room together, and stole to the window. "Yes, there he is," said Geraldine, in an eager whisper.

A man passed close to the window, and looked up at the house just as Geraldine had said. Emily leant against the shutter and trembled like an aspen.

In a very little time he passed again. Emily did not think he was a robber, but what did he want with Albert? A nameless horror crept over her, and she pressed her hand against her heart to keep it from beating so fast. Then her baby woke and cried, and she ran up-stairs, and Geraldine went and brought her father and mother to look out also. But they saw nothing particular in the fact of a man's asking for Albert, or walking up and down waiting for him. Jerry ought to have asked him in, they said. While they stood he did not return, and they concluded therefore that, as it was getting late, he had gone away. Beatrice had eaten her supper, and would not even stir to look out; but Emily, as soon as she had got her baby off to sleep again, went and stood in the dark at the front room window and watched—watched alone, in spite of her fears, for the rest of the family had gone to bed. How long she stood there she did not know; it must have been more than an hour before she heard Albert come in. She cried a little with relief from anxiety when she heard him, but dried her tears to meet him.

The kettle was singing on the hob, and she asked if he would take a cup of tea. He answered yes, and she set about making it, without noticing anything unusual in his appearance; indeed, he had been looking so haggard and wretched lately that there was nothing unusual to notice.

In her thankfulness for his return, and her anxiety to make him comfortable, she had not yet told him about the visitor, and she nearly let the teapot fall from her hands when that knock (quite a subdued knock, too, it was) sounded once more through the silent house.

"It's the man," she said, trembling.

"What man?" asked her husband, crossly, drawing off his boot.

"A man who has been here asking for you," she answered, not daring to say more.

He did not offer to go, as Emily would fain have desired, so she took the candle and went herself down-stairs to open the door.

The man (for it was he) desired civilly enough to see Mr. Albert Lovejoy.

"He has just come in," answered Emily.

The man actually walked into the passage and shut the door, saying, "I'll follow you, if you please."

She led the way up-stairs, and the stranger followed, passed, and entered before her. "You must come with me," he said, addressing Albert; "I've been waiting some time for you."

Ghastly with terror, Albert sat without uttering a word.

"What do you want him for?" asked Emily.

"He's wanted about a little matter of money that's missing," answered the man. "Don't take on so," he added, for Emily gave a scream as if some one had stabbed her. "He may be all right for anything I know, only I must do my dooty, and he must come alon' with me."

Still Albert answered nothing, but began with haste to pull on the boot he had taken off.

"Say it is n't true, Albert—O Albert! say it is not true. You never took any man's money. Say you never took it, and let him go away," pleaded Emily.

"His saying it aint true won't make any difference, he must prove it," said the man.

"You can prove it, Albert?" she implored. "You are not going away with him."

"Don't be a fool," he answered. "I must go, I suppose?" and he looked at the man.

"No mistake about it," said the functionary, in answer to the look.

"I am lucky!" ejaculated Albert. "Mind," he said, turning to the man, "this is all a mistake."

"It's all a mistake," repeated poor Emily. "I am sure you could be punished for taking up an innocent man."

"I'm only doin' my dooty," said the officer patiently, used to such ineffectual wrath.

"Emily, be quiet, I tell you!" shouted Albert; and looking in his face, white as the tablecloth, his wife read, with a sure instinct, not innocence, but guilt.

Her heart died within her; but her manner, after the manner of women driven by weakness to deceit, became lighter. "Will you take your tea, Albert?" she asked; and turning to the man, added, "will you take a cup of tea, sir?"

"I don't mind if I do," answered the man.

So they stood and drank each a cup of tea, the man pouring it into the saucer and drinking leisurely, eating a slice of bread-and-butter as well; Albert pouring it down his throat at the risk of a scalding, and biting the cup to steady it.

"Where are you going to take him?" asked Emily.

"To the lock up for to-night," answered the man, his mouth full of bread-and-butter.

"Good-bye," said Albert, without looking at Emily.

She went over to him and kissed him. He kissed her again mechanically.

"When will he come back?" asked Emily.

"It depends," said the man, swallowing a last mouthful.

Emily held the door open, and they went down-stairs. "Will you go in and tell them?" she cried, and Albert answered, "No," and was gone.

Then Emily sat down alone; but not to cry—no tears would come, only her poor little heart kept sinking, sinking, sinking, till she could bear it no longer, and she crept up-stairs to the room where Mr. and Mrs. Lovejoy slept, and stole in beside them. In the dark, and kneeling on the floor beside their bed, she told what had happened—it eased her heart to tell it; and then she went away, and crept in beside her baby and cried herself to sleep.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS, FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. New Series. No. 6. Elisha.

Chapters to be read—2 Kings, ii., iv., vi., parts of.

INTRODUCTION.—Ask the children to name some of the prophets upon whose lives they have already had lessons, and to mention for what they were noted—Aaron, prophet and priest; Samuel, called while young; Jonah, the disobedient; and Elijah, the bold. Ask where Elisha is first heard of when Elijah was at Mount Horeb, showing how men are all known to God, and their fitness for any work, as was Nathanael to Christ (John i. 46).

I. Elisha's call. (Read 1 Kings xix. 16, 19—21.) Ask of whom Elijah was a type, and show how he resembled Christ in his choice of his disciples. (See Matt. iv. 18—22.) Elijah of course was well known, and this casting mantle on Elisha a well-understood symbol. Now ask what Elisha's conduct showed. (1) Faith. He believed in this call of Elijah as one from God, and therefore was willing to follow him. (2) Obedience. Many are called, but few chosen. Some say they will obey afterwards, like the son in the parable; others, like the apostles, obey at once. (3) Self-denial. He must forsake all —father and mother, home, &c. Ask what Elisha asked to do. Whether he was allowed. Why not? Probably because the work pressed, Elijah was soon going to be taken away; besides, ready compliance would be a sign of earnestness. So he just made a farewell feast to the servants in the field, making a fire out of the plough-handles and cooking two oxen hastily, and went after Elijah without saying "good-bye" to his parents. Draw from the children the natural practical lesson, that we must give up at God's call all that might hinder us in serving Him; that though we are not often called to give up home and friends, still we are to give up anything which might interfere with our religion. Ask what God says in second commandment, and what Christ says about our love to God. Press home to the children the thought whether any sin, any bad companions any fondness for novels, &c., hinder spiritual life or usefulness. Must be given up, or cannot be Christ's disciples.

II. ELISHA'S WORK. (1) Educational. Ask the children how prophets had been appointed hitherto—by direct call of God. Refer to Eli, who was punished for not correcting his sons, and Samuel, whose sons "took bribes, and walked not in his ways." What would be the remedy when a parent is too busy or forgetful to bring up his sons aright? A further advantage of schools would be that others would be educated too. Now read 2 Kings ii. 5, 15; iv. 1, and it will be seen that the "sons of the prophets" lived in a community or college with their families, and in vi. 1 required a larger abode or college. Here they were trained for their work, and by degrees took a share in the prophet's work of anointing and proclaiming Divine messages: thus, Elisha sent one to anoint Jehu (2 Kings ix. 1, 6). This is the first intimation of schools. The advantages of such a body of well-taught men may be pointed out, especially at a time when the nation as a whole had turned from God. (2) Domestic. Picture Elisha living at the head of the college, instructing out of God's law, holding classes, &c., but also acting as a sort of judge or adviser. Read 2 Kings iv. 1—7, and show how God was with him, and blessed other people for his sake; then read 8—17, and picture his quiet life of study during vacations, or at other times. Show the children how this great man, who did so many miracles—far more than Elijah—was studious, prayerful, sympathetic in feeling for the Shunamite woman, in asking God to grant her a son, and subsequently raising that son to life. (See 2 Kings iv. 32—37.) The account of any of his numerous miracles may be read, and it may be seen generally how like his miracles were to those of Christ—viz., in providing food, helping those in distress, and (as above) in raising the dead. Ask with what feelings this great prophet should have been regarded, and read or tell the story of the children and bears (2 Kings ii. 23, 24). Ask the double sin of which the children were guilty, in mocking at bodily infirmities and want of respect to a venerable prophet. From the fifth commandment, and Prov. v. 20, &c., draw the duty of children to those above them—viz., love, honour, and respect; while from the punishment draw the lesson of the sorer punishment which awaits those who despise God (Heb. x. 29).

III. ELISHA'S PROTECTION. (Read 2 Kings vi. 13—23.) Question the children on this beautiful story. Describe Elisha's life sought by the King of Syria; his peaceful life at Dothan; the city surrounded in the night by an army; the fear of the villagers; the alarm of Elisha's servant; his running to tell his master; Elisha's prayer; the sight of the angels around Elisha; the enemy struck with blindness; led to Samaria; their lives spared by Elisha. Draw out two special lessons. (1) God's protection of His people by means of angels. See Ps. xxxiv. 7—this shows how it is fulfilled. So angel closed mouths of lions for Daniel, delivered Lot from Sodom, Peter from prison, Paul from danger (Acts xxvii. 23), and though invisible are always near us. (2) The blessing of generous conduct. Elisha was hated by the Syrians, and his life sought; he spared his enemies when in his power, gave them food, &c., and the effect was that they came no more (ver. 23). From Matt. v. 44 and Rom. xii. 20 show the way to treat enemies, and the effect—that they will be won over to be friends. Press this upon the children with examples, such as Joseph, Stephen, and Christ, of forgiving injuries, and remind that unless this is done we shall not be forgiven.

Questions to be answered.

1. By whom and when was Elisha called to be a prophet?
2. What three things did his conduct show in obeying the call?
3. How was much of his future life spent, and what benefit was it to the nation?
4. Name any incidents in his life connected with children.
5. What lessons may children learn for themselves?
6. What lessons may be learned from his deliverance at Dothan?

LOTTIE.

A TALE FOR THE QUARRELSOME. IN TWO CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

"LOTTIE! Lottie! wherever are you, Lottie?"

No answer.

"I say, Lottie, I've such splendid news!"

At this announcement a head and shoulders appeared from behind a barricade of chairs with a green tablecloth thrown over them, and gradually a vista of white pinafore became visible, an arm, a hand, and a book. A mouth yawned, two arms stretched themselves to their utmost limits, and a voice said lazily, "Well, Bertie, what's the matter now? what a bother you are!"

"Hulloa, Lottie!" exclaimed Bertie, "I'd no idea you were tucked down in that corner. I thought that tablecloth was just thrown down there. I've been hunting everywhere for you, and I've looked in this room three times."

"What's up?" inquired Lottie, laconically.

"Just this: we're to start to-morrow morning. Jane and Anne are as busy packing as ever they can be."

"Start to-morrow!" exclaimed Lottie, somewhat roused. "How do you know? I don't believe it."

"You needn't then, but it's true. I heard papa tell mamma that he found he could go as well this Wednesday as next, if she could get everything ready, and mamma said she could easily manage that; so it's settled, and if you don't believe me you can go and ask Jane."

Lottie's doubts were speedily removed, for her mamma coming into the nursery at this moment, the news was officially confirmed, and the two children being so delighted that they did not know what to do with themselves, they flew off to Lottie's bedroom to worry the busy servants out of their lives.

They were to start very early the next morning, and long before their parents were awake Lottie and Bertie were up and dressed. They were to breakfast with their parents this morning, and although the meal was fixed for seven o'clock, it seemed as if it were never coming. At length, however, they were seated before a delicious repast of fried ham and eggs, coffee out of cups—delicious breakfast-cakes and fresh butter. When breakfast was over there was a great cutting of sandwiches, afterwards packed into a leather bag with biscuits, wine-and-water, and a charmingly small green glass. What would a holiday be without these delightful preliminaries?

Presently the children were whisked off to don their travelling attire. This was speedily accomplished, and when completed made them look so seaside that you almost imagined you heard the plash of the waves as they curled over and burst in foam upon the beach, or smelt the briny odour of the sea-weed.

Lottie wore a pretty little light print dress, nearly white, made in such a fashion as to dispense with the additional heat and burden of tippet or cloak, devoid, moreover, of the fashionable varieties of polonaise or pannier, Lottie's mamma being of opinion that the more neatly and simply her children were dressed, the more comfortable they were, and the better they looked. Her large straw hat was covered with white muslin, in the pretty and appropriate style now in vogue. Bertie wore a sailor suit of brown holland, and announced to the world by the printed ribbon on his hat that he was a member of the crew of the Galatea.

Off at last in a cab, covered outside with boxes and packages, the first stage of the journey quickly comes to an end. They are at the station. Papa pushes his way through a crowd to get the tickets. Engines are screeching, people running hither and thither as fast as they can go, talking, shouting, screaming, half distracted apparently. In the midst of this hubbub, Bertie beholds with dismay a man run up to their luggage, haul it swiftly on to something like a barrow, and wheel it rapidly away. He is just about to tell mamma when papa comes towards them, catches hold of his hand and hurries him along. In another minute they are in the train, and soon the platform with its throngs of people begins to move slowly away. It is gone, houses follow, then trees, telegraph-wires, more houses rushing by, ever quicker and quicker, till at length they fly by in a mad scamper, chasing each other at a frantic speed. This bewildering pursuit goes on for about an hour, and then gradually ceases. The long train is emptied on to the platform; there is a general move onwards; Lottie and Bertie are hemmed in on every side by an eager throng; down an endless flight of stairs on to a wooden pier, with a glimpse of water running underneath, across a movable bridge, and at last safely on board.

The little party stand watching the luggage being shot down into the boat. Presently there comes a box that Bertie would think must be theirs, only that man had run away with it, and how could it be here? Ah! but there is a carpet bag he knows; a leather hat-box; a bath. It is very perplexing. "Is that our luggage?" he asks his mamma. She answers, "Yes," and he heaves a sigh of relief. "We shall have some clean things to put on then," he thinks; and leaves the mystery to solve itself.

When will the delights of this day end? for it is delightful to be tearing through the water and leaving a white track behind; it is delightful to be munching biscuits all over the boat; it is delightful to be having dinner in that pretty gilded cabin; and it is delightful too, when, hours later on, a rumour goes round that land is visible. Every one crowds to the end of the boat, and telescopes are to be seen in abundance. "Can you see it, papa?" asks Bertie, excitedly. Papa answers, "Yes," and Bertie begs to be allowed a look. Papa arranges the glass for him, and after many vain attempts, Bertie at length catches a glimpse of something very indistinct; but papa is tired of waiting for him, and tells him that he may have the glass a few minutes longer, but to be very careful not to drop it overboard.

"Stay, though," his papa added the next moment; "the glass is too valuable to leave in such hands; give it me, Bertie."

"Oh, papa!" Bertie replied wistfully, "I will be very careful of it, and I have only just begun to hold it right."

"Well, you may have it for a minute or two;" and Bertie is left in possession of his treasure.

"Let me have a peep, Bertie," said Lottie, as soon as her papa was gone.

"In a moment, Lottie." But Lottie was impatient, and snatched at the telescope.

"Do be quiet, Lottie, how can I see if you wobble the glass about like that?" Bertie said, a little quickly.

At this moment Bertie fancied he could discern houses and trees, and in the excitement of the discovery he leaned over the edge of the boat. Lottie, always impatient, determined not to wait any longer, and made another grab at the glass. A little scuffle ensued, and the next moment the telescope had gone into the water. "Oh, Lottie!" he exclaimed, "whatever shall I do?"

"Won't papa be cross!" was Lottie's consolatory remark.

"It was your fault, Lottie—you know it was; do tell me what I'm to do—papa will be so dreadfully cross."

Lottie ought to have said, "Go and tell papa at once," for she knew their papa was much more angry if they hid anything from him, than if they told him of their own free will; but she was apt to be "nasty," as Bertie termed it, and in this case she certainly behaved unkindly. "Don't say anything about it unless papa asks you," she said; "perhaps he'll forget it till after we've landed, and then you can say you don't know where it is, but that you had it in your hand a little while ago, and he'll think that some one has taken it away from you in the crowd."

"Ah! but I do know where it is," replied Bertie.

"Do you? I don't then," said Lottie; "we've got ever so far past it now, and it may be down at the bottom of the sea, perhaps."

"So it may," replied Bertie; but he was very disconsolate, nevertheless, and sat quietly down on a coil of rope at the end of the vessel. Lottie scampered away, full of her important secret.

It soon cropped out. She had not meant to tell her papa when she advised Bertie what to do, but she could not keep it in, and as she quite ignored her own part of the accident, she had contrived altogether to put Bertie in as bad a light as possible.

Bertie's father was very angry indeed—angry at the loss of the telescope, but more angry that he had not been told, and his forgiveness asked.

Bertie never guessed at Lottie's treachery, for she told her tale so hesitatingly that her papa thought she was sorry to have to tell him, but that Bertie had refused to do so himself, and on this account, wishing to spare her any reproaches from her brother, he appeared to find out the accident himself. "I am sorry to be obliged to punish you this holiday-time," he said to Bertie, after he had talked to him, "but you have very much vexed me. You will forfeit your pocket-money for the next three weeks."

"Was that all?" Bertie thought, with a feeling of relief, he had expected something much worse than this; but his father knew that it would be a punishment to him to see windows full of cakes or toys, and be unable to purchase one.

Much as they had enjoyed their trip, none of the little party were sorry when landing-time came, nor when they found themselves comfortably settled in a pretty white house facing the sea.

SCRIPTURE HEROINES.

LYDIA.

"Whose heart the Lord opened."—Acts xvi. 14.

GOD oped the heart: and straight she oped the door
To those who came so strangely on the scene,
Apostles of the martyred Nazarene,
Who to her home the Gospel-message bore.
And "she attended." O all gifts before
God's own grace-given gift, the attentive mind,
Forgetting all the by-past things behind,

And pressing on to the eternal shore.
Not only on that ancient battle-field
World-famed Philippi, soars the shameful cross,
Triumphant over worldly gain and loss.
Not only there do saints their choicest yield,
E'en hearts once "unanointed, unancaled,"
Up to the Saviour, but where two or three Lift in the "place of prayer" their hearts to Thee,
There, blessed Jesus, are Thy saints yet sealed,
There thoughts of hearts long veiled by Thee are still revealed.

MAURICE DAVIES.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER I.

"RUTH, Ruth! when will you learn to pay attention, Ruth?" said Miss Windham, knocking on her desk with a ruler. "I have spoken I don't know how many times."

Ruth turned her head from the window where she had been looking out, but did not answer, except by applying herself to a French exercise with despairing diligence.

"It is nearly twelve, and you mustn't leave the school-room till that is completed," continued Miss Windham. "It is really terrible, your carelessness and inattention."

A busy hum of voices filled the room, and Ruth was far behind all the other girls in her lessons. The clock struck twelve, and immediately there was a rush from the room, which was left empty, except for Miss Windham, Ruth, and two or three of the elder girls.

"Please, Miss Windham, will you let Ruth off to-day? She has got a headache, and I don't think she meant to be careless."

"I don't suspect Ruth of intended carelessness, Mary—indeed, I should be very sorry to think any of my pupils tried to do badly; but why did you not tell me," said Miss Windham, turning to Ruth, "that you were not well? Is it because you think I don't regard your health and comfort?"

"I thought you would suppose I was making excuses, and I hate that," answered the child, raising her eyes.

"Mary dear, take your sister out with you, I don't think she looks very well. I wish you could persuade her not to regard a school-mistress as a persecutor, and as always ready to construe every word into something wrong."

Mary held out her hand to Ruth, and they walked into the play-ground, where Mary was immediately joined by two more girls.

"Oh! Mary," exclaimed one of them, "Dr. Rae is coming to see Miss Windham, and Ada is to have the bliss of seeing him; while I suppose the utmost I can hope for is a glimpse of his dear back, or the top of his honoured hat."

"What a ridiculous girl you are, Letty!" said Ada, laughing. "If I could give you my cough I should be most happy, I am sure."

"Ah! I am so painfully healthy—that's the difficulty; I don't suppose I shall ever need a doctor."

"It is very wrong to wish to be ill," said Mary, "even for such a pleasure as seeing Dr. Rae."

"Everybody can't be expected to be as good as you," rejoined Letty, good humouredly.

At that moment the sound of wheels was heard, and a great commotion prevailed in the play-ground as the carriage stopped before Miss Windham's house. The garden gate opened, and Dr. Rae entered. His appearance formed a sufficient excuse for Letty's adoration. He was a tall man, and well made, with a handsome face, where lay the greatest beauty of his person. A broad, white forehead and dark eyebrows, with deep-set grey eyes, and a mouth that told (if you read it) of a life full of noble determination and purpose, might have charmed wiser heads than any among his admirers in the school. It was one of his first visits to the school; his father having attended there until his death, when the present Dr. Rae succeeded to his practice, and appeared likely to become very popular with all his patients.

Ruth betook herself to a sequestered nook and soon became absorbed in reading, freed from the restraint she so often suffered after school-time was over. She was not to remain in peace, however, for Ada came to her, and said, "Run in, Ruth, you are to see the doctor."

"Oh! how dreadful!" exclaimed Ruth. "I can't bear strangers; what shall I do?"

"There is nothing to do but to go, dear, so I advise you to make haste."

Ruth shyly entered the room where the doctor was, with Miss Windham, and looked up at him from beneath her shaggy hair with a scrutinising and rather a wistful look.

"Good morning, missy," said the doctor kindly, as he shook hands. "Come, tell me what is the matter with you."

"I have only got a headache," answered Ruth, "but I often have that, and I am quite well."

"So you think you have no need of me," said Dr. Rae, smiling. "However, you must allow me to differ from you." He then turned to Miss Windham to make some inquiries about the arrangements of the school, and noticed Ruth's shy manner change to a look of dreamy unconsciousness, as her eyes sought the waving tree-tops and pillowy clouds. It was a look with which a bird, that longed to soar in the clear warm air, might gaze at the sky, but without a hope of flying from its cage.

"I think, Miss Windham, we will forego the afternoon school, for I do not wish Miss Ruth to be overfatigued. What do you think of that?" asked Dr. Rae, as he took Ruth's hand.

"I don't know; but, Dr. Rae, there are only four days in the week when we have afternoon school, so perhaps it would not matter——"

"Why, Ruth, I don't think I ever heard you express a wish to study before," said Miss Windham.

Ruth flushed angrily, and suddenly burst out with, "I don't like school, but I don't see that that is any reason why I should do less than the other girls, on false pretences."

"What false pretences?" asked Dr. Rae.

"I don't think it fatigues me more than the others, so I don't want to be let off for that."

"Don't worry yourself about the reasons of your release; all you have to do is to obey me. Do you understand?"

"Yes," said Ruth, hanging her head, and feeling sorry she had said what she knew must have hurt Miss Windham's feelings.

"One thing I must debar you from, and that is reading," continued Dr. Rae.

"Mayn't I read at all?" asked Ruth, in dismay.

"Not at present. I know it is hard to give up a pleasure; but if you do exactly what I tell you, I hope the sacrifice will not be for long."

"I will see that your orders are attended to," said Miss Windham.

"Thank you; I believe I can trust my little patient," answered Dr. Rae.

Ruth raised her eyes to his face with such a look of gratitude and truth as to make the doctor feel that he was not mistaken; and he took his leave, speculating on the vicissitudes of school life.

CHAPTER II.

In a few days Dr. Rae came again, and Ruth made no objection to seeing him this time. He received her very kindly, but did not seem satisfied with the state of her health.

"Ruth gets tired very quickly when we are out for a walk, and yesterday I had to send her home long before the others," said Miss Windham.

"The air is good for her; but, as she cannot walk, she had better ride. If you will allow me I will take her with me now."

"Thank you, Dr. Rae. Run and put on your things, dear, and be quick."

Ruth obeyed with alacrity, and soon appeared ready equipped for the drive. Dr. Rae took her by the hand and walked briskly down the garden. Ruth was perfectly aware that a group of her school-fellows were standing at the school-room window, and she was glad when they arrived outside the garden gate. The doctor lifted her into his trap and drove off.

"I did not ask you whether you wished to come, because I think it will do you good whether you like it or not," said Dr. Rae.

Ruth looked up and smiled very brightly with the colour mounting to her cheeks. "I like to come very much, I didn't feel as if I had been forced into it."

"Should you have objected to come if you had regarded it as a duty?"

"Oh, no! because a duty may be a pleasure too, but still——"

"What? you need not be afraid of me."

"I don't like people to think I ought to obey blindly, and for the sake of obedience," answered Ruth; "because I think it a very poor authority that is obeyed without a sense of its justice."

"I quite agree with you, but you will find a great deal of that kind of authority which can only flourish with ignorance. The other day I went to a patient of mine, a little boy, and I found him in a state of anguish about taking his medicine, and his mother very vexed with his naughtiness. She had not attempted to explain that it was for his good." Ruth's eyes were fixed on the doctor's face while he was speaking, and when he ceased she still looked at him with a puzzled expression. "I can't answer a question with my eyes as well as you can ask one, Ruth," said the doctor.

"I think you can answer very well," replied Ruth, blushing, as her eyes fell beneath Dr. Rae's steadfast look. "I was wondering why I seem to know you so well," she added, reluctantly, after a pause, as Dr. Rae seemed to expect an explanation. Ruth felt that the doctor knew how it was, but had only half solved the problem herself, and that half was the easy one—namely, that she liked him; "but still," she thought, "I don't feel to know everybody I like so well in a short time."

"How old are you, little one?"

"Twelve and a half," and Ruth looked up anxiously to meet a very amused smile.

"I began to feel doubts of your being only ten when you talked to me."

"Oh, Dr. Rae! do you think I look so young as that?"

"There is no harm in it," said the doctor, looking as if it pleased him. "Why do you object?"

"Because the girls tease me about being so little," answered Ruth. "I wish they would not when they see how I hate it. Don't you think it is unkind and silly too?"

"I should have thought that, if you were conscious of its silliness, you would scorn to mind it. The Easter holidays will give you time to grow a little, and when you all come back to school you will have become quite a fine woman."

Ruth silently looked out over the country for a few minutes, and then she said, "I don't like the holidays, because we stay at school, Mary and I."

"How is that?"

"Papa is in India." There was a great deal conveyed in those four words, and when he looked down at the little figure beside him with her black dress, Dr. Rae felt very keen pity for her loneliness.

"But Miss Windham is kind to you, is she not?"

"Yes. I like her very much after school-time, but I am always getting angry about things—little things—I suppose because I have got such a bad temper. Perhaps I ought not to feel discontented; but, Dr. Rae, I can't help it," said Ruth, tearfully. "Do you think it very wrong to feel so when all the other girls are so happy?"

"No, dear, I do not. It is not a thing to be expected that a life which is suited to one would be good for another."

"Oh! I always felt wrong in wishing for anything else. I don't know what it is I want, but I always feel to long for something."

"I dare say when you are stronger you will have less of those feelings. They are hard to bear, but be a brave little woman and fight against them. Look at all this beautiful scenery, and the clouds, and feel how pure the air is. Can you believe in anything but good in such beauty?"

Ruth looked up with a bright, hopeful face. She did not, perhaps, think all of the thought which Dr. Rae expressed; but she felt strongly enough for it to develop to a perfect thought by-and-by.

Dr. Rae stopped before a house and left Ruth for a short time. After seeing some patients in that neighbourhood, some distance from the village, he turned towards home.

"How about the reading, Ruth?"

"I have not opened a book after school-time."

"There's a dear child. Why, I do believe I shan't have any trouble with you in spite of your dislike to control," said Dr. Rae, laughing. "Are you fond of reading?"

"Yes, very. Miss Windham is often displeased with me for reading when she thinks I should be doing something else; but I hate needlework, and every Tuesday we have a Dorcas meeting to work for the poor. Then Miss Windham is always pleased if we make any little thing at odd times; and I do believe I am the only girl who has shirked doing that, because, you see, I want to read."

"So Tuesday is not your favourite day in the week?"

"No; I am always glad when the afternoon is over."

They now arrived at the school, and Dr. Rae got out, then taking Ruth by both hands, he jumped her to the ground. He held her so for a minute or two, looking at her, and said, "I think you do me justice now, you have quite a colour in your cheeks."

"Thank you so much for taking me. I have enjoyed it tremendously."

"Will you come to-morrow afternoon?"

"That is Tuesday. No, I can't," answered Ruth, shaking her head; then seeing that the doctor was going to press her, she said, "Please don't ask me to come, it will tempt me too much."

"Very well; then I will fetch you in the morning to fortify you for your afternoon imprisonment. Good-bye, little woman," said Dr. Rae, as he got into his carriage and raised his hat, leaving Ruth at the garden gate, looking happier than she had done for many a long day.

Dinner had just begun when Ruth appeared at the table. All the girls looked up as she entered the room. Letty was making as many signs expressive of envy and ecstasy as the restraint of a school dinner would allow. Ruth slipped into her place, and wished most heartily that they would all leave off looking at her.

"Well, dear, how have you enjoyed your drive?" asked Miss Windham.

"Very much, thank you, Miss Windham."

"Did Dr. Rae say he should take you again?"

"Yes, to-morrow, Miss Windham, if I may go."

Ruth saw Letty nudge another girl as she made this announcement, and got very red in consequence.

"Well, Mary, Ruth looks all the better. I am sure it is very kind of Dr. Rae, and I hope you thanked him."

"Of course I did," said Ruth, in rather a low voice.

"That is not a very lady-like answer. I don't like to hear you speak crossly without any possible reason, Ruth."

Ruth was especially disgusted at this rebuke, as she felt that she ought to be in Miss Windham's good graces, when she had not yielded to the temptation of evading the Dorcas meeting. This, however, was unreasonable, as of course Miss Windham knew nothing of Ruth's self-denial.

When the girls were left to themselves after school, Ruth was immediately surrounded by a number of them, all plying her with questions about her drive.

"Now, little savage, tell us from beginning to end all about it. You mustn't be selfish, and keep all his sayings to yourself," said Bella Carden, seating herself by Ruth, and bobbing her face in front of hers to enforce an answer.

"Don't!" said Ruth, pushing her face away; "I don't care to talk."

"Ah, she won't tell because he paid her too many compliments!" cried Bella; "she will become too proud to speak to us at all soon."

"I would not ask her any more if I were you, Bella, or she will think too much of his admiration. Perhaps he doesn't know what a temper she has," put in Lydia.

"How dare you say that?" exclaimed Ruth; "you are not worthy to live in the same world with Dr. Rae."

A roar of laughter succeeded this speech, and Ruth immediately felt that she had given her tormentors scope for far more teasing than she had suffered yet. With difficulty she kept from crying.

"Lydia, you ought not to tease her so," said Letty, suddenly.

"Miss Letitia Heath, I believe I have had the honour of hearing some words pass those lips which might be called teasing, before now," retorted Lydia, curtseying.

"Never mind, I am sorry now," answered Letty, with a glance at Ruth, who was dismally looking out of window. "How can the poor little thing enjoy her drives if she knows she must be teased after them?"

"Well, if the little savage appreciated her position, she could not help talking about it, that's a fact," said Bella. "As for Miss Letty, she's a hypocrite—eh, Lydia?" and the two girls giggled a little together, and then Bella went to practise on the piano, playing light drawing-room pieces with a great many flourishes and some disregard to harmony, as her hands scrambled over the keys.

"Ruthie dear, do you hate me?" asked Letty, quietly.

"No," and Ruth held up her face and kissed Letty in a very friendly way; "you don't tease me unkindly."

The next morning Ruth had her drive, and several others after it, all of which she enjoyed thoroughly, and they did her a great deal of good. Mary was very pleased to see how Ruth's manner changed from one of listlessness to brightness, though she still frequently got into hot water with Miss Windham, and seemed no more likely to enjoy her school life. Mary did not quite understand Ruth's behaviour, and never encouraged her to open her heart about her troubles, as she entirely disapproved of Ruth's rebelliousness. Mary was very kind in screening Ruth, when she could, from the consequences of her faults, though Ruth felt that Mary all the time was as distant from excusing any misconduct as Miss Windham herself.

THE CHURCH AND HUMAN SOCIETY.

II.—THE FATHERHOOD OF GOD.

BY THE REV. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., PRINCIPAL OF KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON, AND CANON OF WORCESTER.

"I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named."—Eph. iii. 14, 15.

WE have already considered the lower aspect of the teaching of the Gospel, and the lower element in the constitution of the Church of Christ. We have dwelt, first, on the reality of a natural brotherhood, binding all men together; next, on the terrible divisions and hostilities of our actual society, so breaking the bonds of that brotherhood, that it seemed almost a dream; then, on the vain attempts to heal these divisions by the stern remedies of law, or even by a merely national sense of public spirit and duty; lastly, on the true and only remedy—to be found in the religious sense of brotherhood, which is the lower part of the mission of the Church, and which the Church must bring home more powerfully and more fervently, if she is to do her high duty to society—nay, if that society itself is to endure.

It is a great and intricate problem. If you take the celebrated triple formula of "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity," the proclamation of which once shook Europe to its very base, you will see that no one of its terms exists simply and without balance. If there is sacred liberty, there is also a sacred authority; if there is equality of rights, there is also universal inequality of gifts and of merits; if there is fraternity, yet that fraternity must allow for a perfect freedom and individuality, which is to be harmonised with it and not drowned in a bare startling unison. How shall we find the true key to these apparently conflicting requirements, and so untie the knot, which to cut were ruin and disaster?

The truth is that, if we try to set up this brotherhood of men alone and in itself, it will never be thoroughly realised; partly because it has no sufficient vitality within to throw off the poison of moral evil and human folly; partly because it does not satisfy the whole of man's needs, or go down to the very depths of his nature. There must (to use the old, well-worn metaphor) be a fulcrum outside the world, if this world is to be moved.

But the Church never does regard this human brotherhood alone and in itself. There is a far higher truth on which it depends. In the last discourse of our Lord to His disciples, on the eve of the Passion, we read His command to the Church, couched in this simple language—"Be ye witnesses of me," by the power of the Holy Spirit, who shall Himself "bear witness," first to you, and then, through your life and lips, to others. To be "witnesses of Christ"—what is that but to say, "Our Father," to tell of a real Fatherhood of God, revealed and manifested in Christ to every child of man? Why did He come down from heaven to take our flesh upon Him, if not to show us that man, weak and sinful as he is, was yet made in the image of God, and born to the Sonship of God; and that this birthright, forfeited by sin, His mercy was to restore in Christ? Why did He suffer on the cross, after His earthly life of trial and witness was over, except to complete the work of the Incarnation, by this second act of the "great humility"—to take away the sin, which destroys all sonship, and makes us flee from the face of the Father? Why did He rise from the grave and ascend to the glory of the unknown region which we call "heaven," but to show that this work of the Incarnation and the Atonement had been accomplished, and that men were made once more the children of God? "I ascend," He said, "to my Father, who is your Father; to my God, who is your God." Through all His teaching we observe, indeed, how boldly He preaches Himself, as no human teacher could bear or dare to do, but it is always as the Mediator to bring men to God, to restore the prodigal and wandering children to the home of their still loving Father. As if with a prophetic and loving jealousy, He disclaims all worship and faith that would rest on Himself only, and not pass onward to ultimate repose on the Fatherhood of God. If, as in our "comfortable words," an apostle —a St. Paul, or a St. John—is telling of the hope of salvation, he is content to dwell on the atonement and intercession of Christ, but Christ Himself speaks not so. He calls, indeed, "Come unto me, all ye who travail and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest;" but He adds, "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son;" or, as He elsewhere says, "I say not, that I will pray the Father for you: for the Father loveth you Himself." Accordingly, St. Paul in the text does but take up the line of witness of his Master. The whole Ephesian Epistle deals with the unity of all men in Christ, the doctrine of the Church of Christ; but in Eph. iii. 14, 15, after the apostle had sought to teach this truth, he feels that all is but half done, and he takes refuge in prayer for fuller teaching to the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ, as to Him of "whom every family" (or, possibly, "all fatherhood") "in heaven and earth is named," in whom alone (that is) mankind really is one family, and understands accordingly what true brotherhood means. It is curious that Comte, the preacher of the worship of humanity, delighted in the old "Imitatio Christi" as a text-book. He was right; for it will be long before any modern philosophy of religion can produce anything like the spirit of self-sacrifice, which comes, in Christians as in Christ, from the living personal sense of a Father in heaven and earth.

It is hardly necessary to say that it is this preaching of God, as the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ, and therefore of all men in Him, which is the one supreme doctrine for the Church of Christ to proclaim everywhere. It is necessary to keep it in undisturbed supremacy; it were almost better to forget all others, than to allow them for a moment to obscure it or to rival it. The Church of Christ is a great organisation for the individual education and culture of the soul; it is her office to give all the gifts which secure and promote that culture, and to take away the suffering and the other external hindrances which impede it. She is, by the confession of all, the greatest organisation which the world has yet seen for the civilisation of men; that is, for making all men realise, feel, act upon, their brotherhood to each other. But neither of these is her true mission; and from the attempt to make them so, many a failure, many an error, many a fraud mis-called "pious," many a corruption deadly to Christianity, have sprung. The work of the Church is to bear witness of God. The "Word of God" and "the Spirit of God" are the two portions of her message. So, indeed, it was with every prophet of old; but she can preach these in Christ. The "Word of God" with her is Christ Himself—the Revealer and Manifester of the Godhead with us. The "Spirit of God" is the Divine Personal Comforter, of whom only the Gospel can tell us plainly, whose manifold gifts are the spiritual life of the Church. If the truth of God be preached and believed, then under it all other good things will grow, both for the individual and for the race; but God forbid that by the Church as a whole, or by any of those who now or hereafter shall speak in her name, anything else should be put on the supreme throne of this truth of God! Even for the sake of man—of the human soul and of human society—it were fatal. It is no professed minister of the Church, but a great writer, perhaps hardly claiming the name of Christian, who has declared: "After all, the true evil of our society is that we have too much forgotten God."

It is here that at last we touch ground to which the teaching of mere brotherhood can never reach. That lower Gospel, glorious as it is, cannot grapple triumphantly with the evils under which men groan, for those two reasons at which I have glanced above, and which I now would ask you briefly but thoughtfully to ponder.

No mere philanthropy and fraternity can in any perfect sense struggle against the individual folly and personal sin, which destroy the unity and break up the brotherhood of men. It is in this that we see the weakness of what is called "sentimental" teaching, appealing simply to the affections, which draw men to each other. The real teaching must go deeper—into the lonely and inalienable responsibility of each soul. Look out on the misery of the world, as we see it now under the highest cultivation, and more especially on those terrible extremes of culture and barbarism, of knowledge and ignorance, of wealth and poverty, which so grieve and horrify us at this moment. Where is the source of nine-tenths of this at least? There can be no question that we must answer, "In the sin, which no human system of law, and no power of merely human duty and love, can root out." There is no question at this moment, that—whatever is due to the selfishness of society, at the exaggerated fear of curtailing a misused and death-bringing freedom—the true fountain of all the bitterest of those bitter waters is in the sin of those who suffer under them. Think what society would be—even with all the burden of sickness and bodily pain and death—even with all the divisions and mutual ignorance which inequality of natural character must bring with it—if only the sins of drunkenness, impurity, and falsehood, or if only the minor faults of thoughtlessness, self-indulgence, childishness, could be rooted out. It is not too much to say that it would be changed into a peacefulness, a progress, a happiness, which would seem like a foretaste of heaven. And it is only too certain that while these remain, all human efforts to raise men up, by the action of duty or charity to them, will not only fail, but will often, instead of doing good, do positive harm. "The things which should have been for their wealth will be to them an occasion of falling." No deep enduring good can be done, unless we can bring some power to bear upon this central evil, can bid men arise and shake off the spell of its attraction, and break the chains of its deadly power.

Now it is exactly this which the word and grace of the Gospel can do. I do not know that its revelation is needed either to show men the existence of evil, or to tell them that it does yield here, and that it will yield hereafter, the bitter fruits of misery. Observation tells of the one, conscience of the other. How any man who uses his eyes and his brains can doubt these truths, I cannot even guess. But while Christianity undoubtedly sets its seal on this terrible roll of Nature's witness, there are two things which we want it to do, and which it does. It tells us that evil is "sin." It is not only "vice," as against a man's own nature and happiness; it is not only "crime," as against his fellow-men, as individuals or in society, but it is "sin."—that is, it is resistance to a real will and law of God, a rebellion by men's own free will against Him who gave it. When we know this, then, and perhaps then only, we feel at once the horror of sin, and the hope that it will be conquered, as being against the Almighty will. But Christianity leaves us not to speculation and hope; it goes on to declare that God has not left men in hopelessness to present sin and future destruction. It strikes in with a clear sound, as of an angel's voice, through the conflicts of human consciousness and what men call "natural religion." It speaks of God as really our Father, because the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. It tells us that through His atonement the guilt of sin is taken away, and "there is no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus." It tells us that in His present grace there is power to conquer sin in ourselves, and that no one of us, if he will but "walk in the Spirit," need "fulfil the lusts of the flesh."

And as yet we know nothing but this truth, which can at once stir us and encourage us to the struggle against evil. True, it seems strange to us that the struggle should still go on, and that the spiritual power of Christianity should still be so weak. But it is strange to us only because we have forgotten the warnings of Christ Himself. He told us that it would be so; He bade us not faint when His words came to pass. We feel the sadness of their fulfilment; He sighed and wept over it Himself: but we can leave all in His hand. We know that the power of the Gospel in its word and grace is real. We have seen hundreds and thousands of souls rise by it out of sin and go to the Father, because Christ leads them by the hand, and they know the Father's love in Him. Knowing it to be real, we can look onward in trust to the future, and believe that the chains of bondage will one day be entirely broken, and all rise to the glorious liberty of the children of God.

If we would strive against the evils of our time, save men from themselves, and save society from confusion and ruin, we must not preach a new Gospel, but the old one which we had from the beginning. When we feel its infinite preciousness, we can well understand how St. Paul declared that if "even an angel from heaven preached another, he should be accursed." It is our fault, if the old Gospel of Christ be so overlaid and corrupted, that its life-giving power is choked. We have but to take away all hindrances, and go back to the fountain-head in Him, and we shall find the truth of St. John's declaration—"This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God," and that we are sons of God in Him?

And this leads us on to the second reason why no other than this preaching of the Fatherhood of God can overcome evil and save humanity. It is this, that all lower teaching fails to answer all the aspirations and needs of the soul. It seems to be a law of our being that no man can ever fill any sphere properly, unless he knows how to go beyond it. No man, for example, can teach all he knows; he must have some untouched reservoir of knowledge beyond his teaching, if that teaching is to be masterly and simple. No man can do perfectly the work of his handicraft or trade or profession, if he lives entirely in its groove, and knows nothing of wider culture and deeper humanity beyond it. And so it seems that no man can live up to his full humanity in this world, and his relations to his fellow-men, if he never goes beyond these. There is much, we know, in the secrets of our own soul which these earthly things do not satisfy, for which no work in this world gives full scope, and with which no human companionship or tie has anything to do. Man may deny himself for the sake of others, in the sense of sacrificing himself; but he cannot deny himself in the sense of ignoring himself for them; for there is a region, and that the most wonderful region of his consciousness, in which he is alone. And this loneliness of soul is most especially felt by the choicest spirits of mankind, those in whom humanity is most perfect, and who feel most deeply and intensely the reality of the bonds which bind all men together. They need a higher truth than the brotherhood of men to satisfy the wants of their inmost consciousness.

Nor is this all. It is a matter of historical fact that man can never be contented with the brief present; he must ask—he will ask—the great question, of what shall be his future? It is vain to meet this question with the promise that his being is to be absorbed into a Straussian universum, or that he shall live in the collective life of humanity: for man is conscious of a self, an individual self, which is sacred and indestructible; and even with but little light, in spite of all the powers of darkness, he will believe in some immortality, for which it was made. If we are to make men true men, it is certain that we must enter into the shrine of this inner consciousness; we must speak to this sense of a living above and beyond this world.

Need any one go about to prove that these two conceptions are precisely the features of a Christian faith in God? If we are really His children—that is, if we have His image in us, and if we have His constant communion with us—evidently in this we learn the sacredness of every individual soul, and we find that on which it can rest now, on which it can depend for the hereafter. It is by no accident that the belief in our own spiritual and immortal nature has always varied directly as the knowledge of God. It was the want of that knowledge which made the noblest Greek speculations on immortality so vague and shadowy; it was its presence which gave such solidity of conviction to the less keen-sighted and subtle mind of the Jew. "Sons of God," "heirs of heaven," are terms which always go together. "God is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living," is the ultimate truth, on which our Lord Himself bases our hope of immortality.

But is it too much to say that in Christ alone this knowledge becomes clear and steadfast? If we are "taught by Christ," and believe Him, when He speaks of the heavenly things which He alone knows—if we "learn Christ," seeing who and what He is, and entering into the mystery of mysteries, God and man made one—then we have a teaching which fills the whole soul and pervades the whole life. When we "know God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," then are we "strengthened by His Spirit in the inner man."

Again, I say that this is the message which the Church of Christ has to proclaim. Do not fancy that it is too high except for the choice spirits of humanity—too high for the toiling and suffering thousands of the ordinary type. You will find that there is no wretched abode of ignorance and sin, into which the minister of Christ penetrates, where it is not welcomed. There is no soul, however sinful, ignorant, and degraded, with whom he has to deal, who will be content with learning what are his relations to his fellow-men and to this passing world, and will not ask, "What am I?" "Why was I made?" "Whither am I going?" How vain it is in such a case to seek to fill that hunger with the husks of social and political gospels, or of any mere human moral teaching! The soul will arise and go to the Father. It is our business only to point the way, by telling of Him who is "the way, the truth, and the life," and who was Himself compelled to say, "No man cometh to the Father, but by Me."

This is the higher truth which is the complement of the lower doctrine of the brotherhood of men. It is the one Gospel of Humanity, because, in the first place, it is the only complete truth; and, in the next, it is the only truth which can be universally realised by man.

It is the only complete truth, which regards man in his whole nature, at once preserving the living individuality of every soul, in which it is and must be alone, and yet giving new life to the sense of unity, in which a man loses himself in the thought of others. Under it alone the two conflicting forces of individualism and socialism can be harmonised. Each man feels the consciousness of his own rights, powers, responsibilities, and knows that he cannot give them up himself or take them from others. But he knows that they are not a possession, but a trust from God, to be used for Him, and therefore for his fellow-men. And we who are Christians have this true life of humanity brought out of the cloudland of abstraction in a living personal form. We have the life of Christ to show us that He only is the true Son of man who is the Son of God; we have the Word of Christ to teach us the real secret of unity—

"She flung herself down on the hearthrug at Fanny's feet '—p. 142.

"I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be made perfect in one." We see how the teaching of fraternity alone leads to the crushing of individuality and the extinction of freedom. We see how the preaching of individuality alone leads to selfishness and mutual repulsion, and, while it pampers our material prosperity, starves out true humanity in us. But in the known presence of the Father of all each is drawn to Him in the fulness of his individual being, and yet all meeting in Him are brothers one to another. So it should be in theory: so, in spite of imperfections and sin, it has been in fact.

Yet, on the other hand, while this truth is so profound, it is yet the one simple and living truth which all alike can recognise. The sense of unity and fraternity among men is one which it is very hard for a simple mind so to realise, that it shall be a practical guide and an inspiring consciousness. When it is grasped at all, we see painfully how it is narrowed, so as to make it intelligible and effective, sometimes within the limits of family and relationship, sometimes within the social circle of class, sometimes within the wider area of an exclusive and arrogant patriotism; or, if this narrowness be avoided, it is the favourite theme of satire to show, how in the attempt to become universal, it is diluted to weakness, and, in the desire to reach those who are far off, neglects those who are near home. But the idea of the Fatherhood of God is one which comes home to the youngest child, and to the simple knowledge and affection of those who are children; and when it is grasped, it at once suggests the brotherhood of men as an inevitable inference, keeping it from shallow vagueness on the one hand, from cruel narrowness on the other. Wherever real fraternity has been recognised, it has been among those who cry, "Abba, Father."

Therefore, thinking of the strifes and divisions of these present days, we would say, "Fight any way and every way against them." God bless those who cast out the devils of individual sin and mutual jealousy in Christ's name, even if, following not with His disciples, they know that name but imperfectly! But God grant us to fight as His soldiers indeed! God grant us in ourselves to know what it is to be children of God in Christ, and then what it is to look on all our fellow-men as His children, and realise the brotherhood of men in Christ, because in Christ we know the Fatherhood of God!

CHAPTER XVII.

TROUBLE.

VALENTINE LOVEJOY had a nature as innocent as it was light and gay. He could suffer privation with a cheerfulness which, to his very differently constituted wife, seemed perfectly insane. He would go without dinner, and make a late meal of tea and bread and herring, with absolute graciousness; a man who for himself feared poverty not at all. Its shifts, to others so painful, and even disgraceful, were to him only little difficulties to be triumphed over by patient endurance, and smiled at when they were past. He had persisted in being a gentleman in the midst of them. Disgrace in the true sense he had never experienced. When he heard Emily's account of his son's capture, lying there in the dark, he uttered not a word. Mrs. Lovejoy said but little. She, too, had a conviction that the charge was true. But as soon as her daughter-in-law left she rose. She could not lie there, she said, and Albert in prison. Still her husband did not speak. She lighted a candle and dressed, preparing to leave the room, when he murmured, "I'm very sick, Susan; give me a drop of water."

There was none in the room, and, with his usual habit of sparing her trouble, he said, "Never mind, "I'll rise too."

He rose, and they went down-stairs together and lighted a fire, over which they sat shivering. All at once Mr. Lovejoy moaned, and his wife looking at him, saw him grow deadly pale, and he would have fallen had she not held him. He had fainted. With some difficulty his wife managed to restore him, and prop him up in his chair, and the spreading warmth of the little fire revived him still more. As he became better, and Mrs. Lovejoy was relieved from the anxiety she had felt while he was unconscious, she began to feel a bitter contempt that he should take it thus, fall down before this trouble as it were, while she maintained herself erect, in spite of the raging pain at her heart. She was not a woman who could be tender in her sorrow, and she was anything but that now; she felt savage with her misery. She would have liked, only she knew it was useless, to go after her son that very night. She chafed at having to sit still there; it was only one degree more bearable than lying in her bed. So the two sat over the fire, neither attempting to comfort the other; Mr. Lovejoy drooping his head, and at length laying it down on the wooden table.

"I can't think what I've done to deserve this," said his wife, breaking a long silence. "He was as pretty a child as ever was born, and I tried hard to do my duty by him; he never wanted for anything that I could give him."

Her husband lifted a woebegone face. "And what have I done, Susan?" he said. With sure instinct he picked up the clue to her tangled thoughts, and found it was reproach to himself. Thus we often know what people think, more from what they don't say than from what they do. "I've been honest and honourable," he went on; "through all our poverty I've never touched a farthing of other men's money, though I've had my pockets full of it, and been like to drop with hunger. God knows he has not learnt dishonesty from me."

"If we had been comfortably off, if things hadn't been so hard, he might never have been what he is. He never could bear to be mean and shabby," said Mrs. Lovejoy, bitterly. (By "mean and shabby' Mrs. Lovejoy meant in the outer man: that her husband had never been mean and shabby, in his most threadbare garments and with his empty purse, she had no comprehension.)

"I don't think he has had a very hard life," said Albert's father. "Some people might think my life had been a hard one, Susan, for I was brought up in luxury; but it hasn't; you've never heard me murmur: it has been very happy till now. When the children were young, Susan, do you remember how happy we were, if we could only make ends meet and get bread and cheese? When we went to Greenwich Park on a summer Sunday, and ate our dinners under the old tree, and fetched water from the well to drink, we were happy enough, and there wasn't a prettier set of children on the ground than ours. Yes, we were happy then."

Accustomed as she was to his ideas, Mrs. Lovejoy stared at him; she could not remember the happiness. She could remember her husband proposing the park and bread and cheese, and no need to cook a dinner, because there was none to cook. She had never been happy, she thought, and truly; for to her happiness consisted of purchasable commodities, and she had never been able to purchase them in sufficient quantities. Even her stomach, temperate though she was, rose at cold water with chalk in it, and preferred London stout. She wanted to see her children well clad and well shod, rather than down at the heel, and dancing in the sunshine. It was the same life she and her husband were looking at, and yet how different! the one saw all its squalor and dinginess, all the manifold unpleasantnesses of its poverty; the other dwelt upon its glimpses of sunshine and radiance, the beauty of his little children, and all the unpurchasable pleasures.

Mrs. Lovejoy was by no means a bad woman; she was not even a coarse woman, but she had not a spark of imagination. He, weak as he was, had abundance of that Divine gift; it was this that had redeemed him, and not as his wife thought befooled him. Without it he would have been equally weak and far more worthless; and as men cannot live without pleasure of some sort, he might have been such another as his son Albert.

The haggard couple sat and talked at intervals throughout the bitter night; they talked of him, and of their other children, whom the mother alternately defended and abused. They were of very mixed characteristics, from hard, cold, selfish Beatrice, to Ada, whose affections centred in her father, and were of passionate intensity. The mother's favourite was Geraldine, who had a strong sense of duty, quickened by imagination—a sense of duty which was always triumphing over her inclinations.

"I don't know what's come to Beatrice," her mother murmured on; "I think there is some young man in the case, and that she wants to get married. God forgive me, but I wish almost that her child may give her as sore a heart as she has given me."

"Hush, Susan!" said her husband, "don't wish ill to your own child."

"There's Jerry," she replied, "the best of the lot; she's got a cough like to split, through wearing a thin jacket, and Beatrice might have given us the money to get her a thick one, and wouldn't."

Mr. Lovejoy could only moan his grief: these children were breaking his heart.

Towards morning Mrs. Lovejoy made a cup of tea, cheerfully informing her husband that the coals would not last the day, and there was no money in the house to get more. They did not wake the girls till their usual hour; but they were thankful when that hour came and the house was again astir, and the voices of Albert's children were heard up-stairs. Emily brought them down and came herself to see what was to be done for Albert. The first thing was to see him if possible, for Emily did not even know at whose instance he had been imprisoned. On this mission Mr. Lovejoy went forth as soon as it was thought advisable. He wasted several hours among a miserable little crowd, chiefly women, waiting to see his son, which he at length accomplished, and learnt what he chiefly wanted to know—the name of his accuser, and the extent of his guilt.

The story which Albert told his father was substantially true, with the exception of the way in which the money had been spent, and which he persisted in saying he had lost. He was full of the injury which Mr. Tenterden had done him in refusing to lend him his cousin's money. Indeed, according to him, the entire calamity rested on Philip's shoulders. Mr. Lovejoy next went to his son's late employer and explained the circumstances. He did it in perfect good faith, for he had taken to himself immense comfort from his son's statement, that he had not the slightest intention of keeping the money; but the man was inexorable, and swore that, unless the ten pounds were paid down, the law must take its course. It was a case of embezzlement, and he had had too much of it lately, and was determined to make an example. At that very hour he was sending out a short tale of goods to a great company, whose manager and storekeeper he had bribed.

Mr. Lovejoy came away as miserable as he had been hopeful in going to this man. He was faint, for he had traversed dreary miles on foot, and he returned to the penniless little household utterly exhausted. Emily got him some food; but he was unable to eat it. He seemed completely broken down, and his daughter-in-law took him up-stairs and made him lie down.

Ada's coming on that afternoon was hailed with joy by all the family. Ada was soft and almost supine on ordinary occasions, but she had a way of rising to emergencies. She went and sat beside her father, and made herself mistress of the whole story. Then she proceeded to act. She took up a burning hatred against Philip Tenterden as the cause of all this suffering, and seeing that the immediate issue was the getting of this ten pounds, she set off, determined that he should be made to disburse it, with every possible ignominy. She was but a child, without notion of complicated motives, and with a pure and passionate will, which on occasion could carry all before it.

She had no sooner got home than she poured her story into Fanny's ears, and Fanny, knowing where Philip was to be found, permitted herself to be dragged at once into his presence.

CHAPTER XVIII.

NEGATIVES AND POSITIVES.

"I CAME in to speak to you, Philip," gasped Fanny; "I knew you were here.

"You could have sent for me," he replied, not very graciously.

"It's about Albert," she returned.

"Had you not better wait, and I will come in when I leave Mrs. Austin? It was my intention to do so," he said.

Fanny looked at Ada, as if for inspiration; but she had been smitten on entering the room with her usual childish shyness, and shrank behind her cousin.

"Go into the dining-room, Fanny, if you want to consult Mr. Tenterden," said Mrs. Austin. She was aware of Fanny's difficulties already.

Philip said, "Thank you," and led the way into the opposite room, and Ada was left behind—a proceeding which she did not at all approve.

Mrs. Austin tried to find something to say to her, but failed. Nothing but a faint monosyllable could be got out of her. Happily she could still be treated as a child, and left in silence if she did not choose to talk.

The interview in the next room was, however, prolonged, and Ada's pent-up feelings found relief in an angry sob.

"What is the matter, dear?" said Mrs. Austin, going over to her. "What has distressed you? Are you ill? Can I do anything for you?" She asked her questions out of simple tenderness, not at all anticipating the embarrassing answer.

"He has all my cousin's money, and he will not let her have any of it," burst from the girl's pale lips.

"Who?" said Mrs. Austin, mechanically; "Mr. Tenterden?"

"Yes, Mr. Tenterden."

"You do not understand matters of business," said Mrs. Austin, soothingly. "Mr. Tenterden will do what is right."

"My brother is in prison, all through his fault!" said Ada.

Mrs. Austin was aghast at the girl's unexpected revelations. She would have kept them back if she could; and she hastened at once to put a stop to them. "I think you must be mistaken," she said; "but at any rate you must not speak in this way: it might do more harm than you are aware of."

Just then Fanny returned with Philip, the latter looking deeply annoyed, the former very subdued. She called to Ada to follow her at once, and went off as she had come; and Philip only stayed to explain that he had some unpleasant business before him, and left also. His manner was constrained and unnatural, and went far to deepen the impression which Ada's words had made on the mind of Mrs. Austin. Had she been standing on the brink of a precipice? Was Philip guilty of some secret wrong, and unworthy to be loved or trusted? She had caught glimpses of his mind which revealed a higher and purer standard of right than most. If he was not to be trusted, there was no one worthy to be trusted. All life was a lie—nothing was true, nothing was pure, nothing was holy. Ellen passed through hours of deepening anguish, tormented by thoughts like these. Hour after hour she sat in her lonely room, like a woman turning to stone, and at length there breathed through her pale lips the prayer—"Give me something to love, or let me die."

Ellen Austin was more to be pitied than blamed for the distrust which had so readily taken possession of her spirit, for she had seen too much of the untrustworthy side of human character; but in the daylight, she reproached herself severely for entertaining such thoughts. She was, however, so depressed and unhappy that she sat down and wrote to her mother, begging her to return as soon as possible; and knowing that she was already heartily tired of "dear Julia's," that might mean as soon as the earliest train could bring her.

Philip immediately set about obtaining the release of Albert Lovejoy, which he accomplished without much difficulty on the payment of the ten pounds and the legal expenses incurred. The virtuously indignant employer considered this a much more satisfactory process than that involving the trouble and worry of prosecution, and the loss of his money besides, and willingly agreed to stop proceedings.

Though glad enough to be set at liberty, Albert Lovejoy was by no means grateful to the instrument of his liberation. Of course, he would never have been imprisoned at all if Philip had given him the money, as he ought to have done, therefore the effects of that stain upon his character were to be laid at Philip's door. That was Albert's way of looking at it, and more or less the way in which the whole family looked at it; for though they knew him well enough to be able to give him a full share of private disapprobation, still he was one of them, and it was not in human nature to approve of any one who had injured him, Philip was henceforth to be regarded as the enemy of the house; and he was thus regarded by none more than by Ada, whose antagonism to him was more marked than that of any other member of the family.

Fanny had come to be very fond of her young cousin, though the girl at first made not the slightest pretence of affection for her. Indeed she showed plainly that her only care was for those she had left, and she acted as a perfect conduit through which Fanny's money and Fanny's goods might find their way to them. But she gave very little other intimation of what was passing in her mind; questioning endlessly, but very seldom volunteering any opinion. Fanny was never tired of admiring the girl's dexterity in everything that could be accomplished by hand; the multitudinous pieces of fancywork, strewed up and down the house, grew and flourished. There was nothing she couldn't do with needle and thread and scissors, and other like implements, picking up the most elaborate patterns in a moment. And Ada's mind was as dexterous as her fingers; it gave her not the slightest trouble to adapt herself to all her surroundings, to fall in with the minutest requirements of a new code of manners. If she had been suddenly transformed into a princess, it would have been impossible to tell that Ada had not been born to the purple, she took everything about her in the world so simply and grandly.

Fanny took her with her everywhere; she had been several times in at Mrs. Tabor's, and Lucy, who had been attracted by the pale, perfect face and great grey eyes, carried her off one day into her own room, where she entertained her particular friends. It was a pretty little room, lined with books and pictures, and filled with every conceivable variety of nicknack; a case of ferns in one window, a tank of gold fish in the other; a lovely azalea blossoming here, and a pot of tulips there.

Ada looked round her with interest, and Lucy seated her in a rocking-chair, and began to talk to her. Ada was two or three years younger than Lucy, but incalculably older in her knowledge of life.

"Are you fond of music?" said Lucy, making a beginning.

"Yes," replied Ada, simply.

"Perhaps you only like it when it is very good. I like playing and singing to myself, but I am not a first-rate musician. Do you like reading?

To this came the unexpected answer, "No," given quite unhesitatingly.

"I don't mean hard reading," said Lucy, smiling, "but tales and novels. Perhaps there are some of mine you have not read."

"I don't care for tales at all," said Ada. "What is the use of reading what is not true?"

Lucy could not know that Ada's experience of tales was confined to those of a rather low kind, patronised by Beatrice. The answer gave Lucy a great respect for her young companion, for reading novels was a weakness which she had to guard against by restricting the enjoyment to the least useful portion of her day.

"I like to read useful books," added Ada, still further increasing Lucy's respect.

"History?" suggested Lucy.

"Yes, if I could be sure it was true."

Lucy broke into a merry laugh.

Ada smiled gravely. "I like best to know how people live," she said.

Lucy regarded her with smiling astonishment.

"Have you lived all your life here?" said Ada.

"No, not all my life; I remember living in Finsbury Square."

Ada knew where that was. "Do you like this better?" said Ada.

"Oh yes, we have a garden here, and lovely walks all round."

"That is like the little church on the hill," said Ada, pointing to a picture.

"It is a drawing of mine," said Lucy.

"I should like to learn to draw," said Ada.

"I might help you a little," said Lucy; "and here is a little book," (and she took down Mr. Ruskin's "Elements,") "which would help you a great deal."

"Thank you," said Ada, quietly, and standing up to examine a statuette.

"That is Florence Nightingale with her lamp, and this is a reduced copy of the Venus of Milo."

"I like that best," said Ada, pointing to the latter.

On the mantelshelf were several photographs on small stand-frames.

"Do you know this gentleman?" said Ada, quickly pointing to one of Philip—certainly a very flattering one, for a bright smile illumined the whole face.

"Yes; he is my father's partner," said Lucy.

"I hate him," said Ada, coolly.

Lucy looked shocked and pained.

"He has all my cousin's money, and he will not let her have it," she repeated." There was no sort of compromise with Ada.

"You ought not to hate any one," said Lucy, looking with pained reproof at the girl, and then pointing to a print of the Saviour which hung in the recess by the fire-place.

"Are you very good?" said Ada.

"You queer child—no," said Lucy.

"I am sure you are," said Ada, taking Lucy's hand and kissing it.

Half attracted, half repelled, Lucy drew her close to her and kissed her forehead. She wondered if this strange girl put every one through as close a cross-examination. She ought to have heard the question Fanny had to answer.

Ada was looking at the azalea.

"Do you like flowers?" asked Lucy.

"No, but my father and Geraldine do," said Ada.

"Will you take this one for Geraldine?" said Lucy. "Come with me and see the conservatory first."

Ada followed. They passed through the dining-room, and Ada examined everything. Mr. Tabor would have been abundantly satisfied with her interest in his pictures. When Fanny went away, Ada carried off her azalea wrapped in a newspaper, and she was impatient to be allowed to carry it to Geraldine without delay.

Of course Ada had her way, and she and her carefully-guarded treasure arrived at home that same afternoon. But she was doomed to disappointment. She unveiled its glories to eyes which were too dull and weary to rejoice in them. Her father sat in the chimney-corner, drooping and despondent. He had never recovered the blow he had received on that miserable night of Alfred's capture. It seemed to have struck the very colour out of his eyes. His beard was untrimmed, his whole aspect dishevelled. Her mother hardly raised her eyes from her work. Geraldine was working, too, but fitfully. Ada came in, looking fresh as the white blossoms in her hands, and set the pot on the table by her sister's side. She kissed her father first, then her mother, and then she went and hung over Geraldine's chair.

"How pretty it is," said the latter, leaning back with a sigh, and adding, "oh, Ada! I am so tired."

"I wish I could help you, dear," said Ada. "Let me do a bit while I stay;" and she took up the work dropped by her sister's hands. "How hot your hands are—and your cheeks—and your breath!" she exclaimed, as she touched her lovingly.

"Oh, Ada! I am so ill," moaned the girl; "I can't eat, and I can't sleep, and I can't work, and nothing but cough, cough, cough all night long."

Ada's great eyes took a startled look, and her mouth drew to a close line as she looked at her sister's altered face.

Geraldine shivered.

"What has made you ill, Jerry?" said Ada.

"It's easy enough to tell what has made her ill," said Mrs. Lovejoy, while she worked on faster than ever; "it's the poor living and the cold nights. She'll never get well if things go on as they're doing."

"Mother, she shall get well!" said Ada, in a voice which startled them. "She shall go to Cousin Fanny's instead of me—this very night."

"What nonsense!" said her mother, sharply.

"No, it isn't nonsense, the same things fit us both, and Jerry shall put on mine. She won't feel the cold through this thick jacket. Jerry!" she cried eagerly, addressing her sister, "couldn't you eat nice things, and sleep in a nice warm bed, and get well if you had nothing to do?"

An eager, wistful assent came from poor Geraldine's parched lips, but she said, "No—no, Ada, I can't take your place. I'm glad you're so well off, dear."

"But you must—you shall!" said Ada, at white heat; "I won't stay there, if you don't. I won't go back again."

"I'm sure we don't want you here," said her mother, bitterly; "and don't go and add to our troubles by offending your cousin. You know very well that Jerry can't go without being asked."

Ada subsided; but the look on her face was one of triumph still. She laid on the table the silver Fanny had given her to pay her fare by omnibus and cab, and said, "Good-bye," speedily setting out to walk the whole immense distance as she had done once or twice before. Nor had she slackened in her purpose by the time she had reached what was now her home. She flung herself down on the hearthrug at Fanny's feet, and begged that Geraldine might come to live there instead of herself.

"Don't you like living with me, Ada?" asked her cousin, not a little hurt at the request; "don't you love me a little?"

"Yes, I like you a little; but I will love you all my life, if you will only take Jerry instead. She will die there."

"Dear me!" said Fanny; "is she ill then?"

"If she stays there, with the work and the cold, and not being able to eat the things we have at home, she will die." Ada fell to weeping bitterly.

"Hush!" said Fanny; "don't cry, Geraldine shall come."

"To-morrow?" said Ada, with a sob.

"To-morrow," repeated Fanny. "Come and have some supper now."

LOTTIE.

A TALE FOR THE QUARRELSOME. IN TWO CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER II.

POOR Bertie very soon began to feel the loss of his pocket-money. There never were so many pretty things crowded together in one place as here, and he could have none of them. During the long mornings on the beach or sands, he had to see Lottie munching away at biscuit or bun, while he went without, or had to be content with the smallest morsel which Lottie grudgingly spared him. I dare say you will think this was a very small hardship; so it was, yet to a boy of Bertie's keen appetite and small years it was a hardship. Spade, pail, ship, or fishing-tackle, all these things were forbidden, for it was for such purposes that he was supplied with pocket-money.

One beautiful day their papa promised to take them for a row. Bertie and Lottie were sent down to the beach, and told to amuse themselves there until their parent came to them. As they passed a fruiterer's shop Lottie's attention was attracted by some lovely-looking cherries. She went in and bought some, and walked along eating them out of the bag, but without offering Bertie any. "You might give me a few, Lottie," he said, after he had spent a minute or two in watching with anxious eyes how fast they diminished.

Lottie handed him one, ungraciously enough.

"Is that all I'm to have?" asked Bertie.

"Yes," returned Lottie; "they're not yours, they're mine."

"You are a nasty greedy girl!" exclaimed Bertie.

"And you're a horrid boy!" rejoined Lottie.

"Well, if you don't give me any you shan't eat them yourself in peace," said Bertie, "for I'll keep on dancing round you like this," and he began a war-dance round Lottie, which effectually prevented her from moving in any direction.

As Bertie had anticipated, she made a dash to get away, and bounded off at full speed, Bertie following close behind. In the midst of the scamper the bag burst, and the fruit lay scattered on the ground. Lottie, when she perceived the disaster, began to cry, while Bertie, who was really not an unkind boy, but was driven into teasing his sister sometimes by her selfishness, hastened to pick up the cherries, and rub the dirt off on his handkerchief, before giving them back to Lottie. There were very few spoilt, but Lottie bewailed them as if they had been worth their weight in gold; but there was a worse misfortune in store for her than the loss of the fruit, for Bertie, on looking up, perceived the front of her dress covered with crimson stains. "Oh, Lottie! look at your dress!" he exclaimed, in dismay.

Lottie did look, and her ready tears began to flow faster than ever. "Mamma will be cross," she sobbed.

"Let us get some water and try to take them out," Bertie advised, and accordingly Lottie's pail was filled, and the stains dipped in; but, alas! they only turned to a deep purple, and spread more and more as Bertie rubbed away.

There was no help for it, mamma must be told; indeed, at this moment they saw her coming along towards them. Bertie knew he had been the cause of the accident, and he determined to take the full credit of it, so when his mamma asked Lottie about her spoilt dress, Bertie at once acknowledged that he had run after her, and made her spill the fruit; although he was too generous to say anything about Lottie's unkindness to him.

Bertie was deprived of his row, for his papa said he was always up to some mischief, and he must be checked. Neither his mamma nor papa had yet discovered how much Lottie had to do with Bertie's scrapes. I wonder whether Lottie felt that she deserved her pleasant trip any more than poor Bertie, whom she could see standing on the beach looking so wistfully after them.

Bertie's three weeks of forfeiture came to an end, and he was again allowed his pocket-money. Lottie was glad enough to borrow of him now, and she took good care to get a share of any eatables that Bertie bought.

Another three weeks passed swiftly and pleasantly away, and the weather, that had hitherto continued so beautiful, broke up, and threatened them with a continuance of wind and rain. Our little friends heard with regret that at last they must bid good-bye to sea and sands, the pretty white house, and holiday-time.

The day on which they were to return home turned out to be a very windy one indeed. Bertie's delight knew no bounds when he got on board and felt the vessel heaving and rocking on the wind-lashed sea. Lottie did not enjoy it quite so much; she found walking rather a difficult process, and sitting quietly down did not suit her at all.

Poor Lottie; before the journey was half over she was in all the horrors of sea-sickness. Any one who has been a victim to that dreadful malady can understand the frightened little girl's notion that she was going to die. Bertie, who was a brave little sailor, and only enjoyed the motion of the boat, could scarcely understand Lottie's illness, and was dreadfully concerned about her, thinking it a much more serious matter than it really was. He stood by her side, holding her hand, and anxiously inquiring every now and then if she did not feel a little better, only too glad to be of use in running to the cabin for water or anything else that might be wanted. Lottie could not help being touched by his devotion, when she remembered how differently she had always behaved to him—she, the elder of the two; but for the present she was far too unwell to think much or to talk at all.

Lottie was carried ashore, looking as white as a ghost, and performed the rest of the journey home in her papa's arms. Very glad she was to find herself once more in her own little bed, with Bertie holding a cup of tea, and tempting her to eat a morsel of wafer-like bread-and-butter. She felt much better now, and could thank Bertie for his kindness, although she had not courage enough to acknowledge how little she deserved it.

But Bertie's affection and unselfishness was put to a still further test before long. About a fortnight after their return the two children were invited to a little party at their aunt's. Bertie and his cousins had been getting up some wonderful charades, and the day of the party was looked forward to with the most pleasurable excitement.

But when it arrived Lottie was found to be suffering from a bad sore throat, which grew worse rather than better as the hour approached. When she knew for certain that she must stay at home, she became quite angry, and raged and stormed till she made her throat ten times worse. "If I can't go, I don't see why Bertie should go," she exclaimed, selfishly; but her mamma told her that she could not expect to keep her brother at home.

Presently Bertie came in from his aunt's, where he had been going through a final rehearsal of his part before the evening's performance. He found Lottie crying because she could not go. He debated with himself a little while, and at last determined to stay at home with his sister, for he knew how she had been looking forward to this party, and what a disappointment it would be to her to be left behind. "I shall stay at home with you, Lottie dear," he said gaily; "I'm not going by myself, I know."

Lottie looked at him in surprise. She, poor little selfish girl, could hardly realise that any one should of his own free will give up so great a pleasure.

Bertie did his best to make the evening pass agreeably; he gave her an account of the charade, quoting the different parts as far as he could remember them.

But Lottie could not altogether enter into Bertie's efforts at amusement. Her brother perceived this, and thinking she was still fretting about the party, tried to rally her spirits. "Come, Lottie," he said, cheerfully, "it won't be anything so wonderful after all, only just like all other parties."

"It wasn't the party I was thinking of at all," replied Lottie, gently; "I was thinking how kind it is of you to stay at home with me, Bertie, especially after the way I have so often served you."

"How have you served me, Lottie?" he asked, in some surprise. Bertie's was one of those guileless natures that never retain or even dwell upon little injuries, and at this moment he scarcely remembered how unkind Lottie had often been to him.

His question was a greater reproach to Lottie than any angry recrimination could have been. It showed her the great contrast between Bertie and herself. "Oh, Bertie!" she exclaimed tearfully, "I am a nasty, disagreeable girl, and you've always been such a nice kind boy; but I don't mean to be nasty any more—you see if I do."

"All right, Lottie," replied Bertie, with more feeling than elegance; "but I never thought you were nasty—except, perhaps, sometimes," he added truthfully.

I think Bertie realised the fact that he had gained a great deal by staying away from that party, though he was too young a child to tell himself so in words. Lottie was certainly altered, not noticeably to an ordinary observer, but in the many small actions which it is so easy to keep from all eyes except those belonging to the person to whom they are directed. And this change in a little girl habitually selfish and inconsiderate had been achieved, not by argument, protestation, or punishment, but by the untiring example of a child younger than herself.

My little friends, is not this an encouragement for you?

AT WORK.

"PLANE an' chisel an' hammer! gaily they flash in the sun!
An' somebody's waitin' to welcome me home when my work is done.
Somebody's hands are workin' for bread for the babes t' eat,
Somebody's eyes are lookin' for me comin' up street.

Plane an' chisel an' hammer! gaily they flash in the sun!"
That's how I used to sing at my work; but that song's done.
Here 'n the lonely workshop I chisel an' hammer an' plane,
Not wi' the old good heart—I shall never ha' that again.

There's nobody waiting at home for me; the cottage is all so lone,
An' the babes—God bless 'em—it breaks my heart to hear 'em moan.
There's nobody at the window lookin' out up the village street.
An' work do seem so hard now; she used to make it sweet.

An' the neighbours, kind hearts! they come an' stop at the workshop door,
An' pities an' talks an' talks—they mean all well for sure.
Calmer a bit maybe I'll grow; but there'll still be the place—
The empty place in my heart, 'spite o' the cheeriest face.

Somethin' 'll fill it? What! . . . Now that she's gone away,
I don't want it filled by nothin'. Never! that's what I say.
Plane an' chisel an' hammer! gaily they flash in the sun!
An' nobody's waitin' to welcome me home when my work is done.

An' when th' ev'nin' comes, an' I wipe the sweat from my brow,
I stop wi' my coat on my arm, an' think how lonely all 'tis now.
I think of her place at the table an' fire, an' her empty chair,
An' the lonely supper a-waitin' for me, an' she not there!

The babes that crowed 'n her arms, an' held to her dress's hem,
Comin' to meet me! How proud I was of her an' them!
I stop at the door as I mind it, an' I haven't the heart to go Back to the empty cottage; it makes me miss her so.

I see the shadows a-gatherin', an' the last o' the settin' sun,
An' I wish the day weren't over an' my day's work done;
The shadows over the church an' her grave an' the fields below,
An' there on the lonely cottage! an' I haven't the heart to go.

* * * * *

An' sometimes after the noon when the village is all so still,
An' there's scarce a breeze a-blowin' the arms o' the old white mill,
Here 'n the quiet workshop a voice I seem to hear,
Just like her voice, dear heart! I count her spirit's near.

An' it whispers o' heaven an' hope, an' says I mayn't despond,
An' minds me I got my work to do, an' tells me to look beyond.
An' the shavin's an' chips fall roun' me: they soun' like angels' wings.
It must be her spirit near me, or I shouldn't ha' thought such things.

Yes! I got my work to do, thank God! Hammer an' chisel an' plane!
'Tis work, work, work, as steadies one's heart an' brain.
Just the same for all on us, maiden an' man an'—wife!
Life wi'out work, I reckon, aint worthy the name o' life.

An' life wi'out hope to hold to!—why . . . better die a'most!
'Tis a ship wi'out an anchor, I say; a gate wi' ne'er a post.
Plane an' chisel an' hammer! gaily they flash in the sun!
Thank God I've hope and work; 'tis that as helps me on.

That's what the passun 'ud say; but 'tis hard to stick to 't, though;
'Tis hard to be left alone! An' the babes! An' to want her so.
Plane an' chisel an hammer! gaily they flash in the sun!
An' nobody's waitin' for me at home when my work is done.

There's her empty chair by the fire, an' the seat by the window-pane;
She'll never come back to them or sit an' work in them again.
But the empty place in my heart, there's somethin' as seems to say
She'll come to that for ever maybe, in heaven, some day.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER III.

THERE was a great deal of bustle on the day the pupils left the school for the Easter holidays. Some of the girls departed in the morning, and the others in the afternoon. Letty lived at Woodingham, a town about two miles off, and said she should walk home, so Mary went with her part of the way. After a good deal of fuss the school suddenly became intensely quiet, so much so that the unusual silence oppressed Ruth with a feeling of loneliness. She strolled into the garden, and fell into a deep reverie. Her thoughts naturally turned upon the Easter holidays, and she recalled the high spirits of all her school-fellows as they joyfully anticipated their treats and merrymakings at home. Letty looked radiant as she started off, and Ruth then felt what a happy home her friend had, and how her own could never be like that of most girls, because her mamma was dead. Never had Ruth realised her loss as fully as she did now, and in the solitary garden she cried bitterly for her mother, whom she remembered with an ardent love, and yearned for so much.

Suddenly she was roused by the sound of a carriage stopping before the house, and started to her feet with the intention of escaping from the garden, but before she had time to carry out her design, Dr. Rae entered and stood before her, while she was doubting whether to run away or not.

"What is the matter with my little friend?" asked he, seating himself, and holding Ruth in front of him.

Ruth looked at him with tearful eyes, and answered, "I am so miserable when I think all the girls are so happy, and that Mary and I have no home to go to. It seems so cruel, and sometimes I wonder why I was born, to be so different from other people."

"Do you mean that you should not feel so unhappy if your school-fellows were companions in misfortune? I don't think it is only because you feel the contrast between their lives and your own that you grieve so. Tell me," said Dr. Rae, stroking her hair; "a trouble shared is only half a trouble, you know, Ruth."

"Oh, Dr. Rae! I shall never see mamma again; how can I bear it?" sobbed Ruth. "When she was alive I had a time I could look forward to, even if it were far off, but now I have nothing."

"My darling child, don't cry so much; try to bear this as your mamma herself would wish, and think that death is not so great a separation as ceasing to love. At least you cherish the past." Dr. Rae paused, and then seeing Ruth still unable to control her tears, he said, "Many children who have lost their parents are for a while in great trouble, but they are happy after a time, and there is no reason to suppose your life nothing but a blank for the future any more than theirs."

"I think I must be very wicked," said Ruth, "to be so miserable."

"Why? It is not unnatural, therefore that cannot be."

"I think that mamma must be happier than anybody in the world, so I ought not to wish for her; but it is very hard to feel that always, when I want her most." Ruth looked up at the trees, and almost seemed to forget her trouble in some dream that the whispering leaves were telling her, and then her eyes sought the doctor's face, and she said earnestly, "I don't feel as if death were so bad now; I have never spoken of mamma before, and now she seems nearer me."

"When I was a little boy, Ruth, I had a sister of whom I was very fond, and an old friend of ours used to talk to us about preparing for death, and made us feel it an awful thing in place of a happy one. My little sister died, and I was nearly heart-broken, but from that time death to me was not a thing to dread, for I argued then that my sister could have no harm happen to her. So you see how out of that sorrow sprang a real good, and you will always find that, wherever you may look in the world."

"And does sorrow spring out of joy?" asked Ruth.

"The sorrow will not last, but the joy is eternal."

There was a silence for a few minutes, and then Ruth said, "I suppose the little sister you spoke of came between you and Christina?"

"Yes; Tina was a little thing just able to walk when Amy died."

"And did you live at the same house then that you do now?"

"Yes, I have lived there all my life, and it would not please me to go away; there is some association with every part of the house. You must come and see us during these holidays, Ruth."

"Oh, I shall like that!" said Ruth, flushing with pleasure.

"Well, we must see about it. I must run away now," and Dr. Rae went, and drove down the village to his house. He drew up at the garden gate, and walked up to one of the windows which opened to the ground. He tapped, and it was opened by a young lady in the room, who kissed him, and then settled herself on a footstool by an elderly lady in an arm-chair. Dr. Rae seated himself opposite his mother.

"What are you looking at me so for, Stephen?" asked Mrs. Rae, laughing; "is my cap crooked?"

"Now, mamma, how dare you suppose such a thing, when I put it on with my own hands? I am very angry with you," said Tina; and she jumped up and kissed her, adding, "Doesn't she look pretty, Stephen, when I scold her?"

"I don't think she can help that under any circumstances," replied the doctor.

"What silly children I have to be sure!" said Mrs. Rae, looking very pleased; "I really am ashamed of them."

"I don't think it is very difficult to trace how we have inherited our silliness—if, indeed, we are silly," Tina said playfully.

"Only see what an ill-used mother I am; all this time my question remains unanswered."

"I have a favour to ask you, dear," said Stephen; "and I was looking to see if I thought you would grant it."

"You speak as if mamma were a demon. Oh! fancy her with a bad temper!" exclaimed Tina, and the idea seemed to tickle her very much, for she laughed heartily, and caused another delay in the disclosure of the request.

"I want to bring my little friend Ruth here to stay during the holidays, and her sister too. Have you any objection?"

"Not the least in the world, Stephen dear," said Mrs. Rae. "They can have the spare room, and I am really quite anxious to see them. When would you like them to come?"

"As soon as it is convenient to you, mother. I want you to go and arrange with Miss Windham, and see Miss Leighton and Ruth; it would be better than my going."

"I will go to-morrow morning. Have you seen Miss Windham?"

"No. I hope she will not raise any objection to their coming, or to Ruth's doing so at least. If she does you must make use of your woman's wit to overrule her," said Stephen, smiling.

"How nice it will be! I long to see your little friend."

Here another tap came at the window, and when Tina opened it a young man entered the room, carrying a number of things, of which he disburthened himself, and then he threw his hat on the table. He was tall, and in figure very much resembling the doctor, but fairer. He had an immense quantity of tawny yellow hair that looked very splendid against his black velveteen coat. His eyes were grey—all the Raes had grey eyes—and his tanned and ruddy face showed that he was out in the sun a great deal. Scarcely more than a boy in years, he had a manly bearing, partly due to a sincere and natural manner, and partly to a well-developed and graceful figure.

"What a lovely day you have had, Maurice," said his mother. "Is the result of your expedition satisfactory?"

"You shall judge for yourself," replied he, and taking his sketching frame from his satchel, he gave a water-colour sketch into his mother's hand.

"This is capital, Maurice!" exclaimed Mrs. Rae; "and is it not a picturesque old spot?"

"That tomb so mossy! doesn't it look beautiful?" said Tina, "How well you have done the cool shade by the church."

"I am very glad you like it, Tina. Will you stand to me for the weeping beauty to-morrow?"

"That is too bad of you, Maurice, to ask me a favour with an insult wrapped up in it."

"I mean well," answered Maurice, laughing. "Nobody can complain of such modest self-praise as that."

At this moment dinner was announced, and they all adjourned to the dining-room. The conversation turned upon the doctor's visitors, and everything was arranged in prospect of their arrival.

The following day, quite early in the morning, Stephen started on his rounds and drove his mother to the school. Miss Windham was rather surprised when the servant announced Mrs. Rae, but went immediately to the parlour where her visitor was waiting. After a few words of greeting, Mrs. Rae told Miss Windham the object of her visit, adding, "Of course it is no actual gain, for change of air, but I dare say the change of scene alone will do the young people good."

"You are very kind, and I have no doubt whatever that they will be delighted to come. I will bring them to you, if you will wait one moment."

In a short time Mary and Ruth appeared, and Mrs. Rae, shaking hands very cordially, asked them to come, almost as if it were a favour that they would confer upon her.

"We shall be so glad to have you, and I hope you will give us such a pleasure," she said, smiling.

"Thank you very much, Mrs. Rae," said Mary, smiling too in answer, and her face becoming suffused with a rosy blush. "It is very good of you to think of us, and I am sure we shall always be very grateful to you."

"And the sooner you come the better we shall be pleased. Can you come this afternoon? the doctor will fetch you, and he told me to say he hoped you would be ready at half-past four."

Ruth looked anxiously at Mary for fear she might say it was impossible, but was greatly relieved that she accepted; and Mrs. Rae then rose to go as she did not wish to hinder them. She kissed Mary; and Ruth, who had not spoken all the time, put her arms round her neck, and won Mrs. Rae's heart by her impulsive gratitude, which seemed too strong for her shyness to overcome.

Ruth continued in a state of restlessness the whole morning, and the only thing she could do, as Mary would not allow her to help pack up their clothes, was to spend most of her time at the piano. There Ruth could forget herself, and her whole soul seemed filled with music as she sang and played alone, when she felt free, but not solitary. It was a lovely sight, to see the little girl, seated in the bright sunlight, her bushy, waving hair falling on her shoulders, with her face upturned, singing in a pathetic and perfectly self-abandoned manner, "Savourneen Deelish." Her voice was powerful and tender, and thrilled as it rose and fell in the quaint old Irish air.

At last the doctor's carriage arrived, and Ruth, in quite a tremor of excitement, said good-bye to Miss Windham and ran down the garden from the house.

"I think we can make room for such a little lady as this between us, Miss Leighton," said Dr. Rae, as he lifted Ruth into the trap, laughing a little mischievously. Ruth did not mind, however, and they were soon going at a very brisk pace through the village to the other end of it, where the Raes' house stood.

EXTRACTS FROM AN EXPOSITOR'S NOTEBOOK.—III.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL COX, NOTTINGHAM, AUTHOR OF "A DAY WITH CHRIST," ETC. ETC.

THE SEA AND THE SANCTUARY.—Ps. lxxvii. 19, 13.

IT is very difficult for an insular and maritime people, such as we are, so much as to conceive the dread in which the sea was held by the ancient Hebrews. To us the sea, though it has its terrors, though its tempests often strew our coasts with wrecks, is nevertheless our pleasant companion, our willing and most helpful servant. It is a main source of our wealth; it is the channel of our commerce and intercourse with the world: it is a wall of defence round our coasts. We love to inhale the keen pungent airs it brings, to plunge into its waves, or to ride over them in sport. It has a large and honourable place in our literature, in our ballads and songs, in our national history and drama. The sailor is our special pet and hero. His bronzed complexion and rolling gait, his open hand, his frankness and simplicity of speech, and even the quaint pranks he plays when ashore, have a certain attraction for us. If we laugh at him, our laugh is a very kindly one, and we are not slow to blaze up in his defence. But to the ancient Israelites —as, indeed, to all the Oriental races of antiquity except the Phœnicians—the sea was a hostile and terrible mystery. To them, it was "that great and wide sea," in which men might so soon be lost or overwhelmed. Although the Mediterranean sweeps along the whole of one side of Palestine, yet the coast has no indentations, no winding creeks, no deep havens, no ample and secure ports, such as are common on the European seaboard. The two harbours, Joppa and Acre, which were its only ports in ancient times, and are still the chief (if not the only) means of access from the sea, are very dangerous; no vessel will ride in them save on compulsion, lest it should be dashed on the frowning, inhospitable rocks. It was natural, therefore, that the Jews should hate the sea as much as we love it; that to them it should seem full of mystery and terror, a cruel ravenous monster, lying in wait to destroy those who might be won to it by its fatal beauty, or its treacherous calms. The Old Testament Scriptures express this conception of the sea, and only this. It is, I believe, invariably used as an image of mysterious danger and terror, or spoken of as a wily and deadly foe. And though we can hardly refrain from smiling at the threat of Moses, that if the children of Israel did not keep all the words of the law, they should be carried back "into Egypt again in ships" (Deut. xxviii. 68), no doubt, to them, the "ships" were well-nigh as terrible as Egypt itself, and the thought of that dismal voyage as intolerable as the prospect of cruel bondage.*

But if we find it difficult to realise their feeling for the sea, their feeling for the sanctuary is almost as much beyond us. In our complex modern life the centres of interest are many and various. We seek amusement, instruction, holiday festivity, health, vigour, comfort, in many different places, at many different sources. But almost all that we get from concerts and spectacles, from story and poem, from courts of justice and legislation and royal splendour, from lectures and sermons, from worship and communion, was found by the Hebrew in one sacred centre—in the Temple and its precincts. Thither he went up to make holiday. There he listened to the sweetest and grandest music of his time. There he first heard any new poem written by the inspired singers of Israel. There he beheld the king with his splendid court, and gazed on long stately processions in which priest and Levite, statesman and prophet, defiled before him in their rich costly robes, while clouds of sweet incense floated through the air, and choir and antichoir lifted his heart to heaven on the concord of their triumphant hallelujahs. There his lawsuits were investigated and decided. There he met his brethren from every province of the Holy Land, and strangers, Jews or proselytes, out of every nation under heaven. There his conscience was cleansed from its defilements, the solemn priestly benediction carrying the sense of forgiveness to his penitent soul. There he listened to the law of the Lord, to the stirring recitations of the brave deeds and national deliverances wrought of old, to persuasive exhortations to loyalty and obedience. There, too, he might chance to meet a prophet, the fire of inspiration burning in his eye, and hear some message straight from heaven, or be summoned to enter into a national compact for unseating a usurping tyrant, or for destroying the idols out of the land.

We need to think of all this—of the strange terror with which the Hebrew was inspired by the mighty restless sea—of the holidays and feasts, the dramatic spectacles and ravishing choirs, the glimpses of foreign men and garbs and manners, the excitements of political news and endeavours; the celebration of national victories and deliverances, which the Hebrew naturally associated with the Temple, no less than the joys of worship and communion with Heaven. We need, I say, to think of all this, if we would enter into the meaning of the words, "Thy way, O God, is in the sea; Thy way is in the sanctuary."

One of these phrases, too—nay, both contain historical allusions which add to their significance. In the closing verses of the psalm, Asaph celebrates the exodus from Egypt. His thoughts revert to the time when Jehovah "led His people like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron;" when, as they trod the margin of the Red Sea, "the waters saw" God, "and were afraid," trembling, and parting to their utmost depths, and the Hebrew pilgrims passed dryshod through the abyss in which the Egyptians were drowned. God's way was in the sea then, His path on the great waters, and His footsteps, washed out by the recoiling waves, are not known. As the Hebrews thought of that dreadful night and the mysterious issue of it, the sea grew still more mysterious and terrible to them, as did also the ways of God. Probably, too, in the other verse, there is an allusion to the fact that God went before them, through all their wanderings, in the tabernacle over which "the pillar of fire and of cloud" rested, and moved, and was their glory in the midst of them. His way was then in the sanctuary—the sanctuary in which Moses spake with Him face to face, and from the sacred "doors" of which the prophet had so often to vindicate the ways of God to man.

These historical allusions, then, at once confirm and define the general significance of Asaph's phrases. They lend them new force. The mystery of the Sea deepens as we recall that mysterious passage through its waters, and the revelations of the Sanctuary grow more distinct as we remember how often God met Moses in the tabernacle, that He might explain to him the secret and purpose of His dealings with the people.

But what have we to do with these local allusions, or even with the broad general significance of Asaph's words, we, to whom the sea is a friend, not a foe, and in whose sanctuary no Shekinah burns? We have much to do with them, but chiefly this, that they at once set forth the mystery of the Divine Providence, and teach us where we may find the key to it. For us, God's way is still in a mysterious Sea, and still we learn the secret of the mystery only as we behold Him in the Sanctuary. His providence is still wrapped in clouds that are often very terrible to us; and still the light shines through the clouds on the worshipping heart.

How many, how inscrutable, how terrible are the mysteries which encompass the ways of God! How often are our hearts torn and perplexed as we consider them! On how large a scale is evil at work in His good world! With what a subtle and penetrating force it pierces even into the purest spirits! How many a modest and fair exterior hides a life incredibly corrupt? If we could but see each other's hearts, and read all the guilty desires, all the mean ambitions, all the petty jealousies and enmities which have left their defiling traces there, who could endure the sight? Nay, who could endure to read so much as his own heart as God reads it, and in His light?

Why, oh, why did God make us thus? Why make evil so easy and alluring to us, and good so hard, so uninviting? Why are we so weak that even when, after much discipline and many endeavours, the will to do good is present with us, even then the power to perform we find not, and in our very attempts to do good we often slip into fresh evils? Why are there so many incurable evils in the world around us—broken hearts that we cannot heal even with our blood, hopeless lives that we cannot brighten, degraded natures that we cannot raise, lost souls that we cannot save, do what we will? Why should men be born with an hereditary bias to vice and crime, and never have, as far as we can see, a single chance of goodness and peace? There are thousands and myriads such among us. They live untaught amid their ignorance, unsolaced amid their woes, with no healing and inviting light of truth shining near them; nurtured in filth, trained to crime, their highest act the worship of fraud or force or lust, their whole condition so dreadful and unfriended, that one sometimes thinks the sins and sorrows of a single court or alley enough to silence all the songs of heaven. And, beyond our borders, in China, in Hindostan, in Africa, in all the habitable parts of the globe, there are whole races whose morality is an outrage on the sacred name of Virtue, or whose worship is a mere riot of the senses.

Why are there so many miseries—miseries past all telling, in the world? Why do the young and fair and hopeful die? Why do the good suffer? Why are our virtues well-nigh as fatal as our vices? Why do the wicked prosper? Why is brute force allowed to trample bright intelligence under foot? Why should vast armies of men be withdrawn from the productive arts and toils of life, to support a tyrant on his throne, or to resist the lust of conquest? Why should the millions tremble on the verge of ignorance and want, while only the thousands taste the sweets of culture and opulence? Why should almost every family have its secret of sorrow or guilt, and almost every heart a wound which no tender hand can stanch?

As we ponder and multiply such questions as these (and in some moods we are very apt to multiply them), are we not, at least for the time, shaken from our customary blindness or indifference? Do we not stand as on the margin of that dark ocean, in whose unfathomed depths there lie mysteries of terror before which even the bravest heart may well recoil? Are we not driven to the conclusion?—"Thy way, O God, is in the sea; Thy judgments are a great deep. We cannot trace Thy footsteps in this dark mystery. We only hear them as from afar, and with a secret foreboding and dread."

We are not the first who have stood on the margin of this mysterious sea, and who have been thus miserably perplexed. Asaph, for one, stood here before us; and he confesses that, as he gazed out on the dark and darkening sea, "his feet were almost gone, his steps had well-nigh slipped." When he sought to penetrate the mystery of Providence, it was "too painful" for him. With dizzy head and fainting heart he crept away from this cruel, insatiable sea, leaving the problems that perplexed him unsolved. He found no relief until he "went into the sanctuary of God." And even then he found a relief which is, I trust, no relief to us. To his stern Hebrew temper it was a sufficient solace to learn that the wicked prosper but for a time; that they are set on high "slippery places" only that they may fall, and that their fall may be the more profound. But, if we have the Christian temper, that, so far from being a solace to us, will only be an aggravation of our sorrow and perplexity. For what chiefly troubles us is not that we are called to suffer, but that humanity at large groans under evils so many and so intolerable; that which we most deeply crave is not exemption from suffering for ourselves, nor even for our immediate kinsfolk and neighbours, but a firm conviction that all the evils and pains which afflict the world have a wise meaning and a merciful end, that there is a final goal of good to which all things will round at last.

And such a conviction, God be praised, is well within our reach. It may be proved, even to the sceptical reason, and often has been proved, that good preponderates over evil even in this present world, and that the evils which for a time vex and depress our life are designed to lead us to a higher and more stable good.

But the troubled heart is often impatient of logic. It craves a solution which appeals more directly to itself. It demands, not a demonstration, but an experience. And even this demand may be met. There is an experience to be had which lends instant comfort and strength to the heart, and makes it independent of the tardier processes of the intellect. If we go into the sanctuary of God, we shall no longer be vexed with the troublous beat of the mysterious sea. In the worship of God, in the blessedness of communion with Him, in the deepening sense of His love and goodwill to us and to all men which worship quickens within us, we reach a tranquil haven of repose that no storm can disturb.

Do you doubt it? Take, then, an extreme case, a decisive test. The patriarch Job not only stood on the margin of this sea, but was tossed on its waves for many months, during which "neither sun nor stars appeared," and "all hope that he should be saved was taken away." "Ye have heard of the patience of Job," and of the terrible strain to which it was exposed. You know how at length its strands parted, and he was driven out on the tempestuous waters of doubt, calling on heaven and earth for succour, but winning no response. Have you not also, at least in his case, "seen the end of the Lord, that the Lord is very pitiful, and of a most tender mercy?" And yet, when "the Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind," He did not answer one of the objections which the tortured patriarch had charged against His justice. He solved none of the problems Job had discussed, replied to none of the questions he had asked, vouchsafed no vindication of His ways. He simply passed before Job, proclaiming His greatness, revealing His glory. Job "saw" God, and that was enough. The view of that perfect beauty and holiness silenced every doubt, healed every wound. While as yet his losses were uncompensated, his pains not removed, his reasonable doubts not met, he was nevertheless persuaded of the perfect righteousness of his Judge, the perfect goodness of his Friend. He bowed in worship and self-abhorrence; he retracted all his doubts and aspersions; he was filled with an inward strength and peace. In short, so soon as he "saw with his eyes," the God of whom he had before only "heard with the hearing of the ear," he passed at once from the wild Sea of doubt into the Sanctuary of a perfect and assured trust.

And have we not all, in our several measures entered into this most happy experience? If we have ever worshipped Him who is a spirit in spirit and in truth, if we have ever had our hearts lifted into a genuine communion with Heaven, if we have ever beheld the King in His beauty and grace, have we not been forthwith strengthened and tranquillised? Have not spiritual intuitions and instincts, which go deeper than any logic, assured us that the Lord is good, that He is very pitiful and of a most tender mercy? Have not the perplexing and insoluble questions which haunted and afflicted us receded to an infinite distance, and dwarfed into petty proportions in that great flood of peaceful light? Have not the waves on which we were tossed sunk into a great calm? Have we not felt the strongest conviction that God's ways must be just and good, and confessed, if we could not demonstrate, or even intellectually comprehend their goodness, that was simply because His goodness was too large for us to grasp? Has not "the great deep" of His judgments thus become a source of health to us, an incitement to intercourse with Him, a new wall of defence round us, nay, round the whole world, instead of a dark fathomless mystery, haunted by threatening terrors before which we quailed? Has not the very "sea" of His providence been transformed into a "sanctuary," in which we were secure and at peace?

But we may raise our thoughts to a still loftier pitch, to a height from which the questions of the perplexed intellect and the demands of the troubled heart are both met in one triumphant solution of the mystery of Providence. "He who is higher than the highest" once took flesh and dwelt among us. As though to show how inevitable it is that men should rise through evil to a completer good, the Son of man endured the assault of all the evil that is in the world. He was innocent, upright, free from guile; yet He was bruised and put to grief. "He was oppressed, and He was afflicted." "He was despised and rejected of men." "He was stricken, smitten of God," abandoned in the hour of His supreme agony. Reproach broke His heart, and He was full of heaviness. He looked for some to take pity, but there was none, and for comforters, but He found none. The one perfect Man, the only Man in whom was no sin, He could yet appeal to all that passed by, "Behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of His fierce anger."

Was not He tossed on that dark mysterious "sea" from which we shrink? Did not all its waves and billows pass over Him? As we consider the story of His life, the wonder of His life, is not the dark problem of the Divine Providence at its very darkest? What are our sufferings compared with His? If we can think ourselves wronged, afflicted with unprovoked stripes, what are our wrongs, or our deserts, to His? Yet out of all that darkness there rose the great light; out of all that evil there broke the supreme good. By His obedience unto death the whole world is redeemed unto God; nay, He Himself, in some ineffable way, makes increase to Himself of wisdom, of authority, of glory. "He learned obedience by the things which He suffered." "Because He humbled Himself, God hath highly exalted Him."

Here, then, we have the crucial test applied to the Providence of God. We are taught, and taught in a method which appeals both to our reason and our heart, that evil is to be overcome of good, that all the sorrows and wrongs of time are intended to conduct men to a good, larger and more complete than that of untempted innocence, or untried obedience, or unafflicted virtue. We see the Perfect Man pass through the deepest waters of the great dark "sea" of evil, into the "sanctuary" of an everlasting glory and peace. Shall we murmur and complain, then, if we are called to tread in His steps, to follow Him through the great waters in which His footsteps are known? Shall we not rather rejoice that we are counted worthy to enter into His affliction, and rest in the assurance that we shall pass through His affliction into His rest and joy? Shall we lose hope for the world because it is smitten with evils so innumerable and profound? Why should we, when, for "creatures such as we are, in such a world as this," the path to the highest and most enduring good runs right through those very evils? Let us rather "rejoice in hope," and in this hope,—that, like the Captain of its salvation, and in virtue of His redemption, the world will also rise, through evil, into larger good, and pass across this troubled and tempestuous "sea" into the "sanctuary" of God, the house not made with hands, eternal, in the heavens.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.

A PROPOSAL UNPROPOSED.

PHILIP had taken the success of Arthur Wildish for granted, seeing that there was no interruption to the friendly relations between him and Mr. Tabor. Philip did not see Wildish quite so often at the office, but then he had gone up to him in the neighbourhood of Park Villas, averring that the air of Kensington did not agree with him. And Philip was not more miserable than he had been before. It may seem paradoxical, but he would have been more unhappy if he had been in happier circumstances. He had long ago made up his mind to the result. He had made up his mind that he could not marry for years to come, and that he could not ask Lucy in her first bloom and freshness to waste those years in waiting for him, already a jaded man, even if the result of such asking had been sure, which to him it did not by any means appear. He felt doubtful whether she had ever cared for him at all in the way he would have desired; whether she did not look upon him—kindly, it is true, but as a friend—almost on a footing with her father. Besides which he could not approach her on the subject at all, without a preliminary explanation of circumstances which he had hitherto concealed.

Then, as to Wildish, if he had had a favourite sister, was he not just such a husband as he would have desired for her—pure, affectionate, generous, highminded? Still it was hard for him, a man of superlative energy, to stand by and make no effort to win the prize he most coveted; to see another step out of the ranks and claim it. The motive that held him back must have been strong indeed.

There were times when Philip, who had in him a distinct fighting propensity, and had been an enthusiastic rifle volunteer (it was one of the things it had cost him most to give up, this volunteering), longed to throw up everything and lead the life of an adventurer in foreign lands. He allowed himself to indulge in dreams of such a life, generally ending in the thought, "When I am free—bah! when I am free, it will be too late for anything."

His last evening with Mrs. Austin to be devoted to the papers had arrived. Their task was almost finished, and he was in the mood to derive a melancholy pleasure from the fact. He was fond of Ellen's ready sympathy; but he felt that he would make no effort to keep hold on it. He would probably part from her that very night, and allow her to drift away from him beyond recall. He was completely undecided, or rather, for it better expresses Philip's mind, the only thing he had decided upon was indecision. He would let circumstances decide for him, and the decision was forthcoming.

There, in her seat in the chimney-corner, sat Fate, in the shape of Mrs. Torrance, knotting her threads as vigorously as ever, with the ball at her feet, and the bag containing her web more distended than ever. Mrs. Torrance had an air of extreme satisfaction. It arose from the consciousness of having performed every maternal duty to "dearest Julia," while "dearest Ellen" had found it necessary to recall her just when those duties were becoming unnecessary and therefore irksome.

Mrs. Torrance sat and watched from her corner the progress of the almost finished task. She watched also, with jealous eyes, the progress of something else, and that was the friendship between Mr. Tenterden and Ellen, which had evidently been making rapid strides during her unavoidable absence. Ellen had not said much about Mr. Tenterden, and now he was not the only trouble looming in the distance. Mrs. Torrance had been at home but six days, and in that short space of time Mr. Huntingdon had called twice. On the last occasion she had found him sitting suspiciously close to Ellen, with an expression on his face as if he was engaged in some personal confidences. Nor was her penetration at fault, though from Ellen's manner she could gather nothing, and the latter offered no explanation, and had only mentioned that in her absence Mr. Huntingdon had been a frequent visitor. Now Mrs. Torrance had as much objection to her daughter marrying the clergyman as the layman. In the first place, Ellen by a second marriage lost a considerable part of her income—that which was derived from the profits of the firm, which she shared to the extent of one-third, and which in that event reverted to the partners. In the second, she had not found husbands at all conducive to generosity or gratitude on the part of her daughters; not that she was a merely mercenary woman, far from it. Thanks to Ellen, she had quite enough to live upon, and would have been delighted to spend her little income on these very ingrates; but she wanted to manage for them; she coveted a first place in their consideration and affection; she desired to deal with refractory servants, refractory babies, and even refractory husbands after her own fashion. Ellen allowed her to rule to her heart's content, but if she married again it would be quite different. Ellen would no longer be her own mistress. Ellen's house would no longer be a haven of refuge when the husbands of dearest Bessie and dearest Julia proved refractory. Ellen might have a refractory husband of her own, and as Ellen was never known to manage anybody, of course he would have it all his own way. Mrs. Torrance conscientiously considered that it was better for Ellen to remain as she was.

In reality Ellen was in much greater danger than Mrs. Torrance supposed. On the occasion when she had interrupted Mr. Huntingdon's confidences, they were indeed leading up to a declaration. These confidences suddenly made were rather startling to Ellen, who had no idea of their drift till it was too late to stop them. Mr. Huntingdon had hitherto had some pretext or other for his calls, and he had pitched his intended declaration in the lowest possible key, which was certainly in his favour as far as obtaining a hearing went. He was very poor, he said, poorer even than he seemed, for he was paying back to his parents, now in reduced circumstances, the money they had spent on his education. It was most likely he would have to support them entirely in the end, as well as a deformed sister, who, though very clever and accomplished, and willing to teach, found the utmost difficulty in getting a situation as a governess or companion. He was very straightforward and manly in his bearing as he told her he could only marry a lady who had money, and that both the lady and her money must lend themselves to further his usefulness in the ministry to which he had devoted himself. He acknowledged that there was nothing very tempting in the offer he had to make. Did Mrs. Austin think it was one that was worth listening to by any good and loving woman for whom he could have the necessary affection and esteem? At this point Mrs. Torrance had broken in upon them and rather disconcerted Mr. Huntingdon, and he took his leave, holding Mrs. Austin's hand, which trembled in his, while he begged her to think over what he had been saying, which might have had reference to anything, from mothers' meetings to matters of faith and doctrine. But Ellen had no alternative save silence, for up to the last moment it would have been impossible for her to make a personal application of his words.

And now with Philip there was a grave constraint in her manner, which he set down to the presence of her mother. Almost in silence they went on with their task, drawing quickly to a close, but it was not destined to be uninterrupted as heretofore. At an early period Mr. Huntingdon presented himself, dropping in of an evening being the habit of an intimate in the little circle, a habit never before practised by him, and therefore all the more marked. The servant had shown him into the drawing-room, and came and announced to her mistress his presence there. Mrs. Torrance knotted furiously, and her daughter suffered an embarrassment she could not wholly conceal, and which was increased by the servant saying that she had shown him into the drawing-room, because he particularly desired to see Mrs. Austin alone, and would retire if she was engaged.

"Mamma," said Ellen, "I wish you would go to Mr. Huntingdon, and I will come to him in a little."

Mrs. Torrance went with alacrity. Mr. Huntingdon was certainly the most dangerous of the two. This was something like an emergency, and Mrs. Torrance's spirit rose to meet emergencies. But her going left Ellen embarrassed as before; nay, her embarrassment increased rather than diminished.

It was apparent to her companion, who rose and said, "We have very nearly finished our task, Mrs. Austin; another short sitting will do it, and I had better leave you now."

Ellen hesitated. "No, stay," she answered; "I dare say Mr. Huntingdon will not detain me long. I should be sorry to give you more trouble."

"Make your mind easy upon that score," he said; "it will only be lengthening out a pleasure. I will say good-bye, to-night;" and he did say good-bye, putting on his hat and rushing out of the house in the strangest manner possible; while Ellen lingered beside the writing-table, unable to make up her mind to encounter Mr. Huntingdon.

Meantime Mrs. Torrance had been entertaining the clergyman, who was seated in an arm-chair looking absent and answering at random. Mrs. Torrance mentioned that her daughter was engaged in some business with Mr. Tenterden, assuming at the same time that Mr. Huntingdon knew him well.

Mr. Huntingdon murmured that he had met the gentleman in question, but that they were not likely to be friends, as they differed very widely in opinion.

"Indeed!" rejoined Mrs. Torrance, point blank; "what opinions, may I ask?"

"I think his are rather dangerous, to say the truth," said Mr. Huntingdon, rousing himself.

"You surprise me," said Mrs. Torrance; "my daughter and he are great friends. He is partner in the firm of which Mr. Austin was the head, and Mrs. Austin has still her share in the business you know, as long as she remains unmarried. If she marries again," she added, hitting her nail on the head and driving it home, "she loses everything."

She justified the statement to her conscience by taking it to mean everything from that source, and went on smoothly to other topics, presently wondering that her daughter had not appeared, and leaving him with the hope that he would not be detained much longer.

How much longer he was detained, poor Mr. Huntingdon never knew, for in that time he went through an agony of humiliation and shame enough for a whole lifetime. He had come there to ask the sweetest and noblest woman he had ever met to be his wife, and he must go away, not only without accomplishing his object, but relinquishing it for ever, and relinquishing it for a motive which at that moment he could not but feel to be an utterly ignoble and ungenerous one. Money, money, more and more money, was the pitiful craving created by an age of luxury and false refinement. Why could he not marry Ellen? the idea flashed wildly across his brain. He felt that he had never known his own heart till now, so disguised had it been in the swathings of conventionality. Now he seemed to see it throbbing nakedly. Why could he not marry Ellen on a hundred and fifty pounds a year, while his parents and sister lived on the other moiety of his income? Why must he have a costly house and costly furniture and several servants? Why could he not live differently to the people of his class, and be an example of plain living and high thinking. No, he felt he could not. A great genius might do it, or a great Christian. He was neither, but a common man among common men. If he did any such thing the bland men and sugared women of the villas round him, even those who had still some trouble with their h's and final r's would look down upon him, turn their backs to him, hide their faces from him in spite of his superior education. His last chance of usefulness among them would be gone. He would be in the position of their own or their fathers' clerks. They would look upon him, the servant of God, as their servant, and that not in the sense in which he truly was theirs and every man's. No, the man to do such a thing must be one who was not under the necessity of doing it. So difficult is it to live on a higher level than the people about one. All this flashed through his mind in far less time than it takes to write. And what should he say for himself? She must know what he had intended by coming there that night, and he must give her an explanation. Should he get out of it as easily as possible, invent some excuse for the occasion, and let the thing die a natural death? Alas! feigning and falsehood! had he come to that? His anguish was unspeakable. It paled his ruddy face, as if with deadly sickness. His head sunk down till it was almost bent upon his knees as he sat.

At length Ellen came in, and he rose to meet her and held out his hand. She took it, and it was cold and clammy. He stood looking at her face for a moment, for his lips were too dry for rapid speech, while she met his eyes calmly and feelingly; but the words he uttered, strange as they were, gave her immense relief.

"Forgive me, I have offered you an insult. You must know what I came here to say, I cannot say it. My circumstances will not allow me; but I never knew how much I cared for you till I was forced to give you up."

She could almost have smiled, so different was it from what she had expected and dreaded; but she saw that he was in deadly earnest, his face, his voice, his manner, all betokening an overpowering agitation, and instead of telling him that his suit would have been in vain, she spoke the kindest words she could think of. "You have honoured me with your confidence, Mr. Huntingdon. I cannot look on your withdrawal as an insult, and I would fain retain your friendship under any circumstances."

"God bless you!" he said, and left her somehow with tears in her eyes.

CHAPTER XX.

PHILIP'S INTERFERENCE.

Fanny's money was melting like snow. Instead of sending Ada home and taking her sister in her stead, she went next day along with Ada, and brought both girls back in her cab—a piece of native generosity, which really won for her the prize she coveted. Ada took her into the circle of her close affections from the hour. But that did not mean that she was not going to make use of her. The more she loved her, the less compunction she had about spending her money, just as she would have spent her own if she had had any. She negotiated loans for her father and for Albert and his wife, who would otherwise have been under the neccessity of parting with the last relics of comfort and respectability—in short, she was the channel through which the whole family had begun to draw their support, with the exception of Mrs. Lovejoy and Beatrice, who stood aloof and independent. Nor did this state of affairs seem likely to come to an end at any very early date. A fortnight passed, and Albert had not found another situation. During the first week two had offered; but his applications had been rejected, and he was beginning to be hopeless. Geraldine was no better, and the doctor whom Fanny called in looked grave over her case—far more grave, it seemed, than her illness warranted, for she was often quite cheerful and free from suffering. Still the fact remained that she did not gain strength, and the little cough could not be removed, so that under the circumstances she could not be sent home again.

The constant drain on Fanny's purse at length necessitated another application to Philip, and Fanny was weak enough to let Ada see the reluctance with which she made it.

"It's your own money, Cousin Fanny, is it not?" asked the girl.

"Yes, of course it's my own," replied Fanny; "but Mr. Tenterden keeps it for me, and he doesn't like me to spend too much of it."

"I wouldn't let him keep my money," said Ada, indignantly; and the idea took roothold in the girl's determined mind, that Philip ought to be made to give it up, and, like other ideas that take root thus, it was destined to bear its fruit.

This time Fanny determined to see Philip at the office, and she took Ada with her as a kind of protectress. It was curious, the ascendency which the girl had already obtained over the woman's mind. Ada herself was quite unconscious of it, had neither schemed for it, nor worked for it in any way; but Fanny's ideas, being always in a state of fluidity, required a channel to flow in, and Ada had the power of making channels. The girl's mind was intensely practical, and though free from meanness, even in the midst of mean surroundings, always went straight at the nearest object, removed the nearest obstacle, did the nearest duty, however small. And it was this directness and fixity of purpose that enslaved Fanny. In the small affairs of the household Ada's faculty brought order out of confusion, and good out of evil, and Fanny's trust in her was therefore unbounded.

Fanny took Ada with her, and she acted as a check on Philip to such an extent, that at length he begged her to go into the outer office for a few minutes. He could not warn Fanny against Ada's family in Ada's presence; but as soon as she was gone he did remonstrate warmly. And Fanny was uncomfortable under the remonstrance, and wished, for the first time, that her money was in other hands. Philip evidently exaggerated her incapacity to manage her own affairs. She was only lending, which was not the same as giving, and yet he spoke as if it was. In the end he gave Fanny a cheque for the sum she wanted; but he made it as difficult as possible for her to apply to him again.

When the interview was over he bade her good-bye severely, and led her into the outer office to Ada, of whom he took the slightest possible notice.

But though Ada had been excluded from the interview, she managed by judicious cross-examination to obtain from Fanny a particular account of it.

"Why do you let him keep your money?" she repeated indignantly.

"He has always had it," replied Fanny, limply.

"Always—I don't understand," said Ada the practical.

"His father managed for me when I was a girl like you," Fanny explained.

Ada was silent for a while. Then she spoke suddenly, her thoughts having been busy enough the while. "What if he has spent the money himself, Cousin Fanny?" she said.

"Oh, no fear of that," answered Fanny.

Nevertheless she felt uneasy when Ada answered with preternatural assurance, "I do believe he has;" a view of matters which Ada was not at all likely to keep to herself.

Once more in his room, with the best of the day before him, for Fanny had paid him a very early visit, Philip thought over Fanny's affairs with his usual concentration. He greatly exaggerated her incapacity, and did not give her credit for sense enough to stop short of absolute ruin, and concluded that it was necessary to keep a tighter hand on her than ever. He also painted the Lovejoy family in blacker colours than they deserved, and determined to put a stop, as far as possible, to their exactions, and also to interfere more decidedly in their affairs.

And, in the first place, what was to be done with that young man? Fanny had not said too much about his difficulties in obtaining employment. Who would employ him without a character? It occurred to Philip that there was a vacancy in the office at that very moment, a vacancy which any lad could fill. Should he place Albert in it for a time? The salary was a mere pittance; but the situation might be a passport to something better, might reinstate him among honest men. He disliked the idea of bringing him there—disliked it intensely; but that was no reason with him for not doing it, rather the reverse. He could do no harm, for there would be nothing in his power. He would be removed from the influence of bad associates. In short, having entertained the suggestion, Philip determined that it was the right thing to do, and he sat down and wrote to Fanny at once, asking her to send the young man to him, and telling her, not too graciously, his intentions toward him.

Albert's qualifications were found quite equal to the office, a faultless style of penmanship running in the family, and he was only too glad to accept the eighteen shillings a week attached to it.

Fanny was quite delighted with Philip for his interference in the young man's behalf. Even Ada was coming round to a belief in Philip's goodness, until she went home one day and heard Albert's opinion concerning the benefit conferred on him. In his estimation it was neither more nor less than a shabby dodge, which, taking advantage of his unfortunate circumstances, secured his invaluable services on utterly inadequate terms. The shock of this discovery Ada lost no time in communicating to Fanny; and it ought to be borne in mind that it is only robust minds which throw off successive shocks of this kind. Fanny's was not a robust mind. She began to be uncomfortable about her money.

Ada had received her account of Albert's way of taking Philip's kindness from her mother, who believed it with that kind of impatient half-belief which people give to the most untrustworthy when they happen to be closely connected with them, because, as some one has said, even the most untruthful necessarily speak more truth than falsehood. Besides, as everything seemed to be going against Mrs. Lovejoy, the worst interpretation seemed the most natural at the time. Her daughter Beatrice was troubling her sorely. Letters had lately been coming for her nearly every day, and an expensive valentine had reached her on the morning of the fourteenth of February. Also her mother had caught the glitter of jewels in her ears one night, and she had gone up to her room and taken them off and hid them away. She was often late, too, in returning home, and had been remonstrated with in vain.

At last Mrs. Lovejoy, on the watch continually, had seen her parting with a young man of gentlemanly appearance at the end of the road, which led to the better-class streets of the district. The mother's heart beat fast as the young man stooped and kissed the girl, who held up her face as if accustomed to the salute.

Mrs. Lovejoy was not the woman to be passive under the circumstances. She went up to her daughter, in her shabby bonnet and with her basket on her arm, and laid hold of her, putting the young gentleman to instant flight.

"Who is he?" she asked sternly.

"A friend of mine," answered the girl, defiantly.

"A friend of yours!" replied her mother; "and how came you to know him, pray?"

"I met him in the train."

"And on the street," said her mother. "Do you think that is the way respectable girls meet their lovers? In my time girls saw their friends under their parents' roof. If he won't come to see you there, he means no good to you."

"I haven't a home fit to bring him to," said Beatrice, scornfully.

"Has he a home fit to take you to then?"

"Yes, he has, and a mother and sisters?"

"And have you seen them?" asked Mrs. Lovejoy, more calmly.

"No," faltered Beatrice, "not yet."

"Then the sooner you give him up the better," said her mother. "He's only some selfish fellow who wants to make a fool of you."

"I can take care of myself," answered Beatrice, with a hard, unpleasant laugh.

And indeed, whatever the young man was, it would have been very difficult for him to be more selfish than Beatrice Lovejoy.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS, FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. NEW SERIES. No. 7. HEZEKIAH. PART I.

Chapters to be read—2 Chron. xxix., xxx.

INTRODUCTION. Lessons have already been given on David and Solomon. Refer to the latter, and ask a few questions on his great sin in committing idolatry—the cause and the result. Tell the children how the kingdom was divided, and how all the kings of Israel and most of those of Judah were idolators. Hezekiah a bright exception. His father Ahaz, a most wicked man, had made Hezekiah when a child "pass through the fire," as an offering to false gods (2 Kings xvi. 3). How the remembrance would haunt the boy all his life! Perhaps this made him see the awfulness of idolatry: and he may have learned right from his mother (2 Chron. xxix. 1). This lesson will show how Hezekiah brought about a reformation of religion.

I. THE NEW DEDICATION OF THE TEMPLE. (1) The priests summoned. (Read 2 Chron. xxix. 1—11.) Make the children see his anxiety to reform the abuses of the Temple and restore the services and sacrifices—it was the first thing he set about (ver. 3), notwithstanding all the weighty things demanding the attention of a new king. Ask who had the charge of the Temple and sacrifices. Picture the king assembling the priests and Levites in the east street and making them a speech: ask what were bound to be kept up continually—the lamp with its seven branches, the perpetual incense, the daily sacrifices, and the regular feasts. Notice how Hezekiah traces all their troubles to neglect of these, and now proposes to make a fresh covenant with God and restore them all (ver. 10.) (2) The priests at work. (Read 15—19.) Now show a plan of the Temple, explaining the different parts; the priests, alone allowed to enter the building, cleansed the interior, with its vessels—the lamp, the altar of incense, and the table of shew-bread; while the Levites cleansed the outer court with the altar of burnt offering: the whole work taking sixteen days (ver. 17). (3) The Temple sanctified. (Read ver. 20—36.) Ask when the Temple was built, and remind of its glorious opening by Solomon 278 years before: what a contrast!—still never too late to repent. Remind of Solomon's prayer, asking that God would accept repentant prayers in this house. Now notice the following points about this fresh dedication of the Temple: (a) All classes joined—the rulers (ver. 20), the king and princes (ver. 30), the priests and Levites (ver. 26), the whole people (ver. 28), and show that as all had joined in the sin of idolatry, it was only right that all should join in deploring it. (b) The burnt offerings for sin. Ask from former lessons the need for shedding of blood. Refer to Heb. ix. 22, and ask to whom the sacrifices pointed. Remind how public confession of sin always accompanied the sacrifices, and show how the sacrifices were now offered for all classes of the people—a sin offering for the kingdom (ver. 21), another for the king and congregation (ver. 23). (c) The thanksgiving. Notice how the service, begun with confession and humiliation, must end with thanksgiving: what would they praise for? God had been merciful in sparing them, and also in raising up this godly king to teach them to serve Him. What words would they use? Remind how David's Psalms were written for use in the Temple-worship—(see Psalms lxxxiv., cxxii., and others)—so they used these (ver. 30). (d) The offerings. Having confessed, made atonement, praised, they must now give a thank offering to God (ver. 32): these would be used for the future service of the Temple. See to what a low state religion must have come that the Levites were more ready than the priests, who were the appointed ministers of God: so the Levites (the servants of the Temple) were allowed to help the priests in their office.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) The importance of national religion. The king and priests having forsaken God, led the whole nation astray. Now the king leading the people back to God, the whole nation turns again. How important, then, to pray earnestly for kings and all in authority (1 Tim. ii. 1, 2). (2) The duty of national humiliation. Read Joel ii. 16—18, to see how God enjoins and promises blessing to such. Ask what kingdom did so mourn and repent, and have the punishment revoked (Jonah iii. 10). Remind the children of national fast-day for the Irish famine, Crimean war, &c.; but also remind how a nation is composed of individuals, and therefore each is responsible for himself.

II. THE RENEWAL OF THE PASSOVER. (Read 2 Chron. xxx. 1—12.) Ask how many yearly feasts there were, and which was the most important: why was the Passover kept, and when? (Exod. xii. 2.) Ask why it could not be kept in the right month (ver. 3), and remind how all the people were to assemble at Jerusalem, and not merely the two tribes of Judah. Show what pains Hezekiah took to summon them, and what effect his letters had (ver. 6, 10—12). Now picture the gathering at Jerusalem. If possible show a plan of the city—Mount Moriah, on which the Temple stood, raised above the city—the people "going up" to the house of the Lord—the great court of the Temple gradually filling—the vast congregation—the king's prayer for those not duly prepared (ver. 18)—the feast of unleavened bread duly kept for seven days—the rejoicing and feasting: and also the time profitably spent in learning and taking counsel for the future (ver. 22, 23), the result being peace and good-will between Judah and Israel (ver. 25).

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) The importance of keeping appointed religious observances. The national declension was accompanied by neglect of national festivals. Remind how Christ always kept the feasts of Passover, &c.; and (2) The importance of preparation for the worship of God. Remind of the solemn consecration of the people required at Mount Sinai (Exod. xx. 10): how the people, having neglected the feast so long, had forgotten the due preparation. The same principle applies now: preparation of heart needed for right approach to God in prayer and in His house: then may expect a blessing.

Questions to be answered.

1. What was the state of Judah when Hezekiah came to the throne?
2. What immediate steps did Hezekiah take for the reformation of religion?
3. Show to what a very low condition the priests had sunk, even compared with the Levites.
4. What four points may be observed in the rededication of the Temple?
5. What practical lessons may be learned?
6. Describe the renewal of the Passover. What good effects did it have, and what lessons does it teach us?

"ONLY A FLOWER."

"HOW I wish I had something to bring Hetta! I'm almost sorry she asked me to her birthday party, for I'll be the only one there who cannot give her a present;" and Herbert thought over all his possessions, in the hope of finding something amongst them that his little cousin would like. He had bats, balls, tops, many toys which he valued much, but would willingly have parted with for Hetta's sake; the difficulty was that none of them were suitable for a little girl, and he had no money to buy anything else. At length the idea occurred to his mind, that he had seen one beautiful bud, the first of the season, on his own moss-rose bush. "But will she care for that," he thought, "amongst so many valuable presents? It is only a flower. Still I have nothing else, and it will just show I remembered her."

The day came, and Herbert ran to the garden before setting off. The rosebud was opening into bloom. He cut it quickly from the bush, leaving one fresh green leaf attached, rolled the stalk in a little damp moss, and carefully packed it in a card box, to present to his cousin on his arrival. It was true she had received many pretty gifts that morning, but amongst them all, not one which could compare in beauty for a moment with that simple moss-rose, formed and tinted as it was by the hand of a Divine Creator. The boy was gratified to his heart's content by the look of admiration and exclamation of delight with which Hetta removed the rose from its box and placed it in water.

"Oh, Herbert! how lovely! Did this really grow in your own garden? and did you cut it for me? I have not seen a rose this year till now, and a fresh country flower is such a treat in town."

The day passed merrily, and Herbert enjoyed himself extremely. He returned home in the evening much pleased that the flower had gratified his cousin and had helped to make her birthday happier. Next morning the moss-rosebud had expanded its petals into a still more perfect stage of loveliness, and

Hetta, who had a holiday and was going out to pay visits to some of her young friends, was tempted to take it from the water and fasten it in front of her dress. "My rose does look so beautiful," she said, "I should like to show it off, and an hour or two out of water won't wither it much."

At some distance from home her attention was attracted by a little girl of about her own age, who stood leaning wearily against a wall, crying as if her heart would break. Catching Hetta's eye, she slowly dried her tears, and coming timidly forward, sobbed out: "Please, miss, my brother's sick, and mother sent me out to look for something for him. I never asked any one before, and I don't know rightly what to say, only he's ill and weak, and we have nothing to give him."

Hetta felt very sorry for this little girl, and wished greatly to send some help to her poor sick brother, but all her money had been spent on the treat of the day before. She thought of returning home to ask her mother's assistance, but remembered that she had gone out for several hours. "How grieved I am that I did not keep some of my money. What can I do now? let me think if I have anything which could be of use to the sick boy." Then, as she looked down, her eye lighted upon the rose, and taking it from her belt, "I might send him this," she said; "it is only a flower, but when I was ill last spring I liked the violets so much that mamma brought me. It is all I have, and I remember the Lord Jesus said that even a cup of cold water given in His name to one of these little ones will be accepted. Here, my poor girl," she continued aloud, "I have nothing to send your brother but this rose. I wish I had something more useful, but, perhaps, it will comfort him."

"Well, Mary," said a pale, careworn woman who was bending over the pallet where the sick boy lay, when Mary reached her home, "your foot sounds as if you had had good success. What have you brought?"

"This, mother," answered the child, holding up the rose in triumph.

"Is that all?" said the woman, in a disappointed tone; "why, it's only a flower."

But poor sick Willy's eye had caught sight of it by this time, and raising himself as well as he was able, "Oh, Mary!" he cried, "do bring that beautiful thing here and let me smell it." Then, holding the bud in his thin white hand, he gazed till tears filled his eyes—tears of pleasure—lighting up his hollow eyes and pallid face with an expression of hope and joy, and banishing the remembrance of all the pains and hardships which he had endured. "Oh, Mary! where did you get this? I thought such flowers only grew in heaven. God must have sent one of His angels to bring it here."

"No, Willy; a young lady I met in the street gave me the rose for you."

"God put it into her heart then, just to cheer me before I go, and to show me how good He is; for if He makes such beautiful things in this world, what must the place be where He lives Himself!—all full of flowers, and light, and joy; no pain, no hunger, no cold. Mother, don't cry, for it's better to be there with Jesus than here;" and he looked round the dreary room, where a ray of sunshine seldom found its way and a flower had never bloomed before. "Mother—Mary, you'll come too." His voice grew weak, for the temporary excitement was over, and the dying boy sank back on his wretched bed; but the light of hope and joy still remained in his eyes as he continued gazing at the rose in his hand. Presently the eyes closed, but the smile was yet there, for the impression of that lovely flower was stamped in vivid colours on his fading memory; and, as the dull light of earth passed away, the glories of heaven opened before his soul's gaze—glories "which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard."

The mother and sister stood watching, but the eyes were closed for ever to the things of earth. His breath came and went fitfully for a few moments, then ceased entirely; and while the rose still remained clasped in his hand, Willy's spirit left the dingy room, and the dark and flowerless life which had been his from his birth, for the realms of light and joy, for the presence of the Saviour he had loved. How happy Herbert would have been had he known that his rose was used as a messenger from heaven! And Hetta, little did she think how she had revived the faith and hope of that poor boy, cheered his dying hour, and comforted his mother's heart by her simple offering of "only a flower." S. T. A. SNOWDROPS.

1 Cor. xv.

I LAID them, in their beautiful perfection
White-robed, more pure than snow,
Within the chapter of the resurrection,
Only a year ago!

The hours wore on, and swift they withered—dying
Among the words of hope.
I look upon their pale, still beauty, sighing—
But Faith has found her scope.

My flower droop'd on earth, yet gave me gladness,
Only a year ago.
Why for its glorious bloom do I feel sadness—
The bloom beyond the snow?

O for that rest, awaiting spring's perfection,
Robed in the garments white!
And hushed to sleep in hope of resurrection,
By those dear words of might!

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER IV.

IT seemed to Ruth as if the gates of an earthly paradise were opened when she was ushered into the garden. At the door stood Mrs. Rae, and Tina ran to meet them.

"I am so glad you have come!" she said. "Do you know it is nearly six, and I have been expecting you for ever so long? I have not the heart to scold, though I had composed quite a long lecture for you."

"Please don't lecture us, for we were quite ready when Dr. Rae came—weren't we, Ruthie?" answered Mary.

"Then I can scold him, as he is my brother, without any hesitation."

"You may rest assured I tried hard to be with you at the appointed time, Miss Leighton. I hope you will not allow Tina to take away my character too mercilessly."

Tina then took the girls up-stairs to their bedroom, which was at the back of the house overlooking a broad stream that ran along beside the garden, with the trees drooping into it and the sunlight sparkling on the rippling water.

"How lovely this is!" exclaimed Ruth; "how beautiful to live here!"

"Yes, I think it is very nice; and I am always so glad when people appreciate it thoroughly, as you seem to do," said Tina, watching Ruth with admiration as she stood entranced. "Come and look, Miss Leighton—at least, may I call you Mary? I—I feel as if I knew you; and you must call me Tina, you know."

"I should like it much better," answered Mary; "it seems so strange to be called 'miss.'"

"And, besides, as the Easter holidays are not very long, we must make the best of our time, and not remain on merely polite terms."

"I wish people were always like you," said Ruth. "I don't feel as if I had never been here before. Where does this stream go to?" she asked, turning again to the window.

"A long way, and we have got a boat; so I hope you like going on the water, because Maurice will often take us, I know, if you would like it."

"Oh, Mary! isn't it splendid! I feel as if I were in fairyland," cried Ruth; and she danced down the room and clapped her hands in an ecstasy of joy. Mary was quite taken by surprise at this exhibition of delight, it was so different from the little weary and rebellious school-girl of a week ago.

Ruth became very demure and quiet again when she went down-stairs with Tina and Mary, and she hardly spoke all dinner-time. In listening to all the conversation her happiness was too complete for any wish to take part in it herself; and it seemed too much like a momentary glimpse into an enchanted world for her to feel that she was one of the actors.

After dinner they all went into the drawing-room, which, to Ruth's great delight, looked on to the stream, and here they remained talking for some time. At last Tina was asked to play, and accordingly she did so. Ruth listened most attentively and evidently with keen enjoyment, for Tina played well; and as soon as she had done Dr. Rae said, "Will you play or sing something now, little one?"

"How did you know I could?" asked Ruth.

"I did not know, but now you have told me so I repeat my request."

"Oh, Dr. Rae! how wrong of you to entrap me like that," said Ruth. "Please don't ask me."

"Indeed, you must, dear, I should so like to hear you; and if you are too angry with Stephen to do it for him, do so for mamma and me. Won't you?"

"Mary, help me; say something for me," said Ruth.

"There is not any excuse you can possibly find," answered Mary; "what is there so dreadful in it?"

"Come, Ruth," said Dr. Rae, taking her hand and leading her to the piano, "what a silly little thing to work yourself into such a state about it. Will you forgive me?" Stephen bent down and smiled as he saw Ruth's downcast eyes and flushed cheeks.

"Yes; at least if there is anything to forgive," said Ruth, in a low voice, playing a few chords in an absent way.

The room became very quiet when Ruth began to play, and her wonderful talent struck her auditors with surprise and delight; so Ruth played one thing after another, and lost her nervousness as she grew excited with the music. After a time she sang "Auld Robin Gray," and then the room was so profoundly silent that the gentle opening of the outer door was heard by Tina, who looked round and saw Maurice at the drawing-room door, standing perfectly still, listening to the song with the greatest attention, his eyes fastened on Ruth. Fortunately, she herself was unconscious of his presence, for she would at once have been in a panic if brought back to herself by the sight of a stranger. The song ceased, and for a minute the silence remained unbroken, then Maurice entered. Ruth started from her reverie at the sound of a strange voice saying, "How do you do?" to Mary.

"Ruth," said the doctor, "this is my brother Maurice."

"I hope you will not punish me for coming in so late by leaving off singing," said Maurice, as he shook hands, looking with an artist's pleasure at her small but graceful figure and picturesque hair; and when she raised her eyes he felt an interest awaken beyond that mere professional feeling with which he had looked till then.

"I can't sing any more," Ruth answered, with an imploring look.

"I think we must be kind enough to let you off now," said Mrs. Rae. "You have been a dear good little thing." Ruth walked up to her and took her hand affectionately. "Feel how cold this child's hands are, Stephen."

"They always get cold when I play, especially if I am nervous."

"You must get over your nervousness here, darling, for I think we shall often want you to play and sing too," said Stephen.

"Isn't it bad for me to be nervous, Dr. Rae?" asked Ruth, coaxingly, with a sidelong look into his eyes.

The doctor laughed. "I don't think it is, but sitting up so late is bad for you. I do not wish to lose your company, but you had better go to bed now."

"Oh, dear! how the evening has flown away! I wanted to see Mr. Rae's sketches," whispered Ruth to Mrs. Rae.

"Maurice, do you hear? Through your lateness you have lost the honour of showing your sketches to Ruth. She has expressed a wish to see them."

"I am very sorry, but I hope you will let me have the pleasure to-morrow—will you?"

"I hope you will let me have the pleasure," said Ruth; "it is you who will grant the favour."

"I wish all favours were as easy to grant, then," answered Maurice, smiling; "but since you consider it one, I will trade with it. Will you sing to me if I do that?"

"Yes," replied Ruth, giving the promise from a sudden shyness at Maurice's earnest look, and turning to Mrs. Rae she embraced her affectionately.

"Good night, dear, I am so glad to have you with me. Indeed, I feel very grateful to Stephen."

"So do I, and I don't think he can know how grateful, because I don't know how to thank him for all he has done; I wish I did."

"I don't need to be thanked, my child," said Stephen, who had overheard her earnest little speech; "but do you think I deserve a kiss?"

Ruth raised her face and kissed him, blushing as she did so; then she ran up-stairs as quickly as she could. For a few minutes Ruth looked out on the moonlight shining on the water, and felt so happy that it was almost like enchantment; and the lovely garden appeared to her more beautiful than any other place she had ever seen. The very wind which rustled in the trees and made the water dance and sparkle, seemed as if it loved the little nook and would like to linger there for ever.

Ruth waked early, and dressing as quickly as possible she ran down-stairs into the garden. The sun shone brilliantly and the birds were singing. As she walked towards the stream she saw Maurice seated under a tree, reading; but he looked up as she approached and rose to meet her. "You are up early," he said; "do you like the early morning air?"

"Yes, I think it is beautiful; and at school I used generally to go into the garden and read before the other girls came down."

"It is very pleasant to have peace and quiet," answered Maurice—"especially for reading."

"Mr. Rae, what book is that?" asked Ruth.

"'The Magic Ring.' I am going to illustrate it. Do you know the book?"

"Oh yes! I do love it so!" exclaimed Ruth, clasping her hands. "Tell me what parts you are going to do."

"Do you remember where Hugur kills his wife by accident when she is carrying the Avenger's helmet, and how they sing a love-song together before she dies?"

"Yes, I think that story is lovely, and it will make a splendid picture."

"I have made a sketch for it; if you will come to my studio I will show it you."

Ruth accordingly went in with him, and saw on the easel the sketch which Maurice had spoken of. Ruth stood before it for some minutes in silence, and Maurice watched her thoughtful little face, thinking he should like to paint her portrait with that unconscious, dreamy expression. It was a look which made him wish to know what thoughts were busy in her head, and yet he refrained from asking, that he might watch her still.

At last she roused herself and said, "I like that very much. Will you show me all your pictures?"

One after another Maurice showed them to her, and Ruth spent a long time over each, asking a great many questions indicative of the pleasure and interest that she felt. "What is this?" asked Ruth, as Maurice placed a fresh picture before her.

"It is from 'Christabel.'"

"I have not read that; I am so sorry! Will you tell me about it?"

"I think the author can tell it best for himself," said Maurice, taking a book from a table close by. "I will show you the passage."

"Oh no! I forgot I mustn't look at it," said Ruth, suddenly shutting the book.

"Why not?"

"Because Dr. Rae said I was not to read."

"It is only a short passage which the picture illustrates, and to look at it could hardly be called reading."

"Ah, but it is! and I couldn't look at it unless he said I might," answered Ruth, looking full into Maurice's face with her truthful eyes.

"I admire your scrupulousness, and should not wish you to act differently, even while I think it unnecessary; but do you think yourself that the doctor meant you to obey his orders so literally?"

"I don't know, but where could I draw the line if I once began to read? at what point could I say, 'Here it begins to do me harm?'"

"You have the best of the argument," said Maurice, smiling.

Ruth turned again to the pictures, and continued to look at one after another most perseveringly. Presently she stopped for some time before a painting of Sir Lancelot.

"What do you think of it?" inquired Maurice.

"I think," said Ruth, slowly, wrinkling her forehead and looking intently at it, "I think Sir Lancelot looks almost as if he were in love with Elaine. His expression ought to be more pitying and sorrowing than that."

"I see what you mean. I have only caught the affectionate look," answered Maurice. "It is quite true, what you say."

"You have some of the expression I mean, but I feel as if it were not enough. Somehow I can picture his face so vividly. Mr. Rae, don't you pity them?"

"I pity Elaine, but I had not thought of him so much in that light."

"He suffered very much—as much as she did, I should think," said Ruth.

"Her heart was broken and she died, but he still lived; do you not think that showed his feelings to be less deeply engrafted into his life?"

"No; because he was in love and was loved in return, so it would have been hard for him to die. And his life was hard, too; but to Elaine death was a happy thing."

At this moment the door of the studio was thrown open, and Tina made her appearance. "Here you are! The breakfast bell has rung some time ago, and I have been looking for you," she said, laughing.

"I had no idea it was so late. The time has seemed too short, Ruth, to me. I must thank you for your criticism, it will be very useful to me."

Ruth stood like a culprit, her head bent down and her hair falling over her face, to hide her burning cheeks from Maurice and Tina; and she felt as if she should like the ground to swallow her up. They must go in to breakfast, however; it was an ordeal through which Ruth knew she must pass, and Tina seemed very unmerciful as she led the way to the breakfast room.

"Here you are at last! Why, Maurice; we had begun to think you had run away with Ruth."

"I hope I have taken good care of her, mother," answered Maurice, laughing; "I don't think you ought to be astonished that I forgot how time passed when I was with her." This he said looking at Ruth who was now seated opposite him.

Presently Tina said, "Have you to be busy to-day, Maurice?"

"No, I am at your service; what can I do?"

"I wish you would take us for a row this morning. Mary and Ruth, don't you think it would be nice, as it is so mild?"

"Oh yes!" they answered in one breath.

"You are quite deserting me, Ruth," said Dr. Rae. "I am sorry you don't care to go for a drive with me."

"Dr. Rae," exclaimed Ruth, "how can you say that?"

"Why, with your own lips you said that you preferred to be with Maurice. You cannot deny that," replied Stephen, significantly.

"Yes, I do deny it!" said Ruth, vehemently; "you know it is not true."

"I should not think of going with the doctor now until he has begged your pardon. If you come with me," added Maurice, "you shall be treated with proper respect."

"Now, Ruthie, choose between them," cried Tina, laughing; "don't keep them long in suspense, for I assure you it is a very serious affair."

"I know," said the doctor, "you will choose Maurice from all that has passed this morning; but, perhaps, some day, when you learn that his fascinating manners are empty and vain, you will return to your true knight."

"I am not quite so sure, Stephen," replied Maurice. "Lady Ruth may be a little fickle in the bestowal of her favours, and though I have every reason to hope from her conduct this morning——"

Ruth sprang from her chair and rushed out into the garden, perfectly overcome with shyness and unable to listen to any more. Presently Stephen came to her, and seating himself, drew Ruth on to his knee. "What did you run away for, little woman?" he asked.

"Oh! you shouldn't tease me so, I can't bear it. Why do people always like teasing so much? It seems as if they did it just because it is horrid for the person who is teased."

"You ought to be proud of the honour, for I think it is a proof of affection," said Stephen.

"But you can be very fond of some people without teasing them," expostulated Ruth; "and I should think they must be very happy."

"Are you not happy now?"

"Yes, I can't help being happy here; but it is in spite of the teasing," said Ruth, decidedly.

"Well, as what you have told me will in any case have no salutary effect upon the others, suppose you make a speech to an assembly of your persecutors, and see what impression it will make."

"Oh! Dr. Rae," said Ruth, half laughing, "I do believe you also want to tease me now."

"I am not aware of having said anything very bad; in fact, I really don't know what harm there has been in this morning's conversation. Will you tell me the words that carried the poison?"

"I can't remember words exactly, but it was—that—you looked at me—and your manners were so dreadful!" and Ruth hid her face on Stephen's shoulder. He laughed affectionately.

"Dr. Rae," began Ruth, timidly, "you don't really think that I don't care to go with you, do you?"

"No, darling; don't worry yourself about that. Will you come for a drive to-morrow, and have a long talk with me?"

"Yes, that will be lovely!"

"This morning," continued Stephen, "you will go with the others, and I am sure you will enjoy it. You must run and get ready now, or you will keep them waiting." Stephen kissed Ruth in a very fatherly way, and then started on his rounds.

Ruth went up-stairs, and found Tina and Mary nearly ready, and when they came down Maurice was waiting. Ruth had on a large Tuscan hat, and kept her head down so that Maurice could not see her face as he handed her into the boat. Amused glances passed among the others, and then, waving adieu to Mrs. Rae, they soon glided out of sight of the house, among the trees that trailed their branches in the water, or sometimes formed a cool green canopy over their heads. Ruth leaned down, looking at the clear stream through which the bright stones gleamed, and she saw the reflection of the trees in the rippling mirror, while she listened to the conversation of the other three.

"I always feels so blissfully free from care when I am out on the water," said Tina, after a long silence, as the boat glided swiftly along. "It seems to have such a soothing influence, and I feel as happy as a child."

"That is a very poor standard of happiness," said Maurice. "Do you think it a higher one than that which an adult possesses?"

"Certainly; I think there is no doubt that a child is happier than a grown person."

"How do you account, otherwise, for a child's quickness to forget trouble, and be perfectly merry after a short time of grief?" asked Mary.

"From a smaller capacity for sorrow," replied Maurice; "but then I think that children have a smaller capacity for joy too. A child enjoys the present moment, and has no care for the next; but a grown-up person has a greater insight into the future, and if care is in that future, happiness is beyond. What do you think, Ruth?" asked Maurice, turning towards her, and resting on his oars as he looked at her.

"I agree with you," she answered.

"I should hardly think you could form an opinion, Ruth; as you have had no experience, except of a child's life."

"Oh, Mary! do you think we know nothing but what we learn from experience? How ignorant we should all be if that were the case!" exclaimed Ruth.

"There are some things that must wait for experience to teach, and that is one, I think. In what other way do you learn this?"

"I wonder what life is meant for, and think it is meant for good; so I don't believe that happiness is given for a few years, only to be taken away again."

"Bravo, Ruth!" said Maurice; "I could not have a better partner to vanquish the opponents."

"We are not vanquished, are we, Mary?" said Tina; "our belief remains unshaken by the attacks of the enemy."

"Perfectly; we end as we began——"

"Perfect friends, I hope?" said Maurice, smiling.

"Well, yes; it would be of no use trying to regard any of you as enemies, where I am so happy," answered Mary, laughing.

"APOSTLE AND HIGH PRIEST."

BY THE REV. ROBERT MAGUIRE, M.A., VICAR OF CLERKENWELL.

"Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus."—Heb. iii. 1.

THE Epistle to the Hebrews was written with one very special purpose, to exalt and extol the privileges of Christians; and this by setting forth the superiority of the dispensation of the Gospel ("our profession"), over and above that of any preceding dispensation, and especially over that of Moses and the Law. And this is accomplished throughout the Epistle by the strongly-defined contrasts by which the argument is set forth. That argument had already proceeded thus far (chapters i. and ii.)—that Christ was "above angels;" and yet that "He was made a little lower than the angels." Thus Jesus was proved to be God and man—God, to save, and man, to sympathise. This Saviour is brought near to the comprehension of the Jews by the significant and familiar illustration of their High Priest, "Wherefore in all things it behoved Him to be made like unto His brethren, that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people" (Heb. ii. 17). This is the ground of the argument of the Epistle: a High Priest so Divine, and yet so human; so gloriously great, and yet so humanly near, and so bountifully good; one who is brought so close to us, in His nature, and work, and love—thus constituting the privilege of Christians as very great, and one greatly to be prized, as it is one that they shall be held responsible for. Hence the words of the exhortation which we have prefixed to this paper —"Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus."

I. We shall first briefly notice the name by which we are called—"holy brethren." The followers of Christ were called by various titles in the New Testament—e.g., "brethren," "disciples," "them that believed," and "Christians," as also "saints." Here the term "holy" is the same as in Rom. i. 7, "called to be saints," and similarly in 2 Cor. i. 1; Eph. i. 1, &c. &c. It is very likely it meant then, as it means now, rather what Christian men ought to be, than what they really are. Nevertheless, we are here addressed in all the significance of the term "holy brethren," indicating the holy faith we are called to profess, and the holy character by which we are to be known.

II. We are reminded of the privileges we are called to possess and enjoy—"partakers of the heavenly calling." We are partakers of something "heavenly," and therefore of something "holy." All holiness is from heaven, and our calling is heavenly. It was a voice from heaven that gave the Law of God to Israel. It was a voice from heaven that designated Jesus as the "beloved Son." It was a voice from heaven that summoned Saul of Tarsus to the feet of Jesus; and very likely it was this that suggested the apostle's injunction that we "press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling" (Phil. iii. 14). From whatever place a voice proceeds, calling us, thither the eye is turned. To be called by a voice from heaven is heavenly in its source, and heavenward in its purpose—from the holy place, calling us to a holy character.

III. Then there is the great duty consequent on this calling, and resulting from these privileges—"Consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession." That is, being "holy brethren," consider the Source of that holiness; being "partakers of the heavenly calling," consider Him that hath called you—"I have set the Lord always before me" (Ps. xvi. 8).

This Person is specified by name—"Christ Jesus." He that was "above angels," and was "made a little lower than the angels;" He that was greater than Moses; He that was the "end of the commandment;" He of whom this Epistle was written, to exalt His character, to establish His claims, and to show how He can stand comparison and contrast—"Consider Him," saith the Scripture.

He is also set forth in the offices He holds; two of which are mentioned here—"Apostle" and "High Priest." One of these would be familiar to Christians, the other to Jews; although both of these were of Jewish significance. (1) "The Apostle" An "apostle" is one "sent;" hence the Messiah was spoken of in the prophets as the 'Messenger of the covenant" (Mal. iii. 1), and as the Shiloh—i.e., "Sent." There is, indeed, an intentional contrast even in this: He is above and beyond the dignity of apostles (the highest title and dignity of the Christian ministry). At the first they were called "disciples," learning of their great Master; afterwards they were called "apostles," because they were "sent forth" to teach what they had learnt of Him. Yet there were twelve apostles; but He is "the Apostle;" so that in this, as in all other things, He might have the pre-eminence. And (2) "the High Priest." There was no office more illustrative to the Jewish mind than that of his "high priest." The Jewish high priest was everything to the Jew—the centre, source, and end of all. If the Jew needed counsel, advice, or any aid, he sought it at the hands of his priest; if he had a woe at his heart or a sorrow on his mind, he referred it to his priest; his sin offering and his thank offering he laid at the feet of the priest; and he doubtless felt the safer the closer he clung to the skirts of the priest's garment. And above all these priests was the high priest, the greatest and chiefest of them all, to whom it belonged even to make atonement (of course, only typical atonement), and on the basis of that atonement to offer intercession for the sins of the people. And now all this has passed into the hands of "the High Priest of our profession;" yea, more than ever belonged to earthly priests, and much more than can ever be entrusted to human hands again. Our "High Priest" is Jesus. He is the Source of all counsel, advice, assistance; to Him all our sins and sorrows must be borne; His atonement (not a typical, but a real and true atonement) is the ransom of sin; and on the basis of that atonement He "maketh intercession to God for us."

Such is "the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus;" and we are commanded to "consider" Him. What is the meaning of this word—"consider?"

1. We are to "consider" Him with a thoughtful and loving consideration. The same word occurs again in this Epistle (x. 24)—"And let us consider one another, to provoke unto love and to good works." It is mutual consideration, one for another, that is here enjoined—that generous thoughtfulness which, when practised between man and man, brings forth the fruits of joy. Consideration for another means that whatever I know will please or displease my brother, I will, for his sake, do or refrain from doing. If a word or deed is calculated to offend or wound, I will forbear to speak that word or to do that deed; and the more sensitive to wrong any one may be, the more considerate of that person ought we to become. There are many inconsiderate acts and words which might be spared by just a little thoughtfulness. There are more wrongs done for want of thought than for want of heart. Therefore all the greater necessity that we "consider" one another. Now, in the same way we are to "consider" Christ. He is so sensitive, and so easily grieved. It is possible to please Him, or to displease. He will not enter or occupy our hearts against our will. He stands at the door and knocks, but if we do not rise and open to Him, He will not violently or forcibly break in that door; and, after we have opened the door of our hearts, He will not overstay His welcome, not a single moment; but will depart, if He be not welcomed. To "consider" Him, then, is to consult the mind of Christ, and to do His pleasure, with a thoughtful and loving consideration.

2. We are to "consider" Him in the spirit of study and of meditation. Like the student of art in a picture gallery: see how he studies the masters! He sits down before some great masterpiece, and with studious attention he "considers" it. There are but two directions of that student's eye—first to the model and pattern, and then to his own canvas, to transfer, as nearly as may be, every tinge and tint, and light and shade, from the original to his copy. Thus are we to "consider" Christ: He is perfect, and we must copy Him; He is the Great Master, and we must learn of Him. As Mary, His mother, heard all His sayings, and pondered them (i.e., weighed them, weighed their value, meaning, and significance) in her heart; as another Mary sat at His feet, rapt in loving contemplation; as that same Mary poured the alabaster box of spikenard on His feet; or as another woman of the Gospel did more and better than that—washing His feet with her tears, and wiping them with the hairs of her head. Yes, the box of ointment, however costly, could be bought for money; but tears are priceless; not from the mart, but from the heart; not for money, but for *love. Like all these, we must "consider" Him, in the spirit of earnest study, and meditation.

And this is just what is most needed to advance us, and to perfect us, in the likeness of Christ. How can we become like unto Him, if we never strive to study and imitate Him? It is for lack of this that we are as we are, so far from the likeness of Christ Jesus. We give ourselves no time or opportunity for thus "considering" Him. It is work, work—and sometimes even the Lord's work—that absorbs our attention, and leaves but little time for study and meditation. It is for this reason, too, that some of us take but little interest in Christ; giving up, leaving our first love, growing cold, becoming lukewarm, with the terrible result of God's disfavour and contempt. Let us, then, in the true spirit of earnest study, consider Him!

3. We are to "consider" Him in the spirit of observation and expectancy. We are in heart and mind to ascend to that place whither Christ has gone; and we are also to be in the earnest expectation of those servants who wait for their Lord's coming. Christ, our High Priest, has gone away, and He is to return again. In His departure, and in His promised return, we are observantly and expectantly to "consider" Him. Thus it was with the Jew in his observation of his High Priest. The Jewish worshipper looked ever toward Jerusalem; entering Jerusalem—in person or in thought—he wended his way to the Temple; and there (and especially on the great day of Atonement) he looked for the coming forth of the high priest. His eye followed him as he entered into the Temple; and when he had passed within the veil, and the eye of the body failed to see him more, then the eye of the mind pursued and followed him in the performance of his office, and the worshippers would say—"And now (within the veil) he is appearing before God for us;" and (after an interval), "And now he is holding up the blood for us;" and yet again, "And now he is making intercession, through that blood, for us!" And as the people waited for Zacharias, so, with greater expectation, we wait for our High Priest—on this the day of our oblation. Our High Priest has entered into heaven for us; let us "consider" Him there—now offering up His own blood, and now making intercession to God for us: and with longing eyes let us look for His appearing, when our High Priest shall return again, to give His people the benediction of peace. As the parents of Jesus earnestly and anxiously sought the Child as He tarried behind at Jerusalem; as the sisters at Bethany had Him in their thoughts and longingly sighed for His presence, and urgently sent to call Him from a far-off distant place; as the disciples and the women pressed forward early to the sepulchre—some running, some outrunning, some stooping down, and some entering in; as the Twelve "looked steadfastly toward heaven," as He ascended up; and the angels asked them, "Why stand ye gazing up into heaven?" as Peter, when he recounted to his brethren the vision on the housetop, said, "Upon the which when I had fastened mine eyes, I considered" * (Acts xi. 6). Ah, their hearts were intent upon Him; their eyes were "fastened" fixed, transfixed, on these things. And so must ours be, if we would be Christ's, as they were. They looked with observation and expectancy; and so must we "consider" Him—in heart and mind going after Him to heaven, and, in the earnest expectation of men waiting for their Lord, looking for His appearing.

Go, then, and learn what all this meaneth: "Consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus"—thoughtfully and with due consideration as to what will please and what displease Him; studiously, in the earnest imitation of Christ, our great Example; and in the spirit of observation and expectancy, going after Him whither He hath gone, and looking out for His appearing, when He, our great High Priest, shall come through the veil of those riven clouds, and spread forth His hands, and bestow upon all His waiting people the blessing of eternal peace.

* "I considered."—The same verb again as in the Epistle to the Hebrews iii. 1.

CHAPTER XXI.

FADING.

THE winter had been a mild one. The spring came early. All about the neighbourhood of Park Villas the hedges were greening. Primroses were gleaming in the gardens, and would have been gleaming on the banks, but that it was too near London for the least flower to live in freedom. There was that indescribable sweetness in the air which is felt in spring-time only, though it is no longer the season of the poets. The birds felt it, and sang; the earth felt it, and blossomed. Alas! for those who did not or could not feel it—for the pent-up city children; or the youth cankered and blighted; for the manhood, conscious that a glory has passed away alike from earth without and spirit within.

Lucy Tabor came out of the house and into the high-walled garden, in the sweet March morning, and stood on the steps for a moment listening to the birds, the sunshine bending down her eyelids. Muff jumped about her, and wriggled his fat little body with delight, and started away as if he was saying, "Now for a run." He made more than one start and came back again, wriggling and whining, for his mistress did not move. She used to try races with him down the garden walk, and that was what he wanted now. He looked up in her face and said so—plain as dog could speak.

She understood him perfectly. "No—no, doggie," she said, and shook her head at him sadly. A sparrow lighted on the path and Muff was after him as fast as his little legs would carry him. The bird hopped on to a branch of lilac, and chirped at him, chaffing him unmercifully. He felt it, and came back to his mistress a miserable dog.

Lucy's eyes ran along the ground. On the brown earth the bright spring flowers shone radiantly. Here a cluster of crocuses shot up their tiny flame-spires; there a knot of primroses lay like drops of sunshine, and a solitary snowdrop hung its head between. With a sigh Lucy stooped and gathered it. Then she went down the walk, from spot to spot of blossom, and gathered all she could find. She brought in quite a posy—the firstlings of her flock. Her mamma was in the dining-room still. Mr. Tabor had been gone an hour or more. "See," said Lucy, holding the flowers towards her mother; "and, oh, mamma! to think that they are blooming and that she is fading."

The flowers she had gathered were for Geraldine Lovejoy. As the spring had advanced she had become weaker and weaker, and now the doctor had given it as his private opinion that she could not recover.

Lucy had been deeply interested in Geraldine from the first. She liked her better than she liked Ada, whom she did not quite understand—indeed, it would have been strange if she had, for Ada did not in the least understand herself. Geraldine, whose qualities lay more on the surface, loved books and flowers and music, which Ada could not satisfy herself with, because other things were so much more necessary, especially money—which, indeed, could procure them all, and the girl brooded, and was dissatisfied, and restless and eager, and, it seemed, worldly in her eagerness. So Lucy brought Geraldine her favourite books and read them to her, and in the new atmosphere, and her invalid quietude and calm, Geraldine's mind grew like a hot-house plant. Life appeared before her in a totally new aspect; no longer a treadmill round of working to live, and living to work, barren of all nobler result, but a great triumphal progress, leading to all that heart could desire of beauty and good.

Everybody round her, too, was so kind, so good, and indeed it seemed as if the little circle of Park Villas had wanted something on which to expend their more unselfish affections, so great was the flow of tenderness towards the fading girl. Lucy was a daily visitor, and Arthur Wildish found his way there in her train, and furnished an enlivening element, especially delighting in drawing out Ada.

For Mrs. Austin Geraldine had developed a strong attachment. Mrs. Austin would bring her costly delicacies, but there was something in Ellen which was more to the girl than these. She had little enough appetite for earthly food; but she had an undefined craving for all spiritual nourishment, and she had fastened upon Mrs. Austin as the one from whom she desired something that the others had not to give. There was something religious in Ellen's aspect which attracted the girl, though no word of formal piety had been spoken between them.

Geraldine, though she knew it not, was fast fading away from earth. At first she had not assumed invalid habits at all, but had gone about the house, with her slight cough and drooping figure, and had even crept out in the sunshine, and gone once or twice to church. Then the doctor had forbidden her to go abroad, and she had moved freely from room to room, gradually growing weaker and weaker, until she had to be assisted in that. Then the downward progress was more rapid. A day came when she could not leave her room at all; and another followed when she had to remain in her bed; and still her eyes were not opened. The weather was trying, they said, and if she could only eat and drink and take enough of medicine, she might get well when the summer came.

It was to Mrs. Austin that the doctor first spoke his assurance, that all hope was vain; and having broken it to Fanny and the rest, to all indeed with the exception of Ada, even to Mr. and Mrs. Lovejoy, who came about once a week now, it was she who was selected to tell Geraldine herself. They feared to tell Ada first, lest the scene between the sisters should be too painful, and they trusted to Geraldine to soften Ada's grief. Ellen was left alone with her for the purpose, trembling at the task before her and praying that she might have strength to do it tenderly.

"Are you feeling very ill, dear?" she asked, bending over her.

Geraldine looked up at her with eyes grown unnaturally large and bright, and did not speak, but gave a patient smile and little nod for answer.

Ellen went and poured out a cordial, and saying, "Take this, dear," raised and supported her while she drank it.

"Raise me up a little," said Geraldine, "I feel so faint. Often in the night I seem to be sinking, sinking, sinking down through the bed and the floor and the earth. I was feeling it now. I like your arm round me so."

Ellen's heart beat. If she did not tell her now, it would soon be too late. "Would you like some one to pray with you?" she asked, touching the girl's forehead with her lips.

Ellen will never forget the look of terror that dawned upon Geraldine's face. Her breath failed, and she sank into a momentary swoon. But Ellen stood fast, upholding her, though unable to keep her tears from falling.

At length Geraldine opened her eyes again and looked up at her, whispering, "Am I so ill? am I going to die?"

"We will try and keep you as long as we can, dear; we love you very much," said Ellen; "but God is calling you away from us; you must trust in His love; you must try and say His will be done."

"Oh! I can't—I can't!" came from the parched lips. "I want to get better, and to get up and go home."

"My darling, you are going home to God and to Jesus Christ our Lord. You would not go unwillingly?"

She closed her eyes and did not answer, and Ellen in a low voice repeated the Lord's prayer. Geraldine's face grew calmer, and soon Ellen laid her down like a child asleep. But in a little she woke again with a start and a look of fear, painful to see, and when Ellen would have spoken, she begged her quickly not to speak of that.

They had trusted to her to tell Ada, but she did not. All the day her eyes followed wistfully her sister's every movement; but she spoke little, and not at all of herself.

Mrs. Austin stayed with her that night, and in the night Geraldine's mental suffering increased with the restlessness and exhaustion which generally came on then. Ellen was always by her when she woke from her brief snatches of slumber, always ready to support her in her arms, and to whisper all that she knew of the consoling words of inspiration; but in spite of all, cold dews of terror stood on the girl's forehead. Not only did she cling to life, which had never before seemed so inviting, but she shrank from death, with all the horror of a child who dreads the darkness.

In the morning, after consulting Fanny, Mrs. Austin wrote to Mr. Huntingdon, begging him to come and see Geraldine. The note was sent by a servant who brought back the message that Mr. Huntingdon was not at home.

CHAPTER XXII.

SOMETHING WRONG ABOUT THE HEART.

THE first Sunday after his humiliating proposal—or rather non-proposal—Mr. Huntingdon had dreaded the appearance of Mrs. Austin in her pew near the pulpit; he also dreaded her non-appearance. He had to strive hard on first entering the desk to banish her from his mind, and he never raised his eyes for a moment during the service. He had been thinking what were her feelings toward him, now that in all probability she had drawn the correct conclusion from his conduct. These thoughts seemed to struggle upwards in his mind, but by great effort and determination he kept them away while he was engaged in the services of the Lord's house.

Once or twice he stumbled in his sermon at some remote allusion to the riches of this world. How dared he measure things by the high, unworldly standard of the Gospel? How should he ever be able to denounce that worldliness which now seemed to him the one thing against which he was called to preach, the thing which above all things was closing men's eyes and hardening their hearts.

The next Sunday came, and Mrs. Austin was not present. She was spending the day in rest, and in sitting with Geraldine, who needed constant attendance now. Mr. Huntingdon tortured himself with her absence, as he had done with her presence. She could not listen to him any more, that was evident. It was quite natural, even justifiable, her falling away from him. What could his ministrations be worth to her? Would not every hearer he had fall away from him if he knew this secret of his?

Mr. Huntingdon did not feel this torture sharply; he might have thrown it off in some way more readily if he had; he felt it in a dull, heavy, constant fashion, and was patient under it, as under a hurt deserved. But he was not like men such as Philip, who can bear their burden alone—nay, in some sort take a savage pleasure in its galling them. He longed for solace under it, for help to bear it—human as well as Divine. And failing to find this, he began to feel ill and depressed beyond measure. He was weak and languid; through all his robustness and ruddiness the fact made itself apparent. He was pale about the lips, and had a withered look. He felt an utter want of energy, a prostration of spirit greater than any he had ever known. He told two gentlemen whom he met coming out of church that he was ill. They said he looked ill, and duly commiserated him. Then they told their wives, who communicated to other wives the interesting intelligence, and the commiseration spread. On Monday inquiries were made at his lodgings. On Tuesday an old lady sent him a parcel of lambs'-wool hosiery, with a letter informing him how best to guard himself against the inconstancies of the season, and beseeching him to take care of his throat, in which she had noticed a huskiness. On Wednesday he encountered a bevy of youthful matrons, and was entreated to keep indoors, as the wind was in the east, and he looked really dreadful.

"You are overworking, I am sure," said one, without the faintest notion of what constituted overwork.

"No, not that, at any rate," he answered; "it is possible I may not be working enough."

"Isn't he a dear?" said one to the other when they had bidden him good-bye.

Nevertheless he went home and began to feel "dreadful." He assured himself that he was on the eve of a breakdown, that the energy which had flagged would return no more. Perhaps he might never be allowed to do any more work: he would have to go home, give up his charge, and drag out weary months, or even years in sickness and inaction. And yet when he called in the merry young doctor, who examined him with care, all the satisfaction he got was—"My dear fellow, there's nothing whatever the matter with you. You're sound as a bell—a little out of tone, perhaps, with a slightly relaxed throat, but nothing else."

Privately to himself the doctor remarked, "What cowards those strong, healthy fellows are in the matter of disease; but he certainly does look pulled—something wrong with the heart, I fancy," and he laughed knowingly.

But Mr. Huntingdon felt he could endure it no longer, so he packed some things into a black bag, and early next morning went off by train to Norwich. His father and mother with sister Clara lived there in a quiet and unpretending manner. They did not expect him so soon again, for he had very recently paid them a visit, nevertheless they were glad to welcome him—unusually glad. On the last occasion he had come to confide to them the intention he had formed with regard to Mrs. Austin. It was to them a matter of the deepest moment whom he should marry; perhaps they would have been glad if he had remained single for their sakes; but they had not thought of opposing him—nay more, they had heartily wished him success. They had heard his eulogium on Ellen with perfect confidence in the excellence of his choice, and they had awaited with trembling anxiety the result of his proposal, of which he had modestly told them he was by no means sure.

Then had come a letter to Clara, a letter which ran:—

"DEAR CLARA,—Think no more of what I came down to tell you; it has all ended in smoke. You are not going to lose your big fellow after all. You had best make up your mind to keep him altogether. Some day you shall come and be my little housekeeper, and bully me as much as you please. I leave it to you to tell this piece of news to those whom it concerns as lightly as possible.

"Your affectionate

"CHARLEY."

This Clara naturally interpreted into the fact that her brother had met with a refusal, and she could have cried, half for sorrow and half for joy, only she never did cry. The emotions struggled together on her pale, upturned face, and she ended in feeling heartily indignant with the unknown object of her brother's choice, whom she could not in the least realise from that brother's description.

And now here he was again: he had come back to them after his defeat, and they felt doubly tender to him for coming then. He was only going to stay a couple of days, and go back on Saturday, taking Clara with him. Clara longed to go; but she shrank a little from what it involved—of mixing with a new set of people, of meeting the eyes of strangers.

He did not speak of his disappointment to father or mother, neither did they to him. They respected his silence with the delicacy which ruled them in all their dealings with their children. But Clara was in his confidence, and thought that he might like to speak more fully if the ice was broken. She was sitting in the room with him, and he was writing, or trying to write rather, for he walked up and down, or sat with his head in his hands, looked out of the window, or spoke to her—in short, exhibited all the distraction of a man who has to write and cannot.

"Shall I leave you, Charles?" said his sister.

"Yes," he replied; "perhaps I had better be alone. I'm a great humbug, Clara."

"You are no such thing, Charles," said Clara, with an indignant flash from her blue-grey eyes. "Did she say anything very unkind to you?"

"She! Mrs. Austin, you mean? No. What put such a thought in your head?"

"You are only vexed by her refusal."

"She did not refuse me," he said; "I never asked her."

"How was it then?" she inquired innocently; "I don't understand."

"Don't say anything more about it," he answered.

"Not if you wish it to be so," she said, leaving him, rather puzzled, but greatly mollified towards Mrs. Austin.

He was ashamed that his sister should know how it had come about, and his shame deepened the humiliation; but at length the sermons were written, and packed in their case into the black bag, and the brother and sister returned together.

The first thing they encountered was Mrs. Austin's note. Clara saw the peculiar paleness, which was the sign of strong emotion, deepen round her brother's lips, and his big hand trembled as he took it up. "You won't mind my going at once, Clara?" he said.

"Won't you stay and take a cup of tea first?" she pleaded.

"Look, dear; you won't wish me so stay when you read that." And she did not. A few brief words told that Geraldine was very ill—dying; would he come to her at once? He did not even take off his hat; he went straight out of the house, leaving the note in his sister's hands. Clara was more puzzled than ever, but she looked almost fondly at the little note, and laid it up carefully in his letter-rack.

Mr. Huntingdon went straight to Fanny's. Mrs. Austin was leaving the house as he entered it. It was their first encounter, but Mrs. Austin met him with a simplicity and welcomed him with an earnestness which reassured him. She hurried back into the house to speak with him.

"I was sorry to have been absent when you sent for me," he said. "How is she?"

"There is no change," said Mrs. Austin; "it is terrible to witness her fear of death. Oh! Mr. Huntingdon, I am so glad you are come; you may be able to do something for her."

"Thank you for sending for me," he said humbly. "What is it she fears?—God or sin, I mean," he added.

"It is the mere fact of death, I think—of going away from all she loves, of separation from the body."

"Can I go to her now?" he asked.

"Yes, I think so. There is another thing I wish to say. There is a younger sister with her, who knows nothing of her danger. We trusted to Geraldine to speak of it herself, but she does not; she will learn it from you perhaps."

"I understand," he said. Then they shook hands and parted; for Fanny, to whom his presence had been made known, came to lead him up-stairs to Geraldine's room.

He sat down by her bed and spoke a few kindly words, which he felt sure she did not hear. She evidently regarded his ministrations as part of the dreadful rite and ceremony of death, and looked at him with dismay. But she was silent. Ada was watching him with wondering eyes. Then he knelt, and Fanny kneeling, signed to Ada to do the same. The attitude and sacred exercise of prayer for a time kept down the girl's rising passion, but at the first direct allusion to her sister's state, she started to her feet, and sobbing her protest against it, flung herself on Geraldine's bed.

Mr. Huntingdon had never witnessed such a scene—such utterly undisciplined moral natures he had never been called to deal with, and never before had the awful responsibilities of his position as a minister of religion been forced upon him. He prayed, he entreated, and he stayed till peace was restored, and Ada was sitting holding her sister's hand. "Shall I come again to-morrow?" he asked at parting; and with one voice they answered, "Yes."

It was necessary to procure a nurse for Geraldine, whose nights were very bad. Mrs. Austin and Fanny had shared the task with the servants for a week or two, and they would not hear of Ada sitting up, though she had pleaded hard to be allowed to do so.

Fanny sent for Mrs. Lovejoy to consult her, and she proposed at once, as there was no hope for Geraldine, to take her home. But that Fanny could not allow—besides, Geraldine was really too ill to be removed. Then Mrs. Lovejoy proposed that she should come and nurse her daughter where she was. She arranged it all herself. She was to come every night, and be with Geraldine till morning, getting what rest she could on a couch by her side; in the morning she was to go back to see to Beatrice and her husband, promising also to seek rest at home. But this she did not do. The endurance of Mrs. Lovejoy was perfectly marvellous, and was only equalled by her abstemiousness while under Fanny's roof.

Nevertheless, Fanny was keeping open house for the family, and Philip's anticipations were being rapidly fulfilled. Mr. Lovejoy came every other day, and had begun a system of loans, for which Fanny held certain valuable securities in the shape of I.O.U.'s. With Fanny's money he had even made certain small ventures, which promised magnificent returns. And Fanny went on anticipating her income in the wildest way, only restrained by having to go to Philip for everything, which she felt to be an increasing bondage, and by her grand idea, that capital was not to be touched. She desired more than ever to manage her own affairs in her own way; but she had not the courage to say this to Philip, who, however, was gradually losing all influence over her. (To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS, FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. NEW SERIES. No. 7. HEZEKIAH. PART II.

Chapters to be read—Parts of 2 Kings xviii., xix.

INTRODUCTION. Ask a few questions on the last lesson, to show how Hezekiah effected a reformation of religion. Ask what qualities of piety and devotedness he showed, and anxiety for the good of his people. Referring to Abraham, David, and other eminently good men, ask whether their lives were altogether without care or temptation, and how their faith was tried. Refer to Heb. xii. 6, to show that all God's children must expect trials of their faith to test their love. In what way was Hezekiah's trial to come? This lesson will speak of the two invasions of the Assyrians.

I. THE FIRST INVASION. (Read 2 Kings xviii. 13—16.) After Hezekiah had been king four years, the tribes of Israel were carried captive to Babylon. How would he feel at hearing this? what preparations would he make in his own kingdom? Ten years went by, and no enemy came. Perhaps the people grew tired of waiting, and became careless about the defences of the cities. At last the enemies came suddenly against all the fenced cities. How could they be driven away, by bribes or by war? Which did Hezekiah do? (Read 2 Chron. xxxii. 3—8.) Show what wise preparations he made. The water supply stopped; the strong towers prepared, and captains of war placed over the people. How glad they would be to help him. Better than all, he encouraged them with brave words, and bade them trust in God; contrasting the enemy's arm of flesh with their help from God. Remind of David's similar words to Goliath; but show how after all Hezekiah's faith failed, and he bribed the enemy to depart. Perhaps he wished to spare shedding of blood; but ask whether bribery was likely to be effectual. Why not? Of course, would come again for more bribes. Show how he even had to strip the Temple of its treasures (ver. 15, 16).

II. THE SECOND INVASION. (Read 17—22.) This time the host came direct to Jerusalem. Picture out the scene. The enemy with banners flying, cavalry and infantry surrounding the city; the inhabitants crowding the walls to gain a view; the gates closed; the three officers coming up with a white flag of truce; the king's three officers going out to them; the parley; the hushed stillness in the city. Now notice Rabshakeh's message: (a) His dissuasions. Not to trust in Egypt for help (ver. 21). Remind how Solomon was led into sin by alliance with Egypt. Also, not to trust in God on ground that He was displeased because the altars throughout the country were destroyed; showing ignorance on Rabshakeh's part. Ask where God alone allowed altars to be built. Who built elsewhere, and what title was given him for setting up the calves. (b) His persuasions that Assyria was a good land like their own, and that God could not deliver because the gods of other countries had not helped them. Now see the end of the invasion. What could Hezekiah do? Bribes had proved useless, his forces were too weak, human help in vain. Remind of Elisha at Dothan, and our Lord's words (Matt. xxvi. 53). Read 2 Kings xix. 1—7. Picture the king going into Temple, kneeling down, clothes rent in sign of grief, sackcloth about him; while sent messengers to Isaiah the prophet, asking him to pray for the nation (ver. 4). Isaiah's words of comfort, and the return of Rabshakeh to his own land, where he died a violent death. Now king himself sends another insolent message in a letter. Hezekiah does not wait this time for Isaiah to plead for him; takes letter into Temple immediately. (a) The prayer. Two things to be noticed. He acknowledges God alone as King; and he asks God to save, not for his comfort, but for God's honour, that the world may acknowledge Him as God. (b) The answer. Hezekiah's prayer in Temple ascended to heaven, and God sent answer to Isaiah His prophet, who sent message to Hezekiah. The answer was in two parts; one part referred to Sennacherib, the other to Hezekiah. Read 21—28, for that relating to Sennacherib. Make the children notice his boast of what he had done, and how it was all owing merely to God's allowing him to do so. Ask why God permitted the cities to be destroyed, referring to Sodom, Jericho, Nineveh, and others. For the answer to Hezekiah, read 29—35, noticing that "thee," in ver. 29, refers to Hezekiah. The sign: for two years the land would produce sufficient without cultivation. The help: ask how God could destroy the enemy. By defeating them in battle, as by Gideon; by hailstones, as in Josh. x. Neither of these. A new, direct, and awful punishment; 144,000 struck dead in one night.

III. PRACTICAL LESSONS. All this shows how God deals with nations. (1) National sins followed by national punishment. Ask for other instances from history of Israelites. Apply to children, by showing how each is part of nation, and influences others. A naughty child infects a whole school, &c.; a deceitful boy in a shop may lead others on, till whole moral tone is lowered. So evil spreads. (2) Duty of national repentance. Saw in last lesson how Hezekiah effected reformation of religion. People taught to pray, would now join in king's prayer for deliverance. So the duty of all to pray for the safety of the nation, as well as of themselves. (See Ps. cxxii. 6.) Probably all were called to public prayer, as in Joel ii. 15—17. (3) God's honour concerned in delivering His people. Jerusalem, called the city which God loved (Ps. lxxviii. 68); saved it for His own sake to be hereafter His glory. So often in history of England have seen national deliverance—e.g., Spanish Armada, Battle of Waterloo, Indian mutiny. Should teach to honour God as a nation.

The next lesson will speak of Hezekiah's sickness and sin.

Questions to be answered.

1. Give texts and instances to show that God's people must expect to meet with trials.
2. Why did Hezekiah expect an invasion of the Assyrians, and how did he repel the first invasion?
3. Describe the invasion.
4. How did Hezekiah repel the second invasion?
5. Into how many parts was God's answer to Hezekiah's prayer divided, and to whom did they apply? What sign was given?
6. What practical lessons may be learned?

"WHAT GOOD IS IN A GIRL?"

A BOY'S STORY.

"DO try to behave yourself, Harry," said his sister Kate; "you are doing exactly what you have been bidden not to do. You drove the horse twice too fast, you whipped him twice too hard, you ate your lunch an hour too soon, and now you won't come home, and you will eat those sour crab apples which Uncle Thomas forbade you to touch."

"I'll go home presently," said Harry; "please stop your preaching;" and he went on picking crabs and cutting rough sticks.

Kate was a year and a half older, and it was under her charge that, with a younger brother and sister, he had been allowed to drive to the wood—Ellen's Wood people called it; I don't know why.

They were all spending the holidays with their uncle and aunt, who had justly the greatest confidence in Kate's steadiness and goodness. So when their aunt found that she could not bring them to picnic in the wood upon the promised day, Harry had offered to drive the wagonette, and Kate had been put in command, strict orders being given to the others to obey her.

Unfortunately, Harry's head had been turned by some successes at a large school. He had won a good prize; he was in the first eleven at cricket, and had made the best score in a brilliant match, where a rival school was beaten black and blue; and since that, when the cock of his own school had threatened to box his ears, Harry had turned upon that hero, and beaten him also black and blue, in a more literal sense; and the notion of being ordered about by a girl was enough of itself to incline Harry to disobey.

Presently Kate spoke again. "Really, Harry, it's nearly an hour past our time; and I shall have to drive home the little ones without you. If you stay any longer, you shall walk back every step of the six miles to Blanktown." These were courageous words, and the young lady looked very like the girl to make them good; but Harry thought it all an amusing piece of boasting.

"Listen to me, Miss Kate, and don't make such an idiot of yourself. Do you know what you are talking about—driving home six miles in the twilight, with only two children to protect you! Why, you're only a girl: you're not a handsome girl either—not half as pretty as Edith Robinson; and you have no figure. What good is in a girl like you? Why, you couldn't drive the horse; you couldn't even yoke him; and what's more, you dare not try. Who are you, to threaten me, I'd like to know? Are you my mother, and is Uncle Thomas my father, that a lad of my age should dance attendance upon the pair of you? I'll go in ten minutes."

"Harry," said Kate, "do you think it so very manly to insult a girl? Perhaps I cannot harness Black Prince, but I shall try; and perhaps I cannot drive home, but I give you warning that I shall try that too, if I get him into the wagonette."

"You daren't; don't try to impose on me. You'll break his knees; and what will your dear uncle say then?" retorted the young gentleman, scornfully, and peeling a walking-stick at the same time.

"I know there is risk, and it's a shame to have to run it," said Kate, as quietly; "but there is more danger still in waiting to be driven home in the dark as rashly as you brought us here."

"Well, good-bye, and good fortune to you," cried Harry, who did not in the least believe that she would keep her word.

Soon, however, little George came to say that the horse was yoked, and they would start in a minute. The rebel was surprised and sobered, and almost inclined to yield, but pride forbade him; and he remembered besides that Kate did not know the way. "Tell her I will go in five minutes," was his only answer; and when he did come, he saw the wagonette disappearing from the top of a hill which had to be climbed upon its way.

Kate's patience had given way. She had reined up at this last point of view, hoping that he might yet join them; but his figure was still hidden among the dark trees, when she said, with a sigh, "Well, we can't help him. Get on, Prince; get on, sir!" and away they went. When the road forked, she quietly let the horse choose his own way; and knowing every inch of the country, the animal made straight for his stable, whither he came in a reasonable time, safe and sound.

Harry arrived an hour later, tired, self-condemned, secretly ashamed, and very cross. He complained bitterly of Kate for leaving him; he had only wanted five minutes; he had actually seen the wagonette on the top of the long hill.

"Yes," said his Aunt Mary, "but why? Simply because you were startled and hurried by threats which Kate had made and could not break. And as to five minutes, Kate was home an hour and a half later than the time we fixed—not that I blame her, dear girl."

Harry looked at Kate, and then he looked at Uncle Thomas. His sister's eyes were cast down, and she seemed ashamed for him rather than proud of her success; and his uncle's mouth was pressed tightly together, as if in anger; but neither of them spoke a word.

"I say, Harry," sang out little George, at last, "Kate yoked Black Prince quite easily, and she drove home right well. She wasn't afraid either, not a bit. So now you know what a girl is good for."

"Hold your tongue, you young cub!" roared this good boy, delighted in his heart at the chance of scolding somebody.

"Oh, to be sure I'll hold my tongue. Are you mother, are you father, any more than Katey or Uncle Thomas was?"

But here Kate got up quietly, and taking little George by the hand, led her over-zealous champion softly from the room, and told him how very wrong it is to say provoking words to any one, and especially to one who is in a rage; which advice, I believe, most little boys who have elder brothers stand very sadly in need of.

Presently his Aunt Mary said, rather coldly, he thought, "Henry, are you not hungry?"

"No, thank you; I shall want nothing more to-night."

"But you have had no supper."

"Why, yes; I stopped at a cottage in the village on my way, and got two-pennyworth of milk, which quite satisfied me; and I am tired, and in no spirits to eat." He might have added that he also bought some apples, but this fact he judiciously withheld.

Said his aunt, "I am very sorry you did that, for fever is raging in the village; and it was on that account that I asked you not to stop."

"I did not know that," said Harry; "and we were only bidden not to pull up the horse, so I thought it was a different thing when I was walking and hungry. But everything is wrong to-night." And presently, with a surly good night, he went off to bed.

Through the night Harry was restless, now hot and presently shivering; and if he slept for a while, he was sure to awake with a feeling of some great fright, which he had doubtless suffered in a dream. Nor was it more pleasant to be awake. Then he thought of the day which might have been so delightful, and which he had spoiled for every one.

In the morning his head ached and his knees trembled, so that after rising he was glad to return to bed. The doctor, who was immediately sent for, shook his head, and ordered that the other children should be sent home at once, for it was fever, and fever of a very malignant type.

And now came Kate's opportunity to show "what good is in a girl." Her Aunt Mary was sickly and infirm, and Kate would not hear of her coming near the invalid. She herself watched over him night and day: whenever he was thirsty, she seemed to know it, and the cup was in a moment at his lips; when he was restless, she required no sleep; her hand was always tender, her voice always sweet and low. It was a great comfort to this good girl that he never, in all his delirium, mistook her for any one else. Sometimes, alone with him in the dim room, she would say, "Dear, do you know me?" and he would say, "Oh yes, you are Katey, my little sister Katey; but who is that dark man beside you, and why is grandfather keeping there in the shade?" Now his grandfather was five years dead. Again he would say, "No, those apples are bad—bad enough to sicken one; and, besides, Kate will be grieved if I do. There she is, beside us." And again, "Yes, Kate, I will come at once: it is a shame to have delayed you so long."

At last there came a blessed, blessed day, when Harry opened his eyes after a long quiet sleep, and said, "Katey, if I get well, how shall I ever thank you enough?"

Kate stooped down and kissed his pale forehead, upon which also a tear dropped and moistened it, and said, "Darling, you are not to excite yourself: everything depends upon your keeping still."

So Harry lay quite still. He liked, from this time on, to watch dreamily her gentle motions; and he noticed that she had chosen an old stuff dress which never rustled as she glided from place to place, taking a little food from the fire, tempting him with a grape—"just one," and then "just one more"—coaxing him to swallow "a little spoonful" of jelly, chanting a panegyric, as it were, upon the chicken-broth, and beguiling him to keep himself alive by all sorts of gentle artifices. He used to eat for the delight of her smile. Her affection gave him so keen a pleasure that it was almost painful—it pierced him, it made him want to cry. Once (but this was when he was a good deal stronger) he actually did cry. It happened that Kate, before she lay down upon the sofa, was fluttering about his bedside, smoothing his pillow, shading down the lamp, and, with gentlest fingers, stealing back the hair which had fallen down upon his forehead. Then, for the first time, he noticed how thin she had grown, how blanched her cheek was, how bony her once plump hand. He caught at the hand as it hovered over him, kissed it passionately again and again, and sobbed and cried at last, and pressed it to his heart.

"Hush! darling—hush!" said his sister; "you will put yourself back if you go on so."

But it was a good while before he could calm himself at all. Presently he said, "Kate, you will always make me grateful, for I owe you my life; yes, and humble, for I don't forget how savage a brute I was in the wood that day; and it goes to my heart to see you so worn out for me."

But Katey said, "Dear, you and I are to go to Torquay together soon, and that will make us both strong. Father cannot come, because the judges are on circuit; nor mother, because you have a new brother just come home; but the doctor says I can be trusted with all the responsibility, and that we must go. Isn't that delightful?"

"Ah, Katey, the doctor would not trust me to your care if he knew how I behaved in Ellen's Wood."

"Hush, sir! you are forbidden ever to mention that again. I know all about it, and I can trust you. Shall we read and go to sleep?"

Then she read softly and lovingly a few verses of St. John, and warbled a little hymn; and then she bowed her head silently, and he also closed his eyes, and after some time she rose and lay down, and the room was still. And the heart of Harry was still also, for he had confessed his fault and been forgiven.

And ten years afterwards, when Katey was a merry mother of merry boys, and Harry was rising in his profession with wonderful rapidity, we used to say that if his wife was not jealous of Kate, nor Kate's husband of him, it was only because no person could possibly envy or grudge an affection so beautiful, so tender, so deserved upon both sides.

"Happy is the woman," said Harry's wife, "who can see such love and know that none of it is stolen out of her proper share."

"Happy is the man," replied Kate's husband (nor do I mind confessing that this happy and wise man is your very humble servant), "who knows that Kate loves him even more than she loves her brother Harry."

And indeed we are very happy, all of us.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

59. Quote any passages which show that the Ephraimites were possessed of a haughty and domineering spirit before the establishment of the kingly form of government over the tribes of Israel.

60. By what two names does St. Paul denominate Epaphras, an eminent teacher in the church of Colosse?

61. We read of a certain individual who on one occasion smote Jeremiah, and whose name on that account was changed.

62. St. Paul's description of his conversion on the road to Damascus finds a parallel somewhat similar in the Old Testament.

63. The book of Exodus brings before the reader's notice many and singular types of Christ. Point out some of them.

64. Quote a verse from one of the historical books from which it appears that a girdle was, amongst the Jews, sometimes bestowed as a mark of honour and merit.

SCRIPTURE HEROINES.

MAGDALENE.

"She loved much."—Luke vii. 47.

AND she a heroine! O the power of grace
To trample down the harsh decrees of man
And cancel quite society's deep ban!
She with the golden hair, and pale, wan face,
Who entered into Simon's dwelling-place,
A guest of all most unexpected there,
Bathing with tears and wiping with her hair
The wayworn feet of Jesus! None so base

But in His boundless mercy may find room.
They scouted her. They shrunk beneath her touch.
His gentle verdict was—"She lovèd much."
And wheresoever, to the day of doom,
The Gospel shall be preached forth there shall loom
Her shadowed history. All else forgot,
There stands her record, free from stain or blot,
Her legend thus evolved from Time's deep womb,
"Last at the Sufferer's cross: first at the Saviour's tomb!"

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER V.

DURING the evening there was a fire in the drawing-room, although the weather was mild, and the cosy, idle twilight was very much appreciated by Ruth, who sat on the rug at Stephen's feet, looking into the fire.

"Do you remember your promise, Ruth?" asked Maurice, after a short silence that had reigned in the room. "The nightingale sings in the evening;" and he rose and opened the piano.

Ruth followed him without making any objection, but felt very like a martyr as she seated herself. For a minute she remained quite silent, and then began "Oh, rest in the Lord." The pause that ensued when she ceased singing was a far better proof of appreciation than any chorus of thanks would have been; and Ruth, quite conscious of sympathy, soon lost her nervousness with the Raes, and sang and played as she was bidden. At last she rose, and returning to the doctor, knelt down at his side.

"My child, you are very tired," he said, stroking her hair; "I must send you away again."

"Not yet; it is so early. Mayn't I stay a little while?"

"No, not even for a little while. I know better than you what is good for you, and I must take care of my little friend."

"It seems such a pity to go to sleep, and lose all the beautiful night," said Ruth, looking out of the window at the moonlit garden.

"And would it not be a pity to spoil those beautiful eyes?" asked Stephen, smiling, as he drew her to him and kissed her. "The beauty of the night is not wasted even if Ruth sleeps. Good night, little one."

"What a dear child that is," said Mrs. Rae, as Ruth closed the door behind her. "It seems to me, Mary, as if I had two more children given to me."

"And we have a mamma," answered Mary in a low voice, taking Mrs. Rae's hand in both hers. "You don't know how much good this visit has done Ruth already. I don't think I have ever seen her so happy. It is a great trouble to me that she seems so dissatisfied when she is at school, and I can't account for it."

"Ruth is not like most children; and naturally, therefore, the treatment which would suit others is entirely unfit for her in many respects," said Stephen.

"But I am sure Miss Windham is extremely kind to all the girls, and Ruth often behaves very badly, because she is so passionate; though I am sure she is always sorry when she has been in a temper."

"A nature to suffer and to enjoy most keenly," said Stephen aloud, but musingly, as if speaking to himself.

The following afternoon Maurice was busy in his studio when a gentle knock came at the door.

"Come in," he called out, and Ruth entered, dressed in her outdoor things.

"I came to ask for 'Christabel,'" she said, in explanation of her visit. "Dr. Rae has given me leave to read it."

"You need not take it away, need you?" said Maurice; "you are always welcome here." He closed the door as he spoke.

Ruth threw off her hat and cloak, seated herself on the floor with her arm on a chair, her head resting on her hand, and, becoming perfectly oblivious to everything except the book which she was reading, did not see that Maurice was sketching her.

Some time passed, and then Ruth said with a sigh of pleasure, "How lovely it is! I am so sorry it is not finished. Will you show me the picture again, now that I know all about it?" Another pause, and then Ruth said enthusiastically, looking straight into Maurice's eyes, and thinking only of him, "What a splendid artist you are!"

An irresistible impulse seized him, and he caught the child in his arms, and kissed her fervently. She broke away, and stood for one moment looking at him, then darted from the room. Maurice stood quite still, almost startled at the quick change in her. It seemed as if she had been suddenly awakened from some dream to find herself in the arms of a demon—at least so Maurice felt, and hardly could believe that it was a child who had given him the fiery, resentful look that thrilled him to the very soul.

Ruth ran to the bedroom and knelt on the window-seat, flushed and trembling with anger and excitement.

"How could he do it?" she repeated to herself, half tearfully and half passionately. "I will never go into that room again—never!" And then the thought of meeting him at dinner filled her with dread. As she looked out of the window she saw a boat coming up the stream with a young man in it. Every now and then she lost sight of the boat among the trees, but finally it appeared by the garden, when the young man sprang out and walked straight to the window of Maurice's room. Ruth heard the greeting, and after a little talk, Maurice and his friend came out into the garden, and getting into the boat, glided away, talking and laughing as they went. Ruth cowered out of sight as Maurice appeared.

"Can he be going out to stay?" she thought.

Her conjecture proved true, and that evening was spent without him. Just before Ruth went to bed a letter came from Maurice to his mother, saying that he was going to remain with his friend till the following evening.

"I suppose Jack will return with him very likely," said Tina. "To-morrow is our open evening, Mary, and I believe the Heaths will be here. Do you know any of them besides Letty?"

"No. Is she coming?"

"I think so. She will be glad to meet you, especially as she is rather strange here. I don't know her so well as any of the others."

"Will a great many people be here?" asked Ruth.

"No, dear, I don't think so; in any case, not a very alarming number," answered Tina, laughing at Ruth's aghast face.

It was, however, very alarming to Ruth when the time arrived that the visitors were expected. At about seven o'clock a carriage drove up to the garden gate, and Lady and Sir Lionel Ashleigh were announced. Then there was a great buzz of greetings, for besides these two came their son and daughter. Then came the Heaths—Philip, Julia, and Letty—and one or two other visitors. Ruth became very interested in watching Tina, who looked very handsome and graceful as she talked to the guests, entirely free from any shyness, and with a dignified cordiality that was very charming. Robert Ashleigh apparently found it as interesting as Ruth did, to watch Tina, and still more so when she talked to him. Half hidden by the window-curtain, Ruth could observe the scene unnoticed. Presently there was some music, and in the interval that followed, Maurice returned with Jack Forster. Near Ruth was a group consisting of Maude Ashleigh, Julia Heath, Mrs. Rae, and Stephen. This group was immediately joined by Maurice, who then turned to Ruth and held out his hand. She gave hers with a reluctance that was only half anger. Maurice placed a chair for Ruth, thus preventing a retreat into her retired corner, saying to Julia, "I am afraid I interrupted your discussion. May I ask what was the subject of it?"

"No—no, Miss Heath, don't renew it, please," said Maude. "I am sure argument is worse than useless; it excites the temper without convincing the wrong person. Don't you think it is injurious to the health, Dr. Rae?"

"If I regarded argument in the same light as quarrelling, I should say yes, but there is really no connection whatever," replied Stephen. "As soon as the temper is roused, you will find that argument in the proper sense of the word, ceases to exist."

Here Ruth, having been pressed to sing, sat down to the piano, and the noisy room was suddenly hushed, except for her own voice.

Tina was seated near the piano, and by her side Ruth sought refuge when the song was completed, as she felt quite overwhelmed by the thanks and unconcealed admiration of her audience.

"Oh, Tina! why don't they leave off?" she asked in a low voice, putting her head on Tina's shoulder.

"You cannot expect that they should hear you and say nothing," answered Tina. "They are electrified."

"Yes, indeed, and I don't think it is really a hardship," said Sir Lionel, smiling. "Remember what Waller says—

> 'Tell her that's young
> And shuns to have her graces spied,
> That hadst thou sprung
> In deserts where no men abide,
> Thou must have uncommended died.'"

Tina laughed. "That is a very charming lesson, Ruthie, and I hope you will profit by it."

"I shall profit by your silence, Tina," she answered, laughing shyly.

"Sir Lionel, I am forbidden to speak; I hope you will gain by my loss, and improve the acquaintance you have begun," said Tina, rising to join in a glee that was about to be sung.

Sir Lionel did as Tina wished, and before long Ruth was quite at home with him, looking very bright as she listened to a description of his travels on the Continent. Letty came too, and they formed a merry trio; Sir Lionel very much enjoying the way in which his amusing anecdotes were received, and pleased at the intelligently quaint questions Ruth put to him.

At last the evening came to a close, and Ruth was as sorry as any when the guests departed. As soon as Jack Forster had gone, he being the last of all, Ruth suddenly remembered the scene that had taken place in the studio on the previous day, and without waiting till Maurice came in from the garden, she hastily said good night and darted up-stairs to bed.

CHRIST AND HIS CHURCH.

BY THE REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A., CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN, ETC.; AUTHOR OF "AIDS TO PRAYER," ETC.

"If thou know not, O thou fairest among women, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents."—Song of Solomon i. 8.

THE question proposed by the Church, at the close of the last verse we were considering, was conceived in a spirit of impassioned earnestness—of indignant repudiation of the very thought of disloyalty to her Lord. She had been fervent in her prayers that she might realise more of the near presence of Christ, more of the rich discoveries of His grace, more of close fellowship with His saints, more of the refreshing joy and gladness of ordinances,—more of that heavenly calm which souls, reposing under the banner of a Saviour's love, feel as they rest with His flock at noon. And the thought of possible unfaithfulness occurs,—of temptation to turn aside, of getting out of the trodden sheep-walk, to feed in unwholesome pastures, and to lie down in a dangerous rest. But the suggestion is put away with resolved and instant peremptoriness. "Go away! draw back! turn aside! I who have sunned myself in the bright beams of a Saviour's smile, and have known what it is to feel underneath me the support of an everlasting arm! why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?"

Full well does He whom her soul loveth understand this trembling solicitude of the Church that nothing might draw her from Him,—from His truth, from His people, and from His side. And the portion of the Song we now enter upon contains His practical directions to her how she may keep herself in the good and the right way: "If thou know not, O thou fairest among women," how to keep thyself from danger, "go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents."

Here we are to notice, in the first place, the honourable and endearing title by which, notwithstanding her deficiencies, the Church is addressed by Christ—"O thou fairest among women." The language strikes us the more because of the character, which, as we have seen, the Church had just before given of herself. With humility and deep shame she had acknowledged that she was "black." In the spiritual glory of her Lord, in the comeliness which He had put upon her, she ought to have been as richly adorned as the tapestry in kings' chambers. But she has hardly been loyal to Christ. She had fainted in the day of adversity. She had become a scorched and shrivelled thing on account of the hot and fierce beams of persecution that had lighted upon her—the withering and blighting frowns of her "mother's children." Add to this, she had not to herself been true. A faithful and diligent keeper of the vineyards, it may be, she had not looked narrowly to the culture of her own spirit—the growth of her own soul in grace and godliness; there were spots and blemishes and dark lines there, causing her once fair complexion to appear black and stained as the sun-burnt roof of a shepherd's hut. What lesson do we learn from this self-depreciatory estimate of the Church in regard to her spiritual condition? Why, that Christ looks at believers as they are in Himself, in His own righteousness, in all that mirrored glory and perfectness, in which they appear when seen in the glass of His heavenly Father's purposes, and in which He knows they will finally be clothed. Hence it is that saints are most fair and comely in the eyes of Christ, when they are most unsightly and odious in their own. Hear how the apostle speaks of himself in that seventh chapter to the Romans. One might almost think he was one of the worst of humankind—in very deed, "less than the least of all saints." His ingrained love of evil, his base vassalage to the powers of his lower nature, his fierce conflicts with a rebellious will—all these things cause his whole inner man to be on fire, law with law, mind with members, raging and battling together in inextricable confusion, until, like one possessed, he can only exclaim, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" And yet what was he in the estimation of Christ all this time? A chosen vessel unto the Lord—the bearer of His name to the uttermost parts of the earth—a pattern to them that should hereafter believe on Him to life everlasting—one designated to highest visions and revelations of the Lord; in a word, apostle, evangelist, martyr, saint, fairest among those born of women. Or take another example: that humbled publican in the outer court of the Temple, his head bowed like a bulrush, his heart bleeding like a stricken deer, his breast smitten with holy revenges, as if he had sins, corruptions, enmities—ay, a legion of devils there. And he cries aloud, "God be merciful to me a sinner." A sinner—that and nothing else; a sinner through and through; stained, defiled, "black as the tents of Kedar." But in what light is Christ regarding him at this very moment? Why, as a justified, pardoned, acquitted soul; the harps of angels are rejoicing for him then; the heavenly Jerusalem is welcoming a newly-enfranchised citizen then; in that instant his filthy garments are taken from him, and he is washed, he is sanctified, he is justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. It is no paradox of the spiritual life to say with the apostle, "When I am weak, then am I strong," for it is only saying that there will always be given to us the most of that which we feel to need the most. Our soul thrives on the very sense of its privations. Our best strength is in our conscious weakness; our greatest beauty is in bewailed uncomeliness. We have no righteousness, but in the convictions of awakened sin; and no hope of life, but in the sense of our deserved exposure to spiritual and eternal death. The Church's clothing is of wrought gold, when she is clothed with humility; and when she puts on the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, praying to be guided, desiring to be taught, leaning on the arm of her Beloved, she appears in Christ's eyes as the "fairest among women."

But note, secondly, the directions which Christ gives to the Church for attaining to the knowledge she had desired of Him. The first is a keeping close to the old paths, a steadfast adherence to the well-worn track, marked by the footprints of the saints of God in all ages. The Church is anxious to have some certain way-marks; and she is told how she may find them—signs, clear as the scarlet thread which directed the Israelites to the house of Rahab, certain as the star which led wise men to where the Saviour lay: "Go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock;" "Be followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." "Walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham." "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ."

Let us accept with all thankfulness this ancient protest of Solomon against all religious novelties, all theological developments, all attempts to loosen our faith in time-honoured creeds, all divergences from those principles of our pure apostolic faith, which, whether on the side of an exaggerated sacramentalism on the one hand, or of a comprehensive and elastic scheme of doctrine on the other, cast slights on those grand old paths marked out by the pilgrims of old time—paths which they hallowed by their footsteps, watered by their tears, brightened by their walk of blameless, consistent piety, and made immortal by their dying testimony concerning it: "This is the gate of the Lord; the righteous shall enter into it." The Bridegroom here takes it for granted that the lessons of experience will be welcome to the Church, and echoes that language of Jeremiah: "Thus saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." Find rest as they who have gone before found rest. Surely, compassed about as the believer's path is by a great cloud of witnesses—a cloud which is adding to its mantled glory by new accessions of saints every day—all witnesses for the truth, all rejoicing in their hope, all testifying to the power, whether in life or in death, of a simple looking unto Jesus—he will not, in this old age of the world, be looking for new discoveries, new revelations, new doors to be opened into heaven, which our fathers knew not of. Be we well assured we have had all the light from heaven we ever shall have. All we require further is a cultivated faculty of spiritual discernment—the opened eyes which David prayed for, the revealing Spirit which Saul looked up for, the anointing eye-salve which John spoke of, the new understanding of Scripture vouchsafed to the disciples journeying to Emmaus. The Word and the Spirit—this twofold light it was by which our fathers walked, and we must "walk by the same rule." There is but one way, one truth, and one life for the whole redeemed flock of God. We must keep to the beaten track: "Go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock."

TRY SAN MARCELLO.

"TRY Lapland," was the tempting piece of advice that caught our ears when sweltering beneath the heat of a July sun in Florence. We were on the look out for some cool retreat in Italy. But though the proverb tells that, "as snow in summer, so is news from a far country," Lapland was decidedly too far off. Snow in summer is a good thing, but even gold may be bought too dear. Since, then, we could not go to Lapland, the next question was, whether we could bring Lapland to us—in plain words, was there any temperate region within easy reach of Florence where we could lie by during the fierce heat of summer, ready to return there when the autumn rains had cooled the valley of the Arno? We were as hard to please as the model husband who confides to his wife the choice of a sea-side place, with these five limitations, that it must not be distant, or dear, or dull, or vulgar and last, not least, there must be no nigger minstrels. In San Marcello, we found what we were in search of. It is within two hours of Florence by rail and road; it is cheap, but not vulgar; cool and sequestered, but not cut off from the outside world by a journey like that which makes the advice to try Lapland sound like irony. To San Marcello, accordingly, we repaired; and it is with the view of making this retreat in the Apennines better known that we have put together the following brief notes of a short visit made there during the last summer.

Leaving the railroad which crosses the Apennines between Bologna and Florence, at the small station of Pracchia, I learned that San Marcello lay eight miles distant, to the west, in the direction of the baths of Lucca. It was early morning. The sun, though risen, had not yet acquired strength, so declining the offer of a legno (or trap), which my host at Pracchia wished to press on me, I set out on my ascent up the slope of the Apennines, and reached the summit, where the road descends into the valley of San Marcello, after a walk of about an hour and a half. How shall I describe the view which burst on me from the summit? I can only compare it with some of the finest Scotch scenery minus the mist, and minus that look of stony barrenness which takes from the effect of Scotch scenery. The hill country of Central Italy is almost a terra incognita to the ordinary tourist. He catches glimpses of it on the railway above Pistoia or if he takes the line from Perugia to Florence, there are peeps to be had of the Lake of Thrasymene and the grand old woods of Vallombrosa, as he enters the valley of the Arno; but as for the beauties of the Apennines, he is as insensible of them as the tourist bound for Switzerland is of the beauties of the Jura, or the traveller in the Scotch express is of the Cheviots. It is an old saying, that the best is the enemy of the good. In mountaineering we must have all or nothing. Now there is an obvious fallacy in this. We rush past the approaches of the Alps, either the Jura in the north, or the Apennines in the south, impatient to cast our homage at the feet of Mont Blanc or the Matterhorn; and we experience, we do not know why, a secret sense of disappointment. Our first feeling may be one of surprise; our second is certainly summed up in the exclamation, "Is this all?" The truth is that our eye has not been educated, and our sense of sublimity been allowed to grow by easy and natural stages. If it were not treason to Mont Blanc to say so, many a tourist plants himself at Chamonix for the first time, and looks up at the mountain, as he might at the Monument from London Bridge. Alas! like London's column pointing to the skies, even Mont Blanc seems only like Pope's tall bully—it lifts its head and lies. Dr. Arnold remarked long ago that travellers, in their impatience to get into the heart of the grand scenery of Switzerland, rush through such places as Zurich, and lose much that is most characteristic of the country. The view, indeed, of the high Alps is finer from the Lake of Zurich than from other points nearer their base. The mistake arises from forgetting that mountains spring from mountains—the plateau of the Bernese Oberland is itself a mountain plain—and unless we give ourselves leisure to rise from point to point, and familiarise ourselves with one mountain level before we spring forward to another, we shall miss much of the way, and in the end feel ourselves disappointed.

But it is time that we reached San Marcello, the goal of our pilgrimage.

Looking down from the height on the long and winding valley closed in by mountains on all sides, the first impression which it produced on us was that we had come at last on the scene of the Sabine farm of Horace. So unchanging is Nature that the general description of one valley in the Apennines answers well enough for that of another.

"Continui montes, nisi dissocientur opacâ valle."

To use the words of Horace to his friend Quinctius.—"Imagine to thyself a continued range of mountains, divided only by a shady vale, so situated, however, that the approaching sun views its right side, and warms its left when departing in its rapid car." Now a reader who has not seen the scenery of Central Italy, would scarcely give Horace credit for the accuracy of the description. It is only in poetry, as we should say, that a vale could be shady, and at the same time receive the rays of the rising and setting sun. The objection is very true, if we judge by the Swiss valleys, which usually lie north and south, and thus only get the midday sun, the axis of the Alps being on a line running nearly due south-west by north-east, and the valleys, in consequence, which spring as vertebræ at right angles to these mountains, running up in nearly every case north and south. As a rule, there are no basins in the Alps—valleys, that is, enclosed apparently on all sides by mountains, and where, unless for their winding character, there could certainly be no morning and evening sunbeams. As I stood on the heights above San Marcello, I saw that the valley lay exactly as Horace describes the site of his Sabine farm. It had the first and the last of the sun's rays, how it fared during the middle of the day, and whether it was shady then, when other places less favoured are sun-baked, I must wait till noon to see.

San Marcello is the centre of a little region in the Apennines, marked out by the following distinct boundaries. It is the district between the Œmilia and Tuscany, of which Buscolongo is the highest peak and San Marcello the chief town. It lies about twelve miles to the north of Pistoia, and about the same distance to the east of the baths of Lucca. The river which waters the valley is known by the name of the Reno, a Celtic word for a river, which under the various forms of the Rhone and the Rhine is evidently as common as the Avon or the Dee is with us. The district is celebrated as the scene of one or two great battles. Here the Boii and Ligurians were defeated by the Romans, and a few miles further up the valley there is a place still called Malconsiglio, or the plain of evil counsel, from the fact that in all probability it was the site of the battle where Catiline was defeated and slain. The site of the battle corresponds to the description of Sallust:—"Planities erat inter sinistros montes et ab dextera rupes aspera." There are the hills on the left and rugged rocks on the right, with a barren plain between. Human remains have here been dug up, and mixed with them were found Roman coins, thus confirming the tradition which gave this place its name of ill-omen, as il campo di Malconsiglio. Catiline being at the end of his resources, and finding that he had no course open but to retreat into Cisalpine Gaul, broke up his camp at Fiesole, and ascended the mountains above Pistoia. He was here overtaken by Metellus, who was sent from Rome to join his forces with those of Antonius, the other consul, and after fighting bravely, was defeated and slain.

On the other side of San Marcello lies the village of Cavatina, also celebrated as the scene of a battle which decided the fate of the Florentine Republic. It may be described as the Pharsalia of Italian liberties, the last struggle of the Republics of Italy against their foreign oppressors and tyrants. In 1529 the Emperor Charles, in conjunction with the Medicean Pope, Clement VII., decided on an armed intervention, to restore the Medici family, and to suppress the liberties of Florence. Ferrucci, whom the Piagnoni (the weepers, or Puritan party, as we should describe them) of Florence had named as the Gideon of the Republic, was then in command of the militia, and lay with his little army of 3,000 foot and 600 horse, with 20 pieces of cannon, at Volterra. Deceived by the guides, he fell into a trap, was met by superior forces, led by the Count of Orange, the commander-in-chief of Charles's army. The battle was long and severe, and cost the life of the commanders on both sides. Orange was killed early in the engagement, but the knowledge of his loss was concealed from his troops, which consisted of a mixed force of Spaniards and Calabrians. Ferrucci fought on bravely, though surrounded by superior forces, till he was at last struck to the ground, covered with wounds, and died the same evening in the Castle of Cavatina, which he had defended all day. He was buried in Cavatina, where, in the right aisle of the church there is a short inscription which records the fact:—

"Qui combattendo per la patria morì
a dì 3 Agosto, 1530."

In the punning style of that day there is a reference to this iron captain, Ferrucci:

"Ferreus hic ager in quo Ferruccius olim
Sive hostem statuit vincere sive mori.

Florence in modern times has not been forgetful of the memory of the last of her commanders who fell fighting for her liberties three centuries ago. The little church of Cavatina has been a place of pilgrimage of Italian patriots; and here are inscribed the names of Manzoni, Giusti, Mamiani, and many others, who have distinguished themselves in the struggle of modern Italy to assert her independence and unity. The pretty ceremony called the processo dei crocifissi, the procession to the confines of the two parishes of San Marcello and Cavatina, where the leaders of the rival factions, headed by the crucifix on both sides, exchanged the kiss of peace, and which corresponded somewhat to our old custom of beating the bounds, is no longer kept up, because the rivalries between city and city, village and village, which so long held Italy a prey to the foreign conqueror, have died out. San Marcello is now the centre of a peaceful and prosperous agricultural district, with a cloth mill at one end of the valley, a paper mill at the other, and a trade which, if not important from an English point of view, is still respectable, and a source of employment to all the spare hands in the valley. As to the general air of prosperity and content, I can speak from experience. I did not meet with a single beggar during the whole of my three days' sojourn in this happy valley. I am no Rasselas, and I do not wish to paint a scene which exists nowhere out of the Abyssinia of Johnson's tale, but I certainly can say that for the average air of content and comfort commend me to the inhabitants of this valley of the Apennines.

San Marcello is the tiniest little città it was ever my good fortune to see. The whole of it might easily be stowed away within the railings of Russell Square, and as to one of our London parks it would cover not only the town with its suburbs, including the Palazzo Cini, its pleasure grounds, and the Infirmary, but there would be room enough to throw in some of the chestnut woods which overhang the town, and answer the same end that our parks do as the lungs of London. All day long during the warm summer days, women and children take their work out and sit under the shade, enjoying the delicious breeze and the grand view of Buscolongo in the distance, closing the valley with its jagged peak, and Abetone, and San Pietro, and the other villages dotting its steep sides, and looking like the stones which Deucalion cast behind him after the deluge, and which turned into men. There was something strangely spectacular in the beauty of that outlook up the valley. I have seldom looked on a scene filled in with details such as these, which the eye ranges over up the valley from San Marcello to Abetone. Never out of a picture have I seen that dreamy and almost graceful grouping of foreground and background. The grass was as green almost as in England, and the cultivation not unlike that of our Northern regions. The vine and olive have disappeared at this high level, and are replaced by the oak and chestnut. Further up the mountain-side are the pines, while the summit itself is a bare rock, swept by the storms, or basking in the full blaze of an Italian sun. It is not, as in Switzerland, where the sublime and the beautiful are all tumbled of a heap before you, and the gradations between Alp and avalanche, glacier above and grass land below, are imperceptible, or only marked by a border-land of broken pine-stumps, mixed with stones swept from the bed of a torrent. Here it is different; the Apennines swell from the vale, but they do not midway leave the storm; they steal up to a certain height, carrying cultivation with them, and then end in an abrupt peak, like a kind of sugar-loaf, or cone of mountain set on a ridge of table-land. The effect of this blending of the savage and the gentle in scenery is inexpressibly charming. It is a tract of country which only has to be known to be enjoyed by the tourist, and to those who prefer, as I do, the soft Tuscan tongue and manners to the rude guttural of Norway, or the broad Doric of Scotland, I can only repeat the advice with which I began this paper, Try San Marcello. When you have explored the Apennines, it may be time enough to try Lapland; but on this subject tastes differ. To some stomachs train oil may be more palatable than olive oil; I have nothing to say against such persons trying Lapland. To others, again, six weeks' perpetual sunshine, varied only with a plague of flies by day and of fleas by night, may be a pleasant variety from that of sunrise and sunset—the fireflies and cicalas of Italy. To such I should say, "Try Lapland." But for me, and the vast majority who prefer a bed to a reindeer-skin, and bread and beccaficos, washed down with thin soup and sour wine, to the dried fish and detestable brantuin of the Polar regions, the advice, I repeat, is to come South. It is little more than a three days' journey from London, and a ten-pound note will do the best part of the travelling. Pensions in this happy valley are still at the primitive rate of five francs a day, which I remember was once the tariff in Switzerland—alas! it is so no longer. But I must not add more, or the friends I left behind me there would think it an ungrateful return for a warm and hospitable greeting, to raise prices on them in this way. San Marcello is as yet unsophisticated, does not give herself the airs of a Swiss, not to say an English watering-place. She does not even go in for fashion, like her neighbour the Bagni di Lucca. In any other country but Italy such scenery would be opened up to tourists. A monster hotel would spring up in the valley, and all the way up to Abetone would be dotted with châlets doing duty as pensions during the summer season. But the Italians have little enterprise as yet, and have imperfectly explored their own country. It is the English, indeed, at Florence who have made San Marcello the summer resort that it is, and they, like wise people, seem to wish to keep their knowledge to themselves. They have made a "find," as we should say at the diggings, and are anxious to keep it as quiet as possible.

But as there is room yet for a few more of my countrymen, I think I cannot better repay the debt which I owe for a few days of perfect enjoyment spent amid lovely scenery than by giving the advice—Try San Marcello. As a centre for excursions to Florence, Bologna, and other cities of Central Italy, the situation is unrivalled. There are numbers who for want of some such retreat in the hills are unable to visit Italy at all, as their only holiday comes with long weather, when the heat in the plains is unbearable. To such, and to all, in fine, who desire to enjoy Italian scenery, and at the same time to escape the summer heats of Italy, we can only repeat the advice—Try San Marcello.

WORDS.

WORDS too lightly spoken
Come not back again,
And sweet buds are broken
By the softest rain.

Words may strike as arrows
With too cruel smart;
He who heeds the sparrows,
Heeds the wounded heart.

Words may be good angels,
Winged with love and light;
Bearing God's evangels
To the homes of night.

Words may be as devils,
Slaying where they fall:
Oh, the bitter evils
Coming at their call!

Guard the might thus given,
Sowing weed or flowers;
Spreading hell or heaven
With these words of ours!

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXIII.

RUMOUR.

ALBERT LOVEJOY had hitherto conducted himself with tolerable propriety. He stood in salutary awe of the head clerk, Mr. Sollinger, who addressed him with such extreme politeness—a politeness which lost its value when Albert found that the same grave urbanity of manner was bestowed upon the messenger, the charwoman, the smallest boy who entered the office on the smallest errand. But it overawed him, perhaps, by the impossibility of accounting for it. On the copying clerk, Mr. Cator, he looked down actually and metaphorically. He was an exceedingly small man, with a large family, and most parsimonious in his personal habits, often contenting himself at midday with a piece of bread-and-butter, which he brought in his pocket wrapped in an old newspaper, and going home to an exceedingly mythical dinner in the evening. Mr. Cator had only thirty shillings a week, and he had eight delicate children, so that each person in the family had to exist on an average of three shillings. But Mrs. Cator kept lodgers, which paid her house rent, and she made and mended every stitch of her family clothing, which, as far as the boys were concerned, descended and redescended from Mr. Cator and the elder ones to the smallest animal that ever wore knickerbockers. No one would have guessed that the family which kept up such "an appearance" had less by half than the grimy, ragged, disreputable lot belonging to the skilled artisan in the court behind. Mr. Cator, however, never indulged in a visit to the public-house over the way, of which Albert speedily became a daily frequenter. There, though he met no one from the office of Tabor and Tenterden, he met other clerks from other offices, and entered into friendly relations with them, or with such of them as were kindred spirits. Saturday evening now found him lingering there over beer, billiards, and bets—the three B's of an education in ruin and profligacy. It is true he did not spend much, though he boasted freely of former spendings; he was, as he chose to express it, "confusedly hard up" just then.

Emily and the children fared hardly enough, certainly—indeed, they could not have lived at all but for the help which Emily received from her friends, and which she had hitherto concealed from his knowledge. One Saturday, however, a letter, which ought to have arrived by an earlier post when Albert was not at home, came too late and fell into his hands. It contained a remittance, and mentioned former remittances, of which poor Emily had rendered no account.

"So you've been having lots of money all the time, and never told me," said the husband, with ill-omened glee.

"No, I haven't had lots," sobbed Emily; "and we've eaten it all, every farthing of it."

"Well, that's good," laughed Albert.

It was quite a pleasure to him to think that Emily had deceived him, or tried to deceive him; it absolved him, too, from the self-denial for which he gave himself credit. He resolved to have an evening of enjoyment on the strength of Emily's resources, present and to come; she, poor creature, being quite relieved to find that he had not made a greater grievance of her concealment.

That evening was inaugurated at the Lemon Tree Tavern by a toss up between Albert and a young man of the name of Jones for a shilling's worth of brandy and cigars. Albert lost, but took his loss with satisfaction, remarking that "somebody must make a beginning," which showed that the end was not yet at hand, or in sight. When they had disposed of the shilling's worth they were joined by others, for Albert and Jones had been early, and the long evening passed in lounging, playing, and drinking. As the drink—now beer, now brandy—got into Albert's weak head, he became more and more boastful and mendacious. Mr. Jones wanted to know what position he held in the office.

"Position!" said Albert; "blest if I know. But I'll tell you in confidence it isn't the right one. I've a cousin, a lady of property, it's through her I'm there. One of the partners has got her money in his hands—don't like to part with it either," and he winked at Jones.

"No!" said Jones. "Respectable old cove the governor," he added.

"It's the young one, I mean," said Albert.

"Tenterden?" said Jones.

Albert nodded. "I've got my eye on him," he said, "and I'll come down on him pretty sharp, I warrant."

"You don't mean it!" said Jones.

"Don't I, though! He'll be kicked out of there some day, if I'm not mistaken. He'll have to give an account of himself, and I don't think he'll like it. I want to know what he does with the money," cried Albert, with a tipsy stare of defiance; "and I will know, that's more! Think of a lady that has thousands and tens of thousands, and can't lay her hands on a ten pounder."

"Do you think he makes away with it?" asked one

Albert indulged in a pantomime of assent.

"I've heard queerish things about Tenterden," said another.

"He's a regular screw," said a third; "but that wouldn't account for the money."

"Perhaps he intends to get all he can and bolt with it."

"I shouldn't wonder," said Albert.

"Shall you stay? It's a snug concern," said Jones; "you might be partner some day."

"Dare say I might," said Albert; "but I don't think I will. It's not much in my line, the law isn't." There Mr. Albert broke off abruptly, having remembrance by no means pleasant of his late encounter with the law.

Now his companions did not believe one word of it, but that did not hinder them from repeating it. Mr. Jones had a friend who knew Mr. Cator in the privacy of domestic life, and who repeated the conversation as to a person interested. Mr. Cator heard it with indignation, and repeated it to Mr. Sollinger, who listened with incredulous politeness, but considered it his duty to repeat it to Mr. Tabor.

Mr. Tabor was evidently annoyed at what Albert had said, and sent at once for Philip to put the matter into his hands, suggesting an investigation and the dismissal of the culprit. But Philip declined to investigate; it was not worth investigating so idle a story. He knew what Albert Lovejoy was, and did not, he concluded decisively, desire to take any steps in the matter.

Mr. Tabor, however, was far from satisfied. Happening to look in upon Fanny that same evening, she asked how Albert was getting on. "He is not particularly satisfactory, I understand," said the cautious lawyer—"out of the office, I mean. He has been talking about you in a rather objectionable manner, which it would be well to put a stop to. You may be able, by the way, to give him a hint to that effect."

"Talking about me in an objectionable manner, dear me!" said Fanny, open-mouthed with astonishment.

"Yes; the truth is he has been complaining of Mr. Tenterden's management of your affairs, talking as if you were distrustful or dissatisfied. Mr. Tenterden will take no notice of it, but I do not like it, and I wish you could give the young man a hint that it is not to be tolerated."

A sudden inspiration seized Fanny. "Don't you think I could manage for myself, Mr. Tabor, and save Philip the trouble?" she said.

"Certainly," said Mr. Tabor, looking curiously at her. "There is nothing to hinder you. Have you been expressing a wish to do this?"

"No," said Fanny; "but I think I would like it better—better than going to somebody else for everything."

"Then perhaps you are dissatisfied. That explains the matter—only it has been twisted, as things do get twisted."

"I am not dissatisfied," Fanny hastened to say, "only I would like to spend my money in my own way. Sometimes I want to spend very little, and sometimes I want to spend a great deal."

"And Philip won't let you?" said Mr. Tabor. Fanny acquiesced. "But that is for your good, you know," said Mr. Tabor.

"I wouldn't spend more than I had to spend," she answered. "I know I must not touch the capital. I may do with my income as I like, and I would not always spend as much as I am doing now. Could I not borrow and pay it back again?"

"Certainly, on your securities," said Mr. Tabor.

"I haven't got any," said Fanny, whose money might have dropped from the moon for anything she knew about it.

"Of course you have them. They are in Tenterden's hands; but you ought to know a little more about them. Without them you would have nothing."

"Do you think they are safe?" asked Fanny uneasily, allowing her distrust of Philip to appear.

Mr. Tabor was in consternation. "Perfectly," he replied (thinking to himself, "This comes of the ignorance of women.") "But if you would really like to relieve Mr. Tenterden of the responsibility which he has so kindly taken, why not place your affairs in the hands of the firm? though I don't know that my being conjoined with him would render it any easier for you."

"Oh, but it would," said Fanny. "I should like it very much, and I want to make a will too."

"Very proper, very proper," said Mr. Tabor. "I will speak to Tenterden, and it shall be as you wish."

Mr. Tabor did not contemplate finding any difficulty in making this arrangement. Miss Lovejoy's affairs had been managed by Philip as a matter of friendship, and he would doubtless feel thankful to be relieved of a responsibility which Fanny's ignorance must have rendered troublesome, and had now made disagreeable. If he had wanted any further proof of the necessity for relieving his partner at once from his self—or rather circumstance-imposed position of Fanny's guardian, it was forthcoming. The unpleasant rumour reached Mr. Tabor next day from another and higher quarter. It was only a word in confidence from a friend who could venture to take so great a liberty. "What's this about Tenterden keeping back some old lady's money?"

"Very provoking, a pure invention," said Mr. Tabor.

"Coming out of his quixotic love of prevention rather than cure?"

"Just so," said Mr. Tabor.

"He would force people to do the right thing, rather than see them do the wrong thing and suffer for it, and they naturally resent being forced," remarked the gentleman, laughing.

Mr. Tabor took the first opportunity of speaking to his partner after this. It was with a hesitation for which he could hardly account, however, that he entered on the subject. Something had arisen to put a certain distance and restraint between them lately. "I have had a little more of this absurd rumour about Miss Lovejoy," he said.

Philip's brow darkened, but he stood more erect by the mantelshelf.

"Would it not be better for you to place Miss Lovejoy's affairs in the hands of the firm, and rid yourself of the responsibility?" continued Mr. Tabor.

Philip was driven into a corner. "I do not see any necessity for doing so," he said, "so long as Miss Lovejoy is satisfied."

"That is the point," said Mr. Tabor; "but I think she would prefer it."

"Has she spoken to you on the subject?" asked Philip, stiffly.

"Well, yes," replied Mr. Tabor; "she has—but—"

Philip broke in indignantly: "It seems ungrateful, after all——" he was going to say, the kindness she had received from his family. Mr. Tabor knew that, but he could not account for Philip's stoppage in the midst of so natural a speech, nor for his evident and strange perturbation.

There was an awkward pause, broken by Mr. Tabor saying, "I suggested the arrangement I have mentioned as probably the best for you."

"I think she ought to have consulted me, and that I had better wait till she does so before I take any step in the matter."

"As you please," said Mr. Tabor, a little hurt. This want of frankness was so unlike the Philip of former days. "Miss Lovejoy's wish is to manage for herself, it appears," said Mr. Tabor.

"And lose everything she has," said Philip.

"How is the money invested?" asked Mr. Tabor, looking innocently at him.

Philip hesitated. Mr. Tabor, always calm and penetrating, could not help feeling that something was wrong, but he awaited the answer.

"A portion of it is invested in the public funds," answered Philip, speaking the strict truth, "and the rest is lent on personal security, and for the safety of it I alone am responsible." Philip moved to the table and took up some papers and asked a question concerning them. He had evidently done with the subject, leaving his partner very ill at ease; and the more he reflected on what Philip had said, and on his manner of saying it, the more ill at ease he became. This unpleasant rumour was no light thing if it had a background of unpleasant fact.

CHAPTER XXIV.

ART IS LONG.

It so happened that the office of Messrs. Tabor and Tenterden had never been so full of business, so that Philip could have enough, and more than enough, of the grand solace—work. He literally plunged into it. No amount of it seemed to overwhelm him. When Mr. Tabor suggested additional help, he scouted the idea. The more he did the more he seemed able to do. Every evening saw the black bag carried home to his lodgings fuller and fuller of work, and every morning saw the work accomplished, like the tasks of the good people in the fairy tales. He excused himself to Mrs. Austin; he became more of a recluse than ever. What was his object? Mr. Tabor asked himself this question again and again. Was he making himself so absolutely necessary to the business that whatever might come out (and Mr. Tabor felt sure that there was something to come), his position would be secure? It was a thought which poisoned Mr. Tabor's peace, for above all things he hated suspicion, but it had been forced upon him by Philip's refusal to explain the evident anomalies of his position.

And Philip felt that there had risen up between him and Mr. Tabor the cold shadow of distrust. Even the solace of work would have failed him if he had known that it followed him into that. It was painful enough as it was. His feeling towards Mr. Tabor was almost filial in its affectionateness. He had the sincerest respect for his judgment, and even when his own did not bow to it, he was ready to yield his will, and Philip was a self-willed man. Mr. Tabor on his side had exhibited all the kindness towards Philip which might have been the portion of a son, and a son after his own heart. To have this kind and happy relation marred was an unspeakable pain to both. Of itself it was enough to cloud the happiness of both.

At this time Philip felt that he had two minds—one on the surface, sane, orderly, and calm, and one down in the depths, full of dire and dark disorder. He forced himself to eat and drink and walk and work, and never go below the surface at all, for he saw no way out of his embarrassments which did not involve others, or which did not also involve a confession that he had taken upon himself a burden which he was unable to bear, and he shrank with sensitive pride from either. Besides, no explanation would explain them away. The best of all explanations, the truth, would only, perhaps, relieve him from one aspersion to place him under another.

He came at length to the conclusion that he must speak to Fanny. She had every reason to have faith in him; she was weak and illogical, and he might at once alarm and reassure her. It was rather late one evening when she was called down to the drawing-room; she and Ada had been sitting with Geraldine, and she left Ada at her post. She was not a little fluttered to find Philip there, having a presentiment of the business he had come upon, and she kept talking hurriedly on the outside of it.

Then he began. He had been greatly annoyed by what had taken place between her and Mr. Tabor.

Fanny felt very guilty, and said she did not mean to offend him.

"It is not a question of offending me," he said; "it is a question of saving yourself. You must leave your affairs in my hands for the present; they came into my hands ruined. I have worked hard to retrieve them, and you will lose nothing if I can help it. In the event of my death you are perfectly safe. Your money was lost, and has had to be replaced by me. I am replacing it, and you must not hinder me, and set people talking; you must trust me, and show that you do. If I had bribed you with your own, you would have been perfectly satisfied," he added bitterly.

Now all this was to Fanny a perfect enigma, and she may be pardoned for not in the least understanding its bearings. He had said too much and not enough; he could acknowledge this to himself, for, cool and practical as he was in other men's matters, he was not so in his own affairs. He proceeded to dictate to her a policy of silence and confidence which fell on almost unheeding ears. All that Fanny clearly comprehended was that she had been ruined—and ruin, past, present, and to come, was the one idea which took possession of her mind.

Mrs. Lovejoy had come in and gone up-stairs, and Ada, released, burst in. Philip nodded to her, wishing her out of the way, and almost resolving to ask her to leave the room. But he reflected that Fanny had probably enough for the present, and so he left her to absorb what he had said.

As soon as he was gone she began to tremble and to cry. Ada had never seen her cry before. Her round, cheerful face was distorted, and she shook all over.

"What's the matter, Cousin Fan?" cried Ada; "it's all that Mr. Tenterden," she added resentfully. "What has he been doing to you?"

"Nothing," moaned Fanny with a burst of sobs.

"Oh, but he has," said Ada, sternly; "he has been saying something nasty, and you must tell me."

"It is nothing, I am better now," said Fanny.

"It is the money!" cried Ada, with inspiration.

This was not to tell. Ada had guessed; Ada was wonderful at guessing. It relieved Fanny's heart to cry out that she was ruined.

"Never mind, dear," said Ada, patronisingly; "never mind; you shall come and live with us." There did not seem to be much comfort in that for Fanny. "Since I have been with you I have learnt a great deal," continued Ada, thoughtfully, "about the ways of making money, and I mean to try myself. Players and singers make a great deal, and so do painters, and I mean to be one of the three."

"Don't tell your father or Geraldine or any of them about this," said Fanny; "let none of them know," she besought helplessly. "He says he will pay me back."

"He is a wicked, man," said Ada, "and I always knew he was," which of course settled the question.

Ada had been very busy lately in a new direction. She had taken to art, under Mr. Ruskin theoretically and Lucy Tabor practically; and Ada was not a girl who did things by halves. She was one of those who will have or do all or nothing. She gave herself no rest from her labours. Fanny had made over to her her old paint-box full of unused materials, of which Lucy supplied the deficiencies, and she drew and painted everything that could be drawn or painted; and when she was not drawing or painting she looked at everything as an object for art, and was astonished to find out how much more clearly she saw, and how much more there was to see in everything. The long hours which she spent in Geraldine's room were turned to account. There she sat on a low stool, her sketch-book on her knee, copying anything and everything—taking the water-jug, the candlestick, the flower-glass, the medicine-bottle, and trying again and again to fix the features of her sister's fading face. Nothing was too small for her, nothing was too great. Of course the more she worked, and the more she learnt, the more did the difficulties of art appear, the more did she realise how much there was to be learnt and laboured at; and Ada began to sigh over it, not that the mere labour discouraged her. Her sigh contained the thought of the poet, though she did not put it into words—

"Art is long, and time is fleeting."

Meantime her work was furnishing to Geraldine a fresh interest and a daily pleasure.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. NEW SERIES. No. 7. HEZEKIAH. PART III.

Chapter to be read—2 Kings xx.

INTRODUCTION. We have seen in the previous two lessons Hezekiah's reformation of religion and his conduct under two Assyrian invasions; we have now to speak of his sickness and his sin. Begin by asking a few questions on the invasions and God's deliverance of the people;—how the king's prayer in the Temple and the destruction of Sennacherib's army would be talked about; how much confidence the people would have in the king, and their faith in God would be increased. How eagerly would they desire the life of such a pious and successful king to be prolonged.

I. HEZEKIAH'S SICKNESS. (Read 2 Kings xx. 1—11.) (1) The sickness. All children know what illness is. Sad enough when a father or mother of a family ill, upon whom all depend; much sadder when a good and prosperous king. Refer to illness of Prince of Wales, and ask what people could do; who had set them an example of prayer in trouble? Hezekiah not too ill to pray for himself. Why did he wish to live? Love of life natural to all; and Hezekiah would feel besides that his work in the kingdom was incomplete. Notice his plea for longer life, that he had done right in God's sight with perfect heart. Was this so? Show by reference to Ps. xiv. 2, Gen. vi. 5, that there are none perfect; and Hezekiah's boast may be contrasted with David's words when in sickness, in Ps. vi., where he asks God to save him, not for his goodness—though called "man after God's heart"—but for His mercy's sake. (2) The prophet's messages. Ask the names of any prophets the children have heard of, and what their duties were. Have heard of Isaiah before in the Assyrian invasion bringing message of deliverance. How would king watch for his coming now; how eagerly have him brought into his sick-room. Describe the scene: the high bed, the tapestries, curtains, &c., carved ceiling; contrasted with doctors and attendants moving silently about, and the king with pale face lying on his bed. Ask the prophet's first message. Why set house in order? Leave all his affairs straight, so that all might go on well after his death. Had Hezekiah put off his own preparation till death? Still would wish for special time for prayer before passing on to great account. Picture Hezekiah's disappointment at hearing he must die; then his joy when, after his prayer, the servant told him the prophet was returning. How far had he gone (ver. 4)? How quickly the prayer was heard and answered, as God has promised (Isa. lxv. 24). (3) The answer. Why did God hear his prayer? Not because of king's goodness, but because of covenant with David his father. Perhaps, also, God wished Hezekiah to feel his weakness, as the only sin recorded of him is directly after this. That Hezekiah's feelings were changed by his illness, may be seen from the whole tone of his song of praise (Isa. xxxviii. 9—20), which might be read by an advanced class. He was to be well in three days, and go up to the Temple. What for? (See Ps. cxvi. 17—19.) Refer to Noah's sacrifice after leaving ark, Hannah's song, and many others. On other hand, by reference to the ten lepers, show how often men forgot to thank. Show from the lump of figs (ver. 7) that means were to be used. (4) The sign. Ask what evidence of God's mercy Hezekiah had already had; yet as regards himself faith seemed weak. Ask for other instances in which God had granted signs, such as to Moses, Gideon, and others. Ask what this sign was. Had a similar event ever taken place before? (Josh. xiv.) Show that God, who made the sun, could alter its course, just as He made the sea to stand still, the water become blood, &c.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) To set our house in order. We know we must die one day, though we don't know the day. Remind of parable of Rich Fool who put off preparing; or of the Foolish Virgins. (2) The duty of prayer in sickness. Special promise, James v. 14. Remind of four friends who took sick of palsy to Christ. All can pray. (3) The use of means. Children don't like medicine—must be taken with thankfulness. Ask the cause of sickness. Man's sin: hence medicine is bitter, as a small part of punishment. (4) The duty of thanksgiving after sickness. Least can do is to thank. How else can show thankfulness? By giving some offering, and best of all by devoted lives.

II. HEZEKIAH'S SIN. (Read 2 Kings xx. 12—21.) Describe the king's recovery. First the visit to the Temple (recall the Queen's returning thanks last year); then gradually resuming his duties; then receiving congratulations from friends; at last ambassadors from Babylon. King much flattered by this. How could he honour them? Remind of visit of Queen of Sheba to Solomon; and point out difference between showing, and showing off our things. Which did Hezekiah do, and what did it show? How was his vanity and pride to be punished? Who had given and preserved this rich city and its treasures for him? The same God would allow it to be delivered up for its sins. How did Hezekiah take the message? Remind of similar message to Eli (1 Sam. iii. 18), and show from 1 Peter ii. 20, that correction for faults should be taken patiently.

How can we sum up Hezekiah's character? He was pious, seeking to serve God himself, and lead his people to do the same. He was prayerful, as seen in his visits to the Temple; patient under provocation by Sennacherib's messengers, and in bearing his punishment; trustful in the power and mercy of God to help him in his trouble; zealous for his country's good, and active in reforming evils—a wise king and a prudent ruler; yet from the fact of his son Manasseh turning out so badly, he probably neglected his children, and in that respect was remiss.

Questions to be answered.

1. On what ground did Hezekiah ask God to spare his life?
2. What means were used, and what sign given for his recovery? Name any similar sign.
3. What lessons does Hezekiah's sickness teach us?
4. Describe his recovery.
5. What weakness was he guilty of?
6. Sum up the points in his character.

CHRISTMAS MUSINGS.

ONCE again our village bells are ringing
Their tuneful echoes of the heavenly shore;
Once again the minstrel bands are singing
The songs we loved of yore.

Once again, from hut and hall and palace,
Come Christ's glad worshippers, with anthems loud
To chant His praise—drink of His sacred chalice,
Low in His temple bowed.

Once again the fireside groups are meeting,
And homesteads glow with light and ring with mirth,
And every heart is to heaven's music beating,
"Goodwill and peace on earth."

"Goodwill to men, and unto God be glory,"
This creed sublime, O bells of nations, ring,
Till earth's remotest realms have learnt the story
Of Bethlehem's infant King.

O linger with us, Yule-tide glad and holy,
The best bright jewel of the golden year;
Pour from your plenteous horn to high and lowly
Your gifts of joy and cheer.

Shine o'er us, angel-light, from heaven descending,
That told the shepherds of their Saviour's birth;
And let us feel that we too have been spending
A day with Christ on earth. J. C. TILDESLEY.

THE GRIEFS OF CRIPPLE TOM.

CHAPTER I.

TOM'S father was the village blacksmith. Big, strong, red-haired, fond of the public-house, but not an habitual drunkard, fairly dutiful to his wife and son, and honest in his dealings, there was little to distinguish him from the ordinary type of his class.

Tom's mother was the village slut. In a neighbourhood not remarkable for its cleanliness, dirt was her distinguishing characteristic. No one ever saw her hands and face even fairly clean. Every bit of furniture, every dish, every bit of clothing in her cottage, seemed not only dirty in an ordinary way, but greasy and begrimed with long-continued uncleanness. The secondary quality about Mrs. Robinson was her talk. She would sit in her dirty kitchen on her dirty chair, hastily wiped with a dirtier cloth, and talk to you by the hour, hardly allowing you to put in a word. Her troubles about her cripple son, her past troubles about her other children, all of whom had died, her ill-health, the dearness of food, the general unhappiness of her lot, supplied her with an endless and unvarying theme. Mr. Burton, the rector, had years ago given her up in despair. She would neither go to church, nor send her children to school, nor clean her cottage; so the rector made up his mind that there was no good in her. This was Tom's home.

Mr. Burton's orphan niece had just arrived from America, and it was arranged that she should spend some time, perhaps years, with her uncle. As she was driven slowly up the long, tiresome, shadeless lane that led to Stonyfield, she saw a boy standing at the side of the lane, doing nothing, as if he had not strength enough or sense enough either to sit down and rest, or to walk out of the glare of the sunlight. Miss Burton bethought her of a bag of sandwiches provided for the journey, but untouched, and fancied that they might be acceptable to the lad. So when she came up to him she stopped the pony-carriage, and leaning over the side, she said in a kindly tone, "I have some sandwiches here that I don't want; perhaps you would like to have them."

The lad said nothing, simply stared at her, and allowed her to place the paper of sandwiches in his hands. He seemed about fourteen or fifteen years of age, dressed in coarse and dirty clothes, and one of his legs was much shorter than the other, with a club-foot. The lady thought she had never before seen a human face so empty of all intelligence. The face was very broad, the nose flat, and the eyes prominent; but the entire absence of any trace of thought or feeling, and the absence of even an animal-like pleasure at receiving food, not to speak of a boy-like pleasure at getting something nice to eat, made it painful to look at him.

"You have hurt one of your feet; does it pain you?" said Miss Burton.

No answer.

"Does your foot hurt you?" repeated she, pointing to his foot.

The dawn of intelligence seemed to break over the lad's face as, after glancing at his foot and seeing a little blood, he replied, in a rough coarse voice, "Noa; I didna knowa it wur hurt."

"So much the better then. What is your name?"

"Whaat?"

"I asked what your name is."

"Cripple Tom."

"Do you live at Stonyfield?"

"Yes."

"Good-bye, Tom," said Miss Burton with a parting nod. Tom made no reply whatever. He was looking at the sandwiches; and a doubt crossed the lady's mind as to whether he understood what they were meant for. Leaving him to solve the problem, she told the groom to go on, and soon arrived at the rectory gate.

"I met a lad in the lane this morning," said Miss Burton to her uncle at tea-time, "the most intensely stupid boy who was not an idiot, that I ever saw. He called himself Cripple Tom. Do you know him?"

"Oh yes, of course. His father is Tom Robinson, the blacksmith—not a bad sort of man, but he never comes to church, only earns enough to keep a house over his head. They are one of the most careless and hopeless families we have. You can do nothing with them. You might ask Tom to Sunday-school, but he will only come as long as he hopes to get something out of you."

Next day Miss Burton chose the time when she knew dinner would just be over, and the blacksmith still in his cottage, to call at the Robinsons'. As she knocked at the door a powerful odour, as of questionable pork, met her, and she feared that she might be too soon. But she had come just at the proper time; dinner was over, and the plates would have been removed, but that Mrs. Robinson never did that until five minutes before the next meal. Miss Burton shook hands with the father, mother, and son (for she always made a point of doing that), mentally blessing her gloves, and getting a glance of recognition from Tom. After a few ordinary remarks she said, "I came to ask you whether you would let Tom come to my class in the Sunday-school. I shall have a class of boys, and I think some of them are just about Tom's age."

"Well, ma'am," began Mrs. Robinson, "larnin's a very good thing. I'm no scholar myself, but it's a great thing to be able to read and write, and such like. But, you see, ma'am, Tom——"

"Tom's a cripple, ma'am," Joe Robinson broke in upon his wife, rising to go out to his work; "Tom's been a useless cripple sin' he was born, and he's kind o' stupid like, and he'll never be o' no use for nothin' to nobody."

Miss Burton felt hurt by the blacksmith's open contempt for a son who would never be able to wield a hammer, and looked round with a sympathising glance at Tom. But he listened to this summary declaration as to his condition and destiny perfectly stolid and unmoved. What else had he heard, poor boy, from his cradle?

"But many a worse cripple than Tom has learned a good trade, and earned his living well; and many a stupider boy, I am sure, has learned to read," said the lady.

A faint grin overspread Tom's features as he heard this, not of hopefulness, nor of thankfulness to the one who took his part, but of a feeble amusement that any one should have such strange notions with regard to him.

But at last she got an unwilling agreement that Tom should go if he liked; and she settled the matter for Tom, who could not be persuaded to open his mouth on the subject, by saying that she would call for him a quarter of an hour before school-time next Sunday.

To her surprise, on Sunday, Tom was ready to go, with a semi-washed-and-combed appearance. He was pleased at being noticed by the lady, and somewhat curious as to what Sunday-school might be like. In school he seemed too stupid to observe the glances and smiles of amusement which greeted his arrival; but he evidently enjoyed the harmonium and singing. His teacher found him absolutely without a notion of God, of a spirit, or another world—at least she could elicit no answers whatever to any questions on the subject. But Miss Burton had a habit of trying to say something specially to each boy in her class, and she contented herself with trying to get into Tom's head some notion of a great and strong Being, whom he could not see, who had made the world and all men, and who cared for and loved all men, and Tom among the rest. Telling him that she would be sure to ask him about that next Sunday, Miss Burton was forced to leave off at that point, thinking that for a mind so long neglected the first lesson could hardly be too simple or too short.

"RACHEL WEEPING FOR HER CHILDREN."

WHERE some weak innocent in sickness lying,
Feverishly sleeps
Upon its wee cot, agonised and dying,
There Rachel weeps.

Though by the pallet-side bright guardian angels
Their still watch keep,
Even whilst poring o'er God's great evangels,
Rachel must weep.

Anon, within the churchyard's silent mazes,
Where wild flowers creep
Over a tiny mound, 'mid grass and daisies,
She goes to weep.

Weeps till her mother's yearning heart is broken,
With grief so deep
That never can in human words be spoken:
She can but weep.

"A little while," and grief is turned to pleasure.
Up life's rough steeps
She goes to join her long-since buried treasure.
No Rachel weeps

In the enjoyment of the Father's mansion—
On heaven's bright shore,
Where earth-born love at last finds full expansion,
She weeps no more!

MAURICE DAVIES.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER VI.

THE next morning Maurice was in the garden as usual before breakfast, but Ruth did not appear, as she had done every day since her arrival. The idea dawned upon Maurice, while he was waiting, that she was avoiding him, and that what he had taken for merely an outburst of childish temper, was not such a light affair as he had thought. There was something amusing in the idea that she was seriously offended at his behaviour, but at the same time he regarded her with too much friendliness to desire any breach in their intercourse. He resolved not to let her elude him, and to have an understanding the first opportunity. This opportunity soon occurred, for Ruth left the breakfast-room directly she could, and went into the garden with a book for her companion, not suspecting that Maurice would follow her. The two or three minutes of quiet were quite forgotten when she looked up from her book to see him standing in front of her, and she jumped up from her seat with a wild thought of running away, but was detained by Maurice taking her hand, and saying gently, "Don't be frightened, Ruth; I have come to make my peace, and not to offend you again."

Trembling and blushing, Ruth stood before him, but did not utter a word when he stopped, and after a pause he spoke again.

"Have you not punished me enough yet, by your avoidance of me; and am I to remain in your disfavour still longer? Tell me that I am forgiven, Ruth."

All Ruth's anger vanished as Maurice spoke, except what she felt for herself, and Maurice's words seemed like a reproach. How could she stay there to hear him speak like that, when really she should ask his pardon? and she made another attempt to escape, but Maurice still held her hand.

"You are unkind," he said; "I don't deserve that you should hate me quite."

"Don't say that, Mr. Rae," said Ruth, covering her face with her hands; "I did not mean to be unkind."

"Then why did you avoid me and try to escape just now, unless you still felt angry?" asked Maurice, drawing her hands from her face with gentle force. "If I am culpable, I had temptation, and you should consider that, even if it is more difficult for you to do so than for anybody else." He smiled as if at the recollection of the scene which caused Ruth's anger.

"Mr. Rae, I would rather have you do anything than laugh at me. You don't understand me a bit, and I don't believe you are sorry."

Maurice was quite grave now. He saw Ruth could not bear any teasing, and he would not hurt her feelings for the world.

"It isn't right for you to ask my pardon," she said, blushing; "I was wrong to be so very angry."

"At least you will tell me whether we are friends again, though I really need forgiveness. Tell me, you are not angry now?"

"I am not, really; but oh! I do wish I had never come here!" and Ruth flung herself upon the seat, and cried as if her heart would break.

"My darling child, you make me think I have behaved very brutally, to see you cry like this. What have I said to make you so unhappy?"

"I have been in a passion here, where you are all so kind. It proves that I must be even more bad-tempered than I thought I was. Everybody ought to hate me."

"That is not true, and there is no reason for you to be in such a state of mind about so small a thing as this."

"It is not a small thing," said Ruth, looking up wistfully; "and I wish you wouldn't say that, because it shows you don't know me.

"It is a bad compliment to my perception if you don't think I judge your conduct rightly, and I like you all the better for it, even though I have suffered," said Maurice, with a grave smile that showed his compliment to be really true, and spoken without wishing to make Ruth feel anything but its sincerity.

When Tina and Mary came out into the garden with their work, a little later, Maurice and Ruth were still talking to one another, but the new comer did not detect any traces of Ruth's agitation, and they joined in the conversation. Maurice soon went away to work in his studio, and the three girls were left alone.

That day passed, and the following days, too, like flashes of lightning, as Ruth said, and the visit drew to a close. None of the schoolgirls coming from their own homes, and from among friends whom they had known all their lives, felt returning to school more keenly than Ruth did—perhaps not so much; but be that as it may, it was a very hard struggle to her, and the first night after she went back she cried herself to sleep, after lying awake for some time, drearily contemplating the length of the summer term. There were two things which comforted her, however, in the midst of her trouble, and they were, that as often as she could she was to spend the evenings with the Raes, and that Mary and she were again invited for the summer holidays.

Ruth found it extremely difficult to concentrate her attention upon her lessons the next morning, since, in spite of her efforts to avoid thinking of the Raes, she could hardly do anything else.

"I wonder what I should have been doing now," she thought, scribbling a face absently on a scrap of paper.

"That is a portrait of Dr. Rae, I suppose," whispered Bella, pointing to a grotesque face. "You've made him look so melancholy because he misses you so much, I see. Did his brother teach you to draw?"

"Don't, Bella," said Ruth, taking the paper out of her hand, and speaking rather louder than was prudent.

"I wonder whether you ever said 'don't' to Dr. Rae, or to what's-his-name, the brother. What do you call him? You should answer a civil question with a civil answer. But as you won't tell me his name, I shall call him the ardent admirer. Which do you like best?"

"I wish you would leave off, Bella; I can't learn my lessons," said Ruth, tremulously, and trying to keep calm.

"Oh yes! I dare say; I should like to know whether you were learning them when I spoke to you. But I wish you would tell me which you like best; or, to put the same question in a new form, which admires you most?"

All Bella's speeches were conducted in a soft whisper, with a book held in front of her face.

"No, I shouldn't think of speaking about them to you," Ruth cried out, angrily. "You have no right to speak so, and I hate and detest you!"

"Ruth, I am astonished at you," said Miss Windham. "I cannot have such extremely unladylike language, to say nothing about your speaking entirely out of rule. Go and sit down there," she continued, pointing to a chair near the window, "and don't let me hear you speak again."

Ruth did as she was bid, and Bella bent over her book, reddening a little with shame; but she made no remonstrance at Ruth's punishment. Twelve o'clock came, and with it the very ordinary occurrence of Ruth's detention in the schoolroom.

"I am sorry to see your visit has done your manners no good, Ruth. Your conduct is without any excuse," said Miss Windham; "for nothing can excuse such words as you used."

"I don't wish to make any excuses," said Ruth.

"I am glad you see it is impossible; but it is not so much the fact of your speaking out of rule, which you know I object to, but the unchristian spirit you are so quick to feel, which pains me most. I am quite aware that Bella was talking, to make you speak, and I don't intend to let that pass unnoticed; but I beg you will apologise to Bella for saying what cannot but have hurt her feelings."

"I can't do that, Miss Windham."

"Why not, Ruth? Certainly an apology is due to her, and I must insist upon it, indeed," said Miss Windham, firmly.

"It is no good, for I never can apologise, and never mean to," answered Ruth, with equal decision.

"It is very wrong to behave as you are now doing; both to be so unwilling to own yourself in the wrong, and to rebel against my authority. I shall find some means to bring you to reason, and you must remember that I mean to be obeyed. It shocks me beyond measure to know that such evil feelings are cherished by any of the young ladies in my school. You will remain here until you consent to do as I have bidden you:" with these words Miss Windham left the room.

When the door closed upon her Ruth burst into a passionate fit of crying, and all the good influence of her visit seemed entirely to vanish. The one distinct idea that came back to Ruth again and again, was the resolution to win the battle. For a time all other feelings were unheeded. Her resolve was made all the stronger by the fact that, even if she had wished to please Miss Windham, she would not have felt justified in asking Bella's pardon, as she could not do so from her heart. Her dinner was brought to the schoolroom, and when the afternoon school was over, she still remained a prisoner. Night came as a dull relief, and Ruth went to bed willingly to forget her troubles in sleep.

The next day Ruth's spirits were very depressed, but she showed no more signs of yielding to Miss Windham than she had done on the previous day. The girls were in the playground after school, and Bella was idly swinging, and talking to some of her friends, when Letty called her from a little distance.

"Will you come here a minute, Bella? I want to speak to you."

Bella came readily, for she was anxious to know what made Letty wish to speak privately with her; and leading Letty away confidentially, she asked her what she wished to say.

"Bella, I want to ask you to act more generously," said Letty. "One word from you would clear up all this horrid storm, and you know well enough that you are in the wrong." Letty's face was flushed with excitement.

Bella laughed scornfully.

"Be a little more coherent, Letty. I don't know what you want me to do."

"Why, you know you ought to beg Ruth's pardon far more than she should beg yours, and yet you can let Miss Windham believe Ruth to be entirely in the wrong. I heard all you said to Ruth yesterday morning, and if Miss Windham knew, I am sure she would not think of wishing Ruth to beg your pardon. If you would go and tell Miss Windham that you provoked Ruth——"

"Her, indeed! I shouldn't think of troubling myself about that volcanic little piece of absurdity. You may say what you like, but your generosity is not very great, miss, if you wish to get me into hot water with Miss Windham."

"You are very unkind," said Letty, "to let Ruth be punished for your fault; but as you won't go and tell Miss Windham, I shall."

"I wouldn't be a tell-tale if I were you," said Bella, getting very red, however; "and I don't think you had better talk about generosity any more."

Letty made no reply; but quitting Bella, ran to the house, and gained the parlour door. She knocked, and on being invited to enter, she stood before Miss Windham, her heart beating, and with the sound of the epithet "tell-tale" still ringing in her ears. Convinced, however, that her cause was right, she spoke boldly, and did not spare Bella in her excited defence of Ruth.

"Miss Windham," said Letty, in conclusion, "I don't like to seem like a tell-tale, but I hope you see that I only speak because I know Ruth will never excuse herself by telling all that Bella is so often teasing her about."

"You are a good girl, Letty, and I know you would not speak for yourself as you are now doing for Ruth. I wish I could be as satisfied with every one as I have always had reason to be with you. This affair is very unpleasant, but I am glad you have told me all."

Miss Windham then dismissed Letty, and Bella was called in. Ruth soon came to Letty in the playground, and putting her arms round her neck kissed her earnestly, and then said, "I did not know you properly before, and I think I have often been cross to you, but I know you will forgive me, dear, dear Letty." Ruth looked up at her gratefully.

"We will always be friends," answered Letty, smiling brightly as she returned Ruth's caresses. "We shan't be able to help it, shall we?"

So by degrees the storm blew over, but it was only the precursor of many others. Some of them were very small, but the constant recurrence of these petty annoyances did more harm than any real outbreak could have done. A cloud seemed to gather round Ruth, and her discontent grew more strong than it had been before the Easter holidays. Day after day passed with a monotony which seemed to her almost unendurable, and the only differences were that sometimes she was annoyed at one thing, and sometimes at another. Dissatisfied with the school, she sought to be alone; yet dissatisfaction with herself made her dislike solitude too. Letty had so many friends that she was hardly able to attend to Ruth, and so the little girl would listlessly pass away her leisure time. Reading had been again prohibited by the doctor as soon as she returned to school; so one pleasure which she had formerly enjoyed, was now unattainable.

"THE SACRED HEART."

THE adoration of the human heart of our Lord is the last phase of development in the doctrine and practice of the Roman Catholic Church. While one of its ablest advocates states that "devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus is as old as the mystery of the Incarnation," he candidly admits that it was not until "within the last two hundred years that this devotion took a thoroughly popular, precise, and definite form." It may be interesting to some to learn what this devotion to the Sacred Heart really means, and what were the circumstances under which it assumed that "popular and definite" form which led to a large number of otherwise sensible and rational English men and women going upon a pilgrimage to Paray-le-Monial. The Roman Catholic Bishop of Salford informs his people, in a letter addressed to them on this subject, that two hundred years ago our Blessed Redeemer, "in His exhaustless condescension of charity, was pleased to address Himself, by special manifestations and revelations of His love, to a simple nun, named Margaret Mary, living in a little convent at Paray-le-Monial, an obscure town of the province of Burgundy, in France." The bishop then approvingly quotes the following passage from the nun's writings, descriptive of her experiences.

"On St. John the Evangelist's Day, He (our Lord) bestowed on me a favour which seemed to me to be of the same nature as that received by the beloved disciple on the evening of the last supper. The Heart of Jesus was represented to me as on a throne formed of fire and flames, surrounded by rays more brilliant than the sun, and transparent as crystal. The wound which He received on the cross was clearly seen there. Around this Sacred Heart was a crown of thorns, and above it a cross which was planted in it." Then follows an account of a long conversation which ensued between the Saviour and the nun.

Does Bishop Vaughan really think that between such a vision as this woman's imagination pictured to her, and St. John sitting at a meal, and leaning on his Master's bosom, and speaking to Him in the presence of eleven others, there is the remotest resemblance as regards their reality? In the records of the frenzied imagination of hypochondriacal women is there to be found any more utterly incongruous description of a possible vision than that which Margaret Mary has written in the above words? The human heart of Christ, placed upon a throne surrounded with a crown of thorns, and pierced with a cross, is a mixture of historical facts and of poetic imagery than which it is almost impossible to conceive anything more shocking, more materialistic, more repugnant to our holiest feelings, or more desecrating to the sacred theme with which the crown of thorns and the cross are associated in the Divine Record and in the traditions of Christendom. And it is because of this vision the Church of Rome proposes to do special homage to the human heart of Christ. It is important to remember that whenever we speak of the human heart as the seat of affection we do so in a purely figurative sense. The heart performs in the human frame the simple function of a pump to send the blood throughout the body. But in a poetic or figurative sense we commonly speak of "loving with the whole heart." Altogether ignoring this, and with a thorough contempt for physiology, the Church of Rome in her new doctrine of devotion to the Sacred Heart proposes that Divine worship should be offered to the physical heart of our Saviour, as "the most perfect interpreter to man of the infinite charity and compassion of the Divine Nature," God having "revealed to us the mystery of His love through the action and sympathy of a loving human heart." Of course, such language if used in a poetical sense is intelligible enough; but the whole theory and principle of this new phase of Roman Catholic doctrine is that to the physical human heart the adoration is to be offered and the consecration made, as it is the actual source of the Redeemer's tenderness and love. It would be scarcely necessary to treat such teaching as serious, were it not that as a matter of fact thousands in England, Ireland, and France are carried away by this novel frenzy, and are consecrating themselves to this new phase of materialistic theology.

The bishop informs us that "the French regiments which most distinguished themselves during the late lamentable period of war and anarchy were those which were marshalled under the banner of the Sacred Heart." The bishop does not mention what regiments these were, but we must express some doubt that the discipline of the French army was so utterly ignored by any officers as to permit of their regiments being "marshalled" under any banner but the tricolour.

To what causes are we to attribute this new phase of enthusiasm in the Roman Catholic Church? I think we may regard it as in some measure a reaction from, or rather a counterbalancing element to, the excessive Mariolatry which the last century has been gradually developing. Any one who is familiar with the religious manuals and the various aids to devotion which have appeared in the Roman Catholic Church during the last quarter of a century, must be aware of the extraordinary—almost in some cases exclusive adoration which is bestowed upon the Virgin Mother of our Lord. It may seem an almost grotesque measure of devotion, to estimate it by the burning of common candles, but it is, nevertheless, worthy of observation, and extremely significant of the direction of religious thought, that the churches of the Continent have more votive offerings of this kind burning to the honour of the Virgin, than to her Divine Son. Indeed, in every way there is more in any Roman Catholic church at present to bring the Virgin present to our thoughts, than there is to remind us of the Redeemer. These are but the external yet sure evidences of the direction in which the thought, the feeling, the devotion of that church has been for ever tending. Not to Him as the loving Saviour, but to her as the influencing mother, have gone up the cries of despair, the agonies of supplication, the prayers of wounded, penitent hearts. The immaculate conception of St. Mary —picturesque ideals of her assumption into heaven—realistic interpretations of the poetic expression that a sword should pierce her heart —these are the subjects connected with the Christian faith which have been dwelt on with analytic minuteness by the divines, and received with the greatest enthusiasm by the people of the Roman Catholic Church. During a century of devotion to these objects—quickened and stimulated by vivid visions, the offspring of hysteria, and by imaginary miracles—the Roman Catholic Church seems (by comparison) almost to have forgotten the sublime purity of the Sermon on the Mount, the lonely agonies of Gethsemane, the Divine sorrow of the cross, the dying words of infinite love which came from those pale, patient, passionless lips, from beneath the awful shadow of the crown of thorns.

A kind of reaction would seem to have set in, or at least the leaders of Roman Catholic opinion seem to think some reaction desirable, and I cannot but regard this adoration of the Sacred Heart as a step in the attempt to accomplish it. The conviction has entered some minds that the Roman Church, if she is to bear the name of Christ at all, and not that alone of Mary, must do something to quicken thought in that direction, and cause the feelings of the faithful to be in some way aroused towards their Lord. Perhaps such a conviction should in itself be a cause of thankfulness, breaking as it does the monotony of Mariolatry; but the form of its expression, the means by which it is attempted to make it operative, are such as should cause unmixed regret to all who believe in the spirituality of the religion of Christ. Devotion to the teaching of Christ is to be increased by a gross materialism that would have disgraced the darkest ages of the mediæval Church. Rome has so long tortured the figurative expressions of Scripture into literal assertions—she has been so long zealous for the letter and indifferent to the spirit of her Master's teaching, and she has so persistently exalted the symbol as gradually to substitute it for what it was meant to typify, that though now as the darkness of eventide is gathering around her, and there appears to be entering her soul a conviction that she hath not gone in the way of truth, she seems capable only of returning in the old ruts of her own theology. She seeks to raise enthusiasm for Christ by dwelling with a literalism which shocks one's holiest feelings on the physical minutia of the body in which He agonised and died for men, by asking for special devotion to the heart of Jesus, separated from His body, and in a condition (pierced by a cross and crowned with thorns) in which that sacred heart never was, never could be, save in the fervid imagination of Margaret Mary. Against this, Christendom, jealous of the honour of her Lord, and loving purely even the veil of flesh in which the Son of man lived and died and rose, should utter her passionate protest. We should all strive the more earnestly, as we see how many are being led captive by this newly-invented doctrine, to deepen, by study of God's written Word and by prayer, the spirituality of our own faith. We see to what length a Church can be carried by the current of events when once she abandons the one only safe foundation for all faith—the deep conviction of the direct, immediate, personal relation between the living soul and the Father of spirits. Not by an ecclesiastical organisation, however complete or however useful—not by any ritual, however gorgeous or entrancing, will the individual life be sustained to subdue the temptations, to crush down the sins, and to bear the myriad sorrows of this earthly life, but only by that personal contact, ever deepening as the spiritual life progresses, between the soul and Christ, which Christ Himself has spoken of as our being in Him, and "He in us." Still, as of old, it is true, that the voice of God is not in the earthquake of national convulsion, not in the fires of an artificial enthusiasm—not in the whirlwind of religious excitements, but in the still small voice speaking to the penitent human heart.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

I. THE RARITY OF CHRISTIAN CHARITY. A SEASONABLE WARNING.

WOULD it not be useful to ask ourselves the question whether we are forgetting the true meaning of "charity" in the constant endeavour to take advantage of organised benevolent institutions, about the actual working of which we concern ourselves very little? As the years go on, and what we call civilisation advances, are we or are we not losing sight of "our neighbour" in a long vista of vicarious benefactions, bestowed through the medium of a subscription list, or casual contributions at an "anniversary festival?"

At the speeches that are made on such occasions, when the banquet is over, and the reading of the amounts subscribed is accompanied by the cracking of nuts and a crescendo or decrescendo of applause, in proportion to the liberality of the donors, we are so frequently reminded of "the good Samaritan," that we begin to feel that we may claim some kind of relationship to him; and may shake our heads with solemn sorrow at the inexcusable conduct of the priest and the Levite. It would be worth while, however, to ask ourselves whether we quite come up to the mark of him who, finding the man wounded and helpless by the wayside, dismounted that he might convey the sufferer to the nearest inn; poured out oil for his wounds and wine for his cheer; left him with money in hand for the supply of his immediate needs; and did not scruple—with a robust and secure honesty—even to get into debt on his behalf: since the crown of good-will would be the coming again to learn of the patient's welfare. The debt was a pledge of the intention.

That was the Lord Christ's way of looking at charitable responsibility, and at benevolent effort; and even granting that He illustrated the answer to the question, "Who is my neighbour?" by an extreme case of sudden distress, the longer we look at the peculiar needs of the man who was on his way from Jerusalem to Jericho, the more perhaps we shall be convinced that there are greater, far greater evils, and more terrible accidents, than to fall among thieves, who temporarily rob, strip, and disable their victim.

The present fashion of dealing with such an unfortunate traveller would very much depend on which particular class of philanthropists the modern Samaritan who found him by the roadside happened to belong.

Of course, it would be a scandal to our Christianity to follow either priest or Levite, although our cowardly sympathies might lie between the two; so, in order to make all safe, we hit on a compromise, and, according to our circumstances, try to find a medium line of conduct between Samaritan and Levite, or Samaritan and priest. We are ashamed to pass on without doing something, and so we call at the inn on our way, and leave the twopence there, in case anybody else should think fit to bring on the man who is lying, stunned and bleeding, in the roadway. Or else, having contrived to rouse the poor fellow to a little effort, we borrow an ass and take him back with us, to find some organised institution for the relief of those who fall among thieves, where the wine and oil are contracted for out of the funds. And there we leave him; but without remembering anything whatever about the twopenny contribution which would represent our own share in the benefaction.

It is an awful thought, and one which it may be hoped will soon become intolerable, that, with the mechanical perfection of the means of relieving the necessities of those who are afflicted, there seems to grow upon us a deadly indifference to the very deepest need of all—that personal, human sympathy, without which all our boast of benevolence is but as the sounding of brass and the tinkling of a cymbal. Can it be possible that we are approaching a condition when, refusing to have the poor and the afflicted, the widow and the orphan always with us, we shut them away out of our sight, leaving the whole duty of visiting them, of clothing them, of giving them meat and drink, to be done by an official committee; a charitable board, distributing doles, exactly calculated, on a carefully devised scale, and divided to the ounce or the inch, in supposed proportion to the individual need of each recipient? Will there ever come a time when we shall persuade ourselves that we fulfil the law of Christ by paying so much in the pound for a charity rate, and leaving all the actual "relief" to be effected by an official department, or a series of official committees?

The present aspect of charitable administration would be truly appalling if this were likely to be the result, for there are far too many evidences of that deadly indifference which will get rid of all real personal responsibility by paying a subscription, and will pay handsomely, too, at the same time smiling grimly, and half satirically, at the recollection that there are a number of people who always have on hand "cases," of whom they are anxious to rid themselves by placing them in any institution that will receive them without payment.

Let it not be imagined that these latter words of mine are intended to apply to those workers among the poor, who, with small means of their own, cannot do much more than speak words of advice and comfort, and give their earnest help to better the condition of sordid homes and of neglected children. There are scores of true, tender-hearted women who, spending much time amongst the sick and the afflicted, feel their hearts sink within them as they see how much more might be done, if they had but the wherewithal to appease the actual physical needs of those to whom they try to come spiritually near.

If but the miracle so easy to others were first performed, and the five thousand fed, then indeed might follow that still greater miracle, the earnest listening of the once turbulent multitude to the words of the Bread of Life.

But there are those who pursue what they regard as "charitable work" as an excitement—an amusement—just as children are sometimes set to play with Scripture conversation cards, and puzzles out of the Old Testament, with a kind of feeling that the employment comes nearly to a religious exercise. There is as much danger in these persons missing the true work of charity as there would be in the employment of paid officials—indeed, the latter would have one advantage; they would be less likely to be imposed upon by those who to obtain some special advantage would cringe and flatter.

As it is, the first great difficulty in visiting and temporarily relieving the lower class of destitute poor, is to disabuse their minds of the inveterate notion that the benevolent visitor and distributor is paid for the duty by some occult society, of which the recipients of bounty know nothing, and for which they care very little. Unfortunately, the sharp determined amateur visitor, who "does a district" as other people with leisure do a flower show or a morning concert——but, alas! these very words of mine show how common is that lack of true charity of which I designed to speak. Who am I that I should sum up the disposition and the heart of my brother or my sister? Only I would say that this suspicion on the part of the ignorant poor, which is so often complained of—the notion that their interviewers are paid for the work of charity—can only yield to the conviction that the work itself is undertaken with warm living human sympathy. Before the true relief shall come to any man, it must come by faith. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness," and in righteousness also.

The two tendencies that are driving us away from charity to a kind of selfish economy, are the habit of "relieving our overcharged susceptibilities by secreting a guinea," and thinking we have thereby fulfilled the claims of religion and humanity; and the practice of going about seeking where we may find candidates for other people's guineas, and so becoming a kind of charitable detectives, with an eye to reputation and advancement in the force.

We are forgetting that heartfelt sympathy, that clasp of the hand and beam of the eye which will make even a cup of cold water a benefaction, if we have no more to give, or if the need goes no further than a refreshing draught, that shall be turned from water into wine by the power of loving fellowship. Or we may be saying, "Be ye clothed, and be ye fed," trusting to some other hand to do the necessary work, without having ourselves first wrought for the means of taking our part in it, either by a deep personal interest in the relieving institution or in the destitute recipient.

"Yet one thing thou lackest,"—even though out of thy great possessions a large proportion is given to the poor; "follow thou me." Go about doing good," do not think to have fulfilled the law without love—that which you call charity; the mere giving—is but to offer a stone when bread is required of you, unless it be done with love in your heart—personal, human, and therefore Divine love. And then "if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?" Use the benefits of institutions—even though you use them only for others—as you would use your own property. Recommend only cases that are known to you to be worthy and necessitous, and, should the institution depend on voluntary support, let a contribution accompany your "case," if you can any way afford it, as an act of justice as well as of mercy.

Don't join in the traffic in votes, and never go begging for "proxies," in order to have an exchangeable stock on hand, that you may secure a candidate for any particular institution. This kind of gambling is a cancer that is eating the heart out of genuine, pure, charitable effort, and is making way for the cold impersonal system of distribution, which is now being advocated by those who would make the relief of human wretchedness and distress a mechanical organisation without the soul of love. At the same time, let us not forget that no charitable effort which would be efficacious in affording relief to the widely-spread distress by which we are surrounded, could be even so much as attempted without associations established for the express purpose of relieving particular forms of suffering. This, indeed, is the glory of our country, that humanity is so strong among us as to lead us not only to combine, but to emulate. The absolute concentration and centralisation of charitable effort would be a calamity. The breaking up of the best of our institutions, which have grown from small beginnings in almsgiving into wide and influential centres of benevolent effort, would be destruction.

If anything that shall be written hereafter concerning some representative efforts (large and small, but still truly representative) to do the work that Christianity demands as its first evidence of reality, should lead to a deeper and wider personal interest in their behalf, it will be matter for rejoicing. The larger the number of people who ask what is being done, the greater will be the desire to continue the good work, or to declare it. The attention that might in this way be directed to the mode of affording relief would exercise so keen an influence in the reformation of abuses, and the adoption of improvements, that all our charities would soon become truly "public." With the more earnest conviction of the duty of personal inquiry, and real sympathetic interest in the individual well-being of our poorer brother or sister, would come the satisfaction that we belonged to an association, or to a chain of associations, which would afford to him or to her the very relief which otherwise we should despair of securing.

I purpose in another number to ask you to read the story of an institution that was in its day wonderfully illustrative, and even now serves to take us back for two centuries of history. Only yesterday I was speaking to some of its inmates. One of them had nearly completed her own century of life, most of them had seen far more than the threescore years and ten which we call old age; but they came of a wonderful race, the men of fire and steel; the women of silent suffering—the old Huguenots of France.

A SONG OF THE SEASONS.

A WIND from out the golden west
Brought murmurs of the flowing sea;
The primroses awoke from rest,
The daisies shone upon the lea;
The lark sprang up his love to sing—
With sunlit eye and emerald wing,
Borne on the breeze, came smiling Spring.

In living light the land was gay;
And over hill and dale was heard,
Through glens and wild woods far away,
The voice of many a happy bird—
In rich array, with sparkling gem,
And flashing star, and crimson flame
Of bloom, the blushing Summer came.

Red Autumn, with her golden crown,
And fruits that in her lap she bore—
Begirt with yellow leaves and brown,
To strew about her ample store—
Fresh from her fields, with comely face,
With ruddy smile and matron grace,
Sat at the board, her wonted place.

A wind from out the northern skies,
A cloud from off the polar sea,
Swept o'er the land with wailing cries,
And nipped the daisies on the lea—
All night the blast blew loud and shrill,
At morn, in snowy garments chill,
White Winter sat upon the hill. J. HUIE.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. NEW SERIES. No. 8. DANIEL.

Chapters to be read—Dan. i., vi.

INTRODUCTION. Ask the children to name some of the persons upon whose lives they have had lessons, and also their occupations. Some have been kings, prophets, soldiers, priests, &c. In this lesson we shall speak of a statesman.

I. DANIEL A CAPTIVE. (Read Dan. i.) Ask the children the national sin of the Israelites; how it had been already punished, who had tried to reform the people, and with what partial success. Did they continue to serve God after Hezekiah, and point out how the latter kings of Judah were all idolaters. What warning was there in Hezekiah's reign of the destruction of the Temple, &c.? now just a hundred years afterwards the warning fulfilled. Picture the invaders driving the people captive before them; the long weary march of many days to Babylon, the people working as slaves. Remind of similar circumstances in Eli's days—what became of the ark? So now, vessels of Temple—candlestick, altar of incense, &c., placed in house of Nisroch (Isa. xxxvii. 38). Show how captivity would fall heaviest on those unaccustomed to work with hands—princes, lawyers, students alike. See, from ver. 3—5, how the king had pity on them, and chose some of them out to help him. Ask whom he selected—the healthy and well-educated—to be advanced in learning. Now picture the four young men (ver. 6) at the court, living in rooms at the palace, kindly treated, food and education provided. How did they behave? (1) They were temperate. Ask what the king provided for them. Why would they not eat it? What would natural temptation be? which would fit them best for study—plain or rich food? Perhaps also they declined it because they knew it had been offered in sacrifice to idols (see Ezek. iv. 13; Hos. ix. 3); if so, they would rather eat plain food than dishonour God (1 Cor. x. 28). Ask the obvious lesson as to moderation in eating and drinking. Remind of St. Paul's rule (1 Cor. ix. 27), and how we may with our bodies as well as spirits glorify God (1 Cor. x. 31). (2) They were studious. They were sent for to the palace to study, and did their duty; though captives, did not sulk, but did the best under the circumstances. What was the secret of this? Ask for others in a similar position, and show how Daniel, like Joseph, little maid, and others had learned contentment (Phil iv. 11). (3) The result. They increased in knowledge (ver. 17), and were in favour with those over them, till at last "they stood before the king;" i.e., became his advisers. Remind of Moses at Pharaoh's court, and show how useful they might be to their nation in captivity. Also refer to example of Christ (Luke ii. 52).

II. DANIEL A STATESMAN. (Read Dan. vi.) (1) His position. Not only a "seer" of future events, but a statesman of the highest rank (ver. 2). He was, like Joseph, "second in the kingdom;" such officer now called "viceroy" in Eastern countries, and "prime minister" in England. He held his office during three reigns, and for nearly seventy years. Show what benefit this would be to Jews during their seventy years' captivity, and how evidently it was God's doing, that the Jews might be preserved for their restoration. (2) His prophecies (Read Dan. ix. 2, 3.) Though so busy as a statesman, found time to keep up studies—ascertained duration of captivity, and interceded with God for its fulfilment. (3) His piety. From chap. vi. show that he was a man of prayer. The whole chapter need not be read as the story is familiar, but the following points may be noticed. (a) His regularity (ver. 10). He prayed three times daily. Though so busy, found time in middle of day, and so was in fear of God all day long. Ps. lv. 17 shows that David did the same. (b) His attitude. Not lazily sitting, but kneeling, as Christ at Gethsemane, and St. Paul (Acts xx. 36). (c) His earnestness. Not hurrying over prayers, but using "prayer, supplication (for others), confession, thanksgiving" (vi. 10, ix. 3). All these points for imitation. Then, referring to the well-known story, show what effect his religion had upon him. He was (a) blameless; his enemies could find no cause of offence except as regards his religion. (b) Calm. Not in least excited by the writing being signed against him. (c) Trustful. Picture him in his chamber, with open window, looking towards the Temple at Jerusalem, remembering Solomon's prayer for such (1 Kings viii. 48, 49), and God's deliverance in time of Hezekiah; can fancy his prayer for help, the result being that he was kept (d) safe. (See Isa. xxvi. 3.) And the king was made to believe in God (ver. 26).

PRACTICAL LESSONS. The whole story may be brought home to busy children, living where God is not feared; though only in shop, office, or factory, the principle the same. Quiet, industrious, consistent life, the result of prayerful communion with God, must be both happy and prosperous, and its influence sooner or later must be felt. Our duty to work, pray, trust, leaving results to God.

Questions to be answered.

1. By whom were the Jews taken captive, and in what reign?
2. Describe the position of Daniel and his friends as captives.
3. Name two things about them for our imitation.
4. What was Daniel's position at the court, and how did he fulfil it?
5. What points do you notice in his prayers?
6. What effect did his prayer have upon him?

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

CHAPTER XXV.

LOVE AND DEATH.

S if the very desire to live gave her a new hold upon life, Geraldine rallied daily after having been made aware of the worst. Those about her were not deceived—at least those who were wise enough—into thinking that she would ever be well again, but were thankful for the temporary respite. But she herself would indulge in hope; she would say, "When I am well," I will do this or that; as she had done when she had first fallen ill. "I should like to go out on Easter Sunday;" and when Easter Sunday came and went, and the improvement had not much advanced, she said. "The warm weather will be in by Whit-Monday, I am sure I shall be well by that time." It was sad to see her cling to life as she did, and tenderly those about her strove to loosen her hold on it. They feared to see her clinging to its last ledge as it were, and torn unwillingly from thence.

Mr. Huntingdon came to see her every day, learning more than he taught perhaps, but earnestly seeking to awaken in her the blessed hope of immortality. Many a searching question he had to answer, as the girl's eyes began to seek his, with more and more of trustful confidence; for what she wanted was a true human experience, the hold of a real hand to walk among the shadows.

Geraldine became the centre of the little circle, and her presence gave a new sense of reality to all their lives. Coming near her was like coming to a touchstone, where all that was unreal suffered detection, all that was worthless collapsed: and this not through any searching quality of intellect which she possessed. Geraldine was not clever as Ada was. Her mind was not dexterous, but slow. She did not receive impressions swiftly; but those which she did receive were indelible. The influence came out of her simplicity and directness—out of her ignorance itself, and also out of the position in which she stood. As a great black cloud in the background of a landscape will give a strange vividness to every object, a quite new distinctness of colour and outline, so did the darkness of death behind her give a new significance to the mortal things in the midst of which she moved, with light and radiance of youth and beauty still upon her.

Mr. Huntingdon coming home to his sister Clara remarked this. "I never knew before what the simplicity of the Gospel was," he said.

"God in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself," said Clara, looking up with a keen, sweet smile.

Clara as yet had not gone to see any one. She could not altogether conquer her shrinking from strangers, though it had lost much of the pain it inflicted on her once. But the day after her conversation with her brother, she went to see Geraldine. She had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Austin at the same time—a pleasure which she had longed for, but did not like to ask her brother to give her.

Mrs. Austin, on her part, felt a great attraction to Clara—an attraction which she felt, indeed, for all who were suffering and sorrowful, and which was heightened in this case by the charm of intellect and refinement which predominated in Clara. Ellen begged her to come and see her, and Clara promised to do so.

The improvement in Geraldine's health had been short-lived. April had passed away. The daffodils had come out under the lilac bushes at the bottom of the garden, each like a mimic sun shining its little day. The last were fading under cold inclement skies when May came in; and Geraldine was visibly fading too.

CHAPTER XXVI.

MUSIC CARRIES THE DAY.

Arthur Wildish delighted to draw out Ada after a good-humoured fashion, but he was forced to confess that in the playful encounter he had not always the best of it. Ada, who had got to believe in him as a sort of depositary of universal knowledge, very often puzzled him with her minute and curious questions, and did not spare him when he was at a loss for an answer.

One Saturday afternoon, when he came to inquire for Geraldine and to find Lucy—as, of course, everybody knew perfectly well—he missed the latter and came upon Ada alone. Ada was in one of her moods of excessive concentration, moods in which she appeared deaf and blind to everything but the purpose before her. She was pale, but so she always was, only the small mouth was closer and more colourless, and the grey eyes had a far-off look in them. On this occasion the eyes looked up into Arthur's face, and the mouth said promptly and plainly, "I wanted to see you alone." She showed no excitement and no confusion. She was utterly ignorant of any outrage on propriety, and shutting her prisoner into the drawing-room, she went away and left him in smiling wonderment. Presently she returned with a small portfolio. "I want to show you what I have been doing," she began, with a business-like air. "I have been working steadily, you know; and Lucy thinks my drawings very good considering."

"She has been giving you lessons, I think," said Arthur. "She herself draws exquisitely. She has had every advantage, you know," he added, for fear of giving discouragement. Ada spread her work before him while he was speaking; some of the things on mere scraps of drawing-paper, and he began to look over them. "But these are not all yours," he said quickly.

"Yes, they are," she answered.

"Then they are astonishingly clever. And has Lucy been your only teacher?" he added.

"My father used to give me lessons long ago," she said. "It was my favourite amusement when a child, but I never had any regular teaching."

"Lucy must be a very good teacher then," he said—she had his first thought, you see—"and you are an admirable scholar."

"Well," said Ada, rather impatiently, "I want to know if such drawing is of any value."

"Money value do you mean?"

"There isn't any other," said Ada, with a smile.

"No, I don't think they have," he answered. "You see so many can do things as well as that; and if not so well, still well enough to please themselves; so that the people who would care for them don't want them. Then the people who buy pictures wouldn't care for them."

"Now will you hear me sing?" said Ada, to the still greater astonishment of the unlawfully detained Arthur.

"I didn't know you sang," he said, without expressing any desire for the performance, and thinking it untimely only that Ada was so grave about it.

"I am going to try," said Ada. "Will you play for me the music of that song Lucy sang the other evening? You played it for her."

That was something very different, still he sat down to the piano. "'The Brook,' you mean," he said.

"Yes, I have heard it several times, and tried it," said Ada.

He could not think what she was driving at, but he played, and Ada sung. She sung, as she did everything, without trepidation, without consciousness; and went through the song unfalteringly, triumphantly. It was the triumph of a perfect voice and of a perfect ear.

Arthur Wildish was enthusiastic now. "Why, Ada, you would make a great singer," he said, attracted to the girl as he had never been before, seeing a great gift possessed in such perfect humility.

"Then I will be a great singer," she answered instantly. "I want to make money, and to make it fast. If you had thought I could paint pictures that would sell, I would have been a painter; but the singing seems the easiest."

Arthur laughed. "You have high aims, but a low motive, Ada," he said. "What makes you love money so?"

"Tell me what I must do?" she asked, quite unheeding alike his praise and dispraise, and passing over his question.

"You must study hard, and under the best masters you can get," said Arthur; "and you have talents well worth cultivation. You might be either a painter or singer if you chose."

"Which takes the longest time to learn, singing or painting?" said Ada, hesitating a little.

"I would recommend you to study both," replied Arthur. "I am sure your cousin will be happy to give you the means of doing so. The music will help you in painting and the painting in music, and there is nothing good under the sun that will not help you in both."

"Oh, but there is not time for all that!" said Ada, quickly, perceiving the vagueness of his advice; "I want to be paid for what I do at once."

"In music, I suppose, you might do a little in that way," he answered. "You might teach and work at once; but I don't know much about that."

"It was you who told me how much the great singers could make, hundreds of pounds in a single night," said Ada. "I heard you say you had been at a private concert at the house of a German merchant where Mdlle. Titiens got fifty guineas for singing a couple of songs."

"Well, but you are not Titiens. You may expect to get the same when you have become as accomplished and famous as she," returned Arthur, amused. "But what a mercenary little thing you are, Ada. This, then, is your reason for asking so many questions about art and music, taking such an interest in the fortunes of their followers, and all the rest of it, which puzzled us so."

"Yes, I have thought of it before, but now I must do it," said Ada, quite gravely. "I must make money somehow. Cousin Fanny has lost hers. She has been very kind to us, and I must make it up to her."

"I am very sorry to hear of your cousin's loss," said Arthur; "I hope it is not ruinous."

Ada did not answer, but when Arthur rose to take his leave she thanked him very heartily, opened the door for him, and he went straight into Mr. Tabor's, and found Lucy also alone. "What a strange girl that Ada Lovejoy is," he said to Lucy. "One can hardly tell whether to like or dislike her; at one time she is so matter-of-fact and dull, and at other times all fire and impulse."

"I am beginning to like her better than I did," said Lucy. "Do you know what she puts me in mind of?"

"No."

"A glass of cold water."

"Well, I think she does throw cold water on most things."

"No, it is not that—that was what I disliked her for—only dislike is much too strong. After you have been eating sweets, the first sip of cold water is distasteful; but when you are really thirsty it is more delightful than anything else."

"She is certainly refreshing."

"Yes; and when I have found myself inclined to be angry with her way of putting things, I have found afterwards that it was only that she was putting them in a perfectly direct point of view, while I wanted to look at them in relation to something else more agreeable to my own notions. But what has Ada been saying now?"

Arthur gave an account of his so recent encounter, ending with the loss of Fanny's fortune.

"She must be mistaken—she is surely mistaken," said Lucy, in a tone of such extreme agitation as amazed Arthur Wildish. Lucy was getting further and further out of reach of understanding, it seemed to him. Here she was, with the colour flying from her cheeks at the bare mention of the probable loss of property by a rather uninteresting elderly lady, and quite insensible to all the attractions of love and fortune which were at her service in his single person. She was evidently very much moved by what he had told her, and till he took his leave kept the restless and unhappy look which had come into her face, and the distraction of manner which showed that she was barely listening to his talk, that her mind was, indeed, wandering. She felt that it had, for her look at parting was like a plea for forgiveness; and when he left her she sat down like one who is suddenly set free from some hard task at playing a part, and allowed her face to become a perfect picture of tearless anguish.

She was startled almost immediately by the entrance of Ada. She had rushed in without her hat—her bright hair, child fashion, flying loose behind her—to give Lucy her version of the interview with Arthur.

"You will help me?" she said, when she had ended, and mentioned nothing whatever concerning her cousin.

"Yes, I will help you, Ada; but you have not told me about the loss of your cousin's money," said Lucy. "What is it? Are you not mistaken?"

"No, I am not mistaken," said Ada, indignantly. "Mr. Tenterden told her himself that he had lost it and ruined her. He says he will try and make it up to her, but I don't believe he ever will."

"You must not say this, Ada," said Lucy, quietly but firmly, acting a part once more. "I do not believe it, and if it were true you ought not to say it. Do you know it may seriously injure Mr. Tenterden, and perhaps others also—my father, for instance?"

Ada looked rebuked. "Fanny said I was not to tell," she exclaimed; "at least, that I was not to tell Geraldine and the rest."

"Then why did you tell me?"

"I did not promise to keep it a secret," said Ada.

"Promise now, then," said Lucy.

"Very well, I promise," said Ada lightly, and she sat down before Lucy's piano and ran her fingers over the keys, blindly searching for their music.

The room swam round with Lucy, but she sat patiently till her father and mother came in, and it was close on dinner-time, giving Ada her first lesson in music. (To be continued.)

THE PALIMPSEST.

THESE sunlit walls on Athos' heights
The sailor marks with glee,
A holy gem whose radiance lights
The blue Ægean Sea.

No echo from the world's unrest
Within these cells can come;
Peace broods around the Dove's own nest,
This pure and pray'rful home.

Here, long to this one task resigned
A monk with loving zeal,
Some mouldy parchment hopes to find
Which new truths will reveal.

Watch how with eager care he turns
Each scroll and scans each page;
And o'er this timeworn Father yearns,
And dies with that old sage.

The sun sinks, yet he will not leave,
So much remains unread!
Day's last smiles through the casement weave
An aureole for his head.

The cypress on the terrace glooms,
With twilight still he bends,
Still ponders where the ink entombs
The thoughts of well-loved friends.

At length he stops—his bright eye shines,
He carries to his cell
A tattered reed-scroll whose dark lines
Some novel truth may tell.

Searching the large bold strokes with care,
St. Ephraem's hymns he finds;
Then sighs and with a whispered prayer
The roll again unwinds.

He holds it to his lamp, blurred specks
Start forth beneath the hymn:
Like images the soul collects
From dreams all faint and dim.

Spelling, his soul within him stirred,
He now the text can see—
"IF YE CONTINUE IN MY WORD,
THE TRUTH SHALL MAKE YOU FREE."

"Ah, blessed sentence! Lord, forgive!"
The humbled brother cries,
"In the old ways I still would live,
The old pure wisdom prize.

"Enough for me Thy will to know,
Enough if Thou uphold
My stumbling footsteps, time can show
No new truths like the old!"

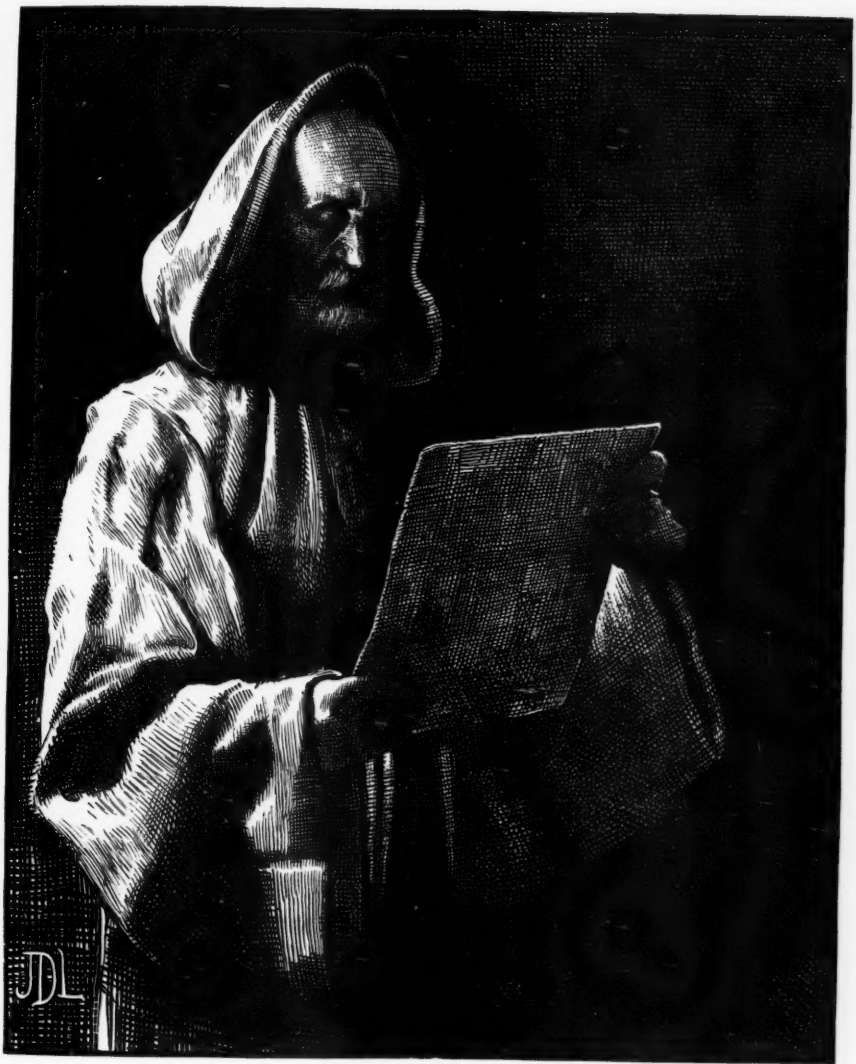
THE GRIEFS OF CRIPPLE TOM.

CHAPTER II.



FOR several weeks Tom came to school regularly enough, but he was too shy to open his mouth in answer to a question. At last his shyness wore off, and he would give ordinary formal answers readily enough to commonplace questions about God, heaven and hell, and the main facts of the Gospel history; but he had no real conception whatever of the things of which he spoke. He had no notion whatever of the size of Stonyfield parish as compared with the rest of the country. Such words as "mountain," "sea," "city," "king," had for him either no meaning, or conveyed to his mind only the vaguest and most incongruous ideas. Much less had he any realisation of an unseen, kindly, watching Spirit, or of a disembodied state. When he was told of the sufferings and death of Christ, he was unmoved, for he had never really turned his mind from the present to consider death; when he heard of the resurrection, it was without surprise, for the faculty of wonder was still asleep within him.

On the sixth Sunday after his first appearance at school Tom's place was vacant. On Tuesday Miss Burton met him, and learnt that he felt ashamed to go to school in his moleskin clothes. She called at his mother's cottage and spoke of it to her.

"Well, I'm sure, ma'am," began Mrs. Robinson in a complaining tone, "I'm sure, ma'am, I can't provide clothes for him. What with coals at eighteenpence a hundred, and meat at tenpence and elevenpence a pound—but I'm sure it's but seldom a poor person can get a bit o' fresh meat—and potatoes that bad, and dear too, and three and sixpence for rent, for all that Robinson brings home, it's impossible for me to have either him or myself decent, fit for to go to church. I'm sure I never expected to be so long at Stonyfield and never enter the church-door, as me and Robinson have lived in the village this seventeen—no, it's eighteen—eighteen years next spring; but it's a poor life and a hard life for poor people at the best."

The lady saw that nothing could be done with her, and soon left the cottage.

Miss Burton next asked her uncle's advice. "Yes, my dear, it's just what I expected," he answered; "those people give you so many school and church attendances in return for so many old clothes and half-crowns and bottles of wine when they're sick. What's to hinder Joe Robinson from clothing his son properly? It only pauperises such people to give to them."

Driven thus to rely upon her own resources, Miss Burton held a long conversation with Tom, the result of which was that he hired himself out to do various little services for the farmers in the neighbourhood, and with the help of his teacher, who provided half the money, not many weeks afterwards he appeared at Sunday-school in a full suit of gorgeous blue.

Very shortly after this it became evident that the cripple was becoming vain of his personal appearance—in fact, exceedingly self-conceited. This characteristic, of which not a trace was visible before he got his suit of new clothes, speedily made him the butt of the school and of the village; but to a careful eye it seemed not so much the ugly fruit of a natural and confirmed over-estimate of himself, as the result of the sudden dawn of a conviction that he was capable of better things than he had hitherto dreamed of—nay, that he had taken one step towards a more respectable life—joined to a natural incapacity for estimating himself at his true value. One circumstance that rendered it very difficult for Tom to gratify his new vanity was that, from a failure of the little jobs which he was able to do, he could not provide himself with minor articles of clothing to correspond with the new suit. His mind was absorbed in this passion with that intensity of which only a child's mind is capable. Yet Tom was not a child, but in that border-time between childhood and manhood when the nature is more sensitive than at any earlier or later time, when the wounds of ridicule burn more painfully and rankle longer than they ever do in a child or in a man. He felt keenly, therefore, the incongruity between his brilliant jacket and his dingy blue-and-white cotton shirt, when he went to school and church, although none of his companions dared to rally him upon the subject under their teacher's eyes, and Tom gave them very little opportunity of doing so out of doors. But it was at home that the poor boy suffered most. His father never tired of making coarse jokes at his deformed son and his changed appearance; while the lad shrank as much as possible from his father's sight, and tried to conceal his efforts at finery on Sunday afternoons. Miss Burton was sorry to see this fault in Tom, but she thought that possibly it might be the first step towards a brighter life for him, so she wisely refrained from saying a word to him on the subject.

About this time she was called away to London, to see a sick relative; and the curate, Mr. Brooke, undertook to supply her place in the Sunday-school. One Sunday afternoon shortly afterwards, Mrs. Robinson was preparing dinner in the kitchen, and Tom was dressing for school in the loft overhead which was his bedroom, when his father came in and began to make fun of Tom, as he was specially fond of doing when he was in either a particularly merry or a particularly cross humour: to-day he was in rather a merry humour.

"Nell, where's our gentleman?"

Nell was busy and did not answer him.

"Where's our gentleman, Nell—the great beauty, ye know?"

"Tom's up in the loft, Joe; let him alone; dinner's ready, and it'll be as cold as the floor ye're standin' on afore you begin; then it'll be my fault, of course."

"Tom, come down t' your dinner," called out his father again; "how could we begin without the fine gentleman, when we've got one? But it's no dinner for a gentleman: gentlefolks have somethin' better'n liver an' bacon. Why don't ye buy yerself a fine dinner, Tom? I wonder you'd eat the likes of this; but it's all a poor man like me can get; we're not all born beauties and gentlefolks."

This coarse and stupid ridicule hurt poor Tom inexpressibly. He knew he was earning nothing for his living, and could not find just then any more of the jobs by means of which he had helped to pay for his clothes. All the worse was it, too, that afternoon, for Tom had got a paper collar, and a bit of coloured silk, which he had persuaded his mother to make up into a large scarf for his neck, so as to hide his shirt. The lad was forced to come down-stairs with his flaring black-and-red scarf and white collar fastened together, rather insecurely, to his shirt by means of a large pin at the front of his neck, knowing as he came that his appearance would afford fresh fun to his father.

A roar of laughter greeted him. "Finer nor ever! Are ye goin' a-coortin,' Tom? Ye must be! Who is't, Tom—Maggie Davis?"

Now Maggie was the belle of the village, whom Tom regarded, from afar, as an angel in human shape; so he could not bear it any longer, but started up and hurried from the cottage as fast as his crutch would enable him to go. His father enjoyed the success of the last taunt immensely, and ate his dinner with increased appetite, while his wife put by a piece to be warmed up for Tom after church-time; and Tom himself wandered down the road, feeling that he hated his father and everybody else, till it was time for school.

As soon as Mr. Brooke entered the schoolroom, he was struck by the grotesque appearance which Tom presented, seated at the end of a bench of boys, all of whom were much smaller than himself, half conscious of the amusement he was creating around him, and half-defiant. The opening prayer and hymn over, the lesson began. The room was much too small for the number of classes and scholars which it held, so that in the case of a large class like Miss Burton's, it was often difficult or impossible to make one half of the class hear and attend to what was being said to the other half. The boys were arranged in a semicircle, and Mr. Brooke stood before them and began to question them on the subject of the lesson, which was "Jonah."

"What was the name of the prophet who was sent to Nineveh to preach?" asked Mr. Brooke of the boy on his right hand. He could not answer, and the question passed to the next boy. Tom thought he could answer it, and held out his arm at full length in token that he was ready to do so; but as he was sitting next to the teacher's left hand, it was evident that Tom's chance of displaying his knowledge was not great. Some one answered the question, and another question was put and answered, but Tom, in the hum of other voices, did not perceive this. Neither did he notice that Mr. Brooke had put a third question,—"What was prepared in the sea to swallow up Jonah?" So Tom thinking that the question about the prophet's name was still unanswered, and still stretching out his arm, and leaning forward in his excitement till he almost fell off the bench, waited till Mr. Brooke's eye, passing over a few more boys, rested upon him, when he at once bawled out, "Moses!"

At this moment the treacherous pin at his neck gave way, the paper collar started out on either side and the red silk scarf fell forward over his waistcoat, laying open to full view his striped blue shirt, which happened to be in a dirtier state than usual. The titter which had broken out at the ridiculous answer swelled into a roar at this exposure; and Mr. Brooke, speaking to himself, and not meaning to utter the words aloud, said in a low tone, "Why, the poor boy must be silly."

These words combined with the laughter, gave the lad more pain than he could bear, so he rose, and without waiting to get his cap, hobbled out of the schoolroom. He walked up the long, dusty road, where he had first met Miss Burton, with his heart smarting with pain and full of bitterness. Bitterest of all was the feeling that he had himself to blame; he had made himself appear a fool in the eyes of what was to him all the world, and his shame would never be forgotten. He went on till he came to a grassy place beside a pool. There he flung himself down, and sobbed out his misery. Several hours passed before he rose from the grass. Then he took the scarf and collar which still hung about his neck, and wrapping them tightly round a stone, he flung them into the middle of the pool; then he went slowly home, through a mist in the autumn evening.

THE OLD AND NEW YEAR.

ANOTHER year is dead—its joys and sorrows
Are sweeping swiftly down the tide of Past,
Like drift-wood thrown upon the rapid river,
Toward ocean's distant thunder eddying fast.

Another year is dead—its joys and sorrows
Have almost reached Oblivion's ruthless sea;
And will they? or will Memory's counter-current Sweep them as swiftly back again to me?

Another year is come—its joys and sorrow
Are graven on Futurity's dark scroll,
Which man may scan not yet, but each to-morrow
Time's wizard hand will ever more unroll.

Another year is come—and we are drifting,
Still drifting onward to another sea,
Trackless, untried, unfathomable, endless—
The darkling billows of Eternity.

THE LILY OF THE VALLEY.

ALL clothed around by the dew-varnished sheen
Of thy young leaves so delicately green,
That clasp their darling when the winds are keen;
Surely thou art a saint among the flowers,
Sweet lily of the valley, hiding low
In some dim nook, far from this world of ours,

Where only garish things are glad to grow.
How many gentle hearts would emulate
The sweet example of thy life, could they,
Hiding from tardy love and ready hate,
Find some still spot to meditate and pray;
Some little chapel where the wearied soul
Might hear the symphonies of Heaven roll,
And stainless dwell until exhaled away.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER VII.

"RUTH! you're wanted," cried Letty, one afternoon, as she bounded into the play-ground, looking as if something very exciting had happened.

"Who wants me?" asked Ruth, wonderingly.

"It is Dr. Rae; he has come to fetch you for a drive, and I am so glad!"

Ruth's pale little face lighted up with joy, and she began running towards the house. Suddenly she stopped, and turning round, said, "Letty, what a dear you are to be so glad for me! I wish you were coming too."

"Don't have the pleasure incomplete by wishing anything," replied Letty, kissing Ruth. "Be quick and dress, so as to have a nice long drive."

In a few minutes the carriage was driving away with the doctor and Ruth in it; she leaving her woes behind her, and, looking up into Stephen's face with a grateful smile, she met his kind answering look.

"It is a long time since we have met, little one," he said. "We miss you very much at home. Tina sent her love, and says she doesn't know how to get on without you and Mary."

"Give my love to her, and to the others, will you? It seems so long ago now since we were at your house."

"What was that sigh meant for?" asked Stephen.

"I don't know; I mean I did not know I sighed."

"But you know what was the cause of your sigh," said Stephen. "You must have no secrets from me."

"I have no secret; but I can't tell you, because I don't know that I was thinking anything particular."

"I think I can tell you what made you sigh, though it is unknown to you." Ruth looked inquiringly at Stephen, and remained silent. "It is because you feel as you did the first time you drove out with me. Do you remember you told me then that you were discontented with your life?"

"Yes," answered Ruth, softly.

"You asked me if you were wrong to be so, and I said no; but it is wrong to remain so now."

The time passed very swiftly, till they returned to the school.

"Give my love to your sister, Ruth, and don't forget about next Wednesday. I wish I could fetch you, but you had better go without waiting for me, as I know I shall be late."

"It will seem strange to go without you," said Ruth; "but why did you tell me not to forget, as if I could do such a thing!"

"Perhaps it was for the pleasure of hearing you make that protestation," answered Stephen, laughing.

From that day Ruth began to apply herself with greater interest to her lessons, and soon found it much easier to attend when she had once begun. Study lost a great deal of its tedium, and Ruth's progress caused great satisfaction to Miss Windham, and her sister, Miss Caroline. Delivering a kind lecture to Ruth upon her previous carelessness, Miss Windham expressed much pleasure at her improvement, and Ruth became quite a distinguished member of the school. Time passed away pleasantly, and the visits to the Raes were very frequent, Letty often being one of the guests. Still there were drawbacks to the school life which Ruth felt very strongly, and her thoughts dwelt constantly upon the midsummer holidays, with many wishes that the time would arrive quickly.

One afternoon Ruth was busy writing an essay, a thing at which she showed great ability, when Mary came into the room.

"Oh, Ruth! I thought you were writing to papa; you said you should last week, and if you don't do it now you won't be in time."

"I had quite forgotten, but I must do this now, so I must leave the letter till next mail."

"How can you, Ruth? I do believe it is about two months since you have written to papa, and you seem to think nothing of it," said Mary, reproachfully. "Hadn't you better write the letter now, and finish that in the evening?"

"Oh! Mary, the Raes—I was going there, and I am sure papa won't mind if I write next mail."

"I should think he would mind very much if he thought you preferred the Raes to your own father," answered Mary, with a heightened colour.

"I know you think I am very wicked, but I can't help it," said Ruth, passionately; "I can't be dutiful as you can."

Mary turned away, and left the room without saying another word; leaving Ruth very miserable, and wholly unable to go on with her writing. She remained with her hands covering her face, perfectly motionless, until the clock struck half-past five; she then went in to tea.

"Why, Ruth, I thought you had gone to the Raes," said Miss Caroline, as she appeared.

"I haven't finished my lessons, Miss Caroline," was the scarcely audible reply.

Miss Caroline smiled. "You are generally so energetic on half-holidays, and I don't think you had more to do than usual, had you, dear?"

"No, Miss Caroline." Ruth was not communicative, and relapsing into silence as soon as possible, she was asked no more questions.

When bedtime came, Ruth went up to Mary, and whispered, "Mary, I am so sorry!"

"Never mind, darling," answered Mary, kissing her; "we won't say any more about it, and you will write next week, won't you?"

"Yes." Ruth said good night, and went to bed to lie awake, and think a long time. "I wish Mary wouldn't say we will not speak any more about it. I am sure she still thinks I am wrong, though she forgave me for what I said to her. Oh, dear! I suppose it is wrong not to care for papa more than anybody else, as Mary thinks so; but I wish she would tell me why it is." Ruth puzzled her little head upon the subject most perseveringly, but it had a bad effect upon her spirits, and when Mary looked at her, as she lay asleep, the tears were still wet on her eyelashes.

"If mamma could take care of her," thought Mary; "how much better it would be." She sighed, and bent down to kiss the little sleeping figure, and looked at her with deep anxiety. If Ruth had seen her standing by her bed that night, she would have been touched by the entirely self-forgetful and protecting look that her sister's face wore, and she might have awakened to a true estimation of Mary's earnest wish to be as like a mother to her as it was in her power to be.

CHAPTER VIII.

"WHAT is the time, Susan?" asked Tina, as Susan was busy setting the tea in the garden; "I feel as if they were very late."

"I think it is only because you are on thorns like, miss," answered Susan, smiling; "but I expect the doctor will be here soon, for I heard William say he would be early."

"I know Miss Ruth is so fond of wild flowers, see what a lot I have here."

"Oh, my!" exclaimed Susan. "Let me help you, Miss Tina, and we'll get them arranged in a trice." She darted away, and soon returned with several vases, and she and Tina became absorbed in their work. Presently Mrs. Rae and Maurice strolled out into the garden, and not long after, the deep barking of a dog caused Tina to rush to the garden door, and flinging it open, she received Ruth and Mary in her arms, and then there was a great bustle of greetings, and Bernard, the large dog, bounced about the garden, looking out for somebody who was disengaged enough to notice him.

"How lovely it is to think we shall have you for such a long time!" said Tina, with her cordial smile. "How long are the midsummer holidays?"

"Seven weeks," answered Mary. "It is glorious, isn't it?"

The three girls seated themselves at the tea-table. Susan tripped about, very smiling, and Bernard watched the scene, seated majestically by Stephen.

"These flowers are especially in honour of you, Ruth," said Stephen. "Maurice and Tina have been gallantly scaling banks and getting wounded with thorns for your sake."

"I am very much obliged," answered Ruth, laughing; "but I wish they had not suffered for their kindness."

"Stephen is croaking, like most doctors," said Maurice, "and the only ground for what he says is, that Tina pricked herself with one thorn, which he was skilful enough to pull out for her."

"Hark! I hear a boat; perhaps it is one of the Forsters," said Tina, running down to the stream. "Yes, it is. Why, Lily, you are a late visitor!"

"Yes," answered Lily, jumping out of the boat; "but Jack was home so late, and I wouldn't be baulked by that."

The party remained in the garden, and the rest of the evening passed in conversation.

"I have such a splendid idea!" exclaimed Tina, "do let us get up a picnic. Wouldn't it be nice, now the weather is so lovely, and Mary and Ruth are with us?"

There was no dissension from this opinion, and a grand discussion ensued as to the details of arrangement for the occasion.

"I want to ask a favour of you, Ruth," said Maurice, when Ruth came up to him to say good night, and holding her hand, he continued, "will you grant it?"

"I don't know," answered Ruth, looking up into his face inquiringly.

"Will you sit to me for your portrait?"

"Oh yes. That is not much to ask me."

"I think it troubles some people very much, to sit still and do nothing," said Maurice. "You must allow me to be grateful."

"Then I am not one of those people, for I don't mind how idle I am," replied Ruth, laughing, as she ran away into the house.

After breakfast the next morning, Tina went out of the breakfast room and returned a minute afterwards with her sleeves rolled up and a cooking apron on. "I want you all to see how industrious I am going to be," she said. "You will think of my kindness to-morrow, when you are enjoying the fruits of my exertions."

Maurice then asked Ruth to come to the studio, so in spite of her determination never to go there again, she did so.

"Sit down, Ruth," said Maurice, handing her a chair; "I shall be ready to work in a few minutes."

He then began arranging the light, talking all the while.

"How do you like the idea of the picnic?" he asked.

"Very much," answered Ruth, slowly.

"Rather a doubtful liking, I think. What is the reservation?"

"Well, I like the idea of going to see the abbey; but then there will be some strangers, won't there?"

"A few that you don't know, certainly; but is that fatal to your enjoyment?"

"No, not fatal, because there are so many people going that I like, but I always dread strangers—I wish I didn't, for it isn't nice at all."

"Yes, you are a very shy little thing," said Maurice, smiling. "What do you feel afraid of?"

"I don't know exactly. I can never make out what shyness is, quite. If I could, perhaps I could get over it."

"I think some shyness is caused by a consciousness of inefficiency, but some by the fear of not meeting with sympathy. Don't you think so?"

"Yes, but there must be more than those two kinds, I should think," said Ruth, resting her arm on the table and her head on her hand, while her face became thoughtful.

"Will you keep so? that position is capital, and very characteristic," said Maurice.

The room became quite silent, Maurice becoming very absorbed in his painting, and Ruth being quite content to be left to her own resources. For some time Maurice went on with his work; but at last he leaned back in his chair, and looked at Ruth steadily.

"How capitally you sit, Ruth! You had better rest now."

"I am not tired."

"Still I think you must be, in spite of what you say. Do you find it dull sitting here?"

"No, not in the least," answered Ruth, smiling.

"I can see your mind is quite occupied. Will you tell me what you were thinking of just now?"

"I was thinking of different things; but I don't know that I was thinking at all, part of the time."

"Yes, you were," said Maurice. "When you imagined that you were not thinking, you were deepest in thought."

Ruth opened her eyes wonderingly. "How can you tell that?" she asked.

"Well, I don't know whether it is true, but I believe that your mind was too busy for you to be conscious of the act of thinking."

"Oh! I see. I have never thought of that before. But, then, I have seen people's faces have a vacant expression sometimes, as if they really were not thinking of anything; and I think it is quite possible for people to think of nothing, now and then."

"Yes, that is true; but some people are different from others," said Maurice, with a peculiar smile. Ruth did not understand it, but somehow felt rather abashed, as she very often did with Maurice.

THROUGH FIRE AND WATER.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A., RECTOR OF ARMAGH.

"When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee."—Isa. xliii. 2.

IT is strange to picture to oneself the feelings of a martyr, a night before he dies. No excitement is in his lonely cell to intoxicate him with any spurious courage. In silence, weary, his mind reverts to the stern tribunal which doomed him, and to the stern doom. He knows nothing of the feelings which other ages may lavish upon him: to him no faces are visible but such as expect his coming sufferings to usher in the sufferings of the damned. He hopes not for escape—he knows that pain will not be an illusion, but real and keen, since his testimony to the power of Christ to uphold in the worst extremity would be a mockery unless that extremity came indeed, unless pangs did really search his frame, unless his soul went forth in genuine anguish.

What sustains him in this frightful prospect? The sure persuasion that the Spirit shall overcome his flesh, and that even when his outward man is perishing, his inward man shall be renewed, because his Father will hold him up; the still small voice, which a clamorous world cannot exclude, saying, "Fear not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God." This breathes a courage not to be quenched by the frown of tyrants, the scowl of persecutors, the hoarse and pitiless roar of mobs.

The text which heads this paper is a good text for martyrs. And yet, one thinks, why are they not saved out of the fire and water, instead of being helped through these? Why, if indeed God loves and pities men, expose them to such miseries? How much better to divert their path, than to hold them up when their feet are torn and bleeding? An answer is at hand, and while we must always regard our explanation of such things as being fragmentary and incomplete, in this case the answer will be sufficient. Which reflection best sustains our faith and the faith of thousands, that some Christians have glided comfortably through smooth lives, and died resignedly on beds of down, or that others, hunted out of dens and caves, and burned to ashes, have in all been more than conquerors? One class elicits in modern phrases the devil's ancient sneer, "Doth Job serve God for nought?" The other gives fire to that verse in the Te Deum, "The noble army of martyrs praise Thee,"—martyrs, but an army still. Therefore all worthy followers of Christ, who was contented to die for others, have rejoiced when offered upon the sacrifice and service of our faith.

But when we recognise this truth for the great and famous, the champions, the forlorn-hope of the faith, we are bound also to recognise it for ourselves. Each has to say to his own heart, "When thou passest through the waters, God will be with thee." Not if thou passest, but when. For that time will come, and that hour draw near to every one of us. While he was yet led in green pastures, the psalmist remembered the valley of the shadow; the apostle bade us count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations, and the Master of apostles said, "In the world ye shall have tribulation."

Let us press upon our hearts this old familiar truth. It has no more novelty than Christianity itself has. But practical things are not to be repeated only once, they should be engraven upon the mind by reiterated strokes; and a time is before every man when he shall fare like a storm-beaten ship, the foam and the black darkness visible by the lightning flashes, and nought else visible at all, and either he must be hurled upon the crags and broken, or hold fast by this one anchor, "I am with thee."

1. For some, there is the time of remorse. The soul has fallen: the white garment is defiled; something is committed which can never be forgotten, and never, never undone. Perhaps one is loaded in conscience by a crime, a deed which even the world, if it knew, would call dishonourable and mean, which he blushes to think of, and feels that a river of pollution rolls between him and the saints of God. Or even if the world might be indulgent, one shudders to be searched by the keener vision and under the stronger light of the law of God, feels that all is lost, that the depths cover him, and the proud waters come in upon his soul.

Unhappy at such a time the man who knows not that God is near, that his Father is breaking down the pride which would not melt for gentler influences, or who knows it, but will not yield. Yes, twice and three times unhappy, for the twin brother of Remorse is Despair; and there are who lie, dead while they live, fast bound in misery and iron, and the sorrow of the world which worketh death. Even visibly it worketh death—in a soul's drugged, stupefied, hopeless and indolent helplessness, in the sullen performance of a dull round of weary, lifeless tasks, in lunacy, in the premature end, sometimes in the self-inflicted end of mortal life, it is seen how cruelly the sorrow of the world can work death.

Still, still, there is One who sees and pities all our misery, and His heart melts, and His hand is stretched out to help. "Return," He cries, "return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal you." And he who tries His strength, who rises up in the might of God revealed in flesh against the enslaver of souls, he knows whether it is vainly promised that God shall bruise Satan under our feet shortly. The waters are there, but they do not overflow him: upon him the fires do not kindle.

2. For all, there is the time of temptation. Some people fancy that if they are accepted of God, temptation should thenceforth be like a tamed snake, its sting and venom extracted. But this is a fatal error, since dark and evil thoughts have but to assail them, and their faith in God is shaken. The servant is not above his Lord, and our Saviour was Himself tempted. If our pilgrimage seem easy just now, and we are like Christian among the Delectable Mountains, let us not presume, nor think our battle to be closed, and our enemy departed from us more than "for a season." A change may come: it will come. Dark misgivings may yet assail the foundations of our faith, thoughts at which we shudder and turn pale, may yet fascinate the soul with a serpentine basilisk power of evil. Things which once seemed innocent, or which were taken on trust, or into which one was overpersuaded and enticed, may become a crushing burden upon the conscience, while yet the tempted one thinks, fears, that now to change would forfeit daily bread or friendships dearer than life. The indulgence may even have passed into the system and become part and parcel of existence. And then Satan will either insist that such a sacrifice cannot be demanded, or else openly defy the snared soul to burst his bands.

Well for him, and only him of all men at such a time, who knows that God is with him, who leans not upon his own strength or resolution or wisdom, but judges what is right, as in sight of the Eternal, and casts himself into his Saviour's arms. The waters may flow around him, but they shall not *over*flow him: the fires may rage against him, but they shall not consume, they shall not kindle upon him.

3. There is the trial of enjoyment and success. So says the Litany, "In all time of our wealth," i.e., weal, well-being, "good Lord, deliver us." And who knows not in some small degree the danger of success, the intoxication, the recklessness, the flush of earthly feeling? "In my prosperity I said, I shall never be moved," was the experience of David. It was in purple and fine linen, receiving his good things, that Dives laid the weight upon his soul which sank it into utter loss and ruin. God grant that no smallest prosperity may find us afar from Him, or pride and fulness of bread will destroy the fibre of the soul. If we recognise His nearness, if we desire Him above all things, then it will be a source of gratitude and humility when He leads us in green pastures, when He prepares a table before us, when He says to us, "Friend, come up higher." Otherwise even prosperity itself will raise up for us another and a contrary scourge.

4. There is the time of disappointment, of disillusion. Every one begins life with the hope of more than life actually yields to even one: for we expect not merely to attain certain objects, but to find in these an ethereal sweetness, a celestial purity and volume of enjoyment which are not found. They accordingly are not the most bitterly disappointed who fail: often the successful are, at least, as miserable as the defeated, perhaps more miserable, because that has vanished entirely for them, which others do but think to have evaded them. In the noon of prosperity men feel the sun to be not cheerful, but overpowering, scorching; they see the gorgeous crimson and purple of morning to be but an illusion, painted upon grey cloud; they have grasped and pinioned Fortune the enchantress, and, lo! her crown is not golden, but pinchbeck, and the jewels on her fingers are but glass. Loneliness in the midst of friends; weariness in the bosom of repose; unsated and insatiable restlessness; disgust of life and death alike; fitful, passionate exertions, which are like the revels of a confirmed drunkard, neither prompted by reason nor hopeful of enjoyment, but the blind result of habit—these are too often the successors in middle life to the golden hopes of youth. Then comes a change. Something inherently hopeless, or hopeless because seen too late, gleams across the eyes with more than the olden splendour; the ardent spirit vows and struggles to grasp its last hope of happiness; the hand touches its prize; the unattainable appears for one wild moment to be attained; but the ponderous machinery of the universe revolves and crushes the intrusive arm; the order of things is vindicated; the heart of a man is broken.

It is not yet a hundred years since a man, still young, attained his dizziest hopes in the chosen path of his ambition. His mouth spoke the thunders of England, and his arm directed her thunderbolts; he stood up, the sole but the dreaded opponent of the conqueror of Europe; and the greatest parliamentary combination which ever threatened any minister lay prone with his foot upon its neck. But no man could look upon his face without seeing there the misery which he was too proud to own, although he died of it. When his friend wished a happy year to Pitt, he answered, "It ought to be happier than the last, for in it I cannot remember one happy day."

They alone are safe against this rust of discontent eating away the soul who remember, when earth begins to fade and lose its lustre, that heaven remains, that God—Christ is by. These fare as the ancient Israel might have done—seas and rivers fail to bar their progress; and when life is desert and barren, they see it illuminated with unearthly light, a celestial guide is with them, and they eat angels' food.

> "When Israel, of the Lord beloved,
> Out of the land of bondage came,
> His fathers' God before him moved,
> An awful guide, in cloud and flame.
> By day along the astonished lands
> The cloudy pillar glided slow,
> By night Arabia's crimsoned sands
> Returned the fiery column's glow."

5. So also when earth is over, and the spirit, weary but sustained so long, is at last about to spread its wings and forsake its dwelling of earth, oh! then some kindling of the dim eyes, some movement of the pallid features, shall tell of the fidelity of Him who said, "I will be with thee," who is pledged to come again to receive His people to Himself.

The Lord is with us in a deeper sense than the prophet ever understood who searched what or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in Him did signify. The sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow, have made Him one with His suffering people here; remembering His own pains He sympathises; armed with His glories He delivers. We may be partakers of His sufferings; we may even, strange as the words sound, "fill up that which remains of His afflictions," for it is as if a settled quantity of anguish lay between the present condition of the Church which is His body, and her glorification, and every grief well borne were some of the wine of that mixture drained, some drinking of the cup He drank of, some sharing of the baptism all whose billows went over Him. Not a tear is shed in holy submission but may shine as a gem in an eternal diadem. When the thorny path is trodden to the end, and the frowning cliffs are scaled, and the Sun of Eternity shines upon the climber resting on the summit—when the battle is over, and it is given to him that overcometh to sit down with Christ upon His throne, then the emancipated and rescued one, whom the rivers have not overflowed nor the flames consumed, shall cry, "We went through fire and water, but Thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. NEW SERIES. No. 9. JOSIAH.

Chapters to be read—parts of 2 Kings xxii., xxiii.

INTRODUCTION. Ask the children questions about the kings upon whose lives they have already had lessons, reminding of their characteristics—David, the man after God's heart, Solomon, noted for wisdom, and Hezekiah for his reformation. This king, Josiah, noted for two things—viz., the prophecy respecting him, uttered so many years before his birth; and the early age at which he began his reign.

I. JOSIAH PROPHESIED OF. (Read 1 Kings xiii. 1—6.) Ask what were Jeroboam's two sins; why he set up the calves, and show how this first sin led on to sacrilege, in that he, not being a priest, offered incense. Then describe the scene: picture the sudden appearance of a strange prophet while the king was sacrificing—the cry against the altar—the sign foretold, which immediately came to pass—the rending of the altar—the king's wrath—his attempt to seize the prophet—his arm withered up, and then restored at the prophet's intercession. Point out the wonderful prophecy of Josiah by name, as well as his work in defiling this improper altar. Tell the children how long elapsed before the fulfilment—viz., 300 years; and ask for other instances of God's delaying—viz., 120 years before flood came; 450 years between promise to Abraham and settlement of Israelites in Canaan; 4,000 years between first promise of Christ and His birth. So now Christ's second coming delayed, but certain.

II. JOSIAH PROPHESIED TO. (Read 2 Kings xxii. 1—3.) Ask how old he was when he acceded to the throne, and how old when he reigned personally; how did he spend his time? yet while he "began to seek after the God of David his father," the people relapsed into a state of general corruption. Now read Zeph. i. 1—12, who prophesied at this time. Point out two classes among the people, the open idolaters (ver. 4, 5) and those indifferent to God (ver. 12). Show how the prophet was bidden to recall the Jews to a sense of God's presence, to warn them that His day was at hand, when the land with its inhabitants should be destroyed (Zeph. i. 7, 14, 18).

III. JOSIAH'S REFORMATION OF RELIGION. (1) Destruction. Ask what would be likely to be his first steps; what must always be beginning of all conversion—viz., leaving off sin. Refer to John the Baptist's charge to those he baptised—each man to give up his particular sin (Luke iii. 11, 13). Ask how Gideon had to begin his work, so now Josiah. (Read 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3—7.) Picture the king making a royal progress through the country—not to receive homage, but to inquire into the state of religion, destroying all the idols, cutting down the groves and breaking down the altars. Now refer to the prophecy of his birth, and show how exactly it was fulfilled, though as he had not yet found the copy of the law, he probably did not at this time know of the prophecy. (2) Restoration. (Read 2 Kings xxii. 3—7.) The idols destroyed, what would be the next step? who had repaired the Temple last? Even in short time since Hezekiah, his grandfather, it had fallen into partial ruin. (3) The book found. (Read 2 Kings xxii. 8—20.) Picture the Temple under repair, places cleaned out, &c. High priest finding "the book (or roll) of the law given by Moses;" perhaps the original—why placed in the ark? The book taken to the king; his reading it; perhaps the first time he had ever seen a copy of the Bible—how different to us with our cheap Bibles!)—the effect upon him—his rending his clothes in grief for the national sins, inquiring of the Lord through Huldah the prophetess; her answer of judgments on the nation, but a peaceful reign and death to the king. (4) Covenant renewed. (Read 2 Kings xxiii. 1—3.) Ask the effect produced on the king by the inspired message; what he would want to do. How could he persuade the people to turn from their evil ways? was it enough to break down idols? what more was wanted? who should teach them, and from what book? So, great assembly gathered, all classes, king himself taking lead, reads book; renews his own covenant; and all the people copy his example. What else could he do? What feasts were appointed to be kept? which was most solemn reminder of God's great deliverance? Once more a great passover kept, the greatest since the first. Did the reformation last? Why not? Seems not to have penetrated the heart of the people; some turned back (ver. 26, 27); the king died at the age of thirty-eight, fighting against King of Egypt.

IV. PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) The blessing of early piety. How much harder would have been for Josiah if he had not begun early; yet spent ten years learning before he ventured to teach others. All children must learn of God themselves before they can hope to profit others. (2) The way to amend. First leave off sin, then confess past sins, then seek to know God and His will, then solemnly renew covenant to serve God. (3) Repentance must be of the heart, and not merely of the outward life, or else it will not last. This itself is the gift of God (Acts v. 31).

Questions to be answered.

1. By whom and to whom was Josiah prophesied?
2. When and how was that prophecy fulfilled?
3. Who prophesied to Josiah, and what was the nature of their prophesies?
4. Describe the steps in his reformation of religion.
5. How far was the reformation successful?
6. Name any practical lessons to be learned.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXVII.

MR. TABOR'S TROUBLES.

MR. TABOR had been becoming more and more convinced that there was a background of unpleasant fact behind that unpleasant rumour concerning his junior partner, and the consciousness of that conviction—a conviction on which he was not prepared to act—cost him a great deal of anxiety and unhappiness.

Mr. Tabor was a cautious man, but by no means a suspicious one. Suspicion is a vague thing, and he hated vagueness; he could not rest in it; he had never in his life rested in it; he had never suspected any one without a good and sufficient cause, and then he had used the utmost promptness and directness in either verifying or dispelling his doubts. He could as easily have borne to leave his letters about loose and undocketed, as to leave his opinion about people in suspense. On this therefore, as well as on higher grounds, it was a daily trouble, which soon grew to a daily torture, to meet his partner. He could not put away his suspicion, simply docketing it a mistake, and thrusting it into the furthest mental pigeon-hole, as he would have done if Philip's language and manner had not confirmed instead of dispelling it, and he could not make up his mind to resolve it in one way or other, by simply asking for an explanation. He felt that this was what he ought to do, and that he could not do what he ought to do, was a fresh and quite a new source of pain to him. All his habitual caution, all his habitual delicacy, the very strength of his suspicion itself withheld him. More than once he tried to approach the subject with Philip, and felt that he was foiled; Philip remained impenetrable: Mr. Tabor remembered that he and his brother had parted on bad terms, the circumstances of which Philip had but slightly alluded to at the time, and had ever since manifested the utmost distaste to enter upon. The more Mr. Tabor pondered upon this, the more it told against Philip in his mind; his brother Francis had been a frank, amiable fellow, the universal favourite—too much given to pleasing everybody to please Mr. Tabor, who had liked Philip's more uncompromising temper the best; still he was the least likely of the two to make, or to maintain, a quarrel. He would not have quarrelled without some strenuous cause. If he, Mr. Tabor, could get to the bottom of that, it might throw light on the other matter. He resolved to make another effort. Therefore one day he asked Philip if he had ever heard from his brother yet?

Philip simply answered, "No."

"It is very strange," resumed Mr. Tabor, "you used to be so fond of each other as boys."

Philip's face worked in a way it had of quivering when he was hurt. Mr. Tabor knew he was probing a wound, but he went on: "You must have had a very serious quarrel, for resentment to have lasted all this time; he was the least resentful of the two, I should imagine," he added, with a meaning smile, and the old gentle way in which he had tried to correct Philip's faults when he was a much younger man.

Philip felt it, and answered gently and sadly, "We had a very serious quarrel, Mr. Tabor."

"May I ask what it was about—particularly, I mean?" said Mr. Tabor. "I have known you both all your lives," he added in a voice of emotion, "and I do not like to have this great gap in my knowledge of you."

"It was about our father's affairs," said Philip; "I am very sorry that further than this I cannot answer you."

"One question I may ask," said Mr. Tabor; "I may ask who made the breach, you or he?"

"As far as that is concerned," said Philip, "I may safely answer that it was I who made it."

"Then you can mend it, perhaps," said Mr. Tabor.

"I think not," was Philip's answer.

Mr. Tabor was thus no wiser, but a good deal more unhappy, than he was before, being more than ever convinced that Philip had done something blameworthy. "Do you know where Francis is at present?" he asked.

"I do not," said Philip; "I have never heard from him since we parted."

"At your father's grave," said Mr. Tabor, with more than usual sternness in his voice.

Philip did not speak, and there was an end of the conversation. But not of Mr. Tabor's hard thoughts; they were busier and harder than ever. He reflected that Philip, not Francis, had had the management of their father's affairs during the illness of the latter. If, therefore, there had been mismanagement, it was his; if there had been malversation, it was his. Francis had had nothing to do with them, then nor since. Had Philip for something of this kind incurred the displeasure of his elder brother, and resented it as the transgressor is apt to resent? This would account for a great deal—for his brother's estrangement, for the condition of his father's affairs, so unexpectedly insolvent, and for Philip's efforts to retrieve the past by rigid retrenchment.

But all such surmises only left the necessity for a fuller investigation where it was before—nay, made the necessity a great deal clearer to Mr. Tabor's mind, and he tormented himself with the conviction that he ought to take the initiative in clearing up the mystery. And what would be the consequences of doing so? One immediate consequence Mr. Tabor foresaw, and that was the dissolution of the partnership, which meant the giving up of the business into other hands. Mr. Tabor felt that he was too old to organise it afresh, and so confident had he been of Philip's ability to succeed him that he had made no provision by retaining the services of his articled clerks for any failure on his part. Whether Philip was guilty or not, the result would be the same; guilty, his services could not be retained in the firm; not guilty, a man so proud and sensitive could not be expected to remain. The grounds on which he had been suspected of making away with money which was not his own, would be certain to seem insufficient to him. And in the meantime this anxiety was making Mr. Tabor ill. He came home jaded and worn. He lost his appetite. He could not sleep. Mrs. Tabor became anxious in turn; she thought his health was failing, that he was breaking up prematurely. A cloud seemed to settle on the little household, and to deepen instead of dispersing when the cause of the anxiety oozed out.

Of course, Mrs. Tabor had known all along, but Lucy had remained in ignorance. "Don't say anything to Lucy," Mr. Tabor had said; and nothing was said to her, till some words of his own led to the revelation. "May I tell?" Mrs. Tabor's face had said, and Mr. Tabor's had answered, by a species of telegraphy, "You may," and Mrs. Tabor gladly availed herself of the first opportunity to do so, which took place a day or two before Arthur Wildish had brought to Lucy the report of his conversation with Ada, which had so distressed the former. Lucy had always been her mother's confidant, and indeed there existed between them a beautiful friendship. "I am very anxious about your papa," Mrs. Tabor had said; "he is worrying himself to death."

"What is it about, mamma?" asked Lucy; "I can see he is vexed about something."

"He is very unhappy about something he has heard concerning Mr. Tenderden," said Mrs. Tabor.

"What has he heard, mamma?" asked Lucy, turning pale.

"That there has been something wrong—something dishonest in fact—in his management of Fanny's affairs. Your father thinks he ought to have handed them over to the firm when his father died; instead of which he has kept them in his own hands, and refuses to give an account of them."

"I cannot, I do not, believe he has done anything wrong," said Lucy, in a tone which wrung her mother's heart. "It must be some dreadful mistake. He cannot be capable of dishonesty." She brought out the word with a shudder of disgust. "We could not all have loved him as we did," she added.

"People may be lovable without being good, Lucy," said Mrs. Tabor, sadly. "We did love him; but you know we see very little of him now. He may have stayed away because he felt unworthy," she added, speaking the thought that came into her mind at the moment.

It was a new idea to Lucy, and a terrible one. It gave her the first pang of the torture of doubt. Her mother sat watching her transparent face. "My darling, do you care for him?" she said at length in a choking whisper.

Lucy burst into tears and hid her face on her mother's bosom, who, as she bent over her, could hear the murmured words, "Oh, mamma! so much!—so much!"

"But, my darling, you could not love him if he had done this wrong," said Mrs. Tabor; "I mean you would cease to love him," she added, in sorrowful perplexity.

"I cannot tell, I do not know," said Lucy. She was silent for a little, and then she spoke again, out of the very depths of her heart. "I would still care for him, mamma," she said; "I cannot help it," she continued, as if deprecating blame. "I know what papa thinks of money dishonour, and I think the same. It is inexpressibly mean, and wicked; but he is not mean and wicked. If he has done anything dishonourable, it must have been under some great temptation, and oh, mamma! it must have made him so unhappy."

"My darling," said her mother, anxiously, "we cannot distinguish in that way between people and their actions; you will only perplex your mind, and confuse your notions of right and wrong."

"What will happen?" said Lucy, after a pause; "what will happen to him, I mean? Will it ruin him? will he be put in prison?"

"It will ruin his prospects in life if he has made away with Fanny's money," said Mrs. Tabor; "but I do not think, whatever is amiss, either your father or Fanny will bring it to a public trial. Philip has been more like a brother to Fanny, and for that matter, more like a son to your father than anything else."

Lucy was weeping unrestrainedly, and her mother's slower tears fell upon her head. All their love and care had not been able to shield the cherished daughter from the hard fate of loving hopelessly, and unworthily, for that Philip was unworthy was beyond doubt in Mrs. Tabor's mind. Her husband had unwittingly conveyed to her a stronger assurance of his guilt than that which rested in his own mind, an assurance which she in her turn conveyed still more strongly to Lucy. It hardly needed Arthur's report of his conversation with Ada to confirm the latter in her belief that it was already a thing proven and accepted by others, however she herself might hold out against it.

But till then she did hold out; till then she had felt like the settler who hears that somewhere behind his clearing the woods are on fire, and thinks truly enough the fire is there, but it may take another direction, or it may die out. But soon he breathes the conflagration in the air; he sees the smoke of its advance, and knows that it is coming on, spreading in a fatal circle, scorching and scathing all before it, and that if he escapes with life it will be well.

Lucy at once imparted to her mother the confirmation which she had received, and she in her turn communicated the substance of what Lucy had heard to her husband. The other and more personal confidence she retained, and because of it, still maintained a reticence on the whole subject. But when Mr. Tabor, after a struggle with himself, went to Fanny and forced from her a very confused account of Philip's interview with her, and the admissions he had made, that reticence came to an end. Suspicion had become certainty, and it only remained for Mr. Tabor to act upon it, and he freely consulted his wife and daughter as to the steps to be taken.

After one of these consultations, when they were left alone together, "Lucy," said her mother, "would you rather your father did not know what you told me the other day?"

"No, mamma; I do not seem to care," she answered. "I think I could tell papa myself. Do you know I have been thinking I would like to tell him."

"Philip?"

"Yes, mamma; I think it might help him to know; help to save him—help to keep him from going from bad to worse, as papa said such men do."

"My darling," said her mother, sitting down beside her, "I think it might, for love is the true salvation; but you could not do this. We say and do in our hearts such things, but we fail to translate them into deeds."

"I would not seek to see him again," said Lucy, showing how her thoughts had dwelt upon her sacrifice. "I would not meet him perhaps till the best of our days were over. After that I might, when other people only knew him as a man who had ruined himself long ago I might know that he had redeemed himself."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

SECOND TIME OF ASKING.

It was a serious addition to Mr. Tabor's troubles just then, to be told of Lucy's attachment to Philip, and to see for himself, in the change which had come upon her, how much she suffered. It was not that she drooped, she bore herself, on the contrary, more bravely, but her careless gaiety was gone; and to see this did not tend to soften Mr. Tabor towards his partner. But his first thought, with his characteristic fear of doing the slightest injustice, was of Arthur Wildish. "He must not be allowed to come about in this way any longer," he said to his wife.

"I do not see that Lucy can help it, since she refused him distinctly," said Mrs. Tabor. She could not bear the shadow of blame to rest on Lucy now.

"No, my dear, I do not blame her in the least," returned her husband; "but you can see how it is, he is counting upon a second time of asking. He thinks he will win her yet; and so he might, but for this unhappy attachment, which will spoil our little girl's life."

"Don't say that, papa; our lives are never spoilt for us, though we may spoil them for ourselves, by taking things in the wrong way," said Mrs. Tabor.

"Our Lucy is so lonely too. We would have been glad to see her with a husband and children of her own. We will leave her almost solitary," Mr. Tabor sighed.

"We're not going to leave her yet a while, please God," said Mrs. Tabor, putting on a cheery smile. "It will never do," she said to herself, "for all three to be melancholy together. Perhaps you had better speak to Mr. Wildish," she added to her husband.

"What shall I say to him?"

"Tell him in the best way you can that he need not come for Lucy, nor yet stay away for her; that is, that if he is coming for her, perhaps he had better stay away, and if he is not, why then he may come and welcome."

Mr. Tabor laughed.

"Make him understand quite clearly that he is only to consider his own feelings in the matter, for I am sure Lucy's will not be in the least affected," Mrs. Tabor, continued; "now don't suspect me of managing, papa, for I hate it mortally."

"That is the last thing I will suspect you of," returned Mr. Tabor, smiling, in spite of himself.

Lucy had kept faithfully to her part of the compact of everlasting friendship, and she honestly returned her lover's attachment in that sterling coin. Having no feeling of her own corresponding to his, she believed that this had settled the matter, and she treated Arthur very much as a girl treats a favourite brother; and it did not mislead either of the parties principally concerned, though it had misled the people about them, who gradually began to look upon them as engaged persons, though nothing of the kind had been formally announced. It did not mislead Arthur; nay, more, it was quite effectual in restraining him, from any lover-like demonstrations. Her perfect cordiality and frank kindness raised no vain hopes, rather, as time went by, dispelled those he had entertained. Reserve or faltering would have been a welcome sign to him, a sign that she was yielding to him something more than friendship. But no such sign appeared, and he was beginning to be rather restive under the restraints of his position, when Mr. Tabor took him in hand.

A party had been got up to take Ada Lovejoy to one of the evening concerts at St. James's Hall, and Arthur had brought a roomy hired carriage, and was waiting with a bouquet in each hand for Lucy, who was up-stairs dressing, and for Ada, who was coming in to go with them. Mrs. Tabor was also up-stairs, as she too was going to chaperon the girls. It occurred to Mr. Tabor to seize the opportunity. "Wildish," he said, laying his hand kindly on the young man's shoulder, and speaking in as light a tone as he could command, "I hope you don't go on thinking of that ungrateful little girl of mine."

Mr. Wildish could not deny it; he smiled, and said frankly, "I'm afraid I think of her as much as ever I did."

"Then, my dear fellow, you should give it up," said Mr. Tabor, seriously; "you are wasting your time and your affections."

"Is it so hopeless, do you think?"

"Quite hopeless," said Mr. Tabor.

"I would like to give it one more trial," said the young man, eagerly.

"The sooner the better then," returned Mr. Tabor, and Lucy and her mother came in.

Ada followed speedily, dressed in silvery grey and green. She and Geraldine had made the dress between them, Geraldine directing from her bed, and Ada executing her directions. The result was very pretty, and made Ada look more like a tall lily then ever. Arthur held out one of the bouquets to her with a mock heroic bow. It was very pretty, and Lucy held one to match it in her hand. "Let me run in and leave it," said Ada, quite forgetting to thank the giver.

"It is to take with you, child," said Lucy.

"Oh, but it would be such a pity to waste it, and Jerry so fond of flowers," said Ada, and she whisked away to Arthur's intense amusement, returning in a few minutes without the flowers, which she had left in a glass on the little table beside her sister's bed.

Ada was a great source of interest and pleasure to Arthur Wildish, and ever since she had taken him into her confidence about her plans, he had assumed the right of helping and directing her. Ada had lost no time in putting her musical plan into execution. She had dragged Fanny out with her to see the inevitable "Professor of Music," three doors off, and to engage him to give her lessons. Day after day she continued to work with unabated energy. Even when she sat up-stairs with Geraldine it was with a music-book on her knee, accustoming her eyes to the reading and humming low snatches of song, which, instead of disliking, Geraldine found particularly soothing.

Anything like Ada's intense enjoyment of that concert Arthur Wildish had never seen. He sat next her, and saw and felt the slight figure sway and thrill and quiver to the music. Flashes of passion crossed her white face, in which Arthur noticed for the first time the promise of splendid beauty, the great grey eyes dilated, the delicate nostrils quivered. All the way home she never uttered a word, and when Arthur handed her out at her own door, he could see the tears on her eyelashes.

It was a mild, breezy, moonlit night, and letting Mrs. Tabor pass into the house, Arthur detained Lucy with a whispered, "Come into the garden." She went with him, gathering her short white cloak about her, and pulling the hood over her head she held it with one hand under her chin. The promenade before them was not a long one, and they were soon at the bottom of the garden, neither having uttered a word. Then they stopped. Lucy stood under the white blossoming boughs of a cherry-tree that had a weird beauty in the moonlight. She had a feeling of what was coming, and strove to deprecate it; she stretched out her disengaged hand and laid it on her companion's arm, saying, "Don't, Arthur."

"I must," he answered, adding abruptly, "Lucy, can't you love me?"

"Oh, Arthur! do not ask me," said Lucy. Then she added suddenly, for the same thought which had occurred to her father came into her mind, "You must go away and try to forget me. You must not go on giving me all who have nothing to give you in return. Yes, Arthur, you must go away; it was selfish of me not to think of this."

"You selfish!" he repeated indignantly; "I do not care how long it goes on, only, Lucy, give me some hope at the end."

"I cannot—cannot," she answered wistfully.

"No hope at all?"

"None at all."

"Never?"

"No, never," she repeated. The wind shook the tree, and snowed its blossoms over her as she echoed the words.

Then they walked up to the house together, as silent as before. Lucy gave him her hand, which he wrung as if for parting, and then she ran up-stairs, and he went into the house to find her father.

"Well?" was Mr. Tabor's greeting, for he had seen his wife for a moment, and knew that he and Lucy had been together and alone.

Arthur shook his head.

"I was sure of it," said Mr. Tabor; "I am sorry, Wildish—sorry on more accounts than one, but you had better take my advice."

"And never see her again?" he asked dolefully.

"I did not say that, but as seldom as possible," was the answer.

"I had rather waste my life, as you call it, in seeing her, than save it for any other purpose," said Arthur, warmly; then he said good night, and was gone.

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM, AUTHOR OF "WORDS OF HELP," ETC. ETC.

"GOOD morning, sir."

"Good morning, George. I wonder you did not address me as Citizen S., for I understand you have joined the equalising fraternity. 'Not exactly,' you say, but you've been attending their meetings, and 'feel pretty considerably sure that there's a screw loose somewhere in the body politic.' Very likely, George; there always have been several screws loose in all human arrangements since time began, and I suppose we shall always have some of them loose to the end. What's that you say? that 'it's our duty to set things on the square if we can.' Well, that's a different figure of speech, but as it means very much the same thing, I agree with you. 'Better and better'—that's the motto for us all—only we are taxed in this world with the rather hard equation of what x, or this better condition of things, is. Oh! you 'don't understand about x's and 'quations and that sort of thing.' No, George, and more's the pity. If you had been born in Germany instead of England, probably you would—and this is certainly one of the things we want in the better line—higher education for all. Lifting one another up, you know, is a better sort of thing than keeping one another down. Not that we shall all be on the same level, you know, for nature won't have it at any price. Brains differ and muscles differ. Some men are born quick-witted and some slow-witted; some are born handsome and some plain; some grow tall and some keep short; so that at the beginning we can't have all things 'on the square' exactly, and in these things we can't trim humanity as we trim quick-set hedges. Plain enough, you think, that is; but we want more equal circumstances, you think! Let us see. Certainly we ought to rejoice that all have better homes, better wages, better provisions than in the old times before us. Never mind, for the moment, the consideration that wages are often wasted; it is certainly better, because it is juster that there should be a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. I quite agree with you there. Improved circumstances are good in themselves, because then the blame of want and misery begins to fall on the right shoulders—that is, our own. But circumstances alone cannot make us. Look here, George; I spent the evening yesterday with a doctor—not a quack, but a regular M.D.—in a small country town; he made me very comfortable—but after some years he hadn't married, and could not afford to do so, though, as he said, young workmen indulge in wives a little after twenty years of age, and seldom save enough first to provide a snug little home. So unless we are masters of ourselves and circumstances, and educated enough to know what prudence and self-restraint mean, we may find ourselves as servants indulging at twenty in what the masters can't afford to do till they are thirty. I only instance this as one point of observation, though I could illustrate it by a hundred cases. On the whole, when prudence and forethought have been exercised, I am in favour of pretty early marriages. Yes; but you say, if we had things square, doctors and lawyers, painters and masons, would have all pretty much alike. Indeed, George. But you must first get your doctor; and do you think he would trouble himself to walk hospitals, dissect dead bodies, strain his brain for examinations, and deal with fevers and that sort of thing, and then get no special reward, but simply take his franc and a half a day? You can't make men equal, you know. You may wish them to be, but suppose they declined such strains and such toil? Oh! but, you say, 'I am talking as if men were always to be selfish, and that good Christian men ought to deny themselves for others.' Really, George, you amuse me by that sentence. Christian men, indeed! why the equalising school you talk about have given up Christianity. To them it is superstitious and old-worldish. Let us avoid the ugly word 'infidels,' but they are Secularists—time-present men. And certainly they can't alter humanity; they can't reverse the instincts within us; they can't make water run up hill, nor can they prevent the growth and exercise of the desires for progress, possession, ambition, enterprise, and personal success. Why the very merchandise and commerce of England have their root in that! For Proudhon and Fourier to arrange socialistic systems with mathematical precision, is a very different thing from making men fall into their places in such intricate systems. The answer is, 'Men won't;' and when it is so difficult to prevent mismanagement, craft, disorder, in simplicity of system, how impossible it would be in a vast, subtle, intricate organisation. Why, disorder in one part would be disorder in the whole. Look here, George, you may as well try to keep wind out of a key-hole, as to keep self-love and family-love out of the heart of man. All you can do is to subordinate them to love to God, and to regulate them by self-denial and unselfish care for others.

"'But there is a great deal of injustice in the world still, and the laws are not equal for rich and poor, and the poor can't get on and rise fast enough.' Concerning inequalities and injustices, George, I believe there is much to be done, considerable evils need removal; but to compare the England of to-day with other great empires of the past, is only to see what immense strides we have made in common prosperity. But look here, George. Suppose you go to Queensland or New Zealand, and get lots of land and liberty, and free space, and no taxes! You have got to create a country, to provide a lot of things that civilisation and emulation have got ready to your hand in England. You can't get up in the night and go over the way for a doctor for your wife; you can't turn the gas on in the bush to light you; you can't buy soap, candles, and a hundred other things that we have come to think we have a perfect right to here. The fact is simply this, that we are all debtors to each other, and shall be to the end of time. Civilisation is much more comfortable for the humblest and the poorest, than barbarism, and it simply means carefully restricted personal rights, and large scope for personal energy and ambition. Take away that, and you kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. You keep your steam-engine, but you put out the fire and get no steam. The men who prate about the time when men will get all they wish, satisfy all their desires without trouble, and banish care and toil and prudence and personal anxiety, are simply charlatans and nothing more. No country has ever secured such a millenium as that, and no country ever will. When love to God and then to our neighbour rules in every heart, the millenium will come, and not before. As to perfect systems and victorious majorities, and all that sort of thing, why, it is too absurd to think of glory and plenty coming from them alone! What is to prevent Citizen A. from envying Citizen B.'s beard, and insisting on it being cut down to regulation shape? and Citizen B. may think Citizen C.'s garden a great deal trimmer and pleasanter than his own; and Citizen D. may see a finer cut of beef on his neighbour's plate than his own (that is, if any citizens at all can be found to do slaughter-house work), and may whip it off, on the ground that it is not fairly cut, and Citizen E. may dislike the natural eloquence of Citizen F., and knock out his front teeth to spoil the inequalities of pronunciation. This may sound ludicrous, George, but it is only pushing the question to its ultimate issue. You must have inequalities somehow. Civilisation and good government try to render life as free from arbitrariness, wrong, and injustice as they can, and by providing asylums for the insane, and homes for the blind and the deaf, and infirmaries and hospitals and dispensaries for the poor, to do good to the poor and needy. This the proud civilisations of Greece and Rome never did, for in all their ruins there is not one arch of a 'hospital,' or one pillar of a 'home.'

"'You don't know anything much,' you say, 'about what used to be, but you know that it's quite right for working men to get as much as they can for themselves.' Certainly, when they don't wish to infringe on other people's rights, it is; and more than that, George, it is quite certain that by mutual effort there remains much that they can accomplish yet in forms of co-operation and united capital, but they need to learn that extra wage does not mean extra prosperity, they must improve their heads, their hearts, and their homes. I saw a man in prison the other day who said that extra pay had been his ruin. Now that is no argument against extra pay, but it is an argument against the theory that more money means being better off. To drink ourselves out of the Alabama difficulty you must admit to be a greater disgrace than to have incurred the difficulty; and yet to what a monstrous extent the working men so called—though I dislike the term—helped to pay these millions. Depend upon it, George, as a young fellow with good health and good spirits and good prospects, you, who are now twenty, might in England be worth a hundred pounds at eight-and-twenty. You earn thirty shillings a week; well, live on five-and-twenty, and in eight years you have a hundred pounds in hand, without compound interest, which will considerably increase that comfortable amount, let alone extras; and then begin life with a wife if you like and a cottage of your own. The fact is simply this, that self-indulgence, and not bad pay, bad prospects, or bad laws, is the curse of England just now. But what do we see around us? Young men, and young women too, expecting to have plenty of amusements, and to dress showily, and all that sort of thing, as though they had a perfect right to plenty of provision for all these things, and then that the State, or the country, or some other entity, might take care of them when they have cast prudence, providence, and ordinary self-denial to the winds. When you look at matters a little closer, George, you will see that the worst curse that can come among young men is to be deluded by the demagogues who try to make them believe that misery and poverty are the faults of everybody else but themselves. As to religion, George, I shall say little to you about that just now; but depend upon it if a man does not love God he will not care much for his brother. Selfishness can hide behind corduroy as well as behind broadcloth; and if you subvert one order of things, you do not always get a better. If you know human nature, you well know that you cannot cure yourself of selfishness by anything short of true religious motives, and that a working man may be as utterly selfish in his neglect of his own home as the well-to-do may be of the needs of the poor. It will be a good time, George, when the tastes of men are everywhere cultivated and improved; when the question, What will he do with it? as applied either to money or time, is met by the reply, The best possible for himself and others. Then rich men will give up Hurlingham pigeon-shooting, and gambling, and surfeiting, and loose living; and men who have less to spend will never find pleasure in dog-fights, betting, spirit-drinking, and vulgar songs and dances, and rich and poor will aspire to purer pleasures, broader culture, wider expenditure of their time and money power, and will unite together, not on the plane of an empty equality—which would leave all lazier and lazier, poorer and poorer, with an ever-deepening misery—but in all high and ennobling aims of usefulness and happiness. Quite a lecture, you think, this talk has turned to. Never mind, George, we have all much to learn, I as well as you; and there are many evils for which I confess that I can see no special present remedy, many problems between capital and labour which I cannot solve, and many burdens of injustice which I should like to remove. But I am quite sure that the way out of the difficulty is the way of God. 'Look not every man upon his own things, but every man also on the things of another;' and that we shall never attain a nobler social economy than this, 'Giving all diligence, add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity.' A beautiful addition sum this, George, for you, for me, and for all. Coming! George, your mistress calls. Grand old words—'master,' 'mistress,' 'servant.' I am not afraid of the task of showing you the beauty of them at another time. George! George!"

"Coming, ma'am!"

THE GRIEFS OF CRIPPLE TOM.

CHAPTER III.

ON Monday morning Cripple Tom put on his Sunday clothes. Their sanctity was gone for ever. He had broken with church and school and respectability generally, and was free to bask in the sun all day long, rolling in the dust as he pleased. His mother had, of course, heard of the scene on the preceding afternoon, but she was too kind-hearted—for with all her faults she dearly loved her son—to refer to the matter, or chide Tom for spoiling his new clothes. During the forenoon Mr. Brooke called at the Robinsons'. He did not intend to be harsh,—he would not do anything to wound the boy's feelings unnecessarily,—he would administer a mild rebuke, point out the sin and danger of giving way to passion, and allow the lad to go to school again as usual. But to the surprise and sorrow of the curate, he found his kind counsel rejected with disgust and his offers of forgiveness scorned. Rightly or wrongly, Mrs. Robinson considered that her son had been grossly ill-used. "Her son should never go back to be made a laughing-stock for graceless dolts that hadn't half his goodness, nor his sense either, if the truth were known. He was very well as he was before he went there, and she didn't see that going had made him any better. He was a good son, and always had been, and Sunday-school only put ill in his head."

As for Tom, his disgrace was too fresh for him to meet the curate's eye, so he sat sullenly by, without a word. When Mr. Brooke left the cottage he took his cap, and betook himself to his old haunt on the side of the road, his face full of sullenness, and his heart full of bitterness and hatred to all men. He no longer looked simply soulless, as he did when Miss Burton first met him, but as if a spirit had come to dwell in his breast,—a spirit of evil. He hated Miss Burton for getting him to go to Sunday-school; he hated his father for tormenting him about his finery; he hated Mr. Brooke for calling him "silly" and being, as he thought, the occasion of his trouble; he hated the boys for laughing at him; he hated himself for his vanity, because it had only covered him with ridicule,—for his poverty and his stupidity—for the general contempt in which he was held. He hated his beautiful clothes for the shame they had caused him, and he delighted to spoil them, rolling on his back in the dusty road.

Suddenly he became aware of some one being near him. He looked round and saw the smiling face of a poor deaf and dumb boy, about four years younger than himself, who lived in the village. Jimmy Todd had been born deaf, and had been bred up at Stonyfield. He was of a sweet disposition, and seemed quite happy in his isolation from the world. Tom turned from him with a frown, as he would have turned from any one else; and Jimmie, seeing that the cripple was not inclined to notice him, sat quietly beside him, looking into the pool with that pathetic imprisoned look that the blind and the deaf often have, and humming to himself in a quiet, inarticulate way. As Cripple Tom looked at him it struck him that here was one who did not know of his disgrace. The deaf boy had not been at school, and no one could have told him of what had happened. He could look in Jim's eyes, and never fear the ill-hidden smile at the remembrance of his ludicrous appearance; in Jim's eyes he was not a ridiculous or contemptible object, he was what he had ever been all his life. The thought was very soothing and comforting to poor Tom. He laid his hand on Jim's shoulder and smiled, Jim smiled too, and pointed at a frog that he had noticed in the pool.

"Ay," said Tom, "so it is. This is a hard world, Jim, and you an' me's not of much account in it. They'll laugh at us and scorn us: leastways they do me. I wish I was out on't."

The religion that Tom had learned had not come at all near enough to him to be a comfort to him, and heaven was only a name, not a new world to which he might go, a future refuge from the one at Stonyfield. But Jim was his comforter. The deaf boy moved nearer to his friend and laid his head on his shoulder; and the sense of being a support to any one was new to the cripple lad. He went on talking to Jim. "What right had they to laugh at me? I'm as good as them. Yet maybe I'd have laughed myself."

But the subject was too painful for Tom to talk of, even to his deaf companion, so after a little the two boys rose and went back to the village together.

Next day Tom, of his own accord, sought the companionship of his new friend, who dumbly persuaded him to saunter with him along one of the more retired roads; and thus the cripple and the mute spent that morning together, and many mornings after. From this time Tom Robinson seemed to grow in intelligence; the truth was that he had found that great educator, a friend. To this friend he could tell everything, and it troubled him little that his confidant could not hear him. He was sure of a sympathising look and a friendly smile, and he often felt as if Jim understood, through look and gesture and the power of sympathy, much that was passing in his mind. The poor boy began to wish, now that a few weeks had passed, that he were back at Sunday-school. He avoided the sight of the children marching from school across the village-green to church; and wished that Miss Burton would come back, and ask him again to go, for he could not summon up courage to return of his own accord. His father, finding no longer anything to ridicule, had given over teasing him and relapsed into his old attitude of profound neglect.

At last Miss Burton did come back to Stonyfield, and only a very little persuasion on her part was needed to make Tom promise to return to school. One thing only he stipulated for, that his new friend should be allowed to go with him. He could not face the other boys, who might meet him with whispers and gestures as well as looks of ridicule, unless he might have at his side this friend, with whom he might affect to busy himself, in whose eyes he would see no mocking light, to whom he was even something of a guide and protector. So next Sunday, to his great delight, Jimmie was placed in Tom's old seat at Miss Burton's left hand. The sound of the harmonium and the children's voices seemed to reach him in a confused way, and the consciousness that he was a part of a class, standing or kneeling when they stood or knelt, seemed to afford him a keen pleasure, for his eyes beamed with smiles the whole time. With church he seemed even better pleased; for the chancel, reading-desk, and pulpit, the organ-pipes and the grave clergyman, were objects completely new to him: he felt as if he were in another land. This pleasure was a new link to bind him to Tom, for it was through him that he became admitted to these beautiful sights; but, indeed, no such link was needed; the two lads were bound together by a real liking for each other, and by an unexpressed feeling that each of them had, that he was the other's only friend.

PILE the fagots higher,
Let the rafters glow;
Snug beside the fire,
What care we for snow,
What care we for storms—
What for howling skies,
While belovèd forms
Flit before our eyes?

Pile the fagots higher,
  Let the rafters glow;
Snug beside the fire,
  What care we for snow?
Warm of heart within,
  What's the cold without?
They to live begin
  Whom Love twines about.

Brightness may depart—
  Dreams dissolve in air—
But if warm the heart,
  We may laugh at care.
Pile the fagots higher,
  Let the rafters glow;
Snug beside the fire,
  What care we for snow?

CHAPTER IX.

DR. RAE could not go with the others to the picnic, but intended to join them later in the day. The Heaths came to the Raes' house very early in the morning, and they set out in high spirits. It had been arranged that the Forsters and Ashleighs, who lived up the stream, nearer the abbey which they were going to visit, should wait until the Raes joined them at a certain point, and that all should proceed together. Letty and Ruth, seated side by side at the stern of Maurice's boat, had a long conversation together, till at last, the party being complete, and the talk very general, Letty became absorbed in it, and Ruth quietly listened to all that was going on, without taking any active part in the scene. There was nothing that could please her better than to be allowed to remain unnoticed, hearing what each person said, criticising or endorsing the opinions and ideas that were presented to her in light conversation, and thinking them out quietly in the midst of the bustle.

"What a strange child Ruth Leighton seems to be," said Julia Heath to Jack Forster; "she seems so different from other children."

"So she is," was the reply; "but I can't see that there is anything especially strange in her conduct just now to make you think of it at this moment."

"Well, it seems so to me. I am judging by myself when I was a child—and a very ordinary one. I know my behaviour would have been so entirely different. The one idea of the picnic, or rather the romping enjoyment of it, would have absorbed me quite."

"It was not so with me, I think," said Jack.

"Ah, but you must not make an example of yourself. You are an artist, and you had an artist's feeling in you from your birth. I sometimes think clever children lose a good bit of enjoyment, and I must say I don't usually take to them myself."

"You are unlike your brother, then," said Jack.

"Oh! his fastidiousness is really painful, with regard to women and children particularly. He has an idea that people are not worth anything if they are not clever, and he even makes Letty annoyed with his harshness."

"That does indeed speak badly for him," said Jack, laughing. "I should like to see Letty made angry. Do what I will I can never rouse her temper."

"Now you have betrayed yourself; but allow me to dissuade you from so unprofitable an occupation. I thought better of you, Jack," answered Julia, smiling. "Good temper is too rare a virtue to be damaged in the smallest degree."

"It is not the rarity that makes the beauty of it."

"I am not sure," said Julia.

"You are falling into a very common mistake in thinking so. If people would learn to prize things for their intrinsic value, it would save that fuming and fretting after the unattainable in which many a man wastes his life."

At length they arrived at the landing-place, a beautiful wooded, rocky hill, at the foot of which the stream meandered. They all ascended the hill, pairing off and clustering in little groups, and made their way towards the abbey. At last they emerged from the trees to a small open space in front of the old ruin.

"How lovely!" exclaimed Ruth, enthusiastically. Oh, Mr. Rae! that is the well you painted, isn't it?"

"Yes. If you will come with me I will show you the place from which I sketched it." Maurice took Ruth's hand, and they walked on alone till they reached the point that he had named, and then Maurice took her to a very curious little winding staircase, which led on to the ruin. They had reached the top of the staircase, but there were some steps broken away, and Maurice proceeded to climb the rugged wall on to the gallery above.

"Mr. Rae, I can't come up there," said Ruth.

"I will help you; it is quite easy," answered Maurice, looking down.

"Oh! I couldn't come," persisted Ruth; "it looks horrid. I always feel afraid to be on a height."

"But see, Ruth, you can give me your hands, and you couldn't fall while I am holding you."

Ruth did not like to say no; so, reluctantly, she did as Maurice told her, and his firm support certainly made it less dreadful than she had anticipated.

"Was it very alarming?" asked Maurice, bending down and holding her still, though the necessity was over.

"Not as bad as I thought it would be," answered Ruth. "Did you think me very silly?"

"No, I like you to be afraid, because then I can take care of you. There is one thing I want to call you to task for, though."

"What is that?" asked Ruth.

"Can't you guess?"

Ruth thought for a moment, and then looked up for information very anxiously, as if she were afraid she had done something to vex Maurice.

"Mary is an example to you. She has kept a promise which you both made, but you have broken it. Do you remember now?"

"Oh! I had forgotten," said Ruth, blushing deeply. "You mustn't be angry with me, but it seems so strange to—to——"

"To what?" said Maurice, unmercifully, and pausing for the completion of her sentence, though he knew what she meant perfectly well.

"To call you Maurice," said Ruth, in a low voice.

"It must not seem strange any longer, Ruth. Will you promise not to avoid it any more?"

"Yes, I will. Let me go now," said Ruth, hearing voices approaching.

"Won't you keep your promise now? If you do, I will let you go directly," said Maurice, smiling.

"Do let me go," pleaded Ruth, in despair, trying to free herself; "Maurice, please do."

He smiled as he set her free, and she darted away, just as a party appeared in sight, talking and laughing as they clambered up the broken staircase.

"There is nothing like this sort of exercise for making one hungry," said Maude Ashleigh. "Do let us come and lay the dinner. It is such fun!" and she took Tina's arm as she spoke.

All the girls were soon busy laying the cloth on the grass, and a great deal more play than work went on for some time. At last they all seated themselves.

"Where's Ruth?" cried Lily.

"Gracious! where can she be?" echoed Tina, blushing as she turned from talking to Robert Ashleigh.

"I will go and look for her," said Jack, springing to his feet.

"And I," said several of the young men; and they separated in various directions.

"I dare say she is quite oblivious of the time, prying about in all the nooks and corners," said Mary.

"Is she fond of such things?" asked Mrs Forster.

"Yes, she is always full of dreams and fantastic ideas," answered Mrs. Rae. "I don't doubt their finding her directly, examining everything like an antiquary."

Philip Heath, one of the searchers, found Ruth on her knees, inspecting an inscription cut in the wall.

"I have come to fetch you. We are beginning dinner."

Ruth started when he spoke, and rose to accompany him.

"What was it that interested you so much, as to make you forgetful of your anxious friends?"

"It was that," said Ruth, pointing to the writing; "I can't make it out."

"There is one thing of which you may be certain—that if you had made it out, the interest would evaporate."

Ruth was too shy to enter into any conversation, and as they were now approaching the rest of the party, she ran away and took her place among the number.

In the course of the afternoon Stephen arrived, while they were looking over the ruins and lounging about under the trees. Tea was rather late, as they found a great many difficulties attending the making of a gipsy fire, and getting watercresses from a neighbouring streamlet. The repast was disposed of as quickly as possible, that they might have some games, and hide-and-seek was chosen from among the number proposed. At last they all broke up, and stood about in groups before returning to the boats, everybody waiting for somebody else to make the move, when suddenly Ruth started from her seat with a slight scream.

"What's the matter?" exclaimed a number of voices.

"Oh, look!" said Ruth, pointing to the grass in horror. "It's a frog."

"Is that all, Ruthie?" laughed Lily. "You frightened me so I thought something was really the matter."

"Well, it seems to have had as much effect on her as if it had been one of the most dangerous of animals," said Jack; "she looks quite pale."

"There are numbers of them. Do let us leave," said Ruth to Stephen, taking his hand and pulling him away.

"Poor child! it is in a panic!" said Stephen, and bending down he took her in his arms, and began walking briskly through the wood.

"Oh! I am so frightened," said Jack, capering about in a very affected way; "I wish somebody would carry me."

"Dr. Rae, will you put me down?" asked Ruth, timidly.

"Why, darling?" said Stephen, looking down affectionately.

"I can't say why; but will you please do it?"

"Do you prefer the company of the frogs to me?" asked the doctor.

"Don't laugh at me," said Ruth, hiding her face on his shoulder. "Won't you let me walk if I want to?"

"If I knew you had a sensible reason I should have no hesitation, but I don't think it is sensible."

Stephen now placed Ruth in one of the boats, and wrapped her up in a shawl, leaving her face peering out above it.

"Dr. Rae, how absurd! I shall be so hot."

"Excuse me, I think I have acted wisely," replied Stephen.

"I know I look very ridiculous. Don't I, Lily?"

"You look a perfect little——oh! perhaps I had better not say what," said Lily, laughing as she seated herself in the same boat. "Don't you agree with me, Dr. Rae?"

"Decidedly. You have shown perception in two ways in that speech of yours."

The moon had risen, and was shedding its light down into the clear water long before the party reached home. On the way back they sang a great many rounds and glees. At last they all separated, everybody being thoroughly satisfied with the picnic, though perhaps nobody prized the remembrance of it as Ruth did. Many a time in after years she looked back upon that day, and the recollection of that and many others remained undying in her memory.

CHAPTER X.

"ARE you tired, Ruth?" inquired Maurice, as they entered the garden one evening, having been out all day together. Maurice had been sketching, and Ruth and he had had a very delightful day.

"No, I am not," answered Ruth, looking up brightly; "do I look so?"

"You look remarkably well in every way," said Maurice, glancing admiringly at his little companion, with her dishevelled hair, and cheeks browned and rosy with the outdoor life she was leading. As if to show how free from fatigue she felt, she bounded along the garden, round to the back of the house, where Tina and Mary were seated under one of the trees by the stream.

"Well, little truant, how late you are!" exclaimed Tina, kissing her; "we can't spare you as easily as you appear to think. Maurice, you are very selfish to keep her so long to yourself."

Ruth laughed, and turned to Mary, who was looking on silently, and she said with a sidelong look, "Have you missed me, Mary? Oh! has anything happened?" she exclaimed suddenly, as Mary seemed scarcely to take notice of what she said; while a perturbed expression that was not sorrowful, yet hardly joyful, flickered over her face. Mary made no answer, but held out a letter. Ruth, who saw immediately that it was in her father's handwriting, began to read it eagerly, not waiting to wonder what news it contained that should excite Mary in any way. The letter ran as follows:

"MY DEAR MARY,—Contrary to my expectations, the time of my return has been fixed already, and when you receive this letter I shall be on my way home. I can hardly realise that I shall so soon see my dear children once more. I am anxious to procure a house as soon as I arrive in London, and you and Ruth will then come to your home for good, I hope and believe. I am coming in the Vixen, which is due at Southampton on the 30th of August, and I shall write to you at once, to let you know what day to come to London. I am desperately pressed for time, so cannot give any further particulars at present. When you have this letter you will not have long to wait before we meet. Much love to both my daughters, from their loving father, "GEORGE LEIGHTON."

Ruth read the letter right through to the end, without uttering a sound. The flush of excitement had died away from her face, but she looked up at Mary for a moment with a strangely bewildered look, then suddenly flung the letter to the ground, and darted away into the house; she did not stop until she reached Stephen's consulting-room, when she burst open the door, entered, and stood before him, pale, and gasping for breath.

"Ruth, what is the matter?" asked Stephen, looking up from his writing, and drawing her to his side.

Ruth made no answer, but nestled close to him, and put her arms round his neck.

"Tell me what is the matter, dear child. Speak, Ruth, I must know."

"Oh, Dr. Rae! papa is coming home. What shall I do? He will take me away, and I can't bear to go."

Stephen was so surprised at this outburst that for a moment he could make no reply; but Ruth sobbed piteously, and at last he spoke. "You must not cry so, darling," he said softly, stroking her hair. "Why are you so unhappy about it? come, you must tell me all your trouble, for I want to help you. Won't you confide in me?"

"Yes." Ruth made a desperate effort to control herself, and looked up with a very woeful face, though she stopped crying, "Oh! I don't love papa a bit, and I have got to go and live with him, and leave everybody I care for."

"But, Ruth, you need not lose your friends because you go away."

"But I shall never see them."

"Yes, you will—I shall take care of that. And though you are unhappy now at the thought of leaving us, after all, you are going to your own father, and you will soon get to know and love him."

Ruth stood looking very pale and mournful. She had become quite quiet, and looked so thoroughly worn out that Stephen said, "You had better go to bed now, darling; you need rest sadly."

"No, let me stay with you. I won't stop your writing if you will only let me be in this room. I feel so much better if I can look at you sometimes. May I stay?"

Stephen placed her on the sofa, and returned to his writing, and continued busy for some time. Ruth lay as quiet as a mouse, looking at Stephen, hardly thinking, but feeling that there was a misfortune at hand, and that he was a comfort to her. At last he came and sat down on the sofa.

Ruth's eyes filled with tears, and taking his hand in both hers, she said, looking up into his face, "Dr.

Rae, what shall I do without you? Fancy when I can't have any more talks like this!"

"Won't you write to me instead, when you are gone? I shall always like to hear from you, and I will answer your letters."

"How lovely that will be!" exclaimed Ruth, ecstatically; "thank you so much!"

Ruth laughed quite merrily as she rose and said good night. Stephen then returned to his work. He had been too much occupied in talking to Ruth to think how much he would miss her himself; now he was almost surprised to find how much he dreaded the separation.

The next three weeks passed very quickly, and the morning of Mary's and Ruth's departure arrived. Ruth woke even earlier than usual, and went down into the garden, and stood beside the stream, wondering when she should see it again, and hardly daring to look forward to her life in London, it seemed so blank and miserable. Presently Maurice came behind her, and putting his hands on her shoulders, bent down and looked into her face.

"Why are you down so early?" he asked gently.

"I could not sleep," Ruth answered, with quivering lips, trying hard to keep from crying.

"Poor child! you must try to keep well when you are in London; though as soon as the excitement is over, I dare say you will sleep better. Sit down here and let us have a talk," said Maurice, as he led her to their favourite seat.

Ruth passively did as he told her, but seemed totally unable to enter into conversation. She sat mutely by him, holding his hand, and listening to anything he said, looking so sadly thoughtful that Maurice's heart ached with pity for her. All the time between that and the arrival at the railway station, where the Raes went to see the two girls off, she continued quite quiet, and did not break down until, having said good-bye to all the others, she came to Dr. Rae. He took her in his arms, and then she clung to him, sobbing convulsively, unable to bear up any longer.

"Good-bye," she whispered, through her tears. "Oh! Dr. Rae, I can't be brave—it is no use."

"My little one must remember all I have said to her. She must not make others unhappy. Good-bye, Ruth; it will not be for long."

Stephen placed her in the carriage, and the train began to move. Ruth looked up as they glided slowly away from the platform, and through her tears she smiled at the Raes, who stood watching their departure. It was a wistful little smile, but the brightest she could give when she felt so miserable; and the engine gave two or three merciless puffs, and the two sisters were whirled away quickly through the changing scenery, towards the great city.

Ruth soon recovered her composure, but the journey was a silent one; for Mary and Ruth were both occupied with their own thoughts, and Ruth, at least, preferred to think in silence. As they neared London she became restless and uneasy, but did not communicate to Mary her dread of the meeting with their father. Presently the train stopped at the Euston station, and almost immediately Mary sprang out of the carriage into her father's arms, and when he had embraced her, he lifted Ruth out, greeted her hastily, and then led them to a cab, returning to it himself as soon as he had seen after the luggage. Then they drove away over the noisy stones, but only a short distance, for Mr. Leighton's house was in Gower Street, and they were soon in the drawing-room.

"Now, let me look at my children," said Mr. Leighton, seating himself in his arm-chair, and holding them both in front of him, looking from one to the other. "You don't look like sisters," he said, after a silent survey, and turning to Mary he continued, "you have your mother's figure, Mary, and her hair—you are decidedly your mother's child."

"Papa, I think my features are like yours; I can see the likeness myself even."

"Yes, I dare say. I should think you take after me in character, to some extent. You must be my right hand. Do you think you can keep house for me, and be a clever little manager?"

"I am sure I can," answered Mary, decidedly, "and I shall like it very much."

"Well, dear, I am very busy, and I must write some letters for the post. Jane will show you which is your room, and I shall be ready for tea at six."

Mr. Leighton kissed Mary and hurried away. Ruth was standing by the window, watching the people that incessantly poured down the street, and the cabs, some of them with boxes on them, driving quickly by. She wondered how many of the people in them were going into the country, and felt as if each one that was going there must be as happy as she should be if she were going to the Raes'.

"Come, Ruthie, and take off your things. You are tired, and must rest." Mary put her arm round Ruth, and they left the room together.

Ruth went to bed early that night, and she was so tired that she fell into a deep sleep very quickly; much to the relief of her sister, who came up-stairs soon after she was in bed, fearing to find her in one of her excited, wakeful states. Mary then returned to her father; and it was late before she retired to bed herself, for they had much to talk about.

EXTRACTS FROM AN EXPOSITOR'S NOTEBOOK.—IV.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL COX, NOTTINGHAM, AUTHOR OF "A DAY WITH CHRIST," ETC. ETC.

THE CONVERSION OF NATHANAEL.—I. (John i. 45–51.)

WE have good reason to believe that Nathanael was an apostle, one of the twelve whom Jesus chose to be always with Him; and yet only one incident in his life is recorded for our instruction. Happily, that incident is one of the most momentous and instructive. It is nothing less than the story of his conversion to the faith of Christ. And surely no event in any man's life is of graver moment than this. When we desire to form a judgment on any man's character, what most of all we desire to know is the history of the turning-point in his career; of the great critical moment which, for good or evil, made him what he was. It is at such a moment that we see Nathanael in the glass of the Word. The main course of his life, the labours, trials, and joys of his apostleship, are veiled from us, save that we know he must have shared in the experiences common to the Twelve. But the veil is lifted for us at the very crisis of his career, at the moment in which he became a servant and friend of Christ's.

To this sacred and impressive moment, then, let us bend our thoughts, considering (1) the Doubt of Nathanael, and how it was met; (2) the Confession of Nathanael, and how it was won; and (3) the Promise of Nathanael, and what it meant.

(1) The Doubt of Nathanael, and how it was met. "Philip"—who seems to have been a neighbour and an intimate companion of Nathanael's, and who himself had but just recognised in Jesus of Nazareth the Christ of God—"findeth Nathanael, and saith unto him, We have found Him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph." To this joyful and excited exclamation Nathanael demurs, asking doubtfully of his neighbour, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Philip meets his doubt with the simple and confident invitation, "Come and see;" Jesus meets it by exclaiming as Nathanael drew near to him, "Behold an Israelite indeed"—a genuine son of Israel, the prince with God, out of whom guile had to be so long and painfully chastised—"in whom there is no guile!"

Now if we would appreciate Nathanael's doubt, we must remember that all the Galileans were held in contempt by the Pharisees of Jerusalem, and that not altogether without cause. The province of Galilee was, practically, much farther from Jerusalem than the Highlands of Scotland are from London, although not half nor quarter so many miles lay between the two. And, to reach the metropolis, the Galileans had either to traverse the alien district of Samaria, or to risk a somewhat perilous journey across the highlands and valleys on the other side of the Jordan. Hence many of them habitually absented themselves from the annual services and feasts of the Temple. To these every Jew was bound, by the law of Moses, to go up thrice every year. Those who failed to "present themselves before the Lord" were held by the punctilious Pharisees and scribes to be little better than heathen.

The Galileans, moreover, engaged in commerce with their Gentile neighbours, and especially with the wealthy merchants of Tyre and Sidon. Their commercial intercourse with heathen races had abated the edge and strictness of their ceremonialism, and, still worse, had also chilled the fervour of their piety. And here was another reason for holding them in contempt. Even the prophets described the Galileans as a "people that sat in darkness;" and the Pharisees, instead of carrying them "a great light," were much more disposed to consign them to "Gehenna."

Metropolitans generally have a little contempt at the service of provincials. Even the most religious men do not always feel more pity than anger for the irreligious. So that we can easily understand how, in the Hebrew metropolis, the provincials of Galilee were thought to be little better than outcasts, half heathenised by contact with the heathen, and how the Pharisees came to be very sure that "out of Galilee ariseth no prophet."

Even in a community of social or religious outcasts, however, class or caste distinctions are generally found—"in every deep a lower still." Commonly there are some hapless creatures on whom their fellows expend the contempt they receive from society at large. And thus the despised Galileans treated the inhabitants of Nazareth. What they were to the Jews of Jerusalem, that the Nazarenes were to them. Themselves despised and contemned, they took their revenge, not on those who despised them, but, as the manner of men is, on those who were weaker, if not worse, than themselves. Even the guileless Nathanael, who lived within a two hours' walk of Nazareth, was not free from this miserable prejudice. When Philip declared that he had found the Messiah in a Nazarene, Nathanael gravely doubted whether any good thing could come out of a village of such ill-repute.

This prejudice was probably strengthened by other feelings, quite as hard to overcome as the set and flow of public opinion. One of the saddest effects of contempt is that it often makes men contemptible. To hold and show a low opinion of men, is only too likely to reduce them to the level you assign them; while if you think well of them, if you let them see that you hope much from them, they will often grow "to match the promise in your eyes." Our vulgar proverb, "Give a dog a bad name, and hang him," goes on the assumption that, if you give a dog a bad name, it will not be long before he deserves the halter. And the Nazarenes, despised by others, learned to despise themselves, just as the publicans, finding it in vain to struggle against their bad name, sank, for the most part, into open and shameless "sinners."

Then, too, there was the prejudice more than once adverted to by our Lord Himself—"A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and among his own kin." Men hardly ever expect much of their immediate neighbours. If by any chance a family, or village, happen to produce a genius, almost every one will recognise his claim before they can see anything remarkable in him.

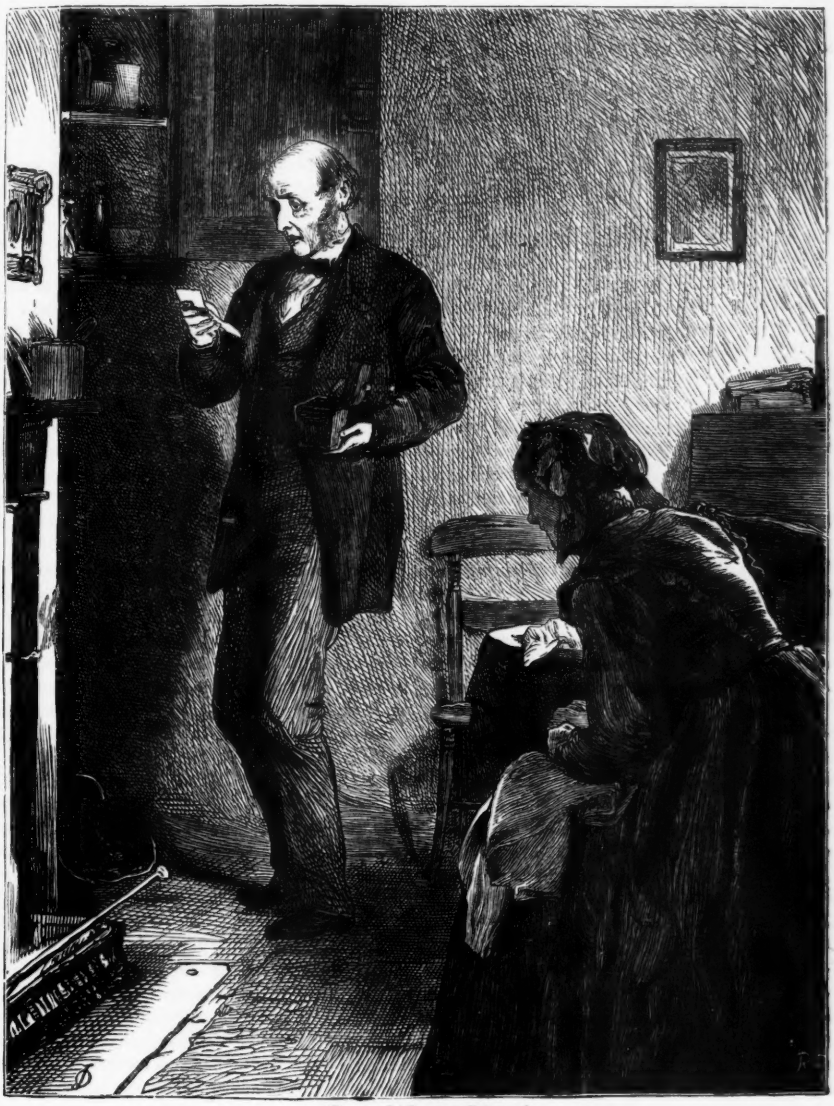
The doubt of Nathanael had, we perceive, a broader basis than most doubts have. The general contempt for Nazareth, the self-distrust of the Galilean, the prejudice of close neighbourhood, all made it hard for him to see the Christ of God in a Nazarene. And it is, perhaps, significant of his guileless candour that he expresses his doubt, not in the form of a dogmatic assertion, but in that of a question: "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? Can any living, life-giving root spring out of that dry ground? Jesus the son of Joseph our neighbour, a Galilean, a Nazarene—this He of whom Moses and the prophets wrote! That were a wonder past all telling." His doubt does not amount to denial; it is rather expressive of a hope darkened and restrained by a cautious fear of mistake.

Philip meets this doubt very wisely. He appeals to experience, and invites trial. He says simply, "Come and see." No doubt he recognised in Nathanael a mood with which he himself was familiar: for Philip also seems, by nature, to have been "slow of heart to believe." He had had his doubts, his prejudices, his fears; and probably he and his neighbour, Nathanael, had often sat under the fig-tree at Cana, talking sadly, and a little sceptically, over the affairs of the Jewish Church and State. Only in the light of one Presence had his prejudices vanished; only by the sound of one Voice had his doubts been charmed to rest. If he could bring Nathanael to that Presence, and within the sound of that Voice, he had no fear of the result.

This was his only resource; and this is our only resource. Nothing but a personal experience of the grace of Christ—no array of arguments and proofs—nothing but a personal and vital contact with Him who is "the truth and the life," will quicken us into newness of life, or redeem us from the thraldom of fear and doubt. We must "come and see" the fair thing, "the good thing" which has come out of Nazareth, before we shall rise into the rest of faith.

Nathanael showed himself to be without guile in that he did "come and see." Neither his prejudices, nor even his open avowal of them, were permitted to hold him back. And now a greater than Philip takes him in hand. The Nazarene requites him good for evil—meets with love and admiration the man who had suspected Him, who was suspecting Him: "Behold a genuine Israelite, in whom is no guile!" How tender the rebuke! While Nathanael had been doubting Jesus, Jesus had been watching him with benign approval, and greets him, now that he comes, with hearty commendation, although he comes in a most questionable mood.

We are not to think of our Lord's greeting, however, as a mere compliment; the encomium He pronounced was not undeserved. He who was "the truth," spake only the truth. Nathanael must have been a genuine and guileless Israelite, or he would not have been saluted as "an Israelite indeed." The reference of the greeting is, doubtless, to Jacob's later and better name. When his guile was chastened out of him, Jacob, the subtle supplanter, became Israel, the wrestler and prince with God. From the emphasis laid on the epithet "Israelite," we may reasonably infer that Nathanael had been wont to wrestle with God in prayer; that in the strife of prayer he had won his guileless simplicity, his frank sincerity of soul. In much he might be still ignorant and weak, tinged by the prejudices of his race; but duplicity was no longer among his faults. He was untainted by the fatal plague-spot of his generation; he was no hypocrite, but a sincere and genuine man. He rang true. He looked at all things, or was at least disposed to look at them, through his own eyes, not through the coloured glasses of tradition, and to speak of them as he found them. Sincere men are often doubters for a while; sometimes for a long while. But in the very sincerity which leads them to doubt, and to avow their doubts, lies our hope of their recovery to faith and the rest of faith. Once set the very truth before their eyes, so that they can see it, and they forthwith with joy receive it.



Nathanael's frank sincerity came out, as in other things, so also in the artlessness with which he uttered his doubt, urged his question, and at last avowed his allegiance to Christ. And it was on this sincerity that Christ laid hold—proving His Divine wisdom by fastening on the grace which was rich in promise for the future, and not on the misgiving that sprang from the prejudices of the past. A less wise teacher would probably have set himself to answer the doubt of Nathanael, instead of lauding his sincerity. He would have tried to argue it down, to show from the prophets that the Messiah "should be called a Nazarene." And thus, while stopping the mouth of Nathanael, he might have utterly failed to win his heart. The Lord Jesus took a more excellent way. Prejudice is seldom overcome by logic; but it is often consumed in the fervours of strong and happy emotion. And Jesus kindles a fervent and happy emotion in the breast of the pious and guileless Israelite, by acknowledging his piety and his sincerity. Passing by the doubt which crept across the mere surface of his soul, the Lord fixed on the permanent underlying virtue of his character. He addressed Himself not to that which was but for a moment, but to that which was for all time, and for eternity; and by recognising and admiring that which was best and most Divine in Nathanael, He won an adoring recognition of that which was perfectly Divine in Himself.

Now in this, as in all else, Christ has left us an example,—an example which we, alas! are slow to follow. He has taught us to admire the sincerity of the sceptic, when at least he is sincere. He has taught us to appeal to that which is best in those who doubt what we believe, to be forward in our recognition of it, to be prompt and hearty in our admiration of it, and thus to incline and predispose them to faith. Would that we had followed His example more closely, or were following it! We find it hard to admit that there can be any good thing in a man until he has joined the Christian fellowship, or even until he has joined our section of that fellowship. Till then, whatever charity we may profess, practically we too often suspect him of not being open to conviction or of not being faithful to it. We have but little admiration to bestow on such homespun virtues as sincerity and uprightness, if they are not found in our communion; and even in that communion we are sometimes tempted to resent rather than to admire them. We demand creeds, conformity to our standards, rather than a wise simplicity and candour of mind, or a fearless integrity, or a life without guile. We are much more apt, it is to be feared, at espying the faults, even of those who do hold our creeds and conform to our standards, than in discovering and admiring their virtues. And if any dare to entertain a doubt, have we always even charity enough to bid them "Come and see" for themselves? Mainly because our own hold of truth is so slight and uncertain as that we are in some danger of relaxing our grasp at every shock, or because we are too indolent or too timid to look all round a doubt and to meet it fairly, we shriek out our foolish terror and alarm; and instead of extending a helping hand to the neighbour who is drawing back from Jesus, and from "the truth as it is in Jesus," we often hurl our hasty anathemas at him, and drive him from the sacred Presence which he is reluctant to leave.

I have somewhere read that when the moon is eclipsed the Chinese turn out with their drums and tomtoms, making the night hideous with their tumult, doing the most that mere noise can do to frighten away the evil spirit which, as they suppose, is devouring the queen of night. But I never heard that the evil spirit was frightened away, or that the eclipse was any the briefer, or that the eternal laws paused even for an instant in their march because of the din and clamour below. Nor is the spirit of doubt to be chased away by mere noise, whether of argument or of vituperation. We need not be disturbed and lose our rest because for a while shadows obscure the heavenly light. The moon is quite safe, and in God's good time will once more clearly reflect the lustre of the lord of day.

There is, indeed, a certain kind of doubt proceeding mainly from an affectation of singularity or of superior thoughtfulness, which deserves no respect, and which may be best met by rebuke. But there are other kinds of doubt which should move us, not to rebuke, but to sympathy and compassion. It often happens, at a certain step of their mental development, that, in proportion to their power and sincerity of mind, men find it hard to acquiesce in the popular creed, hard even to accept and believe the very truth. They want a reason for faith. They see difficulties which are hidden from men of a less inquisitive and searching intellect. And they are too honest to profess a faith of which they are not assured, or to say that they see fully what they only see in part. And again, it constantly happens that men, long habituated to certain modes of thought and action, conceive a prejudice in their favour, which makes it very hard for them to receive new views of truth, even when the new are also larger views. Like the men in our Lord's parable, they have got to love their old garments and their old wine; and they do not and cannot "straightway desire the new." All such doubts, all doubts that are sincere and natural, should be met with kindness and patience. Who that really knows the difficulty of arriving at truth can look without compassion on a neighbour struggling with the detaining bonds of habit and prejudice, and unable all at once to shake them off? Who that knows the rarity and the value of sincerity will not respect a neighbour the more because he will not palter with his conscience, and pretend to see what he cannot see, and to believe what he cannot believe? From Christ's treatment of Nathanael let us learn how to treat such doubters as these. Let us admire their fidelity to conviction, and so predispose them to think well of our convictions, and to listen with candour to the arguments we allege on their behalf. And to the end that we may deal patiently and kindly even with the doubts which are most offensive to us, let us seek a more sincere and hearty faith in our own principles and convictions. For our impatience of doubt often springs from the fear lest we should be overcome by doubt; we grow angry because we are not sure of ourselves: we find it easier to ban and condemn, than to give a reason, or a sufficient reason, for the faith that is in us.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX.

MARRIAGE IN HASTE.

SINCE the night on which her mother had interrupted her parting with her lover, Beatrice Lovejoy's relations with that gentleman had undergone a change. He was freer and bolder in his bearing, though he professed to be as much in love with her as ever, and was after a fashion, in which selfishness and vanity were the chief characteristics. He was a young man of the very lowest type, except that he had a degree of physical vigour, in which that type is generally deficient, and which was apparent in a tall and tolerably handsome figure, on which was set the small low-browed head of an English negro—a negro without the negro's affectionate nature, or power of idealisation. Between these two it had been a game at cheat the cheater. He had given out that he was a gentleman, and she, that she was a lady whose adverse circumstances had obliged her to work for bread, and they had carried on this deception throughout their courtship. Both had a slight substratum of truth in their stories, he because of his birth, for he was the disinherited son of a landed proprietor, and she in that she could remember a time when her family were better housed and clothed and fed, and in her relationship to Fanny, past whose villa she had once walked her lover, while he pointed out to her the house where he dwelt with his mother and sisters, the people whom he passed off as these relations being not in any way connected with their lodger.

The world had not used John Baselow over well—had not taught him much, we will admit, of love or reverence, and there was a time when Beatrice might have taught him both. If she had been a good unselfish girl she might have redeemed him, for the poorest soil may grow grain instead of nettles. He had wandered about with her in those city roads, looking down on her softened face and listening to her softened voice till he really loved her, and in this he was better than he had intended to be, for he had only intended to amuse himself. He loved her, and he longed to tell her the truth, and to ask her to marry him, a clerk with two pounds a week; and if she had married him there and then, it would have lifted their whole lives into another plane. But the sight of that poor, ill-clad, careworn mother had given him a shock. He felt that she had been deceiving him. He did not resent it as a more upright man would have resented it, and he did not cease to care for her; but what had been best and purest in his attachment perished at a blow. Evil may and does harm the good, but its influence on the evil for evil is incalculable.

Shortly after Geraldine's removal to her cousin's, Beatrice had begun to suffer from the great disadvantage under which the bulk of London workers suffer, the excessive fluctuation of employment. The more exclusively they minister to the enjoyments, the luxuries, the adornments of the rich, the more liable they are to be thrown out of work on the shortest notice. Those who provide for the necessities of the poor are comparatively secure.

Beatrice worked half-time for a week or two, and at length she was dismissed to take a holiday for an indefinite period. She was to be recalled, in short, only when business became brisk. Such a holiday was to her simply hunger and despair. She had refused to share her prosperity with those at home, and how was she to come upon them in her adversity? At first she would not condescend to this, and bore privation with Spartan firmness. It was not till she had lived on bread and water for days that she yielded so far as to share the poor enough meals of her parents. She had defended herself for her former hardness—that is, in her own opinion, for she cared little for the opinions of others—by her resolution to help her sisters as soon as she herself was secure. She had the true spirit of an adventuress, and despised her father and mother for plodding on as they did, sinking into the mire of poverty deeper and deeper at every step. Beatrice knew she had beauty; she knew all her good points—that she carried herself well and proudly, that she spoke well, and had none of the vulgarities which she saw and heard every day.

Therefore she determined to marry well, and set about doing so with inflexible purpose. She believed in John Baselow, for he was well dressed and well educated, boastful and energetic, and she had resolved to marry him; but in her desperation she had ventured to push matters to this issue, and had found herself foiled; felt, too, that it was her poverty and the poverty of her home that had foiled her; and was very bitter against both. And this bitterness extended to her lover; she made up her mind to throw him over and try again.

Full of her purpose, she met him one evening, and as she came up to him refused his outstretched hand. The girl was pale with suppressed passion, and did not notice that he, too, was labouring under great excitement, only that it seemed of an entirely pleasurable kind. She told him she had come to say good-bye, and as disguise was no longer necessary, explained her circumstances frankly. She would have left him then and there, but he detained her. He had such a story to tell, and no one to tell it to. Besides, her truth had been much more effective than her fiction, and her thin, pale face under the moonlight looked lovelier than he had ever beheld it. He detained her, and forced her to listen.

He, too, told the truth this time, and discarded the mythical mother and sisters. His story was a strange one. His father, after having cast him off for years, had left him his heir. He had been written for; he had hurried down to the funeral, and had taken possession of his inheritance. He had a handsome dwelling-house; he had some hundreds of acres. He had a bank balance, on which he had actually drawn; and yet none of these did he offer to share with her.

But Beatrice was dazzled. She laid aside her ill-humour; she rose to the occasion, and arrayed herself in every false enchantment. He could not part with her; he was enslaved by her, as the songs of all nations have sung of men enslaved by false enchantments.

And she held her own: supped with him for the first time, and, regardless of everything else but the stake she was playing, walked with him again, until she was nigh to fainting with exhaustion. And he would have had her not to go home at all, but to stay under the protection of his landlady till the morrow, when he should make her his wife.

On the first point Beatrice held her ground; on the second she yielded, promising that on the morrow she would leave her father's house, and cut herself off from her kindred for ever.

They were to be married before a registrar, and to take their departure at once for the house of which John Baselow had come into possession. At parting he gave her a sum of money—not a large sum, but sufficient, in her hands, to make her presentable. She was to be ready at ten o'clock.

When she came home that night, even she was touched by the look of haggard misery on her father's face, as he said, or rather wailed, "Oh, Beatrice—Beatrice! I was coming out to look for you."

"I'm all right," she said carelessly. "I wish you wouldn't be so anxious about me." But she kissed him, which she had not done for a long time, and came in and sat down by the fire, pretending to warm herself.

She could not bear to see him sitting there, with the tears chasing each other down his wan cheeks, and she went over and knelt by his side on the hearth.

"I've not done any harm staying out so late," she said, "and I am sorry it has vexed you. There, I have a sweetheart, and I'm going to be married soon, that's all. Do believe me, and be sure that I can take care of myself." She comforted him, and coaxed him to drink a little tea, and then to go to bed, which he did, and she stole in and saw him sleeping like a child.

But she could not sleep. Her faintness had given place to excitement. She went to her room and looked out her best things, that she might put them on in the morning. She had little save the one set that was worth taking, so that she need not encumber herself, and had nothing to regret leaving behind. She made up the fire, however, and sat, altering and trimming, till morning. At last she became sleepy and chill, and crept off to bed.

Mr. Lovejoy was up first, and had lighted the fire and made the breakfast, and Albert was gone also. She was glad that he was, for he would have treated her savagely enough for staying out so late the evening before. She had nothing to fear in the way of reproach from her father. He had drawn the little table in front of the fire, with a pathetic desire to make her comfortable. It was covered with a brown stuff imitating polished mahogany, and on it were set two cups and saucers, a half-consumed loaf, and a basin of brown sugar. It was to be her last meal at home, and these things were photographed on the memory of Beatrice Lovejoy, along with the feelings of the hour, as she and her father sat opposite to each other during the silent meal. They were so photographed that through all her future life she was never secure—however differently surrounded, however far off the thought of such things might be—against having them flash before her mental sight, with more or less of insufferable vividness.

After breakfast she went up to her own room, and her father went out. Her mother had not returned. Should she wait for her? She was later than usual. Perhaps Geraldine was worse. Beatrice made up her mind to wait as long as she could. Her sister-in-law and the children were moving about; but she avoided them, as indeed she usually did. She dressed herself deliberately; but Mrs. Lovejoy did not return. Then she took an envelope—she happened to have one and a scrap of paper—and wrote: "I am gone to be married, and must bid you good-bye;" and addressing the envelope to her father, she enclosed in it one of the sovereigns her lover had given her, and hid it in a little tin tea-box which stood on a shelf in the cupboard; then turning the key in the parlour door she left the house, and never once looked behind her.

CHAPTER XXX.

RECONCILED.

Mrs. Lovejoy had combined on that morning a visit to the warehouse for which she usually worked with her journey home, and she was not surprised when she came in to learn that Beatrice had already gone out. She did not ascertain the fact for herself, for she went straight into the little back kitchen, where Emily was washing out her children's socks and pinafores, and learnt from her that nothing had happened—"nothing particular," peace-loving Emily said, making no mention whatever of her sister-in-law remaining out till past midnight.

Mr. Lovejoy had gone forth on one of his weary rounds in an outlying district, and would not be home till evening. Mrs. Lovejoy had brought some work with her, and as there was a fire in the kitchen she established herself there, and commenced sewing with her usual industry. When it drew near dinner-time she began to think of preparing a meal for herself, and as, like many poor women, she lived on tea and bread, she must have found that little note in the tea-caddy immediately. But Emily came to the rescue. She had prepared a meal for herself and the children, and called her mother-in-law to share it, which she did.

After dinner, followed by a cup of tea, the children were set upon the floor to play, and both women began upon the dresses Mrs. Lovejoy had brought from the warehouse.

The afternoon passed swiftly, and at length Albert came home. Then Mrs. Lovejoy went down-stairs to her own room, lighted the fire, and sat down to await her husband, working on with might and main, for every stitch told, but the sum of a hard day's stitching would only bring her a single shilling.

About six o'clock in the evening Mr. Lovejoy came home, looking weary and dispirited. Mrs. Lovejoy only looked up from her work for a moment.

"No luck to-day," he said, in answer to her look. It was the usual formula; and her needle flew faster and with a firmer click.

He sat down in a chair by the fire, sighing wearily, and looked at her busy hands; there seemed reproach in their rapid movement. She did not rise to prepare a meal for him, as she had done in long-past times. The kettle was simmering on the hob, and he could make tea for himself. It was his usual custom now to prepare his own. But he did not seem in a hurry to do so now. He was too tired to be hungry, and he sat and sighed.

Mrs. Lovejoy glanced up again, and seeing that he looked unusually weary offered to do it for him.

The offer was enough to revive him. "Never mind, my dear," he answered brightly; "I'll be all right in a minute or two;" and presently he rose and went about the task. It came into his head to ask for Beatrice as he reached down the tea-caddy from its shelf. "Has she come home?" he said.

"No," answered her mother, sharply.

He had got the teapot, and opened the little box to take out a spoonful of tea, when looking in he saw the folded paper placed there by Beatrice, and stopped to take it out. He felt the coin in it, and asked simply, "What is this?"

"How can I tell?" replied his wife.

He unfolded the paper in silence, and the sovereign rolled out and dropped unheeded on the floor, causing Mrs. Lovejoy to start and come to a standstill, for she had caught the gleam of the gold. But no word came from her husband. He stood like one stunned and bewildered. At last he smiled faintly, and said, "Beatrice is married."

Mrs. Lovejoy did not reply. She came over to her husband and snatched the paper from his hands and read.

"I couldn't have believed it," she cried. The piece of gold was lying on the hearth in the fire-light. "A clandestine marriage," she repeated, pointing to it. "Look at that!" They both stood and looked at it a for moment with horror in their eyes; neither advanced to lift it up. Starvation itself would not have tempted them to touch that gold.

Then poor Mr. Lovejoy's limbs gave way and he sank into a chair, sobbing, "Merciful Father! what have I done to deserve such misery?"

It was not what he had done that was rising up against him, it was what he had left undone. It was what he had left undone that spoke in the hard sentence which seemed to come from a distance, though it was spoken close to him. "You've not provided for me and my children as I'd a right to expect."

Having said this, Mrs. Lovejoy sat down and did nothing—a sign in her of suffering too great to admit of mitigation or relief. She was an unimaginative, irreligious woman, with a sense of the value of work which was almost a religion to her; but she was thinking, "Oh! if Beatrice had only died; had only been lying up-stairs in the little bare room still and cold, as the others who were gone had lain, she could have thanked God as she had never thanked Him in all her life."

Something might be done before the night closed in, but what? Somebody might be sent forth to seek her, but where? They did not even know the name of the man she had married. Her father did not even know him by sight; her mother did—she would know him anywhere, she felt sure, though she had seen him only once. But how would this help them? Beatrice would not return with them if found that very hour. They knew this too well. From a child her power of resistance—her hard, unyielding obstinacy, even to her own hurt—had been wonderful. No, there was nothing to be done, Mrs. Lovejoy made up her mind, and yet the idea that nothing was being done was unbearable.

She was the first to arouse herself, and she set to work to make the tea, in the midst of the preparation of which her husband had stopped. She made it, and set it before him, and bade him eat and drink. It reminded both of more than one meal after death had been in the house, and one lay in it with lips closed for ever. And they both ate just as they had eaten on those occasions, with neither relish nor desire, but from the mere habit and necessity of eating.

Nor did they mention her name between them again. Albert was up-stairs; but they did not go to him. They tacitly agreed not to proclaim their loss. They shrank from telling it as they would have shrunk from telling their most secret shame.

But at length the father rose and said, "I am going now;" and his wife knew as well as if he had said it out what he meant. He was going out into the city, upon which the darkness had already come down, to wander up and down in search of a clue to her whereabouts. Then he went out quietly, and Mrs. Lovejoy began to prepare to go to Geraldine. The hour had nearly come when she usually set out. She hesitated whether she would go up-stairs first. The children were being put to bed. They were learning, poor little things, to be quiet as mice when their father was at home. She listened, and heard not a sound. Then she too went out without a sign; and when she reached Geraldine's bedside there was not a trace of emotion visible on her hard features.

Geraldine had been very much better than usual that day. Her cough had ceased, and her spirits had risen. She was quite light and gay when Fanny and Ada said good night and left her alone with her mother. She was full of Ada's plans.

Mrs. Lovejoy was far from approving; but she said very little. What could she say, when Geraldine spoke of a time which her mother knew would never come?

"I feel so much better," she said. "I think I shall get well yet, mother; and perhaps I could sing too. Ada says the singers at concerts make a great deal of money—sometimes five pounds in a single night. She has found out all about it; she asked the professor to-day. And Beatrice might help too," she added, speaking with pauses between the sentences. "Ada's voice and hers go together better than mine. It is a wonder we never thought of it before."

Her mother told her she must not speak so much. "Try to sleep, Jerry," she said. Mrs. Lovejoy was busy working by the light of the shaded lamp. She always brought her work with her when she had any.

"I seem to have so much to say to-night," she answered. "I think I see Ada. How pretty she looked the other night. Ada looks well in slight things. But Beta would look best in silk. I wish you would tell her to come and see me, mother."

Mrs. Lovejoy suppressed a groan. "Jerry dear," she said again, "try and go to sleep. Could you try if I put out the lamp?"

"Not just yet, please," said Geraldine; "I am not sleepy. I do want to see Beta, mamma."

"Why should you wish to see Beatrice?" said Mrs. Lovejoy sharply; "I'm sure she has not been very kind to you."

"That's why, mother. You blamed her about me," answered Geraldine, "and I want to tell her that I don't feel it any more, that I love her all the same."

Mrs. Lovejoy actually groaned this time, and in her heart felt something very like hatred for her eldest daughter.

"Do you know," continued Geraldine, "that lying here thinking things, I seem to know people so much better—to know what goes on in their minds, I mean. I think hard things have made Beta hard, mamma, and that if she was happy, and everybody was very good to her, she would be kind. I mean to try and be good to her. Tell her she is to come."

"Jerry, Jerry, don't talk that way!" cried her mother: "Beatrice has gone."

"Where has she gone?" said Geraldine.

"She has left us," answered her mother.

"Left home!—how?" asked Geraldine, raising herself on her elbow. "Mother, what do you mean?" she added faintly, for her mother's hands were wrung in her lap, and two tears, that looked quite hard and crystalline, the first the girl had ever seen her shed, had fallen upon them.

It was too late for reserve now, and Jerry, young and innocent as she was, was too sadly wise.

"She is gone to be married," said Mrs. Lovejoy; "but we knew nothing more. She has been cruel to the last."

"Where is father?" asked Geraldine with a sob, and sinking back.

"Gone to try and find out about it. Hush! hush!"

Geraldine closed her eyes, and there was silence in the room for a long time—at least, so it seemed. The little timepiece ticked loudly. Mrs. Lovejoy sat with her hands in her lap, and Geraldine lay with her closed eyes, and looked like one already dead.

At length her voice, grown thinner and fainter, broke the silence. "Mother, I don't want to live any more. It has come to me just now, what they've all been wishing and praying for me to have, the desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better."

She paused after the solemn words, sounding tenfold more solemn because this mother and child had never spoken of such things. The one had never taught, the other never learned them. And hearing them spoken then, not only awe, but fear and pain oppressed Mrs. Lovejoy. They seemed at once to carry her favourite child out of her reach for ever—to remove her to a distance greater than even the distance of death.

"Mother," sounded the sweet, faint voice once more, "I couldn't at first pray for myself as they told me; but it comes all right with me praying for you and father and the rest. I wonder if father will find her. I wonder if I could help him to find her if I went now."

Her mother rose and drew near her. "Oh, hush!—hush! Jerry, my child." She thought she was beginning to wander in her mind.

Geraldine's eyes closed, her lips moved, and then gradually, with her mother standing by her, she fell into a peaceful sleep.

Mr. Lovejoy wandered up and down, far and near, coming home again and again to see if by any possibility Beatrice might be there, and still returning to his fruitless quest. He loitered in roads where the gas glared on the pavement, and fell on the faces of the crowd, trying to scrutinise each till his brain was in a whirl, and all mingled in one hurrying, fantastic stream; then he walked into quiet bye-roads, where he met people mostly two and two. But no Beatrice. He had come out of one of these quiet dark roads out of the light of a corner public-house, facing into the principal thoroughfare, when suddenly he felt the pavement slipping from beneath his feet. He clutched at the wall, which seemed receding also, and then he knew no more what had happened till he woke, bruised and shivering with cold, on the hard pavement. It was as well, perhaps, that no one had seen him fall; that no police functionary was at hand, or he might have wakened on the hard bench of a police cell, imprisoned for the night as drunk and disorderly. (To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. No. 10. NEW SERIES. JOB.

Chapters to be read—Job i., ii., xlii.

TO THE TEACHER.—It is not intended in this lesson to give any, even the briefest, summary of the contents of the Book of Job. Such a subject would be altogether beyond the capacity of the children, for whom these lessons are intended. But the man himself, in his pathetic story, his trials, his patience, and his returning prosperity, will be found to interest the children much.

I. JOB AT HOME. (Read i. 1—5.) Try and picture to the children the life of an Eastern prince or sheikh, recalling the history of Abraham or Jacob. Job himself, the father of the family, a godfearing, upright man, "eschewing evil, and fearing God." His wife (ii. 10) only appearing after his trials. His seven sons feasting and drinking, leading careless lives, forgetting God, and persuading their sisters to join them; his substance also very great, consisting of flocks and herds, after the custom of the East. Even in this picture we have an insight into Job's piety, in his daily prayers and burnt-offerings for his sons, lest in their merriment they should have blasphemed God, a sin punishable with death (Lev. xxiv. 15, 16). How much must such a wealthy and good man have been respected and envied.

II. JOB TEMPTED IN HIS ESTATE. (Read i. 6—22.) Ask who are called the "sons of God" (Job xxxviii. 7). Angels, being created beings, are such equally with men. Refer to 1 Kings xxii. 19 for another instance of God's being represented as holding a council in heaven. Point out the fact that Satan is spoken of as a person and not merely as an influence, and refer to Matt. iv. 2, where he is mentioned as coming to, and holding conversation with Christ, and show the children that just as God is a Spirit (John iv. 24), and the angels are good spirits (Heb. i. 7), so Satan is a bad spirit, always going about the earth seeking whom he may devour (1 Peter v. 8). Now question the children upon the story, pointing out (1) how all possessions come from God (ver. 10). Remind of Jacob, whom God blessed, so that his flocks and herds increased (Gen. xxx. 43); of Solomon, to whom God gave riches as well as wisdom; and, universally, all good gifts are from God (James i. 17). (2) How God permits trials of our faith. Explain carefully to the children the difference between temptation and trial. The devil tempts us to sin directly and indirectly: God tempts no man (James i. 13); but God allows us to be tempted in order to "try" us, or "make trial" of our faith and obedience. Thus Eve's obedience was tried or tested, and found to fail; Abraham's aith was tried, or tempted (Gen. xxii. 1), and found firm. As an illustration show how gold must be tested in the fire in order to be purified. So man is tried for his good, but never more than he can bear (1 Cor. x. 13). Question as to Job's trials—his oxen, asses, sheep, camels, servants, and children successively destroyed, and he and his wife left alone. Picture the desolate house, and the parents' grief. Remind of the lamentation of David over one beloved son

(2 Sam. xviii. 23), here whole house destroyed. (3) The effect of trials. Ask what Satan thought Job would do, and what most men would do with such an accumulation of troubles. Why did not Job sink under them? What did he do (ver. 20)? Show how he acted in accordance with God's description in ver. 8. He worshipped—i.e., recognised God as Sovereign Lord, who had a right to demand all from him; he blessed God, even for taking away his dearest things from him. Show how this conduct showed patience under suffering, resignation to God's will, and implicit faith in God as wise and upright Creator.

III. JOB TEMPTED IN HIS PERSON. (Read chap. ii.) Ask the children which would be the greatest trial—the loss of worldly goods or of health. So ask how Satan now wished God to allow him to tempt Job. Again point to the conversation between God and Satan, and show what it teaches us (1) of the perpetual watch kept over us by God, so that He spies out all our ways (see Ps. cxxxix. 1—5), and also how Satan is always restlessly wandering about the earth seeking to do evil. Show also (2) that Satan's power is limited (ver. 5, 6). Only as God allows him can he do anything to us, and press strongly upon the children the fact that as with Job's body so with our souls, Satan can only tempt, not make us sin. Refer to Christ (Heb. iv. 15) to show that we may be as pure after temptation as before; it is temptation trifled with that begets sin (James i. 15). Now try and picture Job in his miserable condition—his possessions taken from him, his children dead, his body covered with loathsome boils. What was left in life worth having? Ask who gave way to despair about him—not himself, but his wife, telling him to "curse God, and die." Ask what Job's answer was (ver. 10), and point out how what we call "evils" are not really such to God's people. They were not so to Job, for they developed his character, and have proved of inexpressible comfort to thousands since; so that all that happens is good (Ps. lxxxiv. 11). Now refer to the visit of his three friends. Show the greatness of their sorrow and sympathy, sitting down in silence for seven days.

IV. JOB RESTORED TO PROSPERITY. (Read chap. xlii.) It will be sufficient to tell the children that Job and his friends had a long argument about God's dealings with him, and in the end Job humbled himself before God, confessing his sin (ver. 6), and God graciously accepted him. Ask what God said about his three friends, and what they were required to do, and how Job was to pray for them. From this let the children see (1) how important it is to have a right knowledge of God. Show how carefully we ought to study the Scriptures (John v. 39); for upon our knowledge of God depends our eternal life (John xvii. 3). (2) Also, how ignorance of God is a sin to be confessed and mourned over. Remind how the Holy Spirit is to convince men of the sin of unbelief (John xvi. 9). They may learn also (3) the duty and blessing of intercessory prayer. They offered up a sacrifice, but Job's prayer for them prevailed. Now God restored to Job his possessions twofold. New children were born to him, and his latter end was blessed more than the beginning (ver. 12). See Ezek. xiv. 14 for the estimation in which Noah was held by God, and in James v. 11 he is quoted as an example of patience.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. Let the children see (1) how riches, &c., alone cannot give happiness, for they may flee away. (2) How all we have is God's, lent us only for a time, given or taken away at God's pleasure. (3) The beneficial effect of trial when borne rightly, teaching patience and resignation, rendering the person more like Christ. Let children learn to bear their little trials patiently.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe Job's life at home. How did his anxiety for his sons show itself?
2. Show that Satan is a real person. What may we learn about his power?
3. Explain the difference between temptation and trial.
4. What lessons may we learn from Job's arguments with his friends?
5. Where and how is Job mentioned elsewhere in the Bible?
6. Give three practical lessons the subject teaches us.

THE GRIEFS OF CRIPPLE TOM.

CHAPTER IV.

THE autumn and winter passed away, and the spring-time and summer came, without bringing any incident in the history of Cripple Tom or his friend worth recording; but there was during all these months a gradual growth in the mind of the elder lad, both of intelligence and of feeling. The development was too gradual to have attracted the attention of any of those around him. Who can tell when the commonest weed begins to put forth its unnoticed flower? Could I have listened to every word that Tom spoke, even to his deaf companion, I should still be unable to point to the minute stages through which his mental life was passing; for no grey-haired man whose conscience is burdened with many a sinful memory, no smooth-browed girl, however sensitive to the world's gaze, is more reticent

She paused after the solemn words, sounding tenfold more solemn because this mother and child had never spoken of such things. The one had never taught, the other never learned them. And hearing them spoken then, not only awe, but fear and pain oppressed Mrs. Lovejoy. They seemed at once to carry her favourite child out of her reach for ever—to remove her to a distance greater than even the distance of death.

"Mother," sounded the sweet, faint voice once more, "I couldn't at first pray for myself as they told me; but it comes all right with me praying for you and father and the rest. I wonder if father will find her. I wonder if I could help him to find her if I went now."

Her mother rose and drew near her. "Oh, hush!—hush! Jerry, my child." She thought she was beginning to wander in her mind.

Geraldine's eyes closed, her lips moved, and then gradually, with her mother standing by her, she fell into a peaceful sleep.

Mr. Lovejoy wandered up and down, far and near, coming home again and again to see if by any possibility Beatrice might be there, and still returning to his fruitless quest. He loitered in roads where the gas glared on the pavement, and fell on the faces of the crowd, trying to scrutinise each till his brain was in a whirl, and all mingled in one hurrying, fantastic stream; then he walked into quiet bye-roads, where he met people mostly two and two. But no Beatrice. He had come out of one of these quiet dark roads out of the light of a corner public-house, facing into the principal thoroughfare, when suddenly he felt the pavement slipping from beneath his feet. He clutched at the wall, which seemed receding also, and then he knew no more what had happened till he woke, bruised and shivering with cold, on the hard pavement. It was as well, perhaps, that no one had seen him fall; that no police functionary was at hand, or he might have wakened on the hard bench of a police cell, imprisoned for the night as drunk and disorderly. (To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. No. 10. NEW SERIES. JOB.

Chapters to be read—Job i., ii., xlii.

TO THE TEACHER.—It is not intended in this lesson to give any, even the briefest, summary of the contents of the Book of Job. Such a subject would be altogether beyond the capacity of the children, for whom these lessons are intended. But the man himself, in his pathetic story, his trials, his patience, and his returning prosperity, will be found to interest the children much.

I. JOB AT HOME. (Read i. 1—5.) Try and picture to the children the life of an Eastern prince or sheikh, recalling the history of Abraham or Jacob. Job himself, the father of the family, a godfearing, upright man, "eschewing evil, and fearing God." His wife (ii. 10) only appearing after his trials. His seven sons feasting and drinking, leading careless lives, forgetting God, and persuading their sisters to join them; his substance also very great, consisting of flocks and herds, after the custom of the East. Even in this picture we have an insight into Job's piety, in his daily prayers and burnt-offerings for his sons, lest in their merriment they should have blasphemed God, a sin punishable with death (Lev. xxiv. 15, 16). How much must such a wealthy and good man have been respected and envied.

II. JOB TEMPTED IN HIS ESTATE. (Read i. 6—22.) Ask who are called the "sons of God" (Job xxxviii. 7). Angels, being created beings, are such equally with men. Refer to 1 Kings xxii. 19 for another instance of God's being represented as holding a council in heaven. Point out the fact that Satan is spoken of as a person and not merely as an influence, and refer to Matt. iv. 2, where he is mentioned as coming to, and holding conversation with Christ, and show the children that just as God is a Spirit (John iv. 24), and the angels are good spirits (Heb. i. 7), so Satan is a bad spirit, always going about the earth seeking whom he may devour (1 Peter v. 8). Now question the children upon the story, pointing out (1) how all possessions come from God (ver. 10). Remind of Jacob, whom God blessed, so that his flocks and herds increased (Gen. xxx. 43); of Solomon, to whom God gave riches as well as wisdom; and, universally, all good gifts are from God (James i. 17). (2) How God permits trials of our faith. Explain carefully to the children the difference between temptation and trial. The devil tempts us to sin directly and indirectly: God tempts no man (James i. 13); but God allows us to be tempted in order to "try" us, or "make trial" of our faith and obedience. Thus Eve's obedience was tried or tested, and found to fail; Abraham's faith was tried, or tempted (Gen. xxii. 1), and found firm. As an illustration show how gold must be tested in the fire in order to be purified. So man is tried for his good, but never more than he can bear (1 Cor. x. 13). Question as to Job's trials—his oxen, asses, sheep, camels, servants, and children successively destroyed, and he and his wife left alone. Picture the desolate house, and the parents' grief. Remind of the lamentation of David over one beloved son

(2 Sam. xviii. 23), here whole house destroyed. (3) The effect of trials. Ask what Satan thought Job would do, and what most men would do with such an accumulation of troubles. Why did not Job sink under them? What did he do (ver. 20)? Show how he acted in accordance with God's description in ver. 8. He worshipped—i.e., recognised God as Sovereign Lord, who had a right to demand all from him; he blessed God, even for taking away his dearest things from him. Show how this conduct showed patience under suffering, resignation to God's will, and implicit faith in God as wise and upright Creator.

III. JOB TEMPTED IN HIS PERSON. (Read chap. ii.) Ask the children which would be the greatest trial—the loss of worldly goods or of health. So ask how Satan now wished God to allow him to tempt Job. Again point to the conversation between God and Satan, and show what it teaches us (1) of the perpetual watch kept over us by God, so that He spies out all our ways (see Ps. cxxxix. 1—5), and also how Satan is always restlessly wandering about the earth seeking to do evil. Show also (2) that Satan's power is limited (ver. 5, 6). Only as God allows him can he do anything to us, and press strongly upon the children the fact that as with Job's body so with our souls, Satan can only tempt, not make us sin. Refer to Christ (Heb. iv. 15) to show that we may be as pure after temptation as before; it is temptation trifled with that begets sin (James i. 15). Now try and picture Job in his miserable condition—his possessions taken from him, his children dead, his body covered with loathsome boils. What was left in life worth having? Ask who gave way to despair about him—not himself, but his wife, telling him to "curse God, and die." Ask what Job's answer was (ver. 10), and point out how what we call "evils" are not really such to God's people. They were not so to Job, for they developed his character, and have proved of inexpressible comfort to thousands since; so that all that happens is good (Ps. lxxxiv. 11). Now refer to the visit of his three friends. Show the greatness of their sorrow and sympathy, sitting down in silence for seven days.

IV. JOB RESTORED TO PROSPERITY. (Read chap. xlii.) It will be sufficient to tell the children that Job and his friends had a long argument about God's dealings with him, and in the end Job humbled himself before God, confessing his sin (ver. 6), and God graciously accepted him. Ask what God said about his three friends, and what they were required to do, and how Job was to pray for them. From this let the children see (1) how important it is to have a right knowledge of God. Show how carefully we ought to study the Scriptures (John v. 39); for upon our knowledge of God depends our eternal life (John xvii. 3). (2) Also, how ignorance of God is a sin to be confessed and mourned over. Remind how the Holy Spirit is to convince men of the sin of unbelief (John xvi. 9). They may learn also (3) the duty and blessing of intercessory prayer. They offered up a sacrifice, but Job's prayer for them prevailed. Now God restored to Job his possessions twofold. New children were born to him, and his latter end was blessed more than the beginning (ver. 12). See Ezek. xiv. 14 for the estimation in which Noah was held by God, and in James v. 11 he is quoted as an example of patience.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. Let the children see (1) how riches, &c., alone cannot give happiness, for they may flee away. (2) How all we have is God's, lent us only for a time, given or taken away at God's pleasure. (3) The beneficial effect of trial when borne rightly, teaching patience and resignation, rendering the person more like Christ. Let children learn to bear their little trials patiently.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe Job's life at home. How did his anxiety for his sons show itself?
2. Show that Satan is a real person. What may we learn about his power?
3. Explain the difference between temptation and trial.
4. What lessons may we learn from Job's arguments with his friends?
5. Where and how is Job mentioned elsewhere in the Bible?
6. Give three practical lessons the subject teaches us.

THE GRIEFS OF CRIPPLE TOM.

CHAPTER IV.

THE autumn and winter passed away, and the spring-time and summer came, without bringing any incident in the history of Cripple Tom or his friend worth recording; but there was during all these months a gradual growth in the mind of the elder lad, both of intelligence and of feeling. The development was too gradual to have attracted the attention of any of those around him. Who can tell when the commonest weed begins to put forth its unnoticed flower? Could I have listened to every word that Tom spoke, even to his deaf companion, I should still be unable to point to the minute stages through which his mental life was passing; for no grey-haired man whose conscience is burdened with many a sinful memory, no smooth-browed girl, however sensitive to the world's gaze, is more reticent of the inner thoughts and feelings than is a child, or a youth just passing out of mental infancy. One thing, however, that greatly contributed to (though it did not entirely cause) Tom's advancement was the instruction which he received from Miss Burton throughout the spring and summer months.

For some time Tom's teacher had thought that she ought to try to teach him to read; but she half feared that it might seem to be her duty to go and teach him at his own home—at that filthy cottage. She knew that Mrs. Robinson was in a very deplorable state, despised even by the less exemplary women of the village for her idleness, dirtiness, and disregard of the good opinion of others. She knew also that she could no more expect to induce this woman to change her habits and ways of life, to become a decent, cleanly, church-going, dutiful wife and mother, by visiting her, tract in hand, and treating her to a small lecture once a week or once a fortnight, than she could expect to change a thistle into a rose-bush by carefully anointing it every week with half a teaspoonful of rose-water. She knew that the only way by which she could reasonably hope to bring about a change, even in the outward details of Mrs. Robinson's life, was by getting her to look upon her as a friend, whom it would be a pain to displease and a pleasure to gratify. She knew also that if Mrs. Robinson would allow her to visit her cottage several times a week for the sake of teaching her son to read, she might in time come to have a great influence over her—an influence far greater than could be gained in any other way. Notwithstanding all this, Miss Burton did not feel inclined to undertake the task. She had not been thinking of the mother's improvement, but the son's; and she felt very doubtful whether she was capable of going to such a place and spending even half an hour in it three or four days a week, for weeks together. So she compromised the matter by inviting Tom to come to the summer-house for an hour's lesson on four days a week; and that the lessons might be the better valued, she limited the invitation to a month to begin with.

Tom gladly accepted the month's lessons. On the second morning he begged that his friend might come too. Miss Burton was glad to have him come, and provided him with pictures to look at during Tom's lessons. She found the mind of her pupil as empty as that of the deaf boy of any idea about countries, animals, or men, other than those he saw around him, without even the commonest furniture of the mind. Little by little she succeeded in filling the lad's mind with new ideas; each day the task grew easier; until at last she was surprised at his intelligence, and the tenacity with which his memory retained whatever he learned. So the summer months passed away, leaving the cripple boy no longer dull-brained and dumb, but a creature possessed of knowledge and thought, and, although he was far from suspecting it, with new capabilities of emotion and desire.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

85. A remarkable sign was given by God to Hezekiah that he should be healed of his sickness. What miracle of a similar kind is recorded in the Bible?

86. Account for the expectation among the Jews of the reappearance of Elijah before the coming of the Messiah.

87. Give the number of the prophecies uttered by Elijah, and name the persons against whom they were directed.

88. What instances from the history of Ahab may be adduced to show that he was a worse character than Jeroboam, the son of Nebat?

89. What is the title by which the memory of the iniquity of Jeroboam the son of Nebat is perpetuated?

90. What are the most convincing proofs we have in the history of Solomon that he turned aside from the Divine law and forgot the God of his fathers?

91. In connection with what event do we read for the first time that God sees not as man sees; that man looketh on the outward appearance, but God looketh on the heart?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 208.

71. Baasha (1 Kings xvi. 1—7); Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xix. 2).

72. Heb. xi. 7.

73. As a priest (Ps. cx. 4; Heb. v. 6; vi. 20; vii. 17—21).

74. "Pharaoh's cup was in my hand: and I took the grapes, and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup" &c. &c. (Gen. xl. 11).

75. Exod. iv. 3, 6, 9.

76. Exod. xvi. 23. "This is that which the Lord hath said."

77. God ordained that they were to be manumitted in the Sabbatical year (Exod. xxi. 2); but if they preferred their position of servitude, they could bind themselves without any limitation of time, "and he shall serve him for ever" (Exod. xxi. 5; Deut. xv. 16, 17); i.e., until the year of Jubilee, which was an exception made by God to this law, for then there was to be general emancipation, and a continuance of their service no longer (Lev. xxv. 10, 40).

"The future mocks the present"—p. 242.

EMBLEMS.

THE shining light discovers
The deepness of the shade;
We sigh the more in sadness
To hear the song of gladness;
The quarrel of the lovers
Seems harsh when peace is made;
It is the light discovers
The deepness of the shade.

A breath creates the bubble,
  Dissolving at a breath;
In merry peals and knelling
The selfsame bells are telling
Of blessing and of trouble,
  Of bridal, birth, and death;
So floats and fades the bubble,
  The bubble of a breath.

The faithless swallows leave us
  When gloomy days begin;
We live and love together
Through glad and glowing weather;
The smiling lips deceive us
  With words that woo and win;
Our friends betray and leave us
  When darker days begin.

The fair and fragrant roses
  Are found on thorny stems;
We hate the sins we cherish;
In pain our pleasures perish;
Our foolish nature closes
  With evil it condemns;
Our hands are full of roses,
  But wounded with the stems.

The tide with useless swelling
  Resounds upon the beach;
We pass the day in sorrow
And dream of joy to-morrow;
Our hopes are ever dwelling
  On bliss beyond our reach;
The tide of life is swelling
  To die upon the beach.

The autumn winds are sighing
  Where yellow leaves descend;
Our joys are evanescent;
The future mocks the present;
The hours are winged and flying;
  This life in death will end;
The mournful winds are sighing
  Where withered leaves descend.

Is there no type of heaven
  For us on earth below?
The stars their watch are keeping:
For sleepless eyes and sleeping
Their gentle light is given
  As thro' the gloom they glow:
So may we find in heaven
  The light we seek below.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER XI.

NEARLY five years had passed away, and Gower Street looked just the same as it did the day Ruth and Mary came to London. So did the Leightons' house, and there was not much more change in the inmates. Mr. Leighton was a little greyer, while the greatest change in Mary was that she had grown altogether brighter-looking than she used to be. She was very happy now, for in a week she was going to be married to a friend of Mr. Leighton's, Dayrell Irving, a cotton manufacturer at Manchester. He had come up to London some time before on business, during his stay had often had occasion to ask Mr. Leighton's advice on affairs of importance, and, on Mr. Leighton's invitation, he had sometimes come to spend the evening. On these occasions he would often remain for hours with his host, closeted in the study, talking politics; but one time, when only Mary and Ruth were at home, he still stayed, much to their astonishment, and what was more, he seemed to enjoy himself. The two girls had often agreed that he seemed to care for nothing but talking about business matters, but soon found they were mistaken; for his visits became more and more frequent, and Ruth somehow left off criticising him and his opinions, ever since one day when Mary told her that she was very fond of forming theories about people, and that, as a consequence, she was often very unjust. This did not go on long, for Dayrell Irving soon asked Mary to be his wife, and she accepted him. There was no difficulty whatever, and as Dayrell could not leave his business long, and did not like being parted from Mary, the engagement proved a very short one. There was only a week now before Mary's wedding, and she was expecting Dayrell from Manchester this very evening. It was dusk; the fire lit up the drawing-room with a soft red glow, and Ruth was singing a melody which she had just composed, enjoying it to perfection in the solitude and the twilight, when Mary came in with a lamp in her hand, which she placed on the table. Ruth broke off in the middle of her song.

"Why did you leave off singing, Ruthie?" asked Mary, going to look out of the window.

"I didn't want any light. I wish I could sit in the dusk all the evening. You always seem to try to cut short my favourite time."

"I don't do it because it is your favourite time," said Mary; "I only thought the house looked so dark, and Dayrell will be here soon."

"I forgot, Mary; I spoke crossly," said Ruth, penitently coming up to Mary, and holding up her face to kiss her, just as she used to when she was a child.

Mary kissed her gently, then, suddenly exclaiming, "There he is!" ran out of the room to meet Dayrell at the street door.

Ruth slipped out of the drawing-room, up-stairs, and leaning on the window-sill, she indulged for a short time in dreaming, an occupation for which she had as great a predilection as ever. Often, when she was alone, her thoughts travelled back to the happy time she had spent at "The Willows," as the Raes' house was called, with many wishes that the old days would return. Once, since she came to live in London, she had gone to visit the Raes, but that was four years ago now. She had been asked again, but Mr. Leighton had had an invitation to some other friends, for his daughters as well as himself, and though Ruth would have preferred infinitely to go to the Raes, she complied with her father's wish. The time had slipped on and on, and now all the Raes were away in Italy, except the doctor, as Mrs. Rae was in a very delicate state of health, and had been ordered to pass the winter in a warmer climate. Ruth thought how selfish she was to indulge in wishes for her own happiness, when her chief thought should be gladness for Mary.

"I wonder what papa will do without Mary," she thought. "I am afraid I shall be a very poor substitute for her in everything. I don't believe I could keep house well, and when he wants me to write letters for him, I know he won't like my writing. I never can write as neatly as Mary." Ruth began scratching her name on the window-sill with a pin. "Yes, it is funny writing. And then if I make tea it always seems so weak. I must be very stupid; I suppose that is why I am not happier. Suppose I were to turn over a new leaf, and try to remember everything carefully, when Mary is married; it would please papa, and it would show him I am not quite such a silly little childish thing as he thinks me. I will try. How I should enjoy being thought quite womanly, and I do believe papa would be really proud of me if I could be a little more useful."

As Ruth looked out of the window she resolved to improve herself, and to please her father by filling Mary's place efficiently, and as she formed this resolution the difficulties seemed to melt away, and her dread of housekeeping to vanish.

The bell rang for supper, and Ruth went down. She entered the dining-room as the others seated themselves at supper. Dayrell was there, and rose to greet her as she entered. He was a man near upon forty, good-looking, although his features were not regular. Naturally it was a very grave face; yet when he smiled there was something very fascinating in the intense change, and his smile was very charming in itself. "Have you been burying yourself like a mole that the light dazzles you so?" asked Dayrell.

"No, but I have been up-stairs in the dark."

"What have you been doing there?" asked Mr. Leighton.

"Nothing," replied Ruth.

There was no remark from Mr. Leighton, but Ruth well understood the silence that followed her reply.

"I dare say that is not a strictly correct answer," observed Dayrell, smiling, "I shouldn't wonder if you were pretty well employed, if the truth were known."

"Apparently Ruth was doing nothing, or prefers us to think so," said Mr. Leighton. "It could not have been very profitable employment, if doing nothing is better than doing it, whatever it may be."

"I remember I first thought of and arranged my plan to improve the machinery at the factory, one evening when I was too lazy to ring for candles. Yet I should not wonder if, like Ruth, I had answered 'nothing,' if anybody had asked me what I was doing. There are many more unprofitable employments than doing 'nothing' in the dark. The result of my improvements, Mary, is this," continued Dayrell, "that I am able to take my wife to a more comfortable home."

Mary looked up. "I am glad of that, if you are, but it does not matter, does it?" and they looked at one another in silence for a moment, speaking in a sort of language that needed no words. Ruth saw the look, and turned her eyes away, feeling she must not try to read thoughts which were not for her. She remained silent.

Dayrell spent all the week in London, and a few days before the wedding a sister of Mr. Leighton's came to London to see the last of Mary before she married, as she had always been a great favourite of hers. This sister had acted as housekeeper in a nobleman's family in Scotland, for some years, but she made occasional visits to London, to see her brother and nieces; at least she did not come to see Ruth exactly, for somehow or other she and Ruth never got on very well together.

The wedding-day came. It was a bright sunny morning in April, and Mary was married early. Immediately after the breakfast she and Dayrell started for the Lakes, where they were going to spend their honeymoon. On leaving, Dayrell told Ruth that he and Mary hoped to see her down at Manchester often, and this made Ruth find it easier to bear the parting.

Mr. Leighton had to go out on business in the afternoon, and Ruth and her Aunt Louisa had tea alone. The day had changed since the morning, and now the rain was coming down in torrents.

"When will your papa be home?" asked Aunt Louisa, as she left the room after tea.

"Soon, I think," replied Ruth. "I shall get some tea ready for him."

"Yes, do. I was about to advise you to do so."

Ruth went into the study, and ordered the servant to bring her father's tea in there, and she then proceeded to make the room a little more comfortable.

She cleared away the litter of papers from the table, drew the curtains, stirred the fire, placed Mr. Leighton's arm-chair by it, and put his slippers to warm; then, being thoroughly satisfied that there was nothing more to be done until his return, she stood before the fire, her thoughts divided between Mary and her father. It was not long before she heard the sound of Mr. Leighton's latch-key in the door, and she went into the passage to meet him.

"How late you are, papa," she said, as he came to the study door. "Are you very wet?"

"Yes, that is outside my coat. Keep away, it's dangerous to come near me at present."

Ruth laughed. "I am not afraid of you," she said, and she helped him to take off his coat. Mr. Leighton seated himself by the fire, and put on his slippers, and Ruth gave him his tea.

"I could almost fancy Mary made this tea," he said. "It is excellent. I remember tasting some tea of your making before, which, to say the least of it, was poor; you have improved since then, I see."

"Yes, I hope so, and now I shall have practice, and I hope I shall always make it as well as Mary does, and that I shall do other things, too, as well as she does," Ruth answered, looking up at her father from her footstool before the fire.

"By-the-bye, Ruth, I suppose you have heard that Lord Mackensie and his family are going to India?" said Mr. Leighton, abruptly.

"Yes. It is a great pity that Aunt Louisa won't go out with them, as they want her to so much. Don't you think so? She said she should prefer going to strange people, rather than to a strange country."

"She is not going to strange people any more. I have dissuaded her from doing so, as I wished very much that she should stay here, to keep house for me, now that Mary is married."

"Papa!" exclaimed Ruth, in a voice that startled Mr. Leighton, and made him look at her suddenly, "why did you do that?"

"I don't understand your question, Ruth; I asked her because Mary has gone away."

"But I thought I was to keep house," said Ruth, her eyes filling with tears.

"My dear child, I don't think that would be a good arrangement. From all I have observed, I should not imagine that you were willing to keep house, and certainly, if you dislike it you will not do it well. Why are you sorry that I have asked your aunt to live with us?"

"Because I should like to keep house," said Ruth.

"But do you think you are capable of doing so?"

"Yes, I am sure I could. Why shouldn't I be able to do it as well as other girls?" asked Ruth, passionately. "Why did you ask Aunt Louisa to stay without speaking to me first? It was cruel of you not to give me a chance of telling you all I meant to do."

"You mean that you wished to decide who shall keep house for me; but don't you see that I preferred to decide myself, because my decision is impartial."

"I don't think that you had any right to decide," Ruth exclaimed; "I don't see why I should be treated like a child, as you always treat me."

"It is because you behave like one, Ruth," replied her father, composedly.

Ruth started from her seat. "I don't. I know you and Aunt Louisa think so, but you are very unkind, and it is no good trying to please you. I shall never try again," she said angrily; and turning suddenly, she ran out of the study and up-stairs to her own room, where she flung herself upon the bed, sobbing violently, partly from anger, and partly from unhappiness.

GOD'S WORKMANSHIP.

BY THE REV. R. DALY COCKING, M.A., INCUMBENT OF TRINITY CHAPEL, BRIGHTON.

"We are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them."—Eph. ii. 10.

"FEARFULLY and wonderfully made" is the fine description which Holy Scripture gives of man as the creature of God's handiwork; a description fully endorsed by our own knowledge of ourselves, and borne witness to in every age by all reverent and thoughtful students of the mental and physical phenomena of the great subject of their contemplation. Nor is it easy to imagine any higher ground—any nobler motive for self-respect, and self-culture in all that is virtuous and enduring: no truer reason for pride in that highest sense which leads a man to guard and preserve in purity and honour his mind and body, his moral and material faculties, than the sure token felt within him, and visible without him, of an origin that is Divine; that Divine wisdom, design, and order are legible upon every feature of his being; "that he is made but a little lower than the angels;" that, in the language of the Psalmist addressed to God, "Thou hast fashioned me behind and before, and laid Thine hand upon me," that "we are God's workmanship."

For when once this great and ennobling truth of a Divine origin possesses and influences the mind, and we contemplate God as the Creator of this marvellous and all-beautiful structure—the human body—and God as the Source of all the fair gifts of which it is the priceless casket—intellect, affection, moral instincts, aspiration, hope—like so many beautiful lamps, illuminating and displaying the inner glories of the spiritual temple—it is an easy, almost a necessary inference, that as life in itself is thus felt to be Divine, the purposes of life must be Divine as well. We feel that for these God-given powers there must be God-created works as the sphere for their employment and development; that for minds sensible of their affinity with the eternal and immortal, there must be corresponding and kindred objects around which to gather, and in which they realise their true, their natural exercise and expression; that, since we are God's workmanship, there are created for us and with reference to us, good works, those supreme enjoyments which flow from deeds of virtue and benevolence, from purity of heart, from love of truth, from the pursuit and realisation of holiness, "which God hath before prepared that we should walk in them."

"Shall I take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid," saith the apostle. "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's." A frustration, therefore, it is of the purpose of God in the creation of man—an utter perversion of God's gifts to His creatures, when they are employed otherwise than He would have them, or than their own high and peculiar nature bespeak and imply. Dreadful is that truth, and prolific in its reproductive power, "God made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions,"—that man received his members as "instruments of righteousness unto God," but yields them as "instruments of unrighteousness unto sin." And so utterly is this a perversion of the high intent of God in the creation of His creatures—so thoroughly does sin, entering in as an element of confusion and destruction, mar and disfigure the fair features of original perfection, that God's own workmanship, concerning which He once declared that it was "very good," so completely loses its God-like characteristics and distinctiveness, so as to need nothing less than a new creation, a new creative act and exercise of omnipotent power and omnipotent love, to bring back the image—to reproduce the likeness of Himself, which the Triune Jehovah contemplated for man, when before the birthday of humanity, God said, "Let us make man in our image, and after our likeness." And most instructive is it to observe how completely the new creation is a counterpart of the first,—how, when God would renew and restore the race which had so far and so fatally contradicted and fallen short of the high intent of the first creation, that there comes into action the mysterious operation of a Trinity of Persons, that it is through the Son that access can be had by one Spirit unto the Father; that it is by giving to the world a new Man—a perfect Man—an ideal Man—a Man with all the needs, the sympathies, the capacities for temptation, sorrow, and death common to men, and yet with all the perfection and sinlessness of God. It is the Man Christ Jesus, the God-man, according to whom, as to a model, all other men were to be re-formed, that in His image, the image of Divine perfection, men in their intellectual, moral, and spiritual being, were to be re-cast, re-modelled, re-made, born anew by the mysterious action of the Spirit of God—by the power of the Highest overshadowing the soul. It is in such wise that that Holy thing, the Divine life, the life of the Son of God, yea, the Son of God Himself, may be born—that is, revealed, within us—by the action, we say, of that Spirit who, when the earth was without form and void, moved over the waters of primeval night as a light-producing, life-generating God—the third Person of the adorable Trinity, the "Lord and Giver of life."

For no less than this is the teaching of God's Word in multiplied places. For example, David, in the fifty-first psalm, in praying for forgiveness for his awful sin, and for future spiritual mercies, asks of God, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." A greater than David tells Nicodemus, "Ye must be born again." St. Paul, in writing to the Church at Colosse, contrasts their state when under the power and control of sin and their own hearts' desires, with the condition in which God's grace had afterwards placed them; and he speaks of the change as that of a "new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him, that is, the image of Jesus Christ." And in writing to the Ephesians the apostle exhorts them to "put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; and be renewed in the spirit of your mind; and put on the new man, which after God" (that is, the image of the pure and holy God as manifested and seen in Jesus Christ) "is created in righteousness and true holiness." And "if any man be in Christ Jesus, he is a new creation!" not merely a new creature, but a new creation! Oh, which of us—which of the truest and holiest of God's saints on earth, ever did, yea, ever could realise to the full all that is here expressed and implied—a new creation! That is to say that all the resources of Deity are here in exercise because required! That it needs as much the omnipotence of God to recreate, re- a fallen, sinful soul—the soul of the dalen that ever wept on her Redeemer's feet, and wiped them with the hairs of a head hung down in penitential shame—as it did to create the universe; to people countless worlds with immortal spirits; to call forth light from its cradle of perpetual night; to bid the ocean bring forth its manifold and multitudinous life, or earth to bear in her prolific bosom unfailing sustenance for every living thing—"grass that groweth on the mountains, and herb for the use of men."

And why should this be so? Because whenever it can be said of any man that "he is renewed in the spirit of his mind"—that he is a new man, that old things—old tastes, thoughts, imaginations, passions, lusts—have passed away; that all things have become new—that life is lived with new aspirations, new pursuits, tastes, joys, affections, hopes; that he is a new creature, created in Jesus Christ unto good works—such a result is exclusively the work of God, flowing from the inexhaustible love of God in Christ; it is a result which He alone could effect, or even conceive—a work which needed the power and love of our Father who is in heaven; the love and life and sacrifice of the adorable Son; and the prevailing, all-sanctifying grace of the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, the Advocate, the Guide, the Friend of man. Man of himself can no more renew his spiritual life, or retrieve his fallen fortunes, than he could at first have been his own creator, or breathed into his own nostrils the breath of life. He has not the knowledge—for "in Christ are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge"—nor the desire, nor the power, if even the knowledge were there. Reason and philosophy might, doubtless—as in fact they did for some—lead the mind to recognise and be conscious of its own deep defectiveness, its moral imperfections, and to guess vaguely at some condition, yet to be, of restoration and perfection; "to feel after God if haply they might find Him;" reason and philosophy could lead the thoughtful and the anxious students of themselves and of truth so far on a moral eminence—a moral Mount Pisgah, wherefrom some fair land of hope and promise might distantly be seen, but into it they could not conduct him; to gain it they could not help him, nor place within his reach the milk and honey of its goodly fields—the rich and all-sustaining hopes and satisfactions of a true religion; and that, because salvation and all that salvation implies and is, is of God; from the first spark of grace which faintly glimmers in the heart on earth, to the full blaze of everlasting glory which shall burst upon the soul in heaven—for it is His Gospel that bringeth light and immortality to life; it is His grace which revealeth, procureth, bringeth salvation! It is said of Michael Angelo, whose noble genius found its grandest expression in embodiments of Christian art, that on the rough material of his own selection no hand save his own was permitted to pass, from its rudest state, until, by the last delicate touch of the master-hand, his work stood forth, the eloquent parable of beauty and of life. Even so in the redemption, justification, and sanctification of man—that is, in all that renders him in the truest sense God's workmanship—it is God who performs the whole Himself; God in the Trinity of persons yet oneness of essence. No human, or sainted, or high angelic hand can bear a part therein; nay, in this particular, angels in their sinless glory, and man, raised from ruin and the miseries of sin to an inheritance of immortality and bliss, stand before God on equal, common ground. The one confession befits the lips of both; the one song of gratitude may rightly burst from the heart of each—"By the grace of God I am what I am."

And upon this work which God would fain accomplish and complete within the soul of man, and thus bring him into closer, dearer relations with Himself, various and sharp and deeply cutting are the tools and instruments which the Spirit of God—not always, 'tis true, but ofttimes, and in some cases necessarily—employs, whereby alone the rough places in man's nature are made smooth, and the rugged sharpness of a perverted will and of obstinate self-assertion is reduced to willing obedience and loving submission. These are, tribulation, disappointment, bereavement, sickness, and other trials in multiplied forms; but all under the Master-hand of Love, and by the patient workings of Grace, are ever fashioning the soul which does not thwart or defeat the purpose, but responds thereto in the truest spirit of submission and faith, until by slow degrees God's design is completed; and then comes forth upon the soul the image of a perfect man—the image of Jesus—the image of holiness; holiness, the most beautiful thing in man, because the highest attribute of God.

"We are His workmanship," His work of art, of truest design—which design is to glorify God and enjoy Him for ever; vessels made to honour; beacons set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel; temples of God wherein dwelleth the Spirit of God: a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ!

"We are His workmanship," His ποιημα—hence our word "poem." Redeemed, regenerate man is, indeed, in the highest sense a great poem, a glorious epic, telling forth on each chapter of his being the mystery of his own complex nature,—at once the subject of a paradise lost and of a paradise regained, singing forth the praises, the adorable love, the ineffable sacrifice of Him who called him out of darkness into His marvellous light—a harmonious creature with a heart delicately strung and attuned by the Spirit of God to the sweetest strains of love, the truest inspirations of hope, and the holy joys and fullest assurance of faith!

In answer to mercies, as an Æolian harp responsive to every touch of external Nature, the heart by the very law of its being becomes itself sensitive to all that is true and lovely and of good report, its breath is then the breathing out of a spiritual influence; its every action is the tuning of some other soul to the true harmonies of grace, and its every word a living power to awaken the lethargic slumberings of some thankless heart, and bid it rise and give thanks with the best member that it has!

"For this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on Him to life everlasting."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. New Series. No. 11. John the Baptist. Part I.

Chapters to be read—parts of Luke i., iii.

INTRODUCTION. Question as to the names of some of the characters on whom the children have hitherto had lessons. Ask in what respect inferior to those in New Testament—what the one great event to which all looked forward. Refer to what Christ said about the prophets and kings (Matt. xiii. 16, 17), and St. Paul (Heb. xi. 13). Show how they, by means of sacrifices and prophecies, looked forward by faith to Christ. All the rest read of in the Bible lived at or about the time He lived, while we live after and look back to Christ's death.

I. John prophesied of. (1) By prophecy. (Read Mal. iii. 1, iv. 5, 6). Tell that Malachi prophesied 400 years before birth of Christ. Ask how Elijah was a type of John; whose hearts he turned to God at Mount Carmel, and how; what king he preached to, and with what result. So that people were prepared for the coming of another great prophet. (2) By the angel. (Read Luke i. 5—25.) Question on the story. Ask the position of the altar of incense inside the Temple, reminding that only priests were allowed inside: where were the people? (v. 10.) Picture the fear and astonishment of Zacharias at the sight of the angel. Remind of the angels sent on similar message to Abraham (Gen. xviii. 10) and Manoah (Judges xiii. 5). Ask how the message was received, and why; and what sign was given in punishment for his unbelief. Notice the description of the child, and ask how John was to be great: what is ordinarily counted greatness; show that he was not great by birth, being the son of an ordinary priest—not great by riches. Ask where he lived, and on what food—not great by any particular talents—but great because of two things: his office in preaching about Christ, and his character in being full of the Holy Ghost (v. 15); ask which greatness is best, and why—showing how greatness of birth and riches will pass away, but the other will remain; and that while one is in the possession of few, all may have the other.

II. John born. (Read Luke i. 57—67, 80.) Ask now about his mother; her name and age. Describe her delight at hearing of the angel's message; her grief at her husband's dumbness; the joy when the child was born; the relatives meeting and discussing his name: what would they naturally wish to call him? who interposed, and why? what this showed on Elisabeth's part; and ask how the question was settled. Ask a few questions about circumcision, showing when it was instituted, and why. Read Gen. xvii. 5—10, to show how infants, at the earliest possible age, were to be received into covenant with God, and at circumcision the name was given. As Zacharias could not speak, what could he do? Describe the scene of his writing his name "John"—his tongue loosed—the joy of his wife—surprise of his friends—the tale spreading. Ask what was the first use he made of his speech, and draw the obvious lesson as to the duty of praise for special mercies. From ver. 66, 80 describe the child's growth—strong, healthy, and vigorous; developing early in body and mind because God was with him.

III. John preaching. (Read Luke iii. 1—18.) Ask the age at which prophets and priests began their work. Why wait till thirty? Show how with few books, learning was necessarily much slower then. Now picture out this new strange prophet in the wilderness of Judea, by the side of the Jordan: his hair, long and shaggy, uncut by the vow of the Nazarites; his dress, camels' hair and leathern girdle—his whole appearance wild and strange. Describe the crowds from the whole country, attracted by the reports coming to him. Show the nature of his teaching. Two subjects (1) repentance. Ask the nature of true repentance, showing from examples of David and Peter that it includes sorrow for past sin as well as change of life. What did John insist on the people's doing?—not merely professing repentance, but showing it in their lives. Question on some of the different classes of people who came; the people were told to give alms to the poor. From the story of the rich young man who went away sorrowful, show that almsgiving was rare in those days. Tell how the publicans, or tax-gatherers, were noted for their extortions, and the soldiers for discontent, and show that each class was told to show their repentance by giving up their particular sins. Press this home practically to the children. Show how needful it is to ascertain and abandon our besetting sin (Heb. xii. 1) if would truly repent. (2) Faith. Ask who the people thought John must be (v. 15), and how he set them right. Compare his baptism and that of Christ's; his the outward sign, and Christ's the inward grace. Show how he always pointed the people to Christ as the Lamb of God (John i. 29) who would take away sin, receive those who repent (the wheat, Luke iii. 17), but destroy the wicked; and how John disclaimed the honour the people wished to give him.

Now ask for points in his character. He was (1) faithful to his mission: he was to preach, and preach he did, with wonderful zeal and success. (2) Humble in declining honour, even though the forerunner of Christ. (3) Earnest in seeking to save souls. All can imitate him in these points—faithful in work, humble in manner, and earnest in spirit.

Questions to be answered.

1. By what two prophets was John the Baptist foretold, and in what way?
2. What was the angel's description of him?
3. Show the difference between the world's greatness and true greatness.
4. What sign did the angel show Zacharias, and how long did it last?
5. What was the nature of John's preaching?
6. Name three points in his character.

CHAPTER XXXI.

IN SEARCH OF EVIDENCE.

THERE had come into the office of Messrs. Tabor and Tenterden the case of a disputed will, and it was found necessary, on consultation, that some one should proceed immediately to the locality in which the testator had lived and died, in order to ascertain what substantial ground there was, for the assertion of the plaintiff, that the will had been made when the said testator was in a condition of incapacity, and that in that condition undue influence had been exercised over him. It was therefore settled that Philip should go into Essex for the purpose, and the day fixed was that on which Beatrice Lovejoy had left her home. It was twelve o'clock noon before he started on his journey, having been detained at the office a couple of hours beyond the time which he had fixed. He drove to the station in a hansom, and jumped into the train already in motion, with a black bag in one hand and a small portmanteau in the other. He had a carriage all to himself, and presently devoted himself to the contents of his bag, refreshing his mind concerning the case before him. The information was not of a very encouraging nature. It had been furnished by the next of kin, the nephew of a Mr. Jacob Baselow, who had left the whole of his property to a disinherited son. Old Mr. Baselow had died at the age of eighty-five, and was, his nephew was well assured, in his dotage. Also, as proof that undue influence had been used, it was alleged that the will was only framed a year and a half previous to his decease—in fact, when the testator had very few wits left about him. It was also urged that Mr. John Baselow had induced—and, indeed, bribed—certain friends to make false representations to his father concerning his (John's) former conduct, attaching the blame thereof to other and innocent persons. The only fact stated in support of old Baselow's mental incapacity was that towards the close of his life, for the last half dozen years or so, he had pretended to be stone deaf, while there was evidence to prove that he heard perfectly well. This was said to be the cunning of madness; but Philip saw in it only the natural outcome of such a character. When he could no longer take active means to verify the suspicions engendered by his own vile nature, and by the characters of those by whom he had surrounded himself, he had resorted to this mode of lying in wait to condemn them out of their own mouths.

Past the outposts of the great city, where ranks upon ranks of houses are stretching out to take possession of the green country, like so many columns on the march, and on through the level pastures of the marshes the train swept on. Philip had arrived at his destination before he was aware. The train was stopping at the station at which he had to get out, when, from a carriage in advance of his own, a young man sprang eagerly, while the train was still in motion, and was dashed upon the platform. Philip's carriage stopped exactly opposite the spot where he fell, and Philip was jumping out to help him when the porter and guard ran forward and lifted him up, and seeing that little damage was done, immediately began to take him to task for a contravention of the bye-laws, in leaving the carriage while the train was in motion.

Philip by this time had got out bag and baggage.

(Drawn by ROBERT BARNES.)

"Fanny began crying again and again. It reached Geraldine's ear, and seemed to distress her"—p. 252.

He heard the guard demand the young man's name, and the young man answer sulkily, while dusting his knees, "My name is Baselow;" and Philip started at the name, for, by a curious coincidence, if nothing more, it was the name of the defendant in the case; —nay, he felt sure it was the defendant himself, still in happy ignorance of his position as such. Guard and porter grinned as they heard the name, and seemed inclined to let him pass.

A lady had joined the group, at which Philip could not help glancing with curiosity and interest. She was the young man's companion—his wife or his sister. Where had Philip seen that face? for it was quite familiar to him, though at the moment blanched with fear—a handsome, unlovable face, he thought it was. And why did it bring before him Fanny Lovejoy and her troubles, and, by implication, his own, so persistently?

The young man limped off to the waiting-room, with the lady by his side, the train puffed out of the station, and Philip, coming behind the porter who was carrying his portmanteau across the road to the little inn, called to mind where he had seen the face. It was at Fanny's, after all, and she was one of those Lovejoy girls. But, having settled that, he could not dismiss her from his mind. What was she doing here, and with this young Baselow, of whom he had formed a most unfavourable opinion at first sight? To these questions he could by no means return satisfactory answers.

But having secured his bed and ordered his lunch, he returned to the common room, and found there the object of his mental inquiries, evidently waiting and alone. She had off her left-hand glove, and on it appeared a wedding-ring. Philip advanced boldly, and gravely begged her pardon; but he felt sure that he ought to know her. Was she not, or had she not been, a Miss Lovejoy?

Beatrice, for it was she, bowed with creditable dignity, and answered that it was so.

"But you claim that name no longer?"

"No; I am married."

"Is the gentleman with you your husband?"

Beatrice bowed again, and said, "Yes."

"Mr. Baselow?" said Philip.

"Yes."

Philip hoped he was not hurt, and was turning away, when she looked round for a moment to see that she was unobserved, and, opening a purse which she held in her left hand, hurriedly took out and unfolded a piece of paper, and thrust it before him. It was a marriage certificate, of that morning's date. He had only had time to glance at it, and she to return it to her purse, when Mr. Baselow re-entered, loud and bustling, and calling to her that the chaise was waiting. Without taking further notice of Philip, she walked from the room.

Having established himself at the little inn, Philip set to work to sift his evidence, and look up his witnesses; but the conclusion at which he arrived was decidedly unfavourable to his client—viz., that the old man had died possessed of all the senses he had ever had—a horrible mixture of craft and animalism, of shrewdness and the kind of short-sightedness which would come upon a soul which never raised eyes from out the dust.

With more than usual aversion Philip traced the footsteps of Jacob Baselow to the grave, and it was afternoon of the day following before he returned to town. He went straight to the office, and found there a note from Fanny awaiting him. Mr. Tabor was already gone.

CHAPTER XXXII.

A GOOD NIGHT.

Geraldine's sleep that night was disturbed by no pain, yet it could scarcely be called sleep, so thinly veiled were the senses. Her mother lay down on the couch beside her and slept also, so slightly that the girl's faintest movement woke her.

"What o'clock is it, mamma?" Geraldine asked again and again, as the night wore on, and after one of her brief intervals of slumber, Mrs. Lovejoy found, with terror, that the timepiece had stopped. To her it was an evil omen, not merely a sign that in the state of mind into which approaching death throws every household any habitual mechanical act, like the winding up of a watch or clock, is apt to be forgotten.

She slept no more. Geraldine, who had been longing for the morning, roused as soon as it was light, and almost hurried her away that she might learn something of Beatrice. Ada had been up with the dawn, and at her music, which, happily, did not disturb her sister, though it could be heard plainly through the rest of the house. It had been settled that no one was ever to enter Geraldine's room in the morning until Mrs. Lovejoy came out, as the invalid was apt to gain her last and most refreshing sleep when others were rising for the day. But, as soon as her mother opened the door, Ada would come in, and she heard the slight sound in the midst of her playing that morning and hastened up-stairs at once. In the few minutes during which her mother was absent, getting something for Geraldine, Ada was put in possession of the fact of Beatrice's run-away marriage. Trembling with excitement, she hastened to communicate it to Fanny; but Fanny could only stand aghast, and murmur, "Oh dear! what a shame!"

Fanny was not famous for resource in trouble, and her one idea under this fresh one was to send for Philip. In all her perplexities Fanny had been accustomed to rely on him, and she could not break the habit. "He is a lawyer, my dear," she said, when Ada objected, "and he always knows what is best to be done. Don't you remember how soon he settled that affair of your brother's? He is sure to find Beatrice, and have it explained. You have no idea how clever he is."

Ada submitted to this argument, with its kernel of fact, and Fanny, by a great effort at combination, sent in a note to Mr. Tabor, enclosing one to Philip, urging the latter to see her immediately. Only the servant brought back a message to the effect that Mr. Tenterden was out of town, and might not be home till quite late in the evening, if then.

Mrs. Lovejoy's fears, superstitious and natural, were somewhat dissipated in the morning light. It soothed her especially to learn that the servant had forgotten to wind up the timepiece, and that it had not, as she expressed it, "stopped of itself." Fanny took Mrs. Lovejoy's place from nine till eleven, while Ada had her music lesson, and the morning seemed passing like other mornings for poor Jerry, quiet and slow. They had moved her bed lately, so that she could see a corner of the garden, and the cherry-tree over the wall, and the field beyond, with its fringe of greening elms. It had been a great pleasure to her to look out at the pretty little picture, but to-day she turned her face away from it and shut her eyes.

When Ada came in she seemed more than usually glad, and more than usually reluctant to lose sight of her for a moment, though whenever by some word or sign she had expressed this, she would hasten to condemn herself as selfish, and beg her sister to go. Ada was glad she did not go that day. She had her lunch brought up to her there, along with Jerry's chicken broth and jelly, and ate it beside her; but Jerry could not eat at all. "Try it," said Ada, tasting it to tempt her; "it is so nice."

"I wanted nice things to eat when I couldn't get them, and now that I have them I can't eat," said Jerry, smiling, always struck by the incongruities of things. Then she took a little book from under her pillow and tried to read, as she had often done lately, but it soon dropped on the coverlet, as if it was too heavy for her to hold. She asked Ada presently to read it for her, and Ada read her to sleep.

Mrs. Austin came to the door, but did not go up-stairs when she found she was sleeping. A little later Mr. Huntingdon and Clara came, and found her awake. She roused herself on their entrance, and seemed to join meekly, as she always did, in the brief act of devotion. Mr. Huntingdon was bending over her to say good-bye, when she said something in a tone so low that neither Ada nor Clara heard her, but he answered, saying, "I am so glad." A few more whispered words, and then he bade her good-bye, passing quickly out of the room to hide his emotion. "She has learnt her hard lesson at last," he said to his sister, when they had gone on together for a little way in silence: "she is willing to go."

"I am so glad," said Clara, echoing his own words. "Well I know the peace it brings, for I have known the struggle."

"Yes, you know some things better than I do," he answered, as if half wondering.

"Because all life is a lesson," she answered, "and I have had a longer one than you—three years longer, Charles: measured by years and by pain," she continued, looking up at him with a pathetic smile, "far, far longer."

"Then we are drawing nearer, Clara," said her brother, "if pain counts more than years."

"Love counts more than pain," said Clara, smiling again.

"And costs more," he answered. "Clara, that poor child asked me to say good-bye for ever. Do you think it is so near as that?"

"There was a change for the worse, I thought," said Clara.

And do you know instead of saying 'Good-bye,' she said 'Good night.'"

It was about four o'clock in the afternoon when Lucy Tabor paid her daily visit to Geraldine. Fanny was sitting in the drawing-room, half asleep. She had got into the custom of drowsing through the hours between lunch and tea. Lucy did not rouse her, but went up-stairs at once; and, as she went, she could hear Ada singing very softly and sweetly. She went in, and found her, with her books upon her knee, sitting on a low seat in the window, where she could not see her sister's face.

As Lucy went up to Geraldine, she was shocked at the great change which she saw in her. She stooped to kiss her, and the touch of her forehead made her shiver with dread.

"How are you to-day, dear?" she asked; and Geraldine only turned upon her appealing eyes, but did not speak. She was evidently unable to answer. "Ada," cried Lucy, with a tone and look of reproach, "Geraldine is very ill."

Ada started up, and threw her book down on the floor. "What is it, Jerry darling?" she said, putting Lucy aside unceremoniously, and bending over her sister; "oh, Jerry! what is it?"

There was no doubting what it was, even by eyes that had never seen it. It was death. Lucy ran for Fanny, who came up-stairs, and proclaimed herself worse than useless by beginning at once to cry. It was evident that Geraldine noticed her and looked distressed. Ada was standing by her, supporting her a little, with her left arm under the pillow, strange and white, but with a tender calm. The terror was there for her, too, for it flashed across her face as she turned it away from Geraldine for a moment; but she was determined that her sister should not see it—as a mother turns smiling on her child, to keep it calm in some deadly strait of peril, which is stopping her own pulses with dread.

"Be quiet, Cousin Fanny," she said; "and you, Lucy, run for the doctor."

They did as they were bidden, both; and it was not long before Lucy returned with the doctor, who could only confirm their fears. There was nothing to be done but to let her depart in peace. The doctor was a kind-hearted man, and he pressed her hand in farewell, with tears in his eyes. But, after he was gone, it was evident that she wanted something, for her eyes turned to the door, and then appealingly to her sister's face.

"She wants mamma and papa," said Ada. "Yes—she knows what I am saying; let some one go for them."

"Let me go," said Lucy; and Ada gave her the address, without taking her eyes from off her sister's face. She had evidently heard and understood, for she faintly smiled.

Lucy flew to execute her errand, and just as she reached the door some one knocked. She opened it herself, and found Arthur Wildish.

Lucy's face was enough. "Can I do anything to help?" he asked, in a subdued tone.

"Oh yes," said Lucy, and told him her errand. "You will go faster than I could;" and she repeated the address which Ada had given her.

Arthur sprang off to do her bidding, and Lucy returned to the sick-room, to see if she could be of use there, telling them that Arthur had gone.

The time seemed to pass with strange rapidity. Fanny began crying again and again. It reached Geraldine's ear, and seemed to distress her. By a look—half reproach, half command—Ada succeeded in banishing her from the room; and she went into the next, where she could indulge freely.

Lucy remained a spectator of the scene, for Ada seemed to forget her presence. But she could not leave her. Out of sight she knelt in silence.

Ada asked, "Do you like to hear me speak, Jerry?" and she must have received an answer in the affirmative, for she went on speaking; and she spoke only what she felt—her own strong, yearning love. In broken, frequent sentences she murmured, "I'm here, darling—don't be afraid. I'm loving you, Jerry." The girl had no words to express higher or deeper things. But as the struggle grew harder, her words failed, and with lips grown white she whispered, "Shall I sing to you?"

Geraldine again assented, and Ada sang. She remembered the simple hymns she knew thus, when she could not say them; childish things they were, such as are sung in Sunday-schools, but they seemed full of sweetness and power then.

At length Arthur Wildish returned, bringing with him Mr. and Mrs. Lovejoy. They found Philip outside the door, having just arrived, and all four entered the house together. In the hall they all stood still, and listened for a moment to the sweet voice thrilling through the silent house; for the door of Geraldine's room had been set open. Arthur shook hands with Philip, who went into the drawing-room, and then followed Mr. and Mrs. Lovejoy up-stairs, but only to remain on the landing till Lucy came to him. It was not long before she came to him, no longer able to control her sobs, and they stood there listening together.

At length they knew by the silence, broken by Ada's crying, that all was over, and Lucy began to tremble so violently that Arthur had to support her in his arms, and, half carrying her down-stairs, he laid her on one of the sofas.

OUR AUTOGRAPH-BOOKS.

BY THE HON. MRS. GREENE.

AMONG the foremost in the ranks of feminine celebrities during the sway of the House of Hanover we come upon Mrs. Delany, the intimate friend of George III. and his Queen Charlotte, and herself a sovereign, as far as being one of the queens of society gives her a claim to such a title. Her admirers were numerous, and her courtiers were of all ranks and countries. Without either claiming homage as an authoress, a politician, or an extraordinary beauty, she still, by her engaging manners and feminine charms, drew around her all the literati of the day, and her correspondence with them was so extensive and various, that it has furnished materials for no fewer than nine large volumes, edited by Lady Llanover, and each volume full of wit, anecdote, and the interest which always attaches to incidents of court life.

Mrs. Delany was the great-granddaughter of Sir Bevil Granville, one of the boldest and most successful cavalier leaders, and known as the Bayard of England. She married first, much against her own inclination, Mr. Pendarves, a Cornwall gentleman, and after his death she became the wife of Dr. Patrick Delany, the Dean of Down, and the intimate friend of Dean Swift.

She was born in the year 1700, and lived to the fine old age of eighty-eight years, retaining her faculties bright and undimmed to the last. The letter which we transcribe next from the pages of our autograph-books, was written by Mrs. Delany in her eighty-first year, and though penned under circumstances of great terror and excitement, is a remarkable specimen of clear and energetic handwriting. It is dated Whitehall, to which place she had first taken flight with the Duchess of Portland, the Gordon Riots being then at their height, and the houses of the nobility and gentry threatened at every moment with pillage and destruction.

"Whitehall, 26 June, 1780.

"DEAR SIR,—The books of Dr. Johnston's criticism on the Poets are safely arrived, but not a word to signify what journey and voyage you have had, how you do, and how you found the friends that I am sure must rejoyce at your return; these are particulars of so much moment that you must excuse my solicitude about them, and gratify my impatience as soon as you can; at the same time give me some account of Summer Hill, from whence I have not heard a great while, and notwithstanding our late dreadful alarms, you have all very much occupied my thoughts, and ever will my best wishes. The Dss of Portland's best compliments and thanks, with mine for yr remembrance of the books, and beg to know what and to whom we are to discharge our debt. Are you not a little surpriz'd to see my handwriting (such as it is) after such shocking scenes as I have lately experienced? not only the general destruction that was apprehended, but the immediate sufferings of particular friends, the principal among them Lord Mansfield and his family; that they have escaped with their lives is a consolation, and that they have all sustained the Terrors and their loss with true fortitude; and now I trust we are in a way, not only of quelling present tumults, but of finding out the vile perpetrators that have brought on us such woe and confusion. Tuesday, the 6th of this month, the Dss Dowager of Pd was advised not to sleep at Whitehall, as it was thought an attack was designed agst a nr neighbour, and she removed for that night to Lord Stamford's in Charles St, but as on examination it was found that her own house in Privy Garden was a better guarded situation, she dined with me, and carried me and my child along with her to Whitehall, as I received a note to inform me that there was a design upon Lord Carlisle's house (almost opposite to mine) that night. You may easier guess at the confusion of mind we were in, nor can I describe the horrors of that Wednesday night, when I heard every gun that was fired that whole night; knew our troops were engaged with the Rebels; that five great fires were blazing in the City, all seen from the windows, and concluded the Temple was one of them: where my nephew, Court Dewes, was—indeed, it is too much to recollect. I have felt it all severely in Body and Mind, but I thank God both are better, and I see the Dss of Pd so much mended within these few days that it has done me more good than anything. We came to town last Friday for a few days, dine to-day at Kenwood at Lord Mansfield's, and return to Bulstrode to-morrow, where I hope our quiet and peace will not be interrupted. I make no apology for this strange letter, that bears so strongly the marks of past agitation. I am surpriz'd and I hope you will be glad that I am able to write at all, and assure you I am, Dear Sir,

"Your most affecte Friend and humble Servt,

"M. DELANY.

"Say everything that is kind to my dear Friends."

One cannot certainly wonder at poor Mrs. Delany complaining that she felt it severely both in mind and body. The horrors of such a situation must have been almost overwhelming to a lady of her great age. Even the young must have quailed at the sight of an infuriated mob: the shouts and imprecations of the rabble, the burning piles, which lit up the sky at night-time with a horrible lurid glare, seeming all the more horrible for the continuous roll of the drums, and the constant loud throb of the cannon.

Lord George Gordon, the leader and originator of this rebellious movement, is described by Lord Mahon as an ignorant fanatic, and the rebellion itself as a sudden meteor, having its origin in the foulest marshes. Rash, brainless, and impetuous, Lord George became the tool of designing demagogues. No project was too wild, no deed too daring for a nature so defiant and ballastless; and as this kind of blustering noisy carriage often impresses weak minds, crowds flocked to become his followers, and a mighty array of fools, knaves, and rebels united in his cause.

Their behaviour was just such as one might expect from such a union, and in a camp where discipline and order were unknown. They paraded the streets, knocked down the watchmen at night, the beadles by day, upset the carriages of the statesmen and peers, and on their way to Parliament dragged them out of their carriages, pulled off their wigs, and rolled these grave dignitaries in the mud. They went even further, and sought to obtain forcible possession of the House of Commons itself. But here one man's cool bravery cowed their impudent clamour. Colonel Murray, a relation of Lord George Gordon's, addressed his traitorous kinsman thus: "My Lord George, do you really mean to bring your rascally adherents into the House of Commons? If you do, the first man of them that enters, I will plunge my sword, not into his body, but into yours." This silenced the valiant leader, who immediately withdrew, and quietly retiring to the eating-room of the House, he threw himself into a chair; and while Mr. Bowen, the chaplain, sought to improve the occasion by advice and reproof, he either fell asleep, or pretended to do so.

But while their leader dozed, and refreshed his giant strength with sleep, the rioters had a little escapade of their own. They broke up into parties; some retired quietly home, being alarmed at the sight of the foot-guards, ready at a moment's notice for action, others paraded the streets, while a few of the wildest and worst, feigning peace and goodwill until the soldiers had been withdrawn, suddenly made a rush on the Roman Catholic chapels in Lincoln's Inn Fields and Warwick Street, and before help could be brought, set them on fire, smashing the fire-engines as they arrived, and making a bonfire of the benches, which were flung out of the chapel windows by the mob inside. The soldiers were again called out, but arrived too late, being only able to secure thirteen of the rebels.

From this moment matters grew worse and worse. Lord George again headed the party. A furious attack was made upon Newgate, where their riotous friends were in confinement. The houses around were set in flames, and presently the gates of the prison itself.

It must have been an awful sight to the lookers-on. The flames of the burning buildings; the shouts and cheers of the multitude, as they dealt blow after blow upon the iron-clamped doors of the prison; the yells and screams of the felons in their cells; and at last the hideous roar of triumph as a breach was effected, and three hundred prisoners were let loose among the crowd, four of whom were to have undergone the penalty of death on the day but one following.

The very Lord Mansfield and his wife Lady Mansfield, mentioned in Mrs. Delany's letter, were placed in jeopardy of their lives, and only escaped by timely flight through the back door of their house as the rebels were pouring through the front. All their property was ruthlessly destroyed, their cellars broken open, their furniture shattered, and their valuable library burnt.

But this state of things could not be permitted to last. The troops, too tardily called upon the scene of action, soon, though not without many instances of bloodshed and retaliation, discomfited the rebel host, and Lord George himself was arrested and tried for high treason.

Many of the unfortunate rioters were hung, while their leader was, after a trial which gave occasion for one of Lord Erskine's most magnificent speeches, acquitted. However, he seemed intent on his own destruction, and after repeated acts of folly, which caused him even to be regarded as a madman, he ended his days in Newgate, where he had been imprisoned as the author of a libellous article written on Marie Antoinette and her ambassador in London.

The following letter, which came into our possession some time ago, was actually written in Newgate only a few months before the gaol fever attacked him, eventuating in his death. The subject-matter itself of the letter is only interesting from the facts which surround it:—

"Lord George Gordon presents his compliments to Lord Erne, and having observed his Lordship's name and patronage added to the resolutions of the Grand Jury of the county of Fermanagh on the subject of the inflammatory proceedings of the Roman Catholics, uses the freedom to enclose a little publication for his perusal, which he hopes will come safe to his hands, and not give any offence to his Lordship or his Protestant friends in Fermanagh.

"Newgate, London, 7th Sept., 1792."

From these few lines it is plain to see that the old fire of fanaticism still flickered in the breast of the prisoner. Lord George Gordon died in his forty-third year, and before his death he embraced the Jewish religion.

As a curious contrast to the wild, lawless character we have just been reviewing, let us read the following autograph of a great, good, and wise man, an earnest philanthropist, an eloquent statesman, and a most loving and affectionate husband.

"Dear Dumont,—I send you several copies of a printed pamphlet on the slave trade which Clarkson has composed. I have been so hurried that I have not been able to look at it, but I am informed that it is not in good French. The facts it records, being the result of the long examinations which took place here some years ago, must be very important. You will best judge whether it is worth while to have it reprinted, or a corrected edition of it printed in Geneva. Whatever expense attends this, the African Society will willingly pay. Indeed, if there were any difficulty on that subject, I would pay it. I send you some copies of a German translation of the same tract. Can you procure this to be sent to Vienna or elsewhere, where they can be most useful? Wilberforce says that he will write to you. After having written this I find that it is not certain that I shall get the pamphlets time enough to send them with this, but if not I will send them by the first opportunity. We have received your letter of the 9th, and return you many thanks for it. My slavery in the Court of Chancery will end to-day, and to-morrow I shall set out for T——, where I hope to enjoy complete happiness with Ann and the children for three weeks. I then go to Durham, and perhaps shall return to T——.

"Ever most sincerely yours,

"Aug. 27, 1814. "Saml. Romilly."

Sir Samuel Romilly was of French descent. His grandfather came over from Montpellier to London, and settled down in the neighbourhood of the City as a wax-bleacher, and his father was a jeweller in Frith Street, Soho. He himself was born in the year 1757, and received but a very poor education in a French Protestant school. He, for a time, tried the business of the shop, afterwards the merchant service, and eventually nearly set up in life as a solicitor. But none of these occupations suited his tastes or feelings. In 1783 we find him called to the Bar, where after a probationary time his talents were discovered, and his income suddenly rose from a trivial sum to £8,000 or £9,000 a year. He afterwards entered Parliament, where his speeches were considered magnificent specimens of oratory. But Sir Samuel's real claim to the grateful remembrance of the nation is founded on the wonderful and humane exertions made by him in modifying the severity of the penal laws then existing, and in rendering capital punishment less common than it had been in his time. He was most successful in these endeavours, and many merciful laws were passed under his auspices and superintendence. He was also a great advocate for the abolition of the slave trade; in fact, his kind and sympathising nature prompted him to lean ever to the side of mercy and humanity, and undaunted by failure or disappointment, he grappled with the object in hand until he had accomplished it.

It is sad to think that these tender promptings of an affectionate heart should have afterwards proved the cause of his own destruction. He loved his wife with the deep and rare love such a sympathetic heart could give, and his worldly honours and greatness were as nothing to the pleasure and sweetness of his domestic ties.

When Parliament was dissolved he was re-elected without soliciting a vote or spending a shilling; but, alas! the House of Commons was never to see his kind presence again.

On the 29th of October, 1818, his beloved wife died. After twenty years of an unbroken happiness the dearest joy of his life was taken from him, and the heart which had struggled in the battle-field of humanity for the weal of others could not face the grief which met him on his own threshold. Three days after the death of Lady Romilly, Sir Samuel, in a paroxysm of overwhelming grief, and indeed of madness, put an end to his useful and valuable life.

He and his wife were buried in one grave in the little parish churchyard of Knill. When Lord Eldon next day took his seat on the bench of the Court of Chancery, and saw the vacant place within the bar, where for years Romilly had pleaded before him, iron man though he was, his eyes filled with tears. "I cannot stay here," he exclaimed, and rising in great agitation broke up his court.

MEMORY'S TEARS.

MY heart is weary and sad to-day,
I hardly can tell what ails me so;
A shadow of something from far away,
Falls like a dream of long ago.

Nothing tangible—yet I feel
A saddening gloom and a creeping mist;
The air is heavy and damp and chill,
I feel—but not what it is, I wist.

Some sad thought about all that's gone—
Some quintessence of all the years,
Distilled from the fruitless work that's done,
Till my heart is wet with memory's tears.

Bright heart blossoms I would not take,
But left to wither and fall in vain;
Good that I wooed but to forsake—
And summer will never return again.

Joys of all that I would have done
Faded, and loss for dream of gain,
Wearily press on me one by one,
And the days will never return again.

The sun will rise, and the sun will set;
And youth will promise, but manhood fail:
Life's work undone—and yet—
I dream, and the dream's of no avail.

My heart it weeps, though my eyes are dry—
A little of all my hopes and fears
Has come and gone as the years go by,
And little is left but memory's tears.

Why profitless strive? since only more
I weep in the vale where hopes have died;
Ah! why did not faith look on before,
Where memory's tears for ever are dried?

THE GRIEFS OF CRIPPLE TOM.

CHAPTER V.

IN September Miss Burton was seized with influenza, and she continued in a weak state throughout the autumn. "Mrs. Jones," said she one day to her nurse, "do either of those boys ever come to ask for me now,—the boys I used to teach?"

"No, ma'am, they don't, an' I expected as much. It's like them Robinsons, and such like trash; there's you, ma'am, as has been plaguin' yourself teaching them an' working for them all this time, and as soon as you's laid up, and can do nothing more for 'em, they never shows their face."

"I hardly think that's the fair way to look at it. Of course Jimmy can't come, and as for Tom, I think I understand why he doesn't come. Perhaps it has never occurred to him that I should like it. Next time you are in the village, Mrs. Jones, please step in and tell him that I am keeping a little better, and that you think I would be pleased if he came occasionally and asked for me."

Miss Burton was right in her conjecture as to the cause of Tom's neglect. The lad not only missed her, not only was the bright spot gone out of his life, but he loved his teacher, and grieved for her, unknown to any one. It had never entered into his head that he might show his regard for her by calling to inquire after her health; indeed, it would have seemed to him presumptuous to do so uninvited. From the time Mrs. Jones delivered her message, every day saw him knock at the rectory door, when this colloquy invariably ensued:—

"Please, how's Miss Burton?"

"Little better."

Then the scornful housemaid shut the door in his face. Tom seemed to think that there was a propriety in going at a certain hour every day, and presently he thought it right that Jim should accompany him. So every day, at the hour that they used to go for lessons, whether it were wet or dry, the two lads marched gravely up the avenue, and went through their little ceremony. To them it was of the nature of a religious rite: for were they not honouring her who represented to them not only knowledge and beauty and art, but her who was the channel of whatever religious ideas and good desires had passed into their minds? Was she not their "epistle of Christ?" They might have said, "Lord, when saw we Thee sick, and visited Thee?"

But a heavier trouble was to come upon Thomas Robinson. His friend Jimmie was seized with typhus fever. Tom's grief was very real, but not of the keenest kind. His was not a nature to bewail his friend with tears and cries, even when he was alone; but he would go slowly stumbling along the stony roads, or lean lazily against the gates, with his head hanging down, and the one thought on his mind, the one grief lying heavy on his heart, almost like a dumb animal that had lost its mate. Presently he was made to understand that his friend might die—die, and be lost to him for ever. Tom's grief became keener then, harder and harder to bear, until the misery of lounging about all day with only this one thing to think of, with no one near to give a word or a look of sympathy, unable to do one single thing to help or comfort his sick friend, became almost insupportable. Hitherto he had only been able to haunt the cottage where Jimmie stayed, continually asking for him, from earliest morning to latest evening; but he was told that the sick boy had often to wait two or three days for medicines or food, until a neighbour should have occasion to go to the nearest town, which was five or six miles off. It was a long way for the cripple to walk, often in drenching rain, for it was now near the end of October; but nothing made Tom so happy as to be sent for something for Jimmie; nor did the thought ever cross his mind that he was doing anything meritorious,—he was simply giving himself pleasure by doing something to help Jim. The dispensary at which Tom procured the medicines was only open at an hour which forced him to be on his way to the town between twelve and one o'clock, the family dinner hour; and there was an old and inviolate rule of the house, which was made in the days when half a dozen hungry boys and girl would pour into the house at all times, that any one who did not choose to be present at a meal-hour should go without it till the next meal-hour came round. So the poor boy often set out with a hungry feeling, knowing that his going would prevent his getting anything to eat till the evening, and come back slowly and wearily along the lonely road, perhaps drenched with rain, to shiver at the comfortless fireside until supper-time came round. Mrs. Robinson strongly disapproved of this kindness shown to a family who had never done her a good turn, and were no kith or kin to her; but at last she relented towards her son, and gave him something to eat before he set out, for she loved this lad, the last of all her children, and besides, Tom's conduct doubtless wrought its own work in her heart.

MUFFLED MUSIC.

A CARELESS child, I used to sing
Through halcyon days of happy spring;
My morn of life was bright and clear;
The night drew closer, year by year.

A lonely boy, I left the rest,
And sought his side I loved the best;
A friend is sweet when foes are near;
I miss his friendship, year by year.

A dreaming youth, I longed for fame,
The honour that exalts a name;
The hope was strong my heart to cheer,
That now grows fainter, year by year.

A victor crowned, I stand alone
On hostile ramparts overthrown;
He would rejoice to greet me here;
His grave grows greener, year by year.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER XII.

THE next afternoon, all her leisure time before tea Ruth was seated, curled up in the arm-chair, reading. She was tired of her own company, and in that state of mind when she preferred to forget her own identity. The unwelcome tea-things were brought in by Jane, and Ruth had to tear herself away from her book.

She stood before the tea-tray, her thoughts still wandering away to her book, when suddenly a sound behind her, like the rustling of a silk dress, made her turn round.

"Tina!" she exclaimed, looking up in surprise at the figure which stood before her, feeling almost unable to realise that it really was Tina. In another moment she threw her arms round her neck, and Tina clasped Ruth in a close embrace.

"Darling, I am so glad to see you!" said she at last. "Did I surprise you very much?"

"Oh yes," murmured Ruth, keeping close to Tina, as if afraid that she would escape from her.

"I need hardly have asked. Your face showed it. Ruthie, you told me a great deal in your reception of me," said Tina, tenderly; "I have been looking forward to seeing you so much. We only returned to England a few days ago, and we went home directly; but Maurice had to come up to the Royal Academy, and we arrived in London last night. Oh! I am so pleased to see you, dear."

"And I am pleased—more than pleased," said Ruth; who was now trembling from excitement; and with a flushed face she looked up at Tina.

"I startled you too much almost."

"Oh no—no!" exclaimed Ruth. "Tina, you are going to stay, aren't you?"

"Yes, if you will let me," replied Tina, smiling. "I asked Maurice to fetch me if I did not return early."

"I am so glad," said Ruth, as she began to unfasten Tina's shawl. "Will you come up-stairs?"

"No, I have kept you from making the tea, so I won't delay you any more." Tina put her things on a chair, and seated herself by the table, while Ruth began in a distracted way to make tea. There was a little pause, and then Ruth said, looking up with a sigh, "I feel as if I had so much to say, that I hardly know how to speak at all."

"There will be plenty of time," answered Tina, with a mysterious smile.

Ruth looked surprised, but before she could ask what she meant, Mr. Leighton entered the room, and had to be introduced, and soon Aunt Louisa came in too.

During tea-time Tina and Mr. Leighton had most of the conversation to themselves, and Ruth quietly listened, hardly taking her eyes off Tina the whole time.

"I suppose you feel quite put out of conceit of London now," said Mr. Leighton, "after your sojourn in Venice?"

"Oh no," answered Tina, smiling; "I feel very patriotic. I own London does look very smoky. It seems very curious to think that people should constantly breathe such an atmosphere."

"Yes, it is most injurious. I am only surprised that there should not be worse consequences from living in London. On the whole it is a healthy city, I believe."

"Yes, I dare say; but I shouldn't think it agrees with Ruth particularly, to judge from her appearance. She doesn't look well. Mr. Leighton, I want to know if I may take her back with me, to stay with us for a few weeks?" Tina made her request as if she expected a favourable answer, but Ruth trembled with hope and fear as she heard it.

"You are very kind," answered Mr. Leighton.

"No, we are not, because it is such a pleasure to have her. You will let her come, won't you?" continued Tina.

"I shall be most happy." Mr. Leighton turned towards Ruth as he spoke. "What do you say to it, Ruth?"

"Oh, papa! I don't know what to say," answered Ruth, with glowing cheeks.

"There is hardly any need to tell us you are pleased," said her father, looking at her a little sadly. Ruth's delight at the prospect of her visit underwent a sudden chill, but in a moment all thoughts but those of eager anticipation had vanished.

After tea, Mr. Leighton had to retire to his study as he was rather busy, and Aunt Louisa, with a delicacy for which, perhaps a little unjustly, Ruth seldom gave her credit, left her niece and Tina alone. Ruth did not say much about her intense pleasure at the invitation she had received, but Tina knew her well enough to see what new life the idea of revisiting the Willows had given her.

"Now tell me what you have been doing all this long time, darling," said Tina.

"Nothing particular. I expect you have much more to tell me—haven't you?"

"Why should you think so?"

"Tina! you have something to tell me," exclaimed Ruth, clasping Tina's hand in hers, and looking eagerly into her face.

"Can you guess what it is?" inquired Tina, blushing.

"I hardly dare to say what I think. Are you—— oh! suppose I was wrong."

Tina laughed, and drawing Ruth to her, said, "I don't think you are. I am engaged, dear, to somebody you know. He is an old friend, and I dare say you can guess who, though I don't know why you should, except that I find everybody suspected it, long, long ago, almost before I ever dreamt of it myself. You congratulate me, don't you?"

"Yes, yes; but if you only tell me the name of the happy man, I shall know better how much to congratulate you, because it must be a very charming man, Tina, who is to marry you."

"You sly little puss, I believe you know all the time." Tina unclasped her locket and disclosed a portrait of Robert Ashleigh.

Ruth clapped her hands, and danced round the room, then ran into Tina's arms. "I thought so, and hoped so too. I know you will be happy."

"Thank you for so sweet a prophecy, Ruthie. I mean to do my best to make Robert happy, and if I succeed, of course I am happy myself."

"Yes," said Ruth, dreamily. "You are a very happy family, I think—I mean that you all have very happy dispositions."

"Well, I think perhaps we have; Stephen more than any."

"Yes," answered Ruth, looking up at the mention of his name; "happy in the noblest and truest sense, and he has done more to make me happy than anybody else in the world. Oh! Tina, I have wanted to see him so badly sometimes."

"And I have wanted to hear you sing too, often. In the twilight I always think of the dear old times when you were with us. Will you sing now?"

"Yes, if you will come to the drawing-room," answered Ruth, and then she added laughing, "you speak of the dear old times as if you regret their departure; but surely these times are dearer still."

Tina laughed too, and they went up-stairs, where Ruth sang several songs. In a short time Mr. Leighton came up, and the music was still continued, until a double knock at the door made Ruth break off suddenly.

"There is Maurice," she said, in explanation. And she was right, for in less than half a minute he entered the room, quickly, and walked straight up to where Ruth was standing, taking her by both hands, and looking down into her face, with his searching look, quite unconscious that anybody else was in the room. A number of questions and doubts were answered as he looked, and he was satisfied. His first words were no key to his thoughts, since he only said, as he might have done to anybody else, "How are you, Ruth?"

"I am well," answered she, and she drew her hands away. Aunt Louisa seemed relieved when the meeting was over. She had been looking over her spectacles, and now looked through them again at her work, of which she did a few stitches, while Maurice was introduced to Mr. Leighton, and then she was ready to be introduced herself.

Maurice then turned again to Ruth, and took a seat beside her. "Were you very surprised when Tina came?" he asked, smiling.

"Yes, very. I wonder I take it so calmly. I feel almost as if I should wake up and find it all a dream."

"Do you wish to wake?" said Maurice, looking down earnestly at Ruth. She gave a quick glance at him, and was going to make a playful answer, when suddenly her smile faded, and she looked away, and seemed to become absorbed in listening to Tina's and Mr. Leighton's conversation.

The rest of the evening passed quickly away; but when Tina was ready to go, Maurice asked Ruth if she would come to the Royal Academy the next day, as he and Tina were going.

"Yes, I should like it, unless papa wants me."

"No, dear, I shall be very glad for you to go," said Mr. Leighton; and turning to Maurice, he added, "it will be a great pleasure to her, I know, as I am afraid she leads rather a monotonous life as a rule. Good-bye, Mr. Rae, I am most glad to have made your acquaintance, and I shall always be delighted to see you, especially so when you bring your sister with you."

"Thank you," answered Tina, as Mr. Leighton shook hands with her; "I will come for my own sake as well as for Maurice's, since you are so kind."

Ruth went to the door with Maurice and Tina, and watched them a little way down the street, then returned to the drawing-room.

"Well, Ruth, these friends of yours are very charming people; I am glad to have seen them."

"I am so pleased you like them, papa," replied Ruth, smiling brightly. "The more you know them the more you will like them, I am sure."

GOODNESS AND SEVERITY.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A., RECTOR OF ARMAGH."

"He will by no means clear the guilty."
"I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more.

AN idea which has always been familiar to thoughtful and wise men, has, in our own days, taken firm hold of the public also. It has now come to be well understood that in Nature nothing comes by chance, nothing is without an excellent reason. If parts of the coast of England in calm weather are beaten with great waves, that is because a tempest is raging far out on the Atlantic. If cholera comes stealing from town to town all over Europe out of the East, it has been bred among the decaying swamps and marshes of India and Central Asia, and it comes westward because we also have decay, and uncleanness, and neglect of the laws of health, which you cannot possibly insult without suffering for it. Everything about us is a link in a vast chain, other links in front have drawn it forward, and now it is drawing others which are behind. But this is not all. From this fact in Nature, we have gone on to see that it is much the same with ourselves; we, too, are subject to stern hard laws, and they will never let us escape—so men tell us. If a battle is lost, the reasons why it was lost can be discovered—it is not any mere chance, nor even a fortunate selection of a better general by the other side. We can explain exactly why the Germans had abler generals than the French, and why they beat them so completely; but we could not do so unless we went back as far as Napoleon, as far as Frederick, even very much further still. And the ablest and most thoughtful writer of tales in our day seems to have this one fixed idea at the bottom of all her deeply-instructive books—that no person can possibly evade the consequence of any deed once done, that the laws of Nature will be more than a match for the strongest and keenest brain which ventures to offend against them; that small things will surely drag large results behind, and the sinner, before all is over, will be utterly crushed.

It is the fixed belief of tens of thousands in our time, that we are governed by laws, so rigid and fixed as to be utterly unsparing, unmerciful; and that our very least offences come under their lash. Once you have committed the smallest crime or the smallest blunder, your cries for pity will be as vain as the shriek which rises from drowning wretches in a foundering vessel to the whistling wind and the cold and bitter surge. Every transgression and disobedience receives its just recompense of reward.

Christians need not be afraid to confess that there is much truth in this belief. It simply means that whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap; that the guilty shall by no means be cleared, that our sins will surely find us out. It is only the modern restatement of the old doctrine of the law, "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things." And nothing can be more instructive than to observe how completely this idea changes the relative positions of unbelief and our own faith. For it used to seem that infidelity was the more indulgent to men's frailty. They used to fly to scepticism from the hard restraint of our faith, and bitterly to resent the warnings which pursued them, that if they sowed to the flesh, of the flesh they should reap corruption. Now they find, even on secular evidence, that theirs was only a refuge of lies, that to sow the wind is to reap the whirlwind, and that to turn from our Lord's easy yoke, is to serve an inexorable merciless taskmaster, as keen as our God to discover transgression, and as unrelenting as machinery to grind into powder him who is entangled among the wheels.

Look at the works of sin all around us, and see what it does for countries and men; then we shall be able to judge whether its wages are likely to be anything else than death, promptly and surely paid. But what can give us even a dim conception of the misery sin breathes around it? Call up the ghosts of all since Cain smote Abel, whom violent and painful deaths have cut down, as a scythe cuts down corn, and ask the secret of their destruction. They will answer that some were murdered in a flash of hatred or of cupidity; some, standing fast against oppression, had their lives quenched by the tyrant or the invader; some died in trampling down the right; and others, in despair and shame, flung their own lives away. But whether the fault was their own or that of others, they all died through sin.

That vast procession vanishes, and another follows. Some of these are pale and haggard, some bloated and sodden, some agitated and unstrung. "We," they murmur, "shortened our own lives by evil habits: we laid ourselves down among the roses of self-indulgence, and the old serpent stung us to death among the treacherous flowers." Who can tell whether this concourse would not be greater than even the first? And yet another follows which might outnumber both. With sighs and tears, with pale faces, with veiled and drooping heads, steal past the countless array of those whom sin—some one's sin—has made to seek for death as it were for hidden treasure—the plundered, the disgraced, the slandered, the betrayed, the deserted, the broken-hearted, all who live in the past with memory, who have no future, no hope for which to live. But why speak of single classes here and there? When the last trumpet shall make the dust of the whole world move and stir, and call the countless family of man from all the graveyards upon earth, there shall not be one of all those dead, but his doom came by sin. Sin is the murderer of all mankind. And yet it is to this author of unfathomable woes that every sinful man is looking for pleasure. It is in the dungeon of sin (which is the shambles of death) that fools look for liberty. It is now, however, admitted by the world, in theory, that all wrong will bear fruit, and fruit according to its kind.

"Out of evil, evil flourishes; out of tyranny, tyranny buds." The only question is whether one can hope for any deliverance, any escape: whether the working of this iron law of retribution can at all be modified or checked by the working of any other law?

To this question there is no distinct answer except from the religion of Christ. We may, indeed, see a partial relief at times enjoyed through human mercy and self-sacrifice. An injured man can do much by one forgiving word; a patient or a generous man can take much of the burden off others who are overloaded. And these are hints of the possibility of a deeper forgiveness, a more efficacious compassion in heaven. But it was reserved for an apostle of the cross to say boldly that the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath set us free from the law of sin and death. What even the Jews knew previously, they had as an anticipation of Christ, not as a fruit of their own law, for by it could no man living be justified. It was the sunlight making the sky splendid before the sun himself appears. And we of this century are entitled to claim for Christianity a monopoly of the doctrine of forgiveness, mercy upon high, or any Divine interposition to rescue and relieve the fallen. Silence and darkness have come upon all other pretences to know any gospel of any grace of God. We have been deliberately told by a great and gifted authority that life is a game of chess played against a great strong angel, "who never overlooks a mistake, or makes the smallest allowance for ignorance."

Think for a moment how such a creed would affect our own dealings with our fellow-men; how hard and persistent it would make us; how all relentings of heart, all tenderness and compassion, would seem out of place in a world governed by such laws. And then think how we should be affected by the knowledge of our past sins. These things, we should say, are now irrevocable, we have lost our chance, and there is no room for any improvement in this direction, we may give up that hope. It would stereotype this bad world; it would sound before the time those dreadful words, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still."

From such a hard, relentless belief, from this pitiless routine of circumstances which drive us, like one who runs down a steep place, ever faster, and ever downward, the hands come to rescue us which for us were nailed to the cross. Balm for our wounds, a physician for our maladies, a shepherd to bring back the sheep, and a father to clothe and to embrace the naked and unloved prodigal—such is the announcement of the Gospel.

In our own experience all these mechanical theories of life do actually give way before the pity and the love of a human heart. This can retrieve, console, restore the unhappy and the erring. And it is a human heart which looks at us out of tender human eyes to reveal the grace of God. "The love of Christ constrains us," binds us with cords of a man, and draws us upward and heavenward.

Christianity is nothing unless it is a system of free, full compassion—free as the sacramental bread, full as the rolling river in which its first converts were baptised. Step by step it unravels all the tangle in which our souls were caught and well-nigh strangled. The fear of death is overmastered by the knowledge that in the dark and lonely hour Christ stands beside His people, Christ receives them to Himself. The allurements of the world are overpowered, and the tempted is of good cheer, for He hath overcome the world. A new life is poured into the veins which were conscious of mortality, a life which is master of circumstances, superior to changes, too strong for disease and pain to overpower, too lofty for the hands of the whole world to reach and drag down, being hid with Christ in God.

Then life is no longer a cruel destiny, and death is only a shadow which falls across our path to the inheritance of light. And when we lift our hearts and thoughts yet higher, when the veil is rent which hides the glory of the King against whom we have offended, what do we seem to see? All around, there are vast and awful beings, spirits of unutterable majesty, one stroke of whose mighty wings might, perhaps, suffice to sweep into ruin the whole offending race of man. But the trustful heart whispers, "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them which shall be heirs of salvation?" And in the centre is > "The living throne, the sapphire blaze, > Where angels tremble as they gaze," and out of the throne go thunderings, and lightnings, and voices. But around it "the hands of the Almighty have bended" the bow which tells how in wrath He remembers mercy, the blessed and beauteous momorial of His first covenant with earth, and it is eloquent of more than the pledge given after the deluge, "for this is as the waters of Noah unto me, saith the Lord; for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah shall no more go over the earth, so have I sworn that I will no more be wrath with thee, nor rebuke thee." And while we gaze with kindling eyes upon this token in heaven of mercy for earth, we see that the red fades out which speaks of anger, and the blue vanishes which speaks of heavenly distance and far heights, and there only remains the emerald green of our woods and fertile valleys and upland lawns; "round about the throne a rainbow like unto an emerald." And who is upon the throne? What is the semblance of that High and Holy One? In the midst of the throne, and of the four living creatures, and of the four-and-twenty elders, stands A LAMB AS IT HAD BEEN SLAIN, the fountain of the hopes of earth, the centre of the joys and praises of the skies.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

A DISSOLUTION OF PARTNERSHIP.

PHILIP turned away his face, and looked out of the window, while Lucy strove to recover her self-possession. He neither moved nor spoke, and she remained unconscious of his presence, knowing that some one was standing there, but not caring to look up through her tears.

"I am going now," she said at last; "papa and mamma will be getting anxious;" and she rose and left the room.

Arthur, who had already spoken to Philip, absorbed in his care for Lucy, followed into the hall, where he stood waiting the opportunity to conduct her home.

No one came near Philip. He saw Lucy go out, and Arthur with her, opening the garden gate and offering her his arm, which she frankly accepted. He was still standing there when Fanny entered, with Mr. Lovejoy. Fanny had even forgotten that she had sent for him, and encountered him with secret dread. He turned toward her a face too strongly controlled for Fanny to perceive anything but the sternness, and she immediately broke down and cried.

"What is it you want me to do?" said Philip, gently. "You sent for me this morning, and I came here as soon as I got your letter on my return to town."

"Oh, I forgot," said Fanny; "now I remember; it was about Beatrice—my Cousin Beatrice. We're in trouble—about her too."

"She has gone," Mr. Lovejoy put in, looking the very picture of misery.

"Gone!" said Philip, bewildered. "I saw one of your daughters yesterday down in Essex. She was newly married."

"That is Beatrice! that must be Beatrice!" broke in Mr. Lovejoy.

"She was with her husband, and was safe and well," continued Philip.

"Then you know whom she has married?" cried Mr. Lovejoy, light breaking out on his thin face.

"As it happens, I do; and I am glad to be able to tell you. Her husband's name is Baselow—a man whom I know something about already, and am likely to know still more of." He then explained who this Mr. Baselow was, and how he had come across the pair by a happy accident, and expressed his satisfaction that he had been able so speedily to allay their anxiety, lest she had made a discreditable match.

Mr. Lovejoy wrung his hand, with tears of thankful emotion shining in his eyes, and the faint colour coming back to his face. Then he hastened away to communicate the tidings to his wife; and Philip took leave of Fanny, after setting her mind completely at rest by offering her whatever sum she required, without putting her to the trouble of asking for it.

When Philip once more reached his cheerless lodging, he found another letter awaiting him. It was from Mr. Tabor, and, unlike any letter he had ever received from his partner, it was several pages long. It was evidently worded with the most anxious care. Mr. Tabor began by reminding him of the trust he had reposed in him, and the expectation he had formed, that when he himself was no longer able to take an active part in the business, he would have left the burden to him, as to a son. He went on to say that he had been as sure of his rectitude as of his own; and that, therefore it was no ordinary pain to have a doubt cast upon that rectitude. He implored Philip to clear up the misunderstanding about Fanny's fortune. He had taken upon himself to see Fanny concerning it, and had found her very reluctant to speak, and utterly ignorant on every point concerning her own investments, which was not a state of things to be approved. He had also drawn from her, with the utmost difficulty, that there was insecurity concerning her money, if it was not already lost. It was impossible in such circumstances, he concluded, for him to go on any longer without an explanation. Whatever affected the credit of one member of the firm affected the credit of the firm itself. Lastly, if Philip, through any error of judgment, had lost any portion of the money entrusted to him, he (Mr. Tabor) claimed, on the ground of business, as well as on the ground of friendship, to be consulted in the matter. It might be in his power, either as a man of business, or as a friend, to help him out of difficulty, or even to save him from the consequences of still more serious fault, although in that event it would be necessary for their business connections to come to an end.

It was a kind, a thoughtful, a delicate letter, from Mr. Tabor's point of view; but as that point of view was certainly not Philip's, these were not the qualities apparent to him. It was the fact that he was suspected which took and held possession of his mind; the fact that years of the closest intercourse, the most perfect integrity, had not sufficed to create a trust in him which nothing could shake—such a trust as was necessary to him if he trusted at all. He turned with despair from the life before him. His restless mood came upon him, but he was conscious of fatigue, and sat still enduring. If he had been a smoker, he would have stupefied himself with the weed; if he had been a drinker, he would have taken to wine—but he was neither. He had a feeling of pity, not unmixed with disgust, for those who were the slaves of either habit. His apartment boasted a couch which certainly did not tempt its occupant into habits of ease, for it forbade reclining on pain of absolute distortion; but, by the help of a chair, he managed to fling himself down to ruminate on his letter, while Mary brought him the never-failing tea and chop.

An hour after, the girl came in uncalled. He had not rung to have the things removed, or else she had not heard. He was lying in the same position, and his meal lay untasted on the table.

"Oh, sir! ye haven't eaten nothink!" cried Mary, in a fine Irish mixture of Cork and cockney, and Philip woke with a start.

"Never mind, Mary," he said, getting up and shaking himself.

"I'll make ye a fresh cup of tay in a minute," said Mary, looking woefully at the chop, which could not be recooked, and was, in Mary's opinion, good for nothing.

"Never mind," he persisted, sitting down to the cold and comfortless meal, and dismissing the girl with a smile, which made Mary turn up her hands and eyes outside the door, and utter an ejaculation to the effect that Philip was certainly a candidate for canonisation. And Philip was wondering whether enough of "this sort of thing" would drive a man mad, and coming to the conclusion that it was extremely likely.

The result of his subsequent meditations was that he sat down and wrote a brief note to Mr. Tabor, saying that, under the circumstances, he thought it was better that their connection should come to an end, as the close of that connection might give him an opportunity of explaining his circumstances, or, at least, do away with the necessity for any such explanation. He added, that he trusted to Mr. Tabor's sense of justice to propose a sufficient compensation for the prospects he was renouncing.

It had just occurred to him that he knew of an opening into a fresh life, which he might begin on new terms, on the other side of the globe. It was an opening about which he and his partner had been consulted. A firm in Melbourne wanted a managing partner, and offered excellent terms. The more he thought of it, the more he became fixed in the idea that this was what he ought to do. What had he to keep him in this country? he asked himself, bitterly. Who would miss him if he went away? He was a man without a single tie. His work might miss him. He was inconsistently glad to think the interests he had fought for and guarded might languish in other hands. He was sorry to believe they would, and yet satisfied that it should be so. And he formed his resolution and acted upon it, with a profound conviction at the bottom of his soul that life was not worth living anywhere out of England.

When he had written his answer to Mr. Tabor, it was too late to post it to that gentleman's house. Mr. Tabor would find it laid on his table when he entered his office in the morning, and Mr. Tabor would doubtless receive it as he received other business communications—with deliberate mind, and take it, as he took them, into the calmest consideration.

But Philip was wrong. Mr. Tabor did receive it in the morning when he entered his office, and took possession of it in anything but a deliberate way; and was, moreover, quite incapable of taking it into calm consideration. He was, on the contrary, as completely "upset" by it—to use a favourite feminine phrase—as any woman might be, say, whose husband proposes a deed of separation on the ground of incompatibility of temper. His hand shook, his calm blue eyes clouded with a suspicious mist, and as these symptoms abated, his mind became full of indignation and anger. Philip's conduct appeared to him the basest ingratitude. It could only be accounted for on the ground that he was guilty of the worst that could be brought against him, and even in that case his conduct did but aggravate his guilt.

And while this was going on in Mr. Tabor's mind, the feelings of the culprit were by no means enviable.

Philip wished now that he had been less abrupt, that he had expressed gratitude for former kindness, and regret—a regret which he only too keenly felt—at the prospect of separation.

Under the influence of these softened feelings, he at length entered his partner's room, intending to supplement the note which Mr. Tabor must have read long ago, intending to say much that was conciliatory and regretful, and to be as gracious and winning as Philip knew how to be.

But Mr. Tabor, without intending at all, rose as he entered the room, and looked at him steadily and sternly, without offering any greeting whatever.

Philip paused in the advance he was about to make, and for a moment neither of them spoke.

"Is this all?" asked Mr. Tabor, at length, pointing to the note.

"It is all I feel at liberty to say," answered Philip, "except——"

"Is this what I had a right to expect from one whom I have treated as a son?" broke in the sorely exasperated man.

"I was about to supplement it by thanking you for all your kindness," said Philip, the calmer of the two.

"Your ingratitude is only equal to your effrontery," said Mr. Tabor.

"You have listened to malicious and foolish charges made against me," retorted Philip.

"Which you have not been at the pains even to deny the truth of," said Mr. Tabor.

"I do deny them emphatically," was the answer.

"Why not explain them then?" returned Mr. Tabor; "they must be capable of explanation."

"They are; but if you do not believe my assertion, neither would you accept my explanation."

"What am I to think of this?"

"You must think as you please," said Philip, firmly. "I can only repeat my great regret that this rupture should have taken place, and my hope that it may be conducted as quietly as may be to its only possible termination."

"You are aware that we can force you to come to terms?" said Mr. Tabor.

"Miss Lovejoy can force me to give an account of my stewardship," said Philip, with a smile which was only bitter, but which appeared to Mr. Tabor perfectly sardonic; "but I hope she will not."

"You have already threatened her with the consequences, I think," said Mr. Tabor; "but that will not deter me from punishing, if necessary, the perpetrator of so cruel a wrong."

Philip's eyes flashed fire, but he answered quietly, "The consequence will simply be, that I shall probably be rendered unable to replace that which has been lost."

"Then you acknowledge that it has been lost."

"I am driven to acknowledge it," said Philip.

"How much of it?"

"The whole," he answered; adding, "and through no fault of mine."

"How am I to believe this, if you refuse to tell me how it has been lost?"

"I distinctly refuse, unless I am forced to disclose it; and, Mr. Tabor, if you had only consented to trust me, I intended to replace it at any cost to myself—to sacrifice my whole life to the replacing of it, if necessary, and for these two years I have strictly carried out this intention."

Mr. Tabor's angry agitation had had the effect of completely calming Philip. He paused for a little, and then said, "If on a further review of this painful business you will to a certain extent give me your confidence, a confidence to which I feel that I am entitled, I will lay before you my plan of repayment."

Mr. Tabor raised his eyebrows, and looked at his partner as if he had assuredly gone out of his senses. "What?" he said, "ask me to become an——"

"Accomplice," said Philip, bitterly.

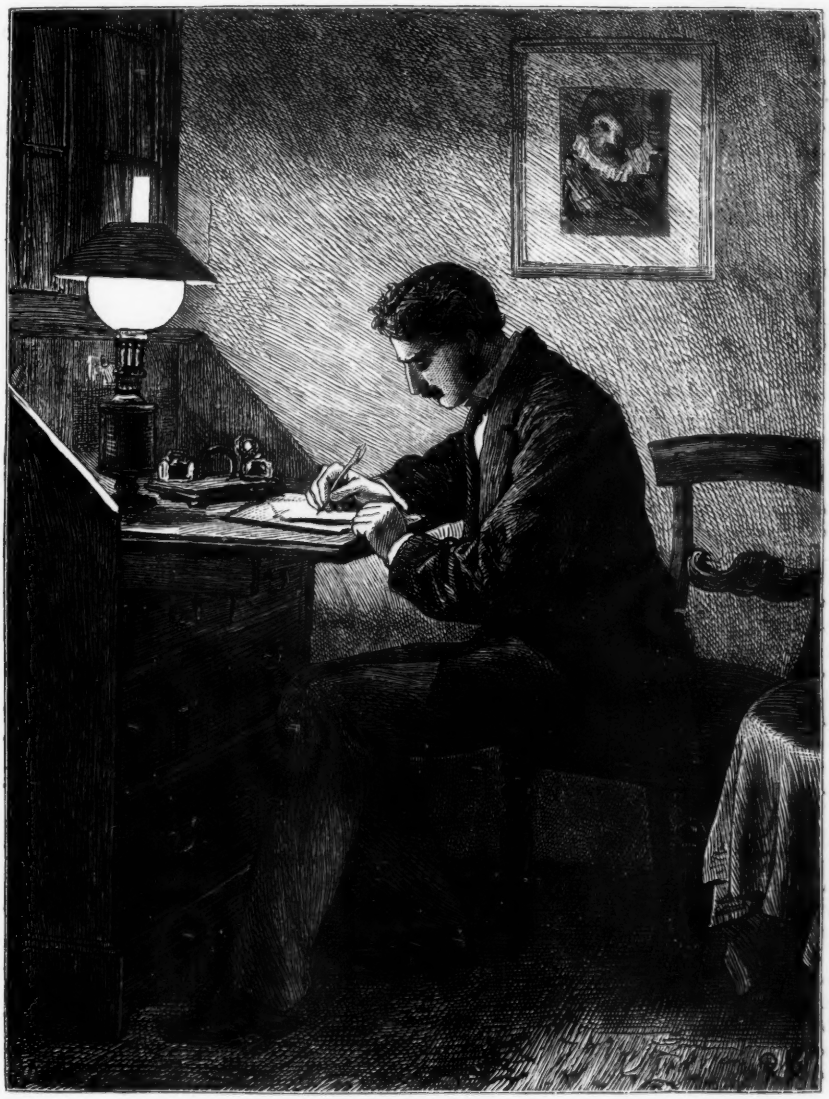
"You ask compensation for giving up your partnership in this business," said Mr. Tabor, turning his thoughts upon the unfortunate Fanny. "If you are desirous of making reparation, whatever is due to you in that respect ought to go to her."

"I intend it to do so," said Philip; "together with what I have already saved and invested on her account."

"How much is that?" asked Mr. Tabor. If Fanny was his client in the case, he was bound to see that her interests did not suffer, and the professional spirit coming thus to his aid, greatly conduced to calm him.

"It is over a thousand pounds," replied Philip.

"Have you accumulated this, besides paying her income out of your own, or is it part of her capital?"



"It has all come out of my own income," said Philip.

"I must at least give you credit for a desire to retrieve this unfortunate affair," said Mr. Tabor.

Now as Mr. Tabor began to grow a little cool, and to think that perhaps he might get to the bottom of the mystery after all, Philip began to get hot, and at this last speech he exploded. "I have said much more than I intended," he said, "and I will say no more. If you and Miss Lovejoy desire to force me to a fuller explanation, it is probable that I may throw up everything, especially as I have made up my mind to quit the country; whereas if you will only trust me sufficiently, she will be perfectly secure. In the event of my death," he added, "she is secure already: my life is insured to the full amount."

He was turning away, but Mr. Tabor detained him, saying, "After what has taken place it will be impossible for us to meet and maintain the friendly relations necessary here. May I ask if you will consent to an immediate withdrawal?"

"I would gladly," said Philip, "but have you

"He thought it was better that their connection should come to an end"—p. 263.

considered how such a withdrawal is likely to damage me?"

"It would hardly be fair to you, I admit," said Mr. Tabor.

"And there is work in my hands which I should like to see wound up. It shall be as little disagreeable to you as it can be made, my stay here," said Philip; "and," he added, "as brief as possible."

And so the interview came to an end, with the understanding that the dissolution of the partnership had been agreed upon, and that it remained only to settle the details of the separation.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

A STRANGER.

AGITATION of any kind had an unusually injurious effect on Mr. Tabor, who was the calmest of men by habit, if not by nature. He found it necessary to leave his office early and return home, labouring under symptoms which Mrs. Tabor had not seen for many a day, and which, noticed in the early days of their married life, when his struggle with circumstances was hardly over, had impressed upon her mind a feeling of insecurity, which had deepened the tenderness of their union. Philip had been absent all day, in attendance upon an important case in court, and had not returned when Mr. Tabor left. He came home, with a flush upon his face almost like the flush of fever, an unnatural lightness in his eyes, and a slight but perceptible breathlessness, which at once awoke all his wife's anxieties. But she hid them in her own heart. He came home for peace, and he should find peace there if nowhere else in the world. "You are very tired I can see, dear," she said cheerfully; "and you must tell us nothing till after dinner."

He was in the habit of telling them the incidents of the day, as far as they concerned himself; and both Mrs. Tabor and Lucy were anxious to know what the incidents of that particular day had been. They knew of the letter to Philip, and would have given much to hear the answer. But Mrs. Tabor knew that if her husband had anything pleasant to communicate, he would do so in spite of her charge, if he had not, the news could wait. His silence was a proof to her that she had anticipated truly, and saved him from feeling his silence an embarrassment. She had no need to warn Lucy to follow her example; in that home atmosphere of unselfishness self was repressed without an effort.

As soon as dinner was over, Mr. Tabor came into the drawing-room and lay down on one of the sofas, saying, "Let us have some music, Lucy, something that will do me good;" and Lucy went straight to the piano and began playing and singing, knowing exactly what he wanted when he spoke thus—some strain of lowly confidence or lofty hope; notes not only of human genius but of heavenly faith.

In the midst of her playing there was a peal at the bell, and in a few minutes a servant entered, and announced "Mr. Tenterden."

Mr. Tabor started from his easy attitude, which in former days he would have maintained, and assumed one in which he would await the greeting of a stranger. Lucy and her mother looked one to the other in a kind of excited dismay; they were wishing, both of them, that they had known a little of what had taken place; but they were speedily relieved from their embarrassment. A stranger entered the room—a stranger, and yet not a stranger; a man bearing a distinct resemblance to Philip, but stouter and of coarser build, and bronzed and weatherbeaten and bearded, as Philip was not.

It was a respite. "Francis!" exclaimed Mr. Tabor, eagerly advancing, "I am glad to see you," and he wrung the young man's hand with fatherly warmth. Mrs. Tabor and Lucy followed suit, and in a few minutes, Mrs. Tabor having ascertained that he had dined, he was seated in the centre of the friendly circle, and plied with question upon question.

For a while these questions played about the outer circle of interests. Where had he been? What had he been doing? When had he returned? He had returned only a day or two ago from the island of Ceylon, where he had been working for the last two years, and one of the principal things he had been doing was getting married.

"And is your wife with you?" asked Mrs. Tabor, woman like.

"It is for her sake chiefly that I am in England," he answered. "She was anxious to place the children at school."

"They have come up very rapidly," said Mr. Tabor, perpetrating the mildest of jokes. "How many are there?"

"Only two. They are girls," he added; "their father died in the island shortly before I went out."

And still no mention of Philip, who was the one person uppermost in the thoughts of all present.

"I must go in and see Fanny to-night," said Francis Tenterden. "I hope she is going on all right!" he added a little nervously.

They told him of the changes in Fanny's household, and of the last change of all; the fair young girl who lay dead so near to them. They told him with tenderer voices and shadowed faces, which somehow changed the whole tone of their conversation. It seemed easier to speak of Philip now, in the presence of the power which says, "The injurer and the injured are mine."

"She still lives in the old house?" said Francis.

It was Mr. Tabor who answered. "Yes, your brother gave it up to her after you left."

"And how is the old fellow?" asked Francis, ending the sentence with a husky voice, which he had begun with ill-assumed carelessness.

"He is well, I believe," replied Mr. Tabor; "but he and I are about to part."

Mrs. Tabor and Lucy felt the shock, but they were able to conceal their agitation; while Francis Tenterden betrayed the greatest surprise. "You surely do not mean that he is leaving the firm!" he said.

"I do," replied Mr. Tabor.

"Have you quarrelled?" asked Francis, blankly.

"Yes, we have quarrelled," replied Mr. Tabor.

"So seriously? I am astonished beyond measure."

"Why, you yourself have done the same," said Mr. Tabor; "and probably for the same cause."

"Impossible!" ejaculated Francis. "Has he told you what we split upon?" he added, looking on the hearthrug at his feet with an embarrassed expression.

"He has not. He has this very day refused to tell me anything," and he added hastily, "I would rather not hear it from you, Francis. Perhaps you may have sufficient influence over him to make him confess a great wrong."

"A great wrong?" said Francis, fairly puzzled; "but I have no influence with him whatever. It is just possible that I may have to leave England again without seeing him. Pretty strange my wife will think that," he added again, contemplating the hearthrug. "She has set her mind on seeing him, from reading a bundle of old letters of his."

"It would be better, perhaps, to make your wife aware of the true state of the case—I mean of the grounds of the alienation between you. It is always a mistake to have mysteries. Take my advice, and tell her," said Mr. Tabor.

"I can't," replied Francis Tenterden, looking more embarrassed, and speaking more huskily than ever.

"I can sympathise with you," said Mr. Tabor, warmly; at which Mr. Francis Tenterden looked up and then down, turned red-hot, and hastily rose to his feet and bade everybody good-bye abruptly.

"Poor fellow, I am very sorry for him," said Mr. Tabor after he was gone. "It is easy to see that he knows all about this business, and is very naturally unwilling to betray his brother. And all this time I have been unjust to Francis. If I had been told that one of these boys would go wrong, I would certainly have fixed upon him. In my mind Philip has always been first and best. It's no use judging men by what they were when they were boys."

Mrs. Tabor did not say, as some wives would have done, "I told you so," but she thought something very like it. She had found an opportunity, however, for asking what had taken place between her husband and Philip.

Mr. Tabor gave them an account of their interview of that morning, which Lucy and her mother received with a silent sympathy which was particularly soothing. There is nothing, perhaps, so deeply irritating to a man as, when he has had ample reason to be angry, to give him greater reason still, and, when he has been angry or disappointed, to add to it by reflecting it. Not one word of condemnation did one of them utter.

"I think I shall give it up altogether," said Mr. Tabor, "and retire into private life; I have enough for our modest wants. There will be enough for Lucy too when we are gone."

Lucy went and sat on a low seat beside him. "Do give up business, papa, and let us go away and live in your native county. We might get a house near the place, where you were born, and you and I would ride about together among the hills."

"And what would mamma do, who can't ride, and who cares more for Primrose Hill than for Helvelyn, Lucy?" said her father.

"Mamma would have a pretty garden, and a paddock for the ponies, and a cow, and a flock of chickens——"

"Geese, goosey, or sheep, you mean," said her father. "What do you say, mamma?" he added.

"You know I don't want to be rich, dear—have never wanted it," she answered; "but I think it would be a mistake to give up all that ever interested and occupied you; I think, you know, it is far wiser to go on with our occupations and interests moderately. I confess I should not care to live up among the hills, and never see a face I knew."

And so they discussed the question of retirement in all its bearings, as they had often done before; and, as they had often done before, came to no conclusion, except that each desired what was most for the happiness of the others.

They had wandered away purposely from the trial of the day, and Mr. Tabor only came back to it for a moment, before they parted for the night, by saying that Mrs. Austin must now be consulted concerning Philip's retirement. It was not till Lucy was alone in her room that she gave way to the grief which oppressed her.

RESOLVES.

WHEN blackest night
Upon us lies,
Our good resolves
Like stars arise,
And sparkle bright
Before our eyes.

When dawn unfolds
They vanish quite;
As stars are seen
But in the night,
So weak resolves
Die in the light.

MATTHIAS BARR.

OUR AUTOGRAPH-BOOKS.—II.

BY THE HON. MRS. GREENE.

AS time and space are both growing short, and our autograph-books still remain almost undiminished, we must pass over a great many of the celebrities who stand, as it were, with one foot in each century, and devote our remaining articles to more modern notabilities.

Walter Scott may not unworthily fill the first place, and the letter which we now transcribe from the original before us is a not uninteresting specimen of his penmanship, as it relates to literary matters, and was evidently written at the time when his "Life of Dryden" was uppermost in the great author's mind. The address is not on the letter.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I must not long delay to acknowledge the receipt of your most interesting and curious packet containing notes on the Legion Club, throwing a most brilliant light upon that most obscure satire. I should not despair to make my edition truly valuable could I but secure a few glimpses of such illumination. I think, but am very far from being certain, that the Earl of Dorset's adventure with Miss Du Passe is alluded to in the Essay on Satire in some such couplet as this—

'So Dorset, purring like a thoughtful cat,
Married—but wiser puss ne'er thought of that.'

The poem was, you know, written by Mulgrave, afterwards John Sheffield, Duke of Buckinghamshire, and corrected by Dryden, who was waylaid and beaten by three hired ruffians for his supposed share in it. I will not fail to consult the book whenever I reach Edinburgh, whither I intend to return for the winter in the course of a fortnight. If you come to London, as you seem to intend, pray let me know by a line how I shall address you there. I am plagued with the arrival of company, and have just time to say I am, with sentiments of sincere obligation, your obliged and grateful "W. SCOTT.

"Ashestiel, 11 Oct. 18 9."

Although Sir Walter complains at the end of this letter of being plagued with company, there was never a better or kinder host, or one who more gratefully remembered the hospitality bestowed upon him by his friends. Another short letter in proof of this may not, perhaps, be considered too large a gleaning from the harvest of such a pen:—

"DEAR SIR,—I should be very ungrateful did I leave this hospitable capital without endeavouring to express my thanks for the kind and flattering attention I have received from you and all your family. May I beg you to make my best respects to the ladies and young gentlemen, not forgetting Sir ——— and his lady. If chance should lead you or any of your family so far from the sun as Scotland, I hope that you will keep in mind that you have a debt of hospitality to claim, which will be always gratefully acknowledged.

"Believe me, dear Sir,
"Always your obliged and faithful, humble servant,
"WALTER SCOTT.

"10, Stephen's Green, 17 August."

Amongst the most favoured of Sir Walter Scott's literary acquaintances we find the name of Joanna Baillie, the famous dramatist, shining forth pre-eminent. Indeed, Lockhart, in his "Life of Scott," states "that Miss Baillie and her brother, Dr. Matthew Baillie, were among the friends to whose intercourse Sir Walter looked forward with the greatest pleasure when about to visit the metropolis." That he also greatly admired her dramatic genius there can be no doubt, as "Marmion," perhaps the most beautiful of all his poems, contains one stanza entirely devoted to Miss Baillie's praise, and in which he goes so far as to compare her even to Shakespeare himself:—

"Or, if to touch such chord be thine,
Restore the ancient tragic line,
And emulate the notes that rung
From the wild harp that silent hung
By silver Avon's holy shore
Till twice an hundred years rolled o'er;
When she, the bold Enchantress, came
With fearless hand and heart on flame!
From the pale willow snatch'd the treasure,
And swept it with a kindred measure,
Till Avon's swans, while rung the grove
With Montfort's hate and Basil's love,
Awakening at the inspired strain,
Deemed their own Shakespeare lived again."*

Let us now glance at the authoress's own feelings towards one who had done her the great honour of thus immortalising her fame, and which we shall find in an extract from a letter of hers, addressed to no unworthy colleague in literature, Maria Edgeworth:—

"But there is one thing in your letter that almost made me a little angry (for one is often a little angry when one is mystified) when you suppose I may despise the criticism of children. There is nobody on earth who pays more regard to the observations of children, and the simple and unlearned of all descriptions, in matters of taste and feeling, than I have always done, and one cause for my thinking perhaps less highly of 'Waverley' than I might otherwise have done, was seeing two unlearned critics, not indeed of seven, but of seventeen and twenty, growing tired of the first and a part of the second volume. Everybody here is delighted with 'Guy Mannering,' in which there are many truly characteristic scenes, very highly worked up, with touching traits of nature and beautiful description, though there is nothing of such deep interest as some of the last scenes in 'Waverley.' I mean those at Carlisle. I wonder how our English neighbours get through the Scotch dialect so well, but certainly they are all reading it and are delighted with it. We expect Walter Scott in town very soon, and many of us here are delighted at the thought of it. He has the happiness of being beloved very universally by those who know him in the midst of his success and glory. He has always behaved to me more like a kind brother than a mere friend, and his visit will be to me a cheering of the heart. One really has some need of cheering. What sad events have taken place within these last 3 weeks. The poor King of France is back with us again, and all our good peace and great exultations have come to nothing. It is very grievous, and yet Bonaparte has played such a clever trick that we cannot help being sometimes amused with it. My sister sends you her kind remembrances along with mine. Pray offer my best respects to your father and Mrs. Edgeworth.

"Most truly and faithfully yours,
"J. BAILLIE."

Miss Baillie is well known as the author of the fanciful song of "The Chough and Crow," which was written by her and introduced into the dramatic version of "Guy Mannering," adapted for the stage by Daniel Terry.

In an autograph letter of Sir William Gell's we also find some interesting anecdotes of Sir Walter, which, although they have probably appeared elsewhere, may claim an insertion as being transferred to these pages from the actual handwriting of the celebrated antiquarian and topographer himself:—

"Naples, April 4, 1833.

"Miss Scott wrote to me, by the desire of Mr. Lockhart, to beg I would send him any reminiscences of Sir Walter, because I was the 'last of his friends.' The fact is that I had generally the care of him when he was in Italy, and though I thought I was going to write only a page or two, I soon found myself writing my 20th and my 30th pages without approaching the end of my materials, which finally reached a fiftieth page; and, considering all circumstances, the whole is by no means so barren of interest as I thought it would have been when I began the narrative. It contains even to a certain degree information as to his future literary projects, which could not have been recorded, I believe, by any other means. . . . I accompanied him to the Convent of La Trinita della Cava, and in going he repeated to me the poem or ballad of 'Jock of Hazeldean.' In returning I desired him to let me hear it again, and on expressing my surprise at the clearness of his recollection, he told me that formerly he had a most remarkable memory, and had astonished many by it. On his first introduction to Lord Byron, some one (whose name I forget) was looking on with wonder at the apparent earnestness with which he spoke, and the singular changes in Lord Byron's countenance as he proceeded. He was repeating to the Great Poet the whole of the poem of 'Hardyknute,' which he then knew by heart, and which proved so highly interesting to his Lordship. My notes also refer to a conversation I had with Sir Walter as to why he had left off writing poetry. When I asked this question he said, 'Because I found Byron beat me; but I shall try again.' These anecdotes, which may amuse some, are all found in my contribution, which I have sent to Hamilton to give to Mr. Lockhart, for as the family had requested them from me I could not well dispose of them to my own advantage, which I was told I might easily do."

Sir Walter's remark, spoken in the privacy of friendship to Sir William Gell, that Lord Byron had, as it were, snuffed out the flame of his genius as a poet, seems to have contained a great deal of truth. When Lord Byron's star rose to its zenith it seemed as if the heavens had room for no other light, and many minor poets who had just begun to create a faint halo of light around their names disappeared almost entirely from the sight of men. Of Lord Byron we can, unfortunately, give no autograph to the public, "our poverty though not our will consents." Two franks, rare in themselves, as the great poet resided so short a period in his native land, are the only memorials we possess of the brilliant, though ill-starred genius. Moore has written the most interesting and graphic life of the wonderful poet, gathering up from all their mutual friends and acquaintances every crumb which fell from the mouth of his hero, and recording it on the page of his history, in proof of which we here insert a letter from the author of "Lalla Rookh" himself. It is addressed to the celebrated Lady Blessington, and is a not unpleasing and characteristic specimen of his style:—

"Sloperton Cottage, Devizes, November 18, 1827.

"MY DEAR LADY BLESSINGTON,—It is now near six months since (after a conversation with Lord ——— about you) I exclaimed, 'Well, I shall positively write to Lady Blessington to-morrow.' Whether I have kept my word you and the postman know but too well. The fact is, I live as usual in such a perpetual struggle between what I like to do and what I ought to do (though communing with you would come under both these heads), between junketting abroad and scribbling at home, that for anything but the desk and the dinner-table I am not left a single instant of time. In addition to our neighbours at Bowood we have got lately their relations the ———, who have settled themselves at L—— near us, and having some very pretty girls for daughters (things I have not even yet lost my taste for), they contrive with music, visits, etc. etc., to distract me not a little. I have had but one short glimpse of Mrs. ——— for the last year, as she has taken flight to some distant and outlandish place (called Fulham I believe), to which a thorough town man (such as I am for the few weeks I stay there) could never, even with the help of the 'march of intellect,' think of arriving. I wish she would return into the civilized world, for I miss her very very much I assure you. To talk of you and old times, of those two dazzling faces I saw popped out of the hotel window in Sackville St., of the dinner to the piper at Richmond, etc. etc.; all this is delightful to remember and to talk about, and if ever 'we three meet again' we shall have a regular cause of it. Lord ——— told me (and this I own was one of the reasons of my above-mentioned fruitless ejaculations) that you saw a good deal of Lord Byron during his last days in Italy, and that you mentioned some anecdotes of him (his bursting into tears as he lay on the sofa, etc. etc.) which he (Lord ———) thought might be very interestingly introduced into my life of him. He also told me that you had some verses addressed to yourself by Lord Byron which are very pretty and graceful—in short, every way worthy of their subject. Now, my dear Lady Blessington, if you have anything like the same cordial remembrance of old times that I have, if ever the poet (or the piper) found favour in your ears, sit down instantly and record for me, as only a woman can record, every particular you remember of your acquaintance with Byron from first to last. You may depend upon whatever you write never meeting any eye but my own, and you will oblige me more than I have time at this moment to tell you. Above all, too, do not forget the verses, which will be doubly precious as written by him and on you.

"Faithfully yours,
"THOMAS MOORE."

It is almost impossible, amidst the crush of poets, wits, and geniuses which lived about this time to select the ones which, in a space short as ours is, would prove the most interesting to the public; we pass over, therefore, Rogers, Campbell, Southey, Crabbe, and others, whose letters, though valuable as autographs, scarcely contain in themselves sufficient merit for publication, and hasten on to some more modern celebrities, some of them men and women of our own time, but before entering on a new field we will conclude this subject by a few verses of considerable beauty and wit, which we find in some of the letters of the brothers Horace and James Smith, the well-known authors of the "Rejected Addresses:—

"Not having my papers with me here I have nothing to offer as a substitute, so I have scribbled a few lines of the prescribed shortness, which if you think them worthy insertion, are very much at your Ladyship's service.

"I have the honour to remain yours very faithfully,

"HORATIO SMITH.

"Youth, beauty, love, delight,
All blessings bright and dear,
Like shooting stars by night,
Flash, fall, and disappear.

"While cynics doubt their worth,
Because they're born to die,
The wiser sons of earth
Will snatch them ere they fly.

"Though mingled with alloy
We throw not gold away,
Then why reject the joy
That's blended with decay?"

The poet Shelley, of whom, unfortunately, we possess no autograph, the intimate friend and admirer of Horace Smith, leaves us in a few lines his opinion of his character:—

"Wit and sense,
Virtue and human knowledge, all that might
Make this dull world a business of delight,
Are all combined in H. S."

The verses which follow, by James Smith, the elder brother, are in a very different style, but from their cleverness and wit are well worthy of perusal:—

"SUN AND MOON.
BY JAMES SMITH, ESQ.

"'Dear brother quit with me the sky'
Thus spoke the Queen of Night,
'And, radiant, walk the earth while I
Dispense my milder light.
On Malta's rock I'll take my stand,
To calm the seaman's fears,
And you shall brilliantly command
O'er barbarous Algiers.'
Each Godhead straight on earth alights
With such a potent blaze,
That Malta long was ruled by Nights,
And Algiers long by Days.

"In England rivers are all males
(For instance, Father Thames),
Whoever in Columbia sails
Finds them Ma'amselles or Dames;
Yes, there the softer sex presides,
Aquatic, I assure ye,
And Mrs. Sippy rolls her tides
Responsive to Miss Souri."

"It was observed that the College of Physicians made but a sorry sight (externally) compared with its neighbour, our newly-painted club. 'Oh!' quoth a wag, 'the reason is obvious. They have painted theirs in distemper.'"

"P. called on me last Tuesday, and told me the following. Horace Smith walking with a friend at Brighton, the latter pointed out to the former the following inscription on a public-house: 'Good Bear Sold here,' commenting at the same time on the bad spelling. 'Pho,' replied Horace, 'he ought to know best, it's his own Bruin.'" And now for my last:—

"You ask me why Pontefract Borough could sully
Its fame by returning to Parliament Gully?*
The Etymological cause, I suppose is,
His breaking the Bridges of so many noses."

The two brothers are perhaps best known to the public by their joint production of the "Rejected Addresses," a series of witty imitations of the great poets of the day, which raised the fame of the authors to a great height. They appear to have both enjoyed happy, genial natures, and their writings are not tinged with either spleen or melancholy. Shelley having given us the character of Horace, we must allow James to speak for himself, and give his own history in his own words:—

"We toil and ease alternate share,
Books and the converse of the fair
(To see is to adore them),
With these, and London for my home,
I envy not the joys of Rome,
The Circus or the Forum."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. NEW SERIES. No. 11. JOHN THE BAPTIST. PART II.

Chapters to be read—parts of Matt. iii. and xiv.

ASK a few questions on the last lesson, as to the double work of John as a preacher and baptist, then begin at once with—

I. JOHN WITH CHRIST. (Read Matt. iii. 11—17.) Ask what John said about Christ prophetically (ver. 12). Had Christ yet begun His ministry? then how did he know Him? Probably brought up in same village, being cousins. Remind of the great age of John's parents at his birth, thirty years before; they probably now dead. Children will have seen pictures of Holy Family. Two boys living together for thirty years would know each other well; yet from John i. 31 show that John did not know Jesus as the Son of God till after His baptism; still had seen His holy life and obedience to earthly parents. Now picture John resting at the end of a day's work—tired with preaching and baptising—eating his frugal food. What was his fare? Sees Jesus coming; recognises Him. His surprise at His asking for baptism. What class of men had John been accustomed to baptise? What had he required of those who came? Did Jesus need repentance? Ask what quality John's conduct showed. What was the secret of this humility? From Gal. v. 23 show that meekness is one form of the Spirit of which John was to be full from his birth. Might perhaps have expected that the applause he had met with would have made him vain; but not so. At last, yielded to Christ's wish and baptised Him; that is, he did his duty to One above him as much as to those below him. Now what blessing did he receive? what voice was heard and sight seen? What did this show John, and what record did he bear in consequence? (See John i. 34.) If had persisted in refusal to baptise, would have lost this sight, and not had faith confirmed. He now believed in Jesus as Son of God. Ask what types had pointed to Christ; especially refer to Abel's lamb and the Paschal lamb. So John calls Christ the Lamb of God, and leads his own disciples to follow Jesus; thus showing unselfishness, not afraid of losing their affection: leads them away from himself to Christ. Contrast this with conduct of chief priests, who were envious of Christ's popularity and desired His death. (Matt. xxvii. 18.) These two qualities of humility and unselfishness to be pressed home to the children.

II. JOHN WITH HEROD. (Read Matt. xiv. 1—12.) (1) In the palace. Ask where John usually lived. Who now sent for him? What a contrast—a palace to a wilderness! Why did Herod want to see him? Perhaps out of curiosity, because he had heard of the strange preacher. What did John say to him (ver. 4) and what had Herod done in consequence? The scene may be pictured out. Herod's palace in Galilee; himself and his unlawful wife sitting in state to hear John; princes, courtiers, attendants all around; the prophet brought in with rough clothing and long hair; all in expectation to hear fine sermon. Did he preach one? Describe the king's anger and Herodias's fury at the bold words. The prophet seized by the guards; led away to prison. From Mark vi. 20 show the influence John had yet gained over Herod—who did many things, all but the right thing. (2) In the prison. Now picture John in confinement; perhaps closely guarded like St. Peter (Acts xii. 6), perhaps his feet in the stocks (Acts xvi. 24). How would he feel? Desolate, forsaken, his work all in vain. Whom might he expect to come and release him? So sent to ask Jesus if He was the expected Messiah. (Read Luke vii. 19—23.) Did Jesus come and release him? No, but that same hour worked many miracles, and told messengers to show John His works. After that, hear of no more doubt in John's mind. Now ask the well-known story of his death, incidentally showing the weakness and cowardice of Herod the king, who, knowing what was right, yet from fear of his nobles' and Herodias's ridicule, dared not do it. Show how John's conduct showed patience and resignation to God's will, and that Christ Himself has written his epitaph (Matt. xi. 11).

Now sum up the points in his character. (1) Humility in depreciating himself and exalting Christ. (2) Unselfishness in leading his disciples away from himself to Christ. (3) Boldness both with the publicans and sinners, and especially with Herod; knowing his duty, and doing it without fear of consequences; and (4) patience in suffering for the truth's sake. In all these ways great in sight of God, and so fulfilled the prophecy of his birth. Who will copy him? Must have the same Spirit—given to all who ask.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe in your own words the scene of Christ's baptism.
2. What was the testimony of John to Christ?
3. What two qualities did John show in his intercourse with Christ?
4. Why did Herod send for John, and what was the effect of his preaching?
5. When did John's faith fail, and how was it confirmed?
6. What was the testimony of Christ to John?
7. Sum up the points in his character.

THE GRIEFS OF CRIPPLE TOM.

CHAPTER VI.

ONE afternoon, before Jim's fever came to its crisis, Tom was asked by the village carpenter to come to his kitchen in the evening to a meeting that was to be held by the Scripture-reader of the parish. It was some time after the proper hour that he slipped into the room, which was nearly as full as it would hold, and found a seat on the end of a plank laid on two nail-kegs, which served for a bench. He was at the very back of the kitchen, facing the Scripture-reader, who was just reading out his text: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself." It was some time before Tom's attention was fixed on the speaker, an old man, with long white hair and a large quiet face; and when he did listen he heard him saying, "But God has done more for us than feed and clothe us. He knew that we could not see Him, and did not love Him, so He sent us His own Son to show us what He was like. Could you not have loved Him if you had been living then and spoken to Him? could you not love Him if He were to come back again and live among us here? But—there was more than that—"

The old man paused, as if he were at a loss for words to express what was filling his mind, and looked slowly round the room into the faces of the people. His was not the bright and joyful look of an apostle whose heart was overflowing with rivers of the living water brought for the first time within reach of thirsty souls; but the wearied, mournful gaze of one who has told the glad tidings often to those who have often heard them, and as often turned coldly away. When he recommenced, his tones were low and pleading, as of one who barely hopes that his pleading will not be in vain.

"You know there is more reason than all that why you should love Him. You know that He loves you. You know that every blow, every torture, was borne for us—for you and for me; that the thorns were pressed into His brow that we might have a crown of glory; that God forsook His Son that we might be drawn near. And did not God the Father show us His love? Tell me now, you that are a father or a mother, is there any one on earth for whose sake you would give up your son, your only son, to a cruel and shameful death? Yet God the Father did that, 'He spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all.' And then He says, 'Love Me with all thy heart.' Is that so much to ask? Tell your own hearts, 'Do you love Him after all?' You don't? How hard, how ungrateful, how wicked you must be!

"The Lord Jesus Christ Himself, the Lord of glory, the same Jesus that thought of His mother even in His own death-agony, He stands knocking at your heart. The print of the iron is in the hand He knocks with, and in the feet that wait on you, oh, so long! and you give Him no heed at all. Even a beggar you would answer somehow, but the Son of God you will not even listen to. I beseech you open your hearts, and let the blessed Saviour in; or if you cannot, ask Him to open your heart Himself, to come in, and be your Friend and Master."

Tom did not hear any more of the address, nor had he any remembrance of the hymn and prayer that followed. He went home in a kind of dream, his mind filled with this one thought—he ought to love God; God deserved to be loved, and wanted to be loved, and he did not love Him. He did not even love his father and mother, nor Miss Burton, nor the people in the village, nor Jim—well, surely he loved Jim. No, he could not be satisfied that he really did. His heart felt empty and cold—cold, as if it would never be warmed again.

Three weeks went by, and James Todd passed safely through the crisis, and was fairly recovering from the fever. The feelings that had filled Tom's mind after leaving the Scripture-reader still kept possession of it. He did not love God, he knew, and he could not love Him, could not even love his friends and neighbours. Two years before he had thought himself incapable of thinking and working like other people; now he thought himself incapable of feeling. Do you say it is impossible that an ignorant and commonplace village lad should have such thoughts? I think not; for I know that the sense of duty left undone may be felt most keenly, even by the dullest minds, and that the wisest among us are often most profoundly ignorant of the ideas and longings that sometimes visit the most clouded souls.

100. "This man, if he were a prophet, would have known who and what manner of woman this is that touched him." On what occasion were these words spoken?

101. One of the apostles asked the question: "Who is he that overcometh the world?" Quote his own answer.

102. "I am," said one of old, "a brother to dragons, and a companion to ostriches." Who?

103. Where do we meet with the first mention of the name "the Jews?"

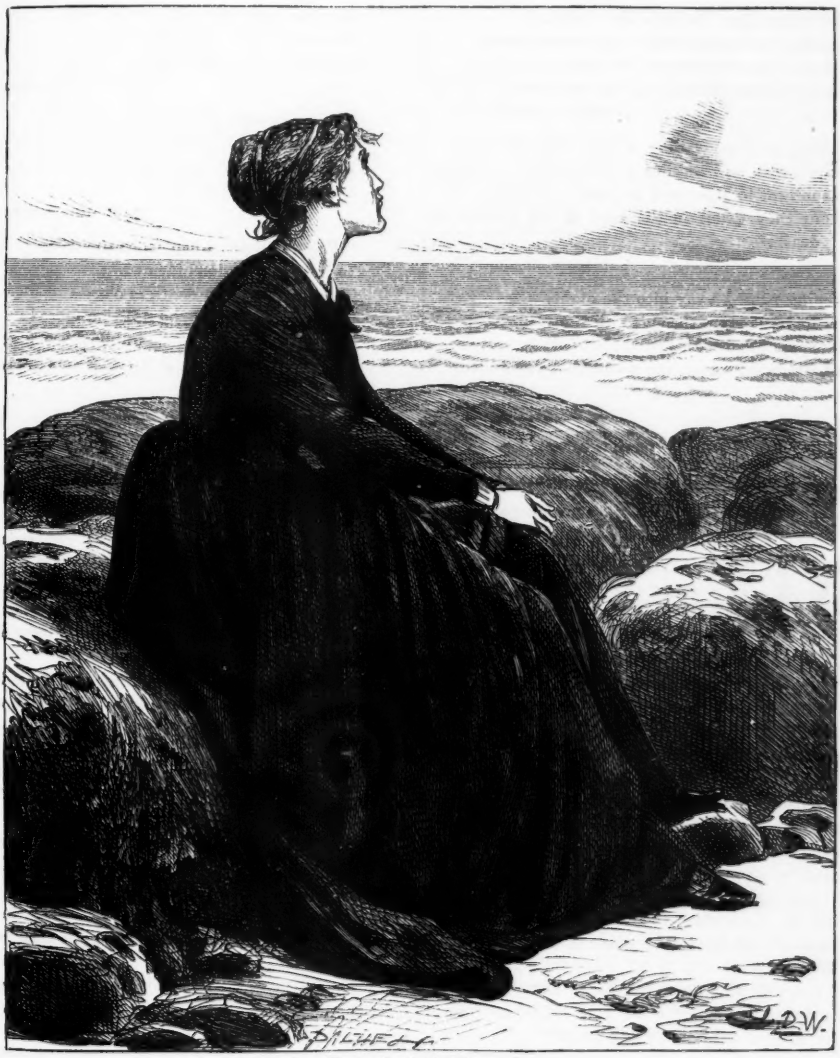
104. Name a King of Moab who fought against two of the grandsons of Omri, King of Israel.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 240.

85. The sun and moon standing still at the command of Joshua (Josh. x. 12; 2 Kings xx. 11).

86. The prophecy of Malachi (iv. 5) led them to expect it: "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet," &c. &c.



87. Three. Ahab (1 Kings xvii. 1; xxi. 19, 21, 23); Ahaziah (2 Kings i. 4).

88. Jeroboam instituted the worship of two calves, assimilating it in some measure to the services appointed by God at Jerusalem (1 Kings xii. 28—32). But Ahab added to this the worship of the idols Baal and Ashtaroth. Ahab, at the instance of Jezebel, slew many of the Lord's prophets.

89. "Who made Israel to sin."

90. He multiplied horses and wives to himself, in contravention of what Moses had written (compare 1 Kings x. 26, 2 Chron. ix. 25, with Deut. xvii. 16, 17); he was induced to worship the idols of his respective wives—Astoreth, Molech, Chemosh (1 Kings xi. 5—7).

91. The selection of David for the throne of Israel, and the rejection of his elder brother by Samuel (1 Sam. xvi. 7, &c.)

LIFE IN DEATH.

"Make no mourning for the dead."—Ezek. xxiv. 17.

I STOOD a musing by the shore at even
And heard the wind that whispered to the wave;
My eyes looked on the fading light in heaven;
My heart lay cold and dead upon his grave.

I saw the long waves, o'er the shingles creeping,
Break murmuringly in sobs upon the beach,
Till all the air seemed filled with voices weeping,
Chanting a wild, low dirge in ghostly speech.

"Fade away, fade away, light from the sky,
Soul from the body and sight from the eye—
Night winds may break the repose of the wave;
Cries cannot wake up the dead in the grave.
Vanitas vanissima!

"All unavailing the sigh and the tear,
Weeping and wailing the dead cannot hear;
As fades from the heavens the last ray of light
So hope leaves the heart to the blackness of night.
Vanitas vanissima!

"A sleep without waking, a sleep without dream,
A night with no breaking, a gloom with no gleam,
No sunlight to cheer and no sweet summer breath,
Where they dwell in the land of the shadow of death.
Vanitas vanissima!"

So evening passed away into the night,
And lustrous stars thronged all the vault above;
My soul was filled with their calm, holy light,
And wind and wave sang now of hope and love.
Until the air, unto my spirit's seeming,
Breathed with the whisperings of a glorious faith,
And angel voices all around me hymning
Sang of the life beyond the gate of death.

"Weep no more those hopeless tears,
Keep no more those faithless fears!
Hope and Love and potent Faith
Rend the grave and conquer Death.
Jubilate Domino.

"Raise in hope those tear-swoln eyes
To the worlds beyond the skies;
Raise thy soul in faith and love
To the living-dead above.
Jubilate Domino.

"There is light, when fades the day,
In heavenly regions far away;
There is life when death is o'er—
The grave can hold the dead no more!
Jubilate Domino."

JOHN FRANCIS WALLER.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER XIII.

TUESDAY morning came at last, and at eleven o'clock the train which conveyed Tina, Maurice and Ruth away from London left the Euston Station.

"And now," said Tina, smiling, as the train moved more rapidly, "we shall keep you with us for a long time; it will be no good trying to escape from our clutches."

Ruth looked up, and smiled a remonstrance, there was no need to speak. She remained silent for some time, entirely giving herself up to the delightful feeling of complete repose which the consciousness of being in the Raes' "clutches" gave her. The atmosphere was quite unsmoky when any of them spoke again, and it was Tina who broke the silence. "What an unsociable party we are!" she said, as she suddenly awoke to the sense of the long pause. "Why is it?"

"I don't know," answered Ruth, looking up, and evidently quite ready for any conversation. "It is not for want of subjects to talk about."

"No, rather because there are so many subjects," said Maurice.

"It would be very interesting, I think, to be able to read people's thoughts when they have any interest in common," said Ruth, "to see how much alike their views of the same thing would be."

"I think there would be more difference than likeness," said Maurice.

"Do you? Let us try."

"Very well," said Tina. "Suppose you begin by telling us what you were thinking about."

"Well, I was trying to fancy how I should feel when I came to the dear familiar places, and wondering whether everything and everybody would be quite unchanged."

"That is strange. I was thinking that I need not have any anxiety about your liking Robert, because you have both changed so little. I need not say that I hope you will like him."

"As much as you do?" asked Ruth, saucily. "I am sure you need not feel anxious about it. You must remember I know him a little."

"Yes, dear, but you were a child then, and of course there is a chance that you might not like him so well now. However, I think you will."

"I am sure of it. I can tell by his face in the photograph you showed me. But, Maurice, what were you thinking about?"

"I hardly know," answered Maurice, looking up from the book he was reading, and smiling in rather a melancholy way.

"Or, rather, you prefer not to tell us," said Tina. "Ruth, I believe he is trying to pique our curiosity, don't you?"

"Yes," answered Ruth, laughing.

Maurice did not deny the accusation, and Ruth and Tina carried on the conversation between them; Maurice occasionally reading, but generally leaning back, silently listening to them, and watching Ruth's happy face with an unaccountable feeling of gravity.

As they drew near their destination Ruth and Tina relapsed into silence, which continued until the train stopped at the station. Ruth looked eagerly up and down the platform; but Dr. Rae was nowhere to be seen.

"He would have been sure to come if he could," said Tina, as the fly drove down the high street. "But you know, Ruth, he is busier than ever now."

"I think, perhaps, it is better to meet him at home," answered Ruth. "I was only disappointed for the moment. Everything looks so strangely familiar," she continued, looking at the shops and houses as they drove along.

At last they arrived at the Willows, and Mrs. Rae and Susan appeared at the door to welcome the travellers, whose arrival caused a delightful bustle. Still there was no Stephen.

"I feel as if I should never see him!" exclaimed Ruth, as she went up-stairs with Tina, to the bedroom which she and Mary used to share.

"Now, Ruth, remember your promise. You said you would wear your hair down some day, and there could not be a better time than now."

"You don't like it up?" said Ruth, questioningly.

"Yes, I like it any way; but I like you as a little ragamuffin best, I think; and besides, Stephen will recognise you better," added Tina, laughing, as she watched Ruth shaking her hair down. She stood looking in the glass pensively for a minute.

"What is the result of your contemplation?"

"I was only thinking," said Ruth, looking up with a sigh, "that this seems a sort of assertion of my liberty, because——" Tina never heard why, for in the middle of her sentence Ruth broke off suddenly, stood still for an instant listening, and darted out of the room. She ran down-stairs and entered the drawing-room, where Stephen had just arrived and was shaking hands with Maurice.

"Dr. Rae!"

Stephen turned round quickly, and taking Ruth's hands, held her at arm's length, and looked with a smile into her radiant face. "The very same child you were four years ago. Tell me, Ruth, am I changed?" asked Stephen, as Ruth's earnest look was fixed upon his face.

"Oh no! I think not," she answered quickly.

"I will prove it," said Stephen, as he drew her to him and kissed her gravely. His manner was exactly the same as ever, and Ruth felt as if she had not been parted from him at all, it seemed so natural to hear him speak as he did.

"Look up, child, and tell me that you are glad to come here again."

"You are assuming that I am glad," answered Ruth with a laugh; and raising her head, she added, "what makes you so arrogant?"

Maurice thought it very natural that Ruth's manner should make him so, and wished he had as much reason to be "arrogant" as Stephen had. He turned away, and left the room; though he had hardly spoken to his brother.

Dr. Rae and Ruth sat talking to one another until the dinner-bell rang, when they joined the rest of the family in the dining-room. Ruth was installed at Dr. Rae's right hand, where she always had been accustomed to sit, and she fell into the old way of cracking nuts for him at dessert.

"I do believe this is the first nut Stephen has taken since you were here, Ruth," said Mrs. Rae, as Ruth was engrossed in peeling a walnut with great care. "I think you should pay yourself for your trouble, and not give all your devotion to Stephen."

"No, mother, nuts are not good for her," replied Stephen, with a professional air. "But employment is, and employment is not necessarily a trouble, is it, little one? Besides," he added, "it is the proper thing for a woman to minister to the comfort of a man."

Tina was about to answer this speech, but at that moment the door-bell rang, and she disappeared instantaneously. Stephen looked at his watch.

"Are you going out?" asked Ruth.

"No, but I must write some letters for this evening's post; you little witch, you have beguiled me into wasting my time."

"Be quick writing them. How soon can you come in again?"

"In an hour, I think. Will that suit your ladyship?"

"No. But mind," said Ruth, holding up her finger, warningly, "if you are not back in one hour I shall come and fetch you."

"What a terrible threat!" said Stephen, laughing; "I give you leave to put it into execution."

CHAPTER XIV.

"Now then, little maiden, you mustn't keep me waiting," said Stephen, as Ruth stopped on her way down-stairs to make some laughing remark to Tina. She ran down as he spoke, and he lifted her into his trap, for she was going his rounds with him.

This was the morning after Ruth's arrival, a lovely spring day, whose radiance was reflected in Ruth's face as the horse started into motion, and she felt the actual realisation of her often wished for pleasure—a ride with the doctor. He too looked pleased, and glancing down with a smile said, "We have neither of us forgotten the old times, have we, Ruth?"

"No, at least I can answer for myself; and oh! how I have longed for them sometimes," sighed Ruth, becoming grave at the remembrance. "Dr. Rae, you see I have not got out of my old habit of being discontented, but I think—I think perhaps I am better."

"That is right, I thought so," answered Stephen, kindly, with one of his penetrating looks.

"What made you think so?"

"I can tell by the expression of your face you have learnt patience, and I am glad of it, Ruth, for it makes your life a happier one. And your happiness will do good to others as well as to yourself."

"If I have improved in any way it is not through any merit of my own, but because I have remembered all you told me when I was a child, and because you pointed out so many things that made me happy to think of." Ruth's voice trembled a little as she spoke, and, after a pause, she said, "You have a wonderful faculty for making people happy. That is a very good one for a doctor to possess, isn't it?"

"A doctor should make it a study to cure the mind as well as the body, certainly. Sometimes the one is cured through the other," replied Stephen. "I must be cheerful to cheer my patients, and that is the secret of my 'faculty,' as you call it."

"I have never seen you gloomy," pursued Ruth, admiringly. "Of course, sometimes things may make you sad; but then, most people get moody now and then for no reason whatever. And a doctor's life must be very depressing, except that of course you are conscious of the good you do."

"Isn't that a very large exception?"

"Yes, very—in your case," answered Ruth, looking up with a smile.

"Tut, tut! you must not say such things. Perhaps some day I might believe you, and then I should become conceited." Stephen's attention was attracted suddenly by the sound of a child's crying, and looking round, he saw a little boy lying helplessly by a stile, having tumbled in climbing over.

Stephen stopped the trap, and getting out, picked up the child, and set him on his feet again.

"Why, Jack, you're a sensible little fellow to fall down when I am passing. I think I can cure your bruises for you."

Jack dried his eyes, being more frightened than hurt; but at the sight of his dusty hands, seemed to recall the sensations of his fall, and was just bursting out in a fresh paroxysm when Stephen said, "If you are going to be a sailor you must learn to climb without falling, or in any case to leave off crying."

"I shan't cry when I'm a sailor like Tom," said Jack, brightening up. "I shall climb very high up."

"If you can climb up here, I will take you home," said Stephen, walking to the trap. His words had a magical effect. In another minute the stile was out of sight, and soon they stopped at the turnpike gate. Jack's father appeared, and touched his hat, and Jack's mother came out of the cottage, and received her son from the doctor, who explained the cause of the injury to his pinafore, the sight of which at once excited the suspicion of his observant mother.

"Many thanks, doctor. He's a naughty boy, always running into mischief; but it's very kind of you to bring him back."

"He'd like a fall every day now," observed his father, "if he gets a ride for it."

"Then he will be very clever to choose the time and place effectually," answered Stephen, laughing as he drove away.

By-and-by they reached the Willows, and Dr. Rae lifted Ruth from her seat. Maurice entered the garden at the same instant, and came up to the door.

"Well, Ruth, have you enjoyed your drive with the doctor?" he asked.

"Yes, of course I have," answered Ruth, smiling, as if she only half attended to his question, while she watched Stephen patting the horse before it was led away by the groom.

"Have you been busy this morning, Maurice?" inquired Stephen.

"Yes, I have been down to the old well, at Coombe Wood, sketching."

At the mention of Coombe Wood Ruth looked up at Maurice directly. She remembered well how she had gone there with him, the very day Mr. Leighton's letter announcing his return to England had arrived. Maurice, however, seemed unconscious of any association connected with the place; unconscious, too, of Ruth's pleased glance; and he went on talking to Stephen quite calmly. Ruth's eyes fell again, and she began to walk slowly up-stairs, taking off her gloves and wondering about Maurice's forgetfulness.

"How silly I am! why should he remember?" Ruth said to herself, impatiently, when she found herself standing at the window and forgetting to take off her things. The fact, however, of there being no reason for Maurice to remember could not prevent Ruth's wish that he did, and she dismissed her speculations with a sigh.

That evening Tina went to dinner at the Ashleighs', and Ruth undertook to do some writing for Stephen, which Tina had intended to do, as Stephen was going to give a lecture at the town. Accordingly, after dinner, Ruth began to write, and went on for some time in silence, when Maurice said, "Will you stand to me for a little while, Ruth, or are you too busy?"

"I really don't think I can now. I am doing this for the doctor. Is it important?"

"Not so important as Stephen's work," answered Maurice, casting aside his pencil and sketch-book, and running his fingers through his hair. He did not know that Ruth saw his frown, and that, instead of being absorbed in her writing, she was thinking how she could manage to stand for him after all, in spite of what she had said. "I can finish this in my bedroom if necessary," she thought, and presently she turned round again, saying, "I think I shall have time after all, if you want me still."

"Thank you," answered Maurice; "you are sure?"

"Yes." For about a quarter of an hour Ruth stood to him, and by the end of that time she was very much puzzled at Maurice's gravity, which began at the moment of her refusal to stand, but had not abated at her subsequent compliance.

Ruth did not get on with her writing very fast, so when bedtime came she went to her room and finished her task before undressing. She grew very tired towards the end, partly through an unaccountable excitement that she had felt during the evening. When the writing was finished, Ruth crept quietly down-stairs, and put it on the study-desk, and as she was about to mount the stairs again, the street door opened and Stephen entered.

"Why, Ruth, how late you are! Is anything the matter?" he asked quickly, at the sight of her pale face.

"No," answered Ruth, standing on the first stair and leaning against the bannister, while Stephen took off his coat.

"What makes you so late then?"

"I have been busy."

"Has that writing taken you so long? My dear child, there was no need to work so hard at it. Why did you fatigue yourself like this?"

"I liked to do it, Dr. Rae."

"But I don't like to see you look so pale, Ruth," said Stephen.

Ruth laid her hand upon his arm to interrupt him. "You mustn't scold me for keeping my promise; you who would be the last to break one yourself because of a little fatigue; and it has given me so much pleasure to be of use to you."

Stephen did not scold her. For the first time Ruth exerted an influence over him of which they had both been entirely unconscious, and Stephen yielded. After a momentary look at Ruth he said, smiling, "You have a true womanly love of suffering in a good cause."

"This is such a little thing, though," answered Ruth.

"Little acts convey great meanings, Ruth, as I have seen to-night," said Stephen. Ruth returned to her room, where she quickly got into bed and fell asleep. (To be continued.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

II.—WITH THE CHILDREN OF THE STRANGER.

A HUNDRED and eighty-seven years ago a French army invaded England and effected a landing at various places on the coast. Smaller divisions of that army had previously obtained a footing in some of the chief towns of Great Britain; and for about fifty years afterwards other contingents arrived at intervals to find the compatriots, settled among the people, who had easily yielded to their address and courage, and by that time were apparently contented to regard them as being permanently established in the districts of which they had taken possession. The strange part of the story is, that for a large part of this time England was successfully engaged in war with the country of the invaders, and not only with that country, but with a discarded prince of its own, who, having received assistance from France, strove to regain the throne which he had abdicated by raising civil war in Ireland. Then was to be seen a marvellous thing. A detachment of the French army of occupation in England went with King William to the Boyne, and when the mercenaries who were at the back of James in his miserable enterprise came forth to fight, they beheld the swords of their countrymen flash in their faces, and heard a well-known terrible cry, as a band of veteran warriors cut through their ranks, fighting as they had been taught to fight in the Cevennes and amidst the valleys and passes of Languedoc. For the army that invaded England in 1686, and for four or five years afterwards, was the army of the French Huguenots, against whom the dragoons of Louis XIV. and the emissaries of Pope and priests had been let loose after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

Four hundred thousand French Protestants had left their country during the twenty years previous to the revocation of that pact, which had been renewed after the siege of Rochelle, and though the attempt to escape from the country was made punishable by the confiscation of property and perpetual imprisonment at the galleys, six hundred thousand persons contrived to get out of France, and found asylums in Flanders, Switzerland, Holland, Germany, and England, after the persecutions were resumed.

Comparatively few of the men who came in the second emigration had fought for the religion that they professed. They had learned to endure all things, and with undaunted courage many of them had suffered the loss of their worldly goods, the burning of their houses, hunger, poverty, and the imprisonment of their wives and daughters in distant fortresses, because they would not forswear their faith. Hundreds of their companions were at the galleys, hundreds more had been tortured, mutilated, burned, broken on the wheel. Women as well as men endured almost in silence the fierce brutalities of a debased soldiery, directed by priests and fanatics, who had as it were made themselves drunk with blood, and seemed to revel in cruelty. With a resolution that nothing seemed able to abate, pastors like Claude Brousson went from district to district, living they knew not how, half famished, in perpetual danger, and with little expectation of ultimately escaping the stake or the rack. Nay, they refused to leave the country, while in the woods and wildernesses of the Gard great congregations of their brethren awaited their coming, that they might hold services in caves and "in the desert," as they called that wild country of the Cevennes and of Lozère. These men were non-resistants. They met with unflinching courage, but without arms. Those of them who remained in France remained to see the persecutions redoubled in the attempt to exterminate the reformed faith. They were the truest vindicators of the religion that they professed. Up to the time of the siege of Rochelle, and afterwards, Protestantism was represented by a defensive sword, but these men discarded the weapons of carnal warfare. Only some years afterwards, when the persecutors (rioting in the very insanity of wrath because their declaration that Protestantism was abolished was falsified by constant revivals of the old Huguenot worship) directed utter extermination of the Vaudois, did the grandeur of the non-resisting principle give way before the desperation of men who came to the conclusion that, if they were to die, they might as well die fighting.

It must be remembered that some of them knew well how to fight. Some of their leaders—men of peace as they were, and men of an iron determination, which was shown in the obstinacy with which they refused to take up the sword—had come of stern warriors and were Frenchmen—Norman Frenchmen—Protestant Norman Frenchmen. A rare combination that;—cold hard steel and fire.

But it was not till some time afterwards that these men became the leaders of the peasantry, the chestnut-fed mountaineers who came down from their miserable huts and joined what had by that time become an organised army of insurrection. Before this time arrived a strange aberration seemed to move the people. The old simple non-resisting pastors had been done to death by torture and execution, and the people met, it is true, but often met amid the ruin of their homes, or in desert places, and as sheep having no shepherd. Then a wild hysterical frenzy appeared among them. Men, women, and even children claimed to be inspired, and at length fanaticism leaped into retaliation. On a Sunday in July, 1702, a wild mystic preacher, named Seguier went down with a band of about fifty armed men to release the prisoners. They were confined in dungeons beneath the house of one Chayla, a priest, who directed the prosecutions, and invented the tortures which he caused to be inflicted for the conversion of heretics. The Protestants broke open his door, forced the prison, and ultimately set fire to the house, in attempting to escape from which Chayla was recognised and killed. This was the beginning of a series of retaliations by the tormented people, the success of which changed the whole attitude of the Protestants of the district. They had formerly endured in silence; now they were desperate enough for insurrection. And the insurrection followed. Seguier was captured, maimed, and burnt alive; but others took his place. The war of the "Camisards" had commenced. Then it was that the leaders of the Protestant army in the Cevennes arose;—Roland and Cavalier, and the men who for a long time waged successful warfare against the royal forces, till defeat came accompanied by a new régime.

The rumbling of the revolutionary earthquake was already shaking the throne and the persecuting church. Voltaire, educated by the Jesuits, and hating religion, was, perhaps, unconsciously helping to deliver the martyrs of the Protestant faith when he first began to "philosophise."

The struggle of the Camisards can only be said to have ceased when the persecutions were nearly at an end, and France itself was tottering. But what of that great Huguenot contingent which had invaded Britain, and was growing in number year by year as the émigrés, leaving houses and land, shops and warehouses and factories, fled across the frontier, or got down to the shore, and came over the sea in fishing-boats and other small craft, in which they took passage under various disguises, or even stowed away in the holds, or packed along with bales of merchandise, to escape the vigilance of the emissaries who were set to watch for escaping Protestants? It is a little significant that of these non-combatant Protestants eleven regiments of soldiers were formed in the English army; but the truth is that of the vast number of émigrés who left France, some 30,000 were trained soldiers and sailors, and doubtless a proportion of these came to England, though probably fewer than those of their number who served in the Low Countries. At any rate, in 1687, two years after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, there arrived in England 15,500 refugees, some of whom brought with them very considerable property, and most of whom were men of education, or skilled in the knowledge of the arts, or of those manufactures and handicrafts which are the true wealth of a nation. At Norwich and Canterbury, they quickly formed colonies which became prosperous, and helped the prosperity of the districts, where they set up looms, and dye-works, and other additions to the local industries. In London they formed two or three remarkable colonies, so that when Chamberlayne wrote his

"Survey of London," there were about twenty French Protestant churches, the greater number of which stood in Shoreditch, Hoxton, and Spitalfields—in fact, above 13,000 emigrants had settled in or near the metropolis. The one French Protestant church founded by Edward VI. was, of course, inadequate to receive them, and their immediate necessities were so great that a collection was made for their relief, and a sum of £60,000 was by this means obtained in order to alleviate their distress.

Among these émigrés were many noblemen and gentlemen of distinction, who, with their wives, were reduced to extreme poverty by the confiscation of their property. These had learnt no trade, but with characteristic courage many of them set themselves to acquire the knowledge of some craft by which they might earn their bread, while some of their number learned of their wives to make pillow-lace, and so continued to support themselves in decent comfort.

To those who knew the "old French folk," as they came to be called in after years, when the later emigration had again increased the number of the weavers' colony in Spitalfields, nothing was more remarkable than the cheerfulness—one might almost say the gaiety that distinguished them. Reading the account given by French writers of the old Huguenots in France, one might be disposed to regard them as stern and sour sectaries, but that would be a very erroneous opinion. Perhaps the sudden freedom to which they came, the rest of soul, and the opportunity to endeavour to serve God with a quiet mind, raised them to a tranquil happiness which revived the national characteristic of light-heartedness; but however it may have been, the real genuine old French weaver of Spitalfields and Bethnal Green was a very courteous, merry, simple, child-like gentleman. The houses in which these people lived, some of which are still to be seen with their high-pitched roofs and long leaden casements, were very different to the barely-furnished, squalid places in which their descendants of to-day are to be found; and, indeed, the Spitalfields weaver even of seventy years ago was usually a well-to-do person; while in the old time he could take "Saint Monday" every week, wear silver crown-pieces for buttons on his holiday coat, and put on silk stockings on state occasions. This was in the days when French was still spoken in many of the little parlours of houses that stood within gardens gay with sweet-scented blooms of sweet-william, ten-weeks-stock, and clove-pink. When there was still an embowered greenness in "Bednall," and Hare Street Fields were within a stone's throw of "Sinjun"—St. John, or rather St. Jean Street,—or of the little chapel of "La Patente," in Brown's Lane, Spitalfields. Even in later times than that, however, I can remember being set up to a table, and shown how to draw on a slate, by an old gentleman with a face streaked like a ruddy dried pippin. I was just old enough to make out that the tea-table talk was in a strange tongue; but I can remember that there were evidences of the refinements that the old refugees had brought with them across the sea. Not only in their neat but spruce attire, in their polite grace to women, in their easy, good-humoured play and prattle to little children, in their cultivation of flowers, their liking for birds, and their taste for music, but in a score of trifling objects about their tidy rooms, where the click of the shuttle was heard from morning to night, these old French folk vindicated their birth and breeding. By tea-services of rare old china, rolls of real "point" lace, a paste buckle, an antique ring, a fat, curiously-engraved watch, a few gem-like buttons, delicately-coloured porcelain and chimney ornaments; by books and manuscript music, or by flute and fiddle deftly handled in the playing of some old French tune, these people expressed their distinction without being aware of it. It has not even yet died out. Unfortunately, many of their descendants—representatives of a miserably paid, and now nearly superseded industry—have deteriorated by the influences of continued poverty; and even so long ago as the evil war-time of Napoleon I., many of the old families anglicised their names in deference to British hatred of the French, but there are still a large number of people in the eastern districts of London whose names and faces and figures alike proclaim their origin.

But we must go back once more to the time when the great collection was made. It is at least gratifying to know that the £60,000 soon increased to £200,000, and was afterwards called the "Royal Bounty," though Royalty had nothing to do with it during that reign. In 1686-7 about 6,000 persons were relieved from this fund, and in 1688 27,000 applicants received assistance, while others had employment found for them, or were relieved by more wealthy émigrés who had retained or recovered some part of their possessions. But there were still aged and sick people, little children, widows, orphans, broken men, homeless women, and lonely creatures who had become almost imbecile or insane through the cruelties and privations that they had suffered. For these a refuge was necessary, and at length—but not till 1708—an institution was founded in St. Luke's, under the name of the French Hospital, but better known to the "old folks" as the "Providence."

Of what it was and is I design to tell in another number.

COMFORTABLE WORDS.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK-ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND CHAPLAIN TO THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

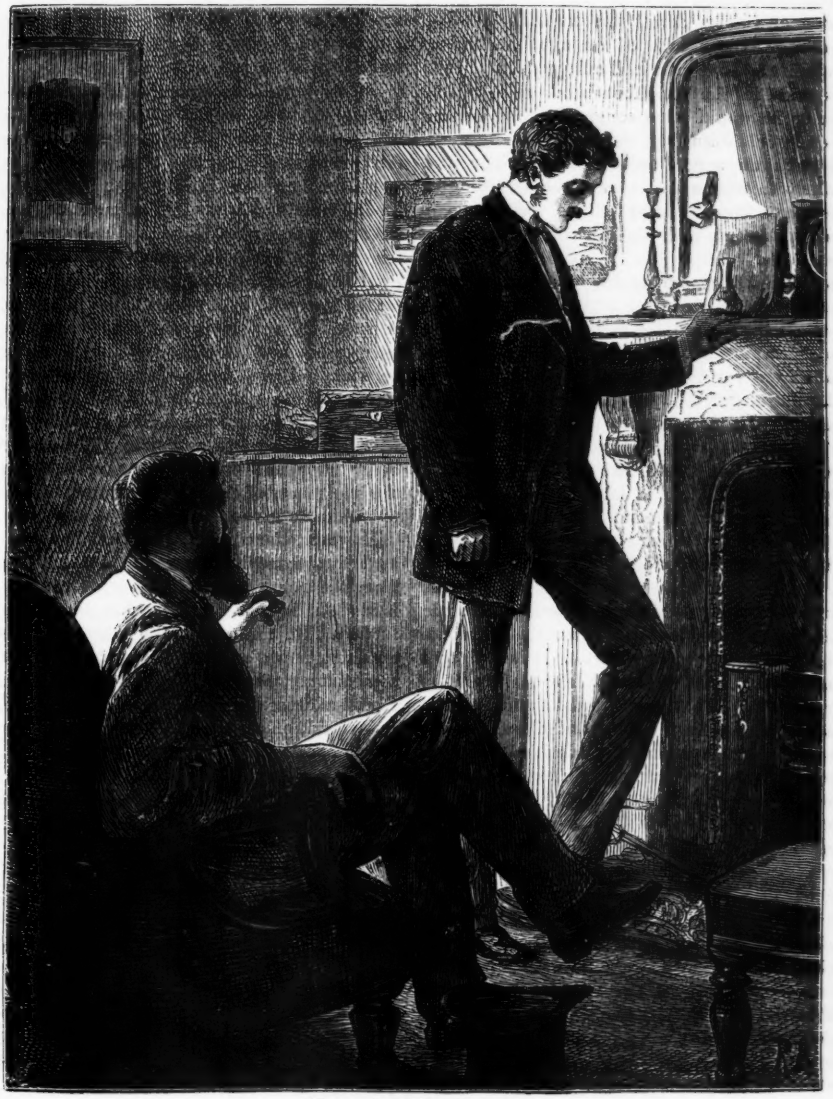
I.

"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."—Matt. ix. 28.

WERE God to promise mankind the unconditional granting of the first request they made, it may be doubted whether many would be wise enough to ask for the "rest" here spoken of. To the sick man, health would probably seem the greatest blessing; to the poor man, a competence; to the neglected wife, the love of her husband; to not a few parents, the restoration of their children; and each would anticipate that perfect felicity would follow upon the removal of his own particular trouble. "Take away this load, and I shall be happy." Now this would be natural enough, but it would also be very mistaken. Below all these external needs lies a still deeper need, which He who knew so well what was in man undertook to meet and satisfy, when He offered to give us "rest."

And what is this "rest?" Not freedom from trial—clearly not. Scripture never promises that God's children are to enjoy exemption from suffering. On the contrary, "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." We may petition, then, for the removal of affliction, or for the mitigation of it. The Lord Jesus did so. The Apostle Paul did so. But though we may rightly petition, we have no right to expect our petitions to be answered in the letter. The removal of the trial may not be granted. But what will certainly be given, if we seek the boon earnestly, is the calm sense of being right with Heaven, and right with oneself; the peace of a reconciled heart; the feeling of a soul that has abandoned its own will, and found a final home and resting-place in the bosom of God.

This is what our Lord speaks of in the text; and this rest comes from Him. Standing on the one side, and placing on the other a countless host of men and women—ay, and little children, too,—who are burdened with the burden of existence; toiling, suffering, perplexed, sorrowful, weary, and heavy laden—not one without a secret grief—He stretches out the blessing which each of them unconsciously craves. And observe that He could not do this if He were not man to sympathise and God to succour and help. Observe, also, that we cannot obtain the boon by any efforts of our own. How often do we struggle for this calm and repose of soul, as if it were something to be won by striving! Whereas it comes just to those who cease to strive; to those who surrender self-will; who are contented simply to accept; who do nothing but hollow the hand for Christ to deposit the blessing in it.



And what is the condition of receiving? Simply that of personal approach to the Saviour. "Come unto me," says Christ. It is implied in this language that the only hindrance is on our side. No obstacle really intervenes between the sinner and the Saviour, except the sinner's own unwillingness to draw nigh. With us is all the difficulty; with Christ is none. Christ stands inviting. He offers Himself as the one object of trust, the one Giver of the blessings we need. He has no frowns for those who are conscious of their unworthiness, and hesitate to move forward. On the contrary, He is all gracious tenderness; and His loving heart is glad when we can be persuaded to come. It is implied, also, in the language, that the movement of the heart towards Christ must continue until there is personal contact with Him. Good impulses, good feelings, a wish to be Christ's,—are well in their way; but they are not enough. We must not stop short on this side of appropriation of Christ. We must not be contented until we can say, "My Beloved is mine, and I am His." Once again, it is implied in the language, that there are others beside the Saviour who make this offer of rest to the soul of man. The world gives a sort of peace; but it is a false peace: it neither satisfies nor lasts. Christ alone gives "rest," for He alone really has it to give.

And what is the result of accepting the Saviour's invitation? A strange calm,—a feeling which lifts the soul into a region above the world. Men are "athirst for God, for the living God;" although too often they know it not. But here we find the object of our desire, and the heart is filled with God. The unquiet search is over: at last we have reached our home. And with the calm comes strength—strength to labour, and, what is more precious still, strength to endure. Do you ever see any who bear pain patiently, who suffer loss cheerfully, who can come down without a murmur from a higher position, who can see one after another put over their heads, and not be soured; who can be undervalued and misrepresented, and yet persevere in kindly deeds and silent well-doing? If you do, depend upon it such persons have learned the secret of coming to the Lord Jesus Christ for His great gift of Rest.

II.

"Be not afraid, only believe."—Mark v. 36.

One day a man came to Christ in terrible distress. He was a father; and his little daughter, whom he loved, lay at the point of death. All that human skill and kindness could do for the child in her sickness had been done, but all without avail; and there was no hope now save in supernatural interference. Would, then, the good Prophet of Galilee arrest the impending blow, and comfort the hearts of an agonised father and mother? The man had only just heard that Jesus was in the neighbourhood, and within reach, or he would have sought His aid before. But, oh! would Jesus help now?

(Drawn by ROBERT BARNES.)

"Come, do be reasonable"—p. 285.

To such an appeal as this the Saviour was not likely to turn a deaf ear. And, accordingly, leaving the occupation in which He was engaged, He set out at once with the father in the direction of the house.

Now whilst they are travelling on together we may notice that there appears to be a certain weakness about the faith of the petitioner. Unlike the centurion, who believed that Jesus could heal his servant from a distance, by merely speaking the word, this ruler of the synagogue—for such he was—considered it necessary to the effecting of the cure that Christ should be present in the sick-room, and bring Himself into actual contact with the patient. "Come and lay thy hands on her, that she may be healed; and she shall live." Unless this is done he cannot imagine that there can be any salvation for the child. But we notice, also, that the poor father's faith, weak as it is, and, weak, perhaps, because he was infected with some of the prejudice of his class against the Prophet of Galilee, is honoured by Christ. It is such that Christ thinks it worth His while to foster and to strengthen it. It has power to put a supernatural agency in motion for the relief and blessing of the man who possesses it; and he is dealt with, we see, according to the measure of the confidence which he reposes in the Saviour; he is not rebuked for the scantiness of it.

But this weak faith is soon to be brought to a very severe test. The progress to the house, slow as it must have seemed to the father's natural impatience, is arrested by an incident, which occupies the Saviour several minutes. A sick woman, suffering from a long-standing disorder, comes behind the Saviour, and timidly touches the hem of His garment, thinking that if she can only succeed in doing that, she shall be restored to health. Her expectation is fulfilled; and now she is creeping away, unnoticed, as she believes, in the crowd; glad at heart on account of the soundness which she feels in herself that she has received. But it is not well that she should be allowed to steal a blessing in this way; and the Saviour stops her. In a gentle, loving way, but yet by what is really compulsion, He brings her forward to acknowledge before others what had been done, and then dismisses her with a whole, not a half-blessing—a blessing for her soul as well as for her body. "Thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace."

But whilst all this is going on, imagine what the feelings of the father must have been! When he left his daughter's bedside, the child was very far gone. Every moment almost seemed as if it would be her last. And now, when the sands of life are running low, and all seems to depend upon the speedy arrival of Christ at the house,—what a trial it is to find these precious moments occupied by the intrusion of this woman! How the father must have stood by, fretting at the delay! Yet he is reverent, and says nothing: not a murmur escapes his lips. And, perhaps, he is learning, as he stands there, something about the Saviour which he did not know before. In that calm, majestic composure, which refuses to be hurried—which has leisure to attend to the necessities of every suppliant—he begins to read, it may be, the lineaments of the Divine. A new light breaks upon him as to the character of Jesus.

However, there is another trial in store. Just as they are moving on again, a message comes from the house to say that all is over. The child is dead: it is useless to trouble the Master any further. He can do nothing now—no one can do anything now; and the faith of the father is in some danger of being extinguished altogether, when Christ addresses to him the reassuring words, "Be not afraid, only believe." Trust me. The case seems hopeless, but it is not so. Trust me.

This is enough. The man holds fast to Christ; and his child is restored to him, even from the grave itself.

And so speaks Jesus to His faithful people now. Are they anxious about their salvation? "Fear not," He says, "but trust that matter in my hands." Are they dreading some sorrow or suffering that seems to be approaching in the distance? "Fear not; I will arrange all; I will bring you through." Are they perplexed and troubled about the future of those dependent upon them? Still the voice falls upon the ear, "Confide in my care, in my love; leave me to provide. Be not afraid, only believe."

How tenderly Christ fosters and encourages a weak faith!

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE BROTHERS.

NOTHING further could be determined on till after the funeral of Geraldine. It was necessary to consult Fanny concerning her own affairs, and to get her, if necessary, to force Philip to submit to a complete investigation. Some men might have rested content if the money had been restored, without caring to inquire too closely beneath the surface; but not Mr. Tabor. He would go back, and go on unravelling everything, till he held the clue to the whole transaction. He could withhold his judgment, and he could hold the most lenient and generous one which the circumstances would admit of; but he must first be clear about these circumstances. There was, therefore, no escape for Philip. He must make up his mind one way or other: and he evidently had done so. Everything that he did had some pointed reference to the close of his connection with Mr. Tabor. In calling attention to the conclusion of each matter that admitted of a speedy settlement, it was as if he said, "This will not require doing again—this has been done by me for the last time."

Philip had also dispatched a letter to Melbourne, offering himself for the vacant position, and also Mr. Tabor knew that Francis had written to Philip, and that Philip had written to Francis; and he hoped that some negotiation was already on foot between the brothers.

Francis had written requesting a meeting with his brother—a very friendly letter—asking Philip to be introduced to his wife, and offering to help him out of the scrape he had got himself into. And Philip had written to Francis a very impatient letter, telling him that there was only one way of helping him, which he had already rejected, and that if he had anything to propose, he (Francis) had better come to him, and not bring a stranger into the matter.

And Francis did come to him. Things were in a great deal too awkward a position for both of them for Francis to stand upon ceremony, or to give way to proud resentment; besides, to these vices he was not much inclined. Those he had a mind to were of quite a different stamp. He arrived at Philip's lodgings before Philip himself, and had an opportunity of inspecting them at his leisure. They evidently filled him with contempt and disgust. How could Philip bear to live in "such a beastly place?" he thought, as he looked at the threadbare carpet, the dingy paper, the mean furniture. Francis prided himself on having nothing mean, or dingy, or threadbare about him. He had never had, and never would have had, let his means have been never so slender. Now that he could afford it he had everything, he flattered himself, in first-rate style, and he was strongly inclined to despise men who had not. All his appointments were perfect—his gloves, his boots, his clothes, his linen, the diamond on his little finger. But on his face, as he stood puffing out his cheeks with contempt at his brother's chosen surroundings, there was marked—there was branded the deterioration of the man—the obliteration of the soul, caused by the vice of self-indulgence.

Francis Tenterden had been a very good-natured youth, and he was a good-natured man—facile and easily led, but dominated above all by an ambition—(or is it not too low for the name?)—by a desire for worldly success. If he had fallen into a fast set, he would have been a fast man, never going too far with his fastness to do injury to his comfort or his credit. But he had fallen into a good set, and his object was to stand well with them. His wife had been one of them, a good and very narrow woman, but narrow rather by training than by nature. She was rich herself, as well as her children, and scrupulously upright, given to taking account of every detail—but with a fixed idea that management on a large scale was not a woman's province. There was nothing to have hindered her from managing her money, herself, and her children, but she chose to give all up into the hands of Francis Tenterden, after what she considered a sufficient examination into his character, which, as she was not exactly in love with him, she had conducted quite fairly. Francis had used his power to all appearance well, and stood there, a thoroughly successful and prosperous man.

But he could not help thinking on the meeting with his brother with some disquietude, while going over in his mind every incident connected with their parting. Far from approving of his brother's conduct at that time, it had only become more and more inexplicable. Far from attempting to justify his own, he did not think it could possibly stand in need of justification.

Before the funeral of Mr. Tenterden his sons had made the discovery, not only that their father was a ruined man who had lost everything of his own, but that every penny of Fanny's fortune was gone also. Her clear six thousand in the funds was represented by shares not worth the paper they were written on, in more than one company which had made ruinous calls upon its shareholders before becoming happily defunct. If Fanny had given her consent to these transactions, which was not apparent, it had clearly been given in utter ignorance—in blinded confidence.

"She must not be allowed to suffer in this way," Philip had said at once, on making the discovery.

And Francis had answered as promptly, "I do not see how we can help it."

The answer was ready: "We can share the loss between us," Philip had said.

"But we have nothing to lose," Francis had replied.

And Philip had answered, "We can charge ourselves with it as a debt."

"And ruin our prospects in life," his brother had cried.

"Retrieve them, you mean," Philip had said scornfully, adding, "it is what our father wished when he was dying. It was what he wanted to say to us, I feel sure." And he did feel sure, remembering his father's hopeless hint of his wish to mate him with poor fortuneless Fanny."

"Of course, I would never see Fanny want," Francis had urged, "but that is a different thing from sacrificing our lives to her."

"Not to her, to our own sense of justice—to our father's honour and our own," Philip had answered hotly. "I will not consent to the robbery of a weakling, an orphan, our father's ward, nor will I ever believe he meant it."

"It is no robbery," Francis had answered," it is a great misfortune. I can't look at things in that high-flown way. I will have nothing to do with it if you go much further."

"I will see that Fanny is paid to the uttermost farthing," Philip had replied obstinately.

"Then I wash my hands of the whole affair," said Francis.

"And I wash my hands of you," was the angry retort.

And Philip had stood firm in his determination, and before the coffin was closed on the day of the funeral, he had gone into the room where it lay and stood before it, with bent head and an exceedingly bitter spirit; and at length he had lifted the shroud, and looking on the face of the dead, had vowed to wipe away the reproach and hide the shame. And as he had stood gazing on the wasted face the bitterness had gone away. "I will do as you wished me to do," he had said aloud, as if he made a promise to the living. It was still more sacred, for it could never be remitted—it was a promise to the dead.

From that day to this the brothers had held no communication whatever on the subject. Philip had taken the burden entirely on his own shoulders, never thinking that, like other burdens, it would get heavier the longer it was borne.

The thing he had taken upon himself was no easy task. It was nothing less than the mortgage of the best years of his life. Philip was then twenty-seven, no mere youth, but a man, with all the hopes of an honourable and ambitious manhood. He had but just tasted of independence, in the shape of a considerable income which had been postponed to the prospect of a partnership in the firm he had entered as an articled clerk ten years before. During those years he had stood very high in the estimation of his employers, who had lately depended much upon his zeal and ability.

His income would be about nine hundred a year, and he lost no time in making his arrangements. Three hundred had he paid to Fanny yearly, an insurance on his life had to be effected, that she might not suffer in the event of his death, and whatever he could save from the remainder must be set aside as the purchase of his freedom. Unless he could accumulate sufficient capital to repay the money which had produced Fanny's income, there was nothing before him but a lifetime of bondage.

He had arranged everything before he allowed himself time to think particularly of the consequences to himself; but when he did look at them, and realise them, there was no harking back in his mind. To him it was the one course possible, and he did not credit himself with any special virtue in pursuing it. He could imagine what it could be to despise himself, and go about for the rest of his life under a burden which could never be lifted—the burden of disgrace; he had imagination enough to realise that in the end even the actual money loss might be the greater.

For two years Philip had rigidly carried out his plan, therefore the dingy lodging, the strict self-denial, the apparent stinginess, of which a nice little mystery had been made. Sometimes he had felt the bondage well-nigh intolerable; at other times he went on hopefully, especially when his exertions in filling the place of Mr. Austin, laid aside by illness, and in the next place Mr. Austin's death, brought him more of the money for which he craved. Money! it meant—what did it not mean for him?—freedom, love, a home, a life redeemed from bondage.

The appearance of Mr. Lovejoy, and a whole race of Lovejoys behind him, Philip had, not unnaturally under the circumstances, hailed with anything but pleasure; but he had hardly foreseen the consequences of their advent. But for them, Philip might have been left to pursue his plan in peace, to lay up from his steadily increasing income a sum sufficient in the course of years to repay the little fortune entrusted to his father, and set him free to live for himself. And now the purpose of his life was frustrated, at least in part—unless, indeed, Francis had relented, and was prepared to do his part, when it might still be possible for him to save his father's memory. He clung to this tenaciously, and was resolved to cling to it to the last. If it damaged his own reputation, he was free to assert his integrity, and to prove it in the end.

At length Philip arrived, and found his brother awaiting him, having had time to refresh his memory of the past, and to review his present position, and to lose his easy good-nature in the process. The first note which Francis struck was a false one, and made a discord. He held out his hand, saying, "Why do you live in such a beastly place? I had the greatest trouble in the world to find you?"

"I am very sorry," returned Philip, dryly, "but I cannot afford a better."

Francis saw his mistake, and retreated from it. "Won't you come and see my wife, Phil?" he said affectionately; "she is very anxious to see you."

"You are married then?"

"You might have seen it in the Times, a year and a half ago," said Francis.

"I must have missed it. I hope you are happy, Frank," and Philip forgetting for a moment that they were at feud, grasped his brother's hand with the old cordial clasp.

It made Francis feel that it was worth some sacrifice to restore that former brotherly cordiality. "I am very happy," he answered; "Rachel is as good as gold, and she brought me plenty of cash, on which I have been flourishing. My only trouble has been the misunderstanding with you."

"And you have come to set it right, I hope," said Philip, brightening.

"I'll do my best," said Francis. His best and Philip's by no means corresponded, however.

"If the money can be replaced," said Philip, "I shall be content. The rest must go. I have made up my mind to leave England. Tabor would never rest satisfied till he got to the bottom of it, and I am as determined that he shall know nothing whatever, unless I am forced to disclose the whole. I shall invest for Fanny every hundred I can get together, and if she will trust me for the rest, all will yet go well."

"I was in hopes you had had enough of such a Quixotic enterprise," exclaimed Francis. "It's like a man trying to swim with a millstone tied round his neck."

Philip retreated coldly. "How far are you prepared to help me?" he asked. "I will accept your help, and leave the discussion of the question."

"Well, it depends," said Francis. "We might offer Fanny a fair compensation."

"I have determined that Fanny shall be paid every farthing," replied Philip; "and I am prepared to carry out that determination."

"How much have you done towards it?" asked his brother.

"I have got together the first thousand," he replied.

"The first thousand!" ejaculated Francis. "At that rate you will have paid up the amount by the time you are about fifty."

"I know it," said Philip, bitterly.

"Come, do be reasonable, and get Fanny to accept a compromise, which she ought to be precious thankful for."

"I hate compromises," said Philip; "a debt is a debt, and no amount of whitewashing can blot out the figures against one."

"My money is my wife's, you know," said Francis, casting about in his mind for reasons wherewith to support his recommendation; "and of course I have no right to spend it carelessly."

"You have no right to spend it at all, I should say," replied Philip; "and after all, Francis, you are poorer than I am."

"Oh, but I have made some of my own besides," he hastened to say; "only, you know, three thousand is a large sum."

"What can you afford then?" said Philip. "I would give much that the story should not come out.

It struck Francis just then that so would he. He would suffer more in the estimation of some who knew him than Philip would. He might not have felt this, but for the contrast between Philip's conduct and his own, which was being forced upon him. What would his wife think, if she knew? She was just like Philip. She had such exaggerated notions. Yes, certainly if Philip was willing to sacrifice himself, it was better that the story should not come out.

"I can give you a thousand," said Francis, moodily. "It seems a large sum to throw away in this fashion."

"And will you lend me as much more as I may require?" asked Philip. "You have only my personal security, but in case of my death you will be repaid in full, and I will pay you any interest you please."

Francis hesitated for a moment, and then said, "Well, I will risk it; but I don't think there ever was such a piece of business as this transacted. And now you will come and see Rachel?"

Philip assented.

"Come now," urged Francis.

And Philip went.

It was not pleasant to Francis Tenterden to throw away his money, as he had said, but it was pleasant to walk once more with Philip in the old brotherly fashion. He had never been quite happy since their quarrel, and he was happy now in spite of those twinges of regret at the price he was paying for it.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. NEW SERIES. No. 12. ANDREW.

Chapters to be read—John i. Matt. iv., x., parts of.

INTRODUCTION. It will be very easy by a few questions to connect this lesson with the last upon John the Baptist. Ask to whom John bore testimony, and to whom was he likely to teach most about Christ. Explain the word "disciple" as meaning a learner and show how it applied to John's disciples.

I. ANDREW'S PERSONAL CALL. (Read John i. 35—42.) Try and make the children realise the scene: John the Baptist standing in the road talking earnestly to two disciples, of whom Andrew was one—Jesus passes by—John points Him out—calls Him the "Lamb of God." His disciples never heard any one called a Lamb before. Full of curiosity, follow Jesus. He turns round—sees them—questions them as to what they want—invites them to visit Him. They go at once, and stay with Him that day. What would Jesus tell them about? Would explain His Divine mission—how He was the Lamb of God, and evidently He asked Andrew to join Him and become His disciple. At last Andrew left. To whom would he go at once with the news? Ask where he lived (ver. 44)? and from the house at Bethsaida being called that of Simon and Andrew, draw the inference that their father was dead, and the two brothers lived and worked together. What did he tell Peter (ver. 41)? Show from this that Andrew was evidently looking for the Messiah, long expected: had learned from John the Baptist and from the Scriptures that Christ was coming—now believes in Him for himself.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Show the children how Andrew believed in and followed Jesus as a living Person. Point out that this is how all must regard Him; that we have not only to be sober, honest, religious, &c., but to realise Christ as a living, loving, Saviour, close to us, ready to hear us and help us and save us. (2) Draw the important lesson of true religion beginning at home.

II. ANDREW'S CALL TO WORK. (Read Matt. iv. 18—20.) After Andrew's first call seems to have resumed ordinary work as fisherman. Show with a map of Palestine the position of the Sea of Galilee, and picture Peter and Andrew, the sturdy fishermen, casting a net. Jesus walking by the sea, calls them, Ask what He told them? Refer to parable of Drawnet (Mathew xiii. 47—50) to show how kingdom of God is like a net: how thoroughly they would understand the meaning. Ask what their ready response showed. Faith in Christ as the Messiah; love to Christ as their new Master; devotion to His service. Refer to Acts ii. 41, to show how Peter caught 3,000 souls in the Gospel net.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Christ's call requires prompt obedience. Remind of Elisha, who at first wanted to turn back. If do not obey His call, perhaps He not call again (Prov. i. 24). He calls us by conscience, by His Word, His ministers, &c. See the blessing of following at once. (2) Christ's call may require us to give up all for Him. Remind of the young man who could not give up possessions, and went away sorrowful. Peter and Andrew gave up all. Did they starve? So have heard of missionaries giving up all—even life—for Christ. Can we give nothing? (3) Christ's call is one to work. No Christian can be idle. See punishment of those who do nothing for Him (Matt. xxv. 35, 36).

III. ANDREW'S PUBLIC CALL. (Read Matt. x. 1—14.) Christ having called the disciples individually, now collects them together to send them out and teach. Ask the name that we now give to such, and explain that the Greek word "apostle" is the same as our word "missionary," and means "one who is sent." Ask (1) their work: to preach repentance, or change of heart and life, like Noah before the Flood, Jonah to Ninevites. (2) Their power to heal the sick and cast out devils. Ask what good this would be, and show that it had the effect of making the people believe their mission. (3) Their support (ver. 9, 10). Why were they to take no money, &c.? What would it teach them? Had they any reason to distrust as yet? Picture the disciples starting forth by twos—probably Peter and Andrew, the two brothers together still. Jesus left alone, probably praying for them. How nervous they would feel at first at leaving Jesus and starting by themselves: how eager they would be: how wonderful to work a miracle: how their faith in Christ would be confirmed.

The only other notices of Andrew individually are in John vi. 8, where he tells our Lord of the barley loaves, and John xii. 22, where he tells Him of the Greeks wishing to see Him. This latter, coupled with his bringing Peter to Christ, may be dwelt upon as the practical lesson of his life—his eagerness to bring others to Christ. For the reward of such, see Dan. xii. 3.

Questions to be answered.

1. Where did Andrew live, and with whom?
2. Name all the occasions on which he is mentioned.
3. How many calls had he? what were the circumstances of each?
4. What are the lessons to be learned from his first call?
5. What are the lessons to be learned from his second call?
6. Explain the words "disciple" and "apostle."

GOING FROM HOME.

SON of my hopes and prayers, go forth,
Thine hour is come; the world is wide,
And east and west, and south and north
Are free for thee to stride.

Elect thy course and forward press,
All earnestness towards the goal;
Sin takes the hand of Idleness,
And soon pollutes the soul.

When, with her dulcet melody
And scented breath, comes loose Delight
To lure thee to her company,
In worldly trappings dight;

Turn from the siren, false as fair;
She woos thee only to betray:
All selfish pleasures lead to care,
Excesses to decay.

Thy fortune, though some deem it small,
Is really large—unsullied name,
Fair store of learning, and withal
A sturdy, healthy frame.

The amplest fortune man can hold
Are these, joined to a trust in God;
Far, far beyond the glitt'ring gold
For which men plot and plod.

Poor is he, though untold his wealth,
Whose soul lies grov'ling in the dust;
Whose mind ne'er knows a day of health,
Whose soul is knit to lust.

And rich is he, however poor,
Whose aim is true, whose faith is great;
Content shall rest beside his door,
Success upon him wait.

THE GRIEFS OF CRIPPLE TOM.

CHAPTER VII.

IT was a dull and cold day in the latter half of November, and Tom was standing just outside his father's cottage palings, with his hands in his pockets, watching three children playing in the middle of the road. Two of them were four or five years old, and the third an infant not yet three. Just then a large four-wheeled dog-cart came along the road at a rapid pace. The driver shouted to the children to get out of the way, and the two elder ones did so, but the youngest one remained sitting in the middle of the road, too much frightened to be able to rise and run. Then the driver attempted to check the horse, but the animal was high-spirited, and could not be stopped, and in another moment it was close upon the child. Tom hobbled across from the paling as soon as he saw that the infant was in danger, but he had only picked it up, and was holding it at arms' length just outside the track of the carriage, when the horse was upon him, and struck him down. The child fell outside of the wheels, but one of them crushed against Tom's chest as he lay on the ground, and, quite insensible, the lad was lifted from among the horse's feet and carried into his father's cottage.

Fortunately the doctor passed through the village shortly afterwards, and he found the kitchen filled with bewildered, sympathising neighbours, and Mrs. Robinson sitting in a corner, sobbing heavily and overcome with grief. After a while the doctor succeeded in restoring the lad to consciousness, and found that one of the horse's feet had struck his head, and that two of his ribs were broken. Beyond that there were no external injuries, but the doctor feared that near the broken ribs some serious internal hurt had been inflicted. All that could be done was to keep the patient quiet, and guard as well as possible against feverishness. The next day Tom seemed better. He breathed with much difficulty, and could take little nourishment; but the blow on the head seemed to have been slighter than had been feared, for his mind was perfectly clear.

On the second day Miss Burton insisted on going out, though she had not gone into the open air since her illness, and it was hardly safe for her to do so. But she felt that she must go and see Tom. When she entered the kitchen she found that his mother had gone out for a little, and that the patient was left to the care of the deaf boy, who was sitting, still pale from his fever, at the foot of his friend's bed. The faces of the two lads lit up with pleasure, as Miss Burton, finding no answer to her knock, peeped in at the half-open door. "Well, Tom," said she, taking a hand of each of them in one of her own, "I'm so glad to see you again. But are you much hurt? Do you feel much pain, my dear lad?"

"No, ma'am, not so much," said the boy, with a pleased smile on his face. The lady got a chair and dusted it, and sat down in front of the bed where she could see both the boys. No one spoke for a little; it seemed so strange to be with them again, in such different circumstances from those in which they had always met hitherto. She thought that it would hurt the sick lad to speak much to him; it was excitement enough for him to receive her visit. But after a few moments she said, "We have all been ill since we last met; my illness was the least, but I felt it so very kind of you both to come to ask for me so often."

Tom looked down, almost ashamed, but surprised and glad that he had pleased his teacher. After a while he said suddenly, "I was at a meetin'—a cottage meetin'—and the man said as we should love God with all our heart and all our mind——"

Then he paused. It was his first attempt to speak out his real feelings to a listening ear, and he hardly began when his courage failed him. Miss Burton had not come with the intention of holding any religious conversation with him; she did not think that his strength was sufficient for it, or that this was the proper time for it; she had merely meant to pay him a kindly visit. But he seemed to wish for it, even to invite it; and these opportunities, she felt, come so seldom, that she might never have another, so she thought she might talk to him very quietly for five minutes. She guessed that Tom wanted to be drawn out, or he would hardly have introduced the subject, so she replied in a low and gentle voice, "Yes; and you love Him, don't you, Tom?"

"No—leastways, I don't know. Sometimes I thinks I does; but mostly it looks as if I didn't care for Him a bit."

"But you love the Lord Jesus, I am sure, Tom. You know He loved you, and died for you. Have you asked Him to forgive you your sins?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Well, you believe that He does forgive you as He promised. He would not break His word, do you think?

"No, He wouldn't."

"And He loves you very, very much. That is the grand thing. Don't you believe that, Tom?"

"Yes; but I don't love Him—not to call love. An' I don't love nobody right, my mother, nor my father, nor you, nor even Jim there. I like you all, but I can't love; I'm not fit. It's like a string was tied tight round my heart, and I can't."

The boy stopped, for he breathed with difficulty; and Miss Burton sat astonished. Had it been granted to this heavy-browed, commonplace, cripple boy to feel that a love was possible, so different in degree that it might be said to be different in kind, from the feeling that usurps its name? She sat still for a minute to give Tom a rest; then she said more quietly than before, "But you love God a little, Tom, don't you?"

"Yes, a little; but not rightly—not as I should."

"Then God is glad to have the little love you can give Him, and one day He will give you more. I am very, very glad you love Him a little, and you must think often of what He has done for you, and how much He loves you, and that will help you. Now I must go, for it will hurt you if I stay longer. But first we will have one minute's prayer together to our Father."

Hardly was the short prayer finished when Mrs. Robinson returned to the cottage, and began to give what promised to be a long and detailed account of the accident, mingled with exclamations of grief; but Miss Burton stopped her, and entreated her in a whisper outside the door not to speak a word in the kitchen that she could help, but to keep her son quiet by every means in her power. Then she left the cottage with a great peace and gladness at her heart. (To be concluded.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

105. "Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst; and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it to His mouth; and when He had received the vinegar, He said, It is finished." What Scripture is here referred to?

106. In which of the Psalms is reference made to synagogues?

107. Name the prophet who foretold the revolt of the ten tribes of Israel.

108. What was enacted by Moses with reference to a dwarf (or one too slender) among the Levites?

109. Where does St. Paul quote the words of the prophet Isaiah—"Who hath believed our report?"

110. "Binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes." On what occasion were these words uttered?

111. In which of the Psalms is the ascension of Christ predicted?

112. Name a few who are mentioned in Scripture as having been devoted to God from their youth.

THE BETROTHAL.

SUMMER night was softly creeping,
Summer winds were falling low,
And the silent birds were sleeping
In the warm hedge-row:
Not a sound was in the larches,
Not a cloud was on the sky,
As beneath the drooping arches
Roamed a maid and I.

Ever as I gazed upon her,
  Love-light shone within her eye;
Shone in truth and shone in honour,
  Shone on me, close by.
And a sob of pain and pleasure
  Mingled, crossed her lip and passed
Up beyond the trembling azure,
  Into heaven at last.

On my arm her fingers quivered,
  To my side her head was pressed,
Yet she prayed to be delivered
  From that peaceful rest.
All the while she struggled vainly,
  Said she little words of ruth,
Yet I still retained, ungainly,
  That dear hand, forsooth.

Then I whispered, speaking lowly,
  "Darling, by all things I hold Sacred to my memory, holy
  In my guarded fold,
Do I swear to love thee very Truly, through all good and ill,
Till the boatman at the ferry
  Sound his whistle shrill."

But no answer floated to me,
  Nay, I even needed none,
For her eyes were flashing through me,
  And our hearts were one.
Not another word between us
  Since has passed, and never may,
Yet I know that summer e'en was
  Our betrothal day.

BURTON WOLLASTON.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER XV.

ABOUT a week passed away, and one warm and sunny afternoon a game at croquet was proposed. Ruth was waiting in the garden for the others to join her, when Maurice stepped out of the studio window and strolled across the lawn.

"What are you doing, Ruth?" he asked.

"Waiting. We are going to play at croquet. Are you coming?"

"I think I must. I am so heartily tired of painting."

Ruth looked up in surprise. "Why, are you not satisfied with your painting?"

"No. I feel inclined to tear it up—I think I shall in desperation."

"Oh! don't do that," exclaimed Ruth, anxiously, for Maurice's manner was almost more alarming than his words.

"It will not matter to you, Ruth," answered Maurice; "you have not looked at it."

"You didn't show it to me," retorted Ruth.

"You haven't been to the studio."

"Because you didn't ask me."

"I didn't know you required an invitation," said Maurice coldly. This time Ruth made no reply. As Maurice stood by the lilac bush, wantonly tearing up the leaves and flowers, he could see Ruth's cheek flush violently; but she sat quite still with her head rather bent down, so that most of her face was hidden. Maurice would not break the long silence that ensued, and he waited in vain for Ruth to do so.

"Here we are at last, and Maude has come with Robert. Isn't it splendid?" said Tina, throwing the croquet balls on the grass. "Now then, Stephen and Robert, choose partners."

"Run in, and fetch your hat, Ruth; it is very hot in the sun," said Stephen.

Ruth rose and walked towards the house, but as Stephen watched her he noticed her slow walk and drooping head. He glanced at Maurice, and said hastily, "What is the matter with Ruth?"

Maurice turned round and watched her till she entered the house. As he looked, a new idea crossed his mind, that made his face relax its stern expression, and he answered, "I will go and see," and followed her, leaving Stephen in perplexity.

When he reached the door, he stood still and looked into the lobby, where Ruth was trying to reach her hat from a high peg. She jumped several times, and endeavoured to knock it down, but could not even touch it. Finding this useless, she turned round to look for a chair to stand on, when she became aware that Maurice was watching her. He saw in an instant that she had been crying, and the smile he wore had something triumphant in it.

"Shall I give you your hat?" he asked.

"No, thank you," answered Ruth, turning quickly away again, and going to fetch a chair that stood at the end of the lobby.

"Am I so much in disgrace that you will not accept a small service from me?" said Maurice, putting it out of her power to refuse, by taking her hat off the peg. "Why are you so cruel?"

Ruth made no answer, and Maurice stood between her and the door, holding her hat behind him.

"Will you give me my hat?" she asked, as calmly as she could.

"If you will forgive me," answered Maurice.

A wild thought passed through Ruth's mind, of going out without it, but in an instant she discarded the idea, for she knew it would excite comment, and she felt even now that she must have been a very long time fetching her hat.

"Maurice, I want my hat; you have no right to keep it."

"Might is right. But you know how you can get it. Is it so very difficult to be friendly towards me?"

"Yes, when you are so—so—ungentlemanly. I must have my hat. You must give it to me," said Ruth, in a tone of passionate entreaty.

"And you must forgive me. Don't you know that you must?" asked Maurice. "If you knew your own power I hardly think you would use it so cruelly. I don't think you mean to be cruel," he added in a lower voice, so earnestly that Ruth felt almost frightened. "Do you? Will you forgive me, Ruth?"

"Yes," whispered Ruth, almost inaudibly. "Please let me go."

Maurice handed Ruth her hat, and she took it from him, and stepped out into the garden, when something made her look up at Maurice, who answered her look with a smile, and said, "Will you come to the studio soon? I shall hardly believe that I am really forgiven unless you give me that proof of it."

"You ought to believe me," answered Ruth, trying to look unembarrassed as they approached the croquet lawn, and wishing Maurice would not bend down to see her face, while everybody seemed looking at them.

"Shall I have to obtain a promise from you by such means as I obtained forgiveness, by force?"

"No, I will come," answered Ruth, taking up a mallet, and appearing very interested in knocking her foot with it, while Maurice seemed equally interested in watching her, until Tina, Robert, and Maude had finished an excited discussion about Stephen's ball. It had been struck by Robert, who wished to croquet it, while Maude, and Tina urged him to take two turns instead.

Stephen himself stood quite still, unconscious of the danger his ball was in. As Maurice and Ruth appeared from the house together, her step having regained its buoyancy, and Maurice talking earnestly and bending down to catch her shyly-spoken answer, Stephen, suddenly awakened to a realisation of the future, and, as he looked, a sharp pain darted through his heart. He was not one to leave the cause of his pain unquestioned, and in an instant the whole truth stood before him, clear as day. The colour left his face, and he pressed his lips together, but stood perfectly motionless, until Susan, running up to him, said breathlessly, "Please, sir, Mr. Ross is very ill; you are wanted to go to him directly."

Stephen threw down his mallet. "Maurice, take my ball for me," he said quickly.

"I am so sorry the doctor had to go," said Ruth while Maurice was playing. "If he does have a spare afternoon he is very often sent for, Tina says."

"Yes, it is a great pity," replied Maude.

"But it is very selfish after all, to think of it in that light, isn't it? Because, of course, if anybody is ill, a game of croquet is very trivial," said Ruth ponderingly.

The early part of the evening slipped away in talking, and when Susan brought the coffee into the drawing-room, Tina expressed her surprise at Stephen's lateness.

"I heard the doctor come in a little while ago, miss."

"I wonder what keeps him in his study then. Ruthie, will you see?"

Ruth scarcely needed to be asked, and in another moment she had left the room. She knocked gently at the study door, but receiving no answer, opened it and walked in. Stephen did not turn round on her entrance; he was seated with his back to the door, his arm on the table, and his head resting on his hand. Ruth touched his arm.

"What a long time you have been away!" she said; "you look so tired—do come into the drawing-room and have something to eat."

"No, no, I can't come, I must be busy," replied Stephen hastily, drawing his chair to the desk as he spoke.

"How is Mr. Ross?" asked Ruth suddenly, thinking something must be the matter from Stephen's unusual manner.

"Much better; I think he will recover."

Ruth stood quite silent for a minute, then she spoke again. "Have you had no dinner?"

"No, but I don't need any, Ruth; I can't spare the time."

"Oh, Dr. Rae! you look so tired! I am sure you must need something to eat. Can't I write some letters for you? Please let me," pleaded Ruth; "you have often said I am a very good secretary."

"I am not going to write letters, and you can't help me now, Ruth," answered Stephen; then looking up, his eyes met hers, looking at him with such a puzzled, wistful expression that he added, "Don't worry yourself about me; go to the drawing-room, you will be missed if you stay away."

She did as he told her, but Stephen saw her wonderment at his apparent wish to be alone. He walked up and down and reproached himself severely, for having given Ruth any indication of his trouble. "She must never guess it; I must appear the same, or it will grieve her," he thought. "I can save her pain at least, and that I will do."

As he walked up and down, Ruth re-entered, carrying a tray, which appeared rather heavy for her. Stephen took it from her and placed it on the table, then turning to her, said, "I don't deserve such thoughtful care, Ruth."

"Oh! Dr. Rae, what do you mean?"

"Didn't I speak brusquely to you, Ruth? yes, and you revenge yourself with attentions that reproach me."

Ruth with tears in her eyes, answered earnestly, "Don't speak like that. You were tired, and I worried you with questions. But I may stay and give you some tea, mayn't I, if I am quiet? And you must take it for my sake."

Stephen yielded, and Ruth, quite happy again, poured out his tea and buttered some toast for him, while Stephen leaned back in his chair watching her intently. When he had finished his tea, he would not let Ruth stay any longer, but she persuaded him to come to the drawing-room if he possibly could.

"I did not know that sending you to ask Stephen to come in would cause such a long absence," said Tina, on Ruth's return; "we have been wanting some music, and have been at a complete stand-still."

"Tina, how absurd!" said Ruth, laughing.

"Not at all. The point is this: I said that Maurice was to begin the music, as he proposed it, and I kindly offered to play his accompaniment, but he declined, saying he would not sing except when you played for him. Of course I feel thoroughly snubbed now."

Ruth made a precipitate retreat to the piano, and, seating herself, remained quite still, until Maurice joined her. Generally Ruth began the symphony of any song she wished Maurice to sing, without asking him what it should be, but to-night she said, "What will you sing?"

The question took away all Maurice's desire to do so at all. Her long absence from the room, and her preoccupied manner on her return irritated him, and after a pause, he answered in a low voice, "I can't sing at all."

"Why not?" asked Ruth, surprised into looking up; "I thought you said you would, if—if I played for you."

"I should not have said that unless I had thought that you would be in the mood. I don't wish to tax you."

Ruth felt hurt and angry. "Maurice seems trying to make himself as disagreeable as possible to-day," she thought as she began to play "Beneath the window, lady bright," the turbulence of the accompaniment being a relief to her feelings. Maurice sang it well, and by the conclusion of the song would have completely recovered his temper, but Ruth left the piano abruptly, and seemed determined to take no part in the music; for she seated herself at Mrs. Rae's feet, and taking up a book, began reading her favourite poems.

Tina was well enough acquainted with Ruth's freaks to know that there would be no use in asking her to sing, and Maude was requested to do so. "I want Ruth to sing," she replied.

"It would be no use to ask her to-night," said Tina; "I can tell she doesn't feel inclined."

"Come and sing a duet then," said Maude; and she and Tina went to the piano. While they were singing, Stephen came into the room, and soon after Maurice, looking at Maude, who was now sitting by the piano alone, saw that she was watching Stephen and Ruth with great interest, while her face wore a smile more serious than amused. Ruth was kneeling by Stephen's chair, talking earnestly, with her book open in her hand. Then she pointed out some passage in the book which Stephen read. Their conversation seemed very engrossing, and Maurice read Maude's thoughts as she watched them. He watched both with a painful interest, wishing, in vain, to quell the feelings which the scene provoked. He suddenly turned to the window, and opening it, walked into the garden.

"I never knew the diabolical side of my nature till now," thought Maurice as he stood by the stream. "I must go away from home soon, and leave them all in peace. Nobody will miss me, except that Ruth will most likely be glad to get rid of me."

Maurice's solitude was broken by the party in the drawing-room, who followed his example, and came out into the moonlit garden, where they remained until the Ashleighs' carriage came; Robert and Maude then departed, and the rest separated for the night. (To be continued.)

EXTRACTS FROM AN EXPOSITOR'S NOTEBOOK.—V.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL COX, NOTTINGHAM, AUTHOR OF "A DAY WITH CHRIST," ETC. ETC.

THE CONVERSION OF NATHANAEL.—II. (John i. 45–51.)

THE Confession of Nathanael, and how it was won (2).—"Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!" exclaimed Jesus, as, led by Philip, Nathanael drew near to Him. Nathanael responds to the gracious salutation with, "Whence knowest Thou me?" And Jesus replies, "Before that Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee." Then follows the confession, "Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God; Thou art the King of Israel."

In Nathanael's response to the salutation of our Lord, we have a fine illustration of true, as distinguished from false, modesty. Jesus had greeted him, with wonder and delight, as a guileless Jacob, a genuine Israelite, as worthy therefore to receive the visions and gifts vouchsafed to his father Israel. And Nathanael does not disclaim the honour; he does not protest that he is unworthy of it. He feels, apparently, that the Rabbi of Nazareth has fairly summed up his spiritual history, that He has expressed his true character in a single phrase. And he does not, as surely false modesty would have done, pretend to put away the honour from him. He tacitly admits the truth of Christ's description. The only thing that puzzles him is how a stranger should know him so well. "Yes, Thou knowest me: but whence knowest Thou me?" And yet, on the other hand, there is a true and unfeigned modesty in this response. His words mean, "Whence knowest thou one so little known, so inconspicuous, so obscure, as I am?" He has but a poor opinion of himself. He is conscious that he has lived a quiet, retired, and meditative life, that he has not attracted the public eye, and has done nothing great enough to attract it; and it perplexes him to meet with One who seems to know him altogether. Moreover, it irks and a little frightens him, I think, to find his inward life laid bare, to stand in the presence of One from whom nothing seems to be hid. He feels that his secret has been read and he shrinks back with a touch of fear from an inspection so searching; not because he has anything to hide, for he is without guile; but because it is as terrible to him to find himself utterly known by One whom he knows not, as it would be to us. One can fancy his recoiling form, and catch the tone of alarm in his voice, as he looks on the Teacher who had read his very heart, and cries, "Whence knowest Thou me?"

To this admission and inquiry our Lord so replies as to deepen the impression He had already made. "Before that Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee." So, then, the eye of the Nazarene had been on him when Philip called him, and when, in answer to the call, he had doubted whether any good thing could come out of Nazareth. Nay, even before Philip called him, before he had so much as heard of this new Rabbi, the eye of Jesus had been upon him. With what deepening wonder must he have listened to such words as these!

What Nathanael had been doing when he was under the fig-tree, we cannot determine, we can only conjecture. But we know that the large and copious foliage of the fig-tree produces a profound shade; and that the Jewish rabbis were accustomed to rise early in the morning, and to seek the shelter of a fig-tree, in whose cool shade they might pray and study the law of God. And therefore we may reasonably infer that the devout Nathanael, on the morning on which he was brought to Christ, had risen betimes and sought the shade of his fig-tree, that he might hold communion with God or meditate on his Word. It may be that here, hidden from the gaze of men, this genuine Israelite had wrestled with God in prayer, and had come forth from the Divine conflict with a spirit more steadfastly sincere. Or it may be that, as he read the Word of promise, the great Hope of the time arose within his heart, that he passionately yearned for the advent of Messiah, and, like aged Simeon, received a promise that "he should not see death till he had seen the Lord's Christ." But whatever the scene that transpired under the solemn shadows of that leafy screen, it was evidently a secret which Nathanael knew to be hidden from every eye but that of God. The Rabbi of Nazareth no sooner hints that he is acquainted with it, no sooner intimates that he could the tale unfold "an if He would" than Nathanael feels that he is in the presence of a more than mortal power, in the presence of One who, like God, has "searched and seen him through." He no longer shrinks back; he bows before the Searcher of hearts, and witnesses the good confession, "Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God; Thou art the King of Israel, and therefore my King, since Thou hast acknowledged me to be an Israelite indeed." He has "come," he has "seen," and he is conquered. He no more debates about Galilee or Jerusalem, Bethlehem or Nazareth. Jesus may be "the son of Joseph;" but He must be "the Son of God." "Rabbi," he cries, "Thou art He whom I have long sought, with prayers and tears known only to Thee. Thou hast been with me, and I knew it not? Thou hast searched and known me. Thou hast compassed all my paths, and been acquainted with all my ways. And now I know Thee, who Thou art: Thou art the Son of God and the King of Israel. Henceforth I will have no King but Thee."

Obviously, Nathanael was moved to the very heart, and to the surrender of his heart; and even we, who are but bystanders, can hardly look on unmoved. In Nathanael's example, we find our duty; and in the wisdom and grace of Him who spake unto Nathanael we find, or may find, a sufficient motive for the discharge of that duty. We, like the son of Tolmai, are bound to surrender ourselves to the Son of God, the King of men. And what will move us to this surrender if the gracious wisdom of Christ will not? From many of the stories related in the Gospels, notably from the story of St. Peter's call, we learn that, as He looked on men, Christ could read the innermost secret of their being, and forecast their future destiny; that, as He turned His glance on this man and that, their whole future shot out in long perspective before His eye, brightening ever toward the eternal day, or sinking toward the Hadean darkness. And now we learn that He, who could forecast the future of men, could also recall the past; that on every countenance on which He looked He could trace and interpret every line inscribed by experience, deciphering every enigma, solving every problem figured thereon by Time. Our present character, our past experience, our future destiny, all are naked and open to Him. Before Him the hidden things of darkness are as the secrecies of light. We cannot hide ourselves from Him under any tree in the garden, however dense its shade. He looks on us, and, lo! He knows us altogether, even to the purpose, passion, desire we most scrupulously conceal. Such wisdom would be dreadful to us were it not in the service of a love most tender and divine. We could not brook the inspection of His eye, were not His eye as quick to discern ought that is good in us, as it was to discover the sincerity of Nathanael, were it not full of pity and love for us, even when, like Nathanael, we question His claim to rule over us. It is this blending of grace with authority which most of all moves and touches us, which constrains us to adopt the confession and prayer, "Thou art God's Son and our King. Thou knowest what we are. Oh, make us what we ought to be!"

(3) The Promise to Nathanael, and what it meant.—When Peter confessed, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," he was rewarded with the promise that he should be one of the rocks on which Christ would found His Church. And the similar confession of Nathanael wins a reward as exactly adapted to his character and desires, as was the promise of Peter to his. "Jesus answered and said unto him, Because I said, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? thou shalt see greater things than these. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man."

This, then, is the promise. Because Nathanael has heard, he has believed. Because he believes, he is to see, and to see greater things than he has heard. He is to see the sacred reality of which his father Jacob's dream was a shadow,—the Son of man, taking the place of the "golden ladder," and all the ministries of heaven passing to and fro upon, or through, Him. And this promise is confirmed with an oath.

Here, for the first time, we hear that solemn Αμην, Αμην, i.e., "Verily, verily," afterward so familiar in the lips of Christ. He does not speak as the prophets spoke. It was for them to say, "Thus saith the Lord." He is the Lord. His royalty of speech betrays Him. He speaks in His own name, and takes the Divine "Verily, I say unto you," upon His lips. Not, I apprehend, that any oath was necessary to ensure Nathanael's faith. He had just listened to words which convinced him that Christ knew and foreknew all things. Nor, indeed, does Christ limit the promise to Nathanael. He passes from the singular, which He had hitherto used, to the plural. His promise runs, not, "I say unto thee," but, "I say unto you." It is a promise to Philip, and Peter, and Andrew, and John, as well as to Nathanael. Nay, it is a promise to all who follow Nathanael into His presence; a promise that, however marvellous the manifestations of His wisdom and grace by which they are brought to put their trust in Christ, they shall see greater and ever greater things, even unto the end. Hence the solemnity of His tone. Because the promise is so great and wide, the Son of God speaks as His Father in heaven had been wont to speak. For when God made promise unto Abraham, and to his seed after him, "He confirmed it by an oath." Men swear "because an oath for confirmation is an end of all strife." And therefore "God willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of His counsel, confirmed it by an oath, saying, "Αμην (verily), blessing, I will bless thee; that by two immutable things" (viz., the promise and the oath) "in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation." Man swears to put an end to the strife of doubt; and therefore God swore. Yet even in condescending to our level, God asserts His native majesty. For "men swear by the greater; but God, because He could swear by no greater, sware by Himself." In like manner Christ condescends to the weakness of our faith, in his Αμην, Αμην. For our stronger consolation, he gives us two immutable things instead of one, an oath as well as a promise. Yet, in stooping to our level that He may anticipate our doubts, He also, like His Father, asserts his Divine Majesty, saying, "Verily, verily, I say unto you," swearing by Himself, because He can swear by no greater.

What, then, is this great promise the immutability of which is so solemnly guaranteed? In so far as it was addressed to Nathanael, no doubt it meant that, for him, the dream of his father Jacob should be fulfilled and surpassed. Because he was a true Israelite, the momentary vision of Jacob was to become to him a sacred and abiding reality. He would thenceforth see, no golden ladder rising for an instant to heaven, with angels ascending and descending upon it, but the Son of God Himself binding heaven and earth together, bringing down to earth the gracious influences of the world unseen and eternal, and lifting the spirits of men into a growing communion with their God and Father. In so far as it pertains to us, and to all who believe in Christ, the promise connects itself with the history of our Lord's baptism in the Jordan and His temptation in the wilderness. It is a pledge that what Christ Himself saw and enjoyed, that we also shall see and enjoy in and through Him. As He came up from the river, the heavens were opened and the Spirit came down and abode with Him. As He issued from His conflict with the tempter in the wilderness, the angels came and ministered unto Him. These were the great spiritual experiences through which the Lord Jesus had passed a few days before He made His promise to Nathanael, and, through Him, to us. And he hastens to use them for our comfort and instruction. We are not to conceive of these wonderful experiences as exceptional, as peculiar to Him. We are to share them with Him, if only we listen to His voice and follow Him. As we follow Him, we too shall walk beneath an opened heaven, and enjoy the gracious ministries of the happy spirits who do always behold the face of our Father who is in heaven, and who are never nearer to Him than when they minister to us. And Christ Himself is to be the medium by which the heavenly ministries come down to us and by which we climb toward heaven. With the eye of faith we are to see that the fleeting vision of an antique age has become a glorious and permanent fact in the new day which the Lord has made. We are to see and know that that fellowship with God, in which our true life consists, broken of old by the sin of man, has been restored by the man Christ Jesus.

This was Christ's first promise to His disciples. How often must they have recalled it as the years passed, leading them through many sorrowful changes and disappointed hopes! How often must the darkness of tribulation have grown luminous to them as with the golden ladder whose top touched the sky, and musical as with the songs of the angels who thronged its shining rounds!

And this is Christ's first promise to us, the promise with which He salutes us as we enroll ourselves among His disciples. If we come, as we come to Him we are at once reunited to the God from whom we had been alienated through sin that was in us, and commence an ascent which will at last conduct us to His presence. And ever thereafter we see more and more clearly that all the revelations of God to men reach us through Christ, and that all the powers and ministries by which we are raised and brought near to God flow to us through Him. Has not the promise been fulfilled? Is it not being fulfilled to-day? Does not the Church, does not the world, owe its best knowledge of God to Christ Jesus the Lord? Is not our only hope of being recreated in the image of Him that created us, and of being made partakers of His rest and glory, the gift of Christ? Which of us does not know and feel that we owe to Him whatever has brought heaven nearer to us, or raised us nearer to heaven? We have seen then, the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of man; and we shall see all things in heaven and in earth reconciled in Him more and more fully, as our faith looks to Him with wider eyes and grasps Him with more steadfast hands. This promise is to us and to our children. Having, therefore, received so great a promise, let us purge ourselves from all soils of the flesh and of the spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

TRUTH WILL OUT.

PHILIP'S next step was to see Fanny, and to overwhelm that unfortunate person with regret and shame.

"I am about to dissolve partnership with Mr. Tabor, and after that to leave England," he began, with the fewest possible preliminaries.

"Dear me!" exclaimed Fanny, astonished and perplexed beyond measure; "you would never do such a thing!" (She did not say which thing.) "I feel as if the world was coming to an end, with one trouble or another."

"Mr. Tabor and I have quarrelled, and I have little choice in the matter," continued Philip. "But what I want to explain to you is, simply, that before I go, your fortune, exactly as your father left it, in Government securities, will be placed in Mr. Tabor's hands. You will then be able to manage it exactly as you please; to take it into your own hands, or to leave it in his; to spend, or to keep it, or to lose it," he ended, grimly. "Do you understand?"

"Yes," murmured Fanny, dolefully, feeling as if she stood upon quicksand.

"You wished for this," said Philip, "did you not?"

"I don't know. I'm sure I never wished you to go away," said Fanny, crying. Her prospects had never seemed so dreary before. It was not such freedom as this she had wished for. "You haven't quarrelled about me, have you? It's not my money that has done it?" she cried.

"Don't trouble yourself about it," he answered coldly; "I don't blame you;" and he did not—he felt her almost beneath blame."

"But, tell me if it is," she urged.

"It is, then," he replied.

"Oh, dear! I would rather have lost it!" she cried, all the kindness of the home of which she had been a member coming back upon her: and Fanny began to sob.

"Nonsense," said Philip; "what is done cannot be undone. But I want you to be firm," he added. "You may do me still greater injury by your distrust of me now. What I want to fix in your mind is that your money is safe, and that you must resist any attempt to force on an inquiry concerning it. You must be content to wait, and you must say so. Surely, Fanny, you have not known me all my life without being able to believe my word! You will not have to wait long. It rests with Mr. Tabor to offer me terms on which I can go out; and with this matter, in the meantime, he must not be allowed to interfere."

"But, can't you give up going away?" sobbed Fanny.

"I have no wish to give it up," he replied, impatient of her interference; and then proceeded to explain to her some details of her income and expenditure, which he had at length to say he would put on paper for her guidance, being perfectly hopeless of her coming to a clear understanding on the subject.

And, indeed, after Philip left her, Fanny's state of haze might well have been felt by a person of far less hazy intellect. She believed Philip because she could not help believing him, and her belief was the natural result of his character on one who knew him so well; but how had she ever come to distrust him? Her distrust had done him serious injury. She wanted to undo what she had done; but, then, what had she done? She could not make it out at all. Her head ached with the effort to get out of the labyrinth in which her thoughts were entangled. She would go to Mr. Tabor that very night, and tell him that, in some inexplicable way, she had done Philip wrong. Perhaps he would be able to set it right.

Philip's next step was to write to Mr. Tabor—they were reduced to writing now—and to beg him to be as speedy as possible in settling the terms of their separation. He also stated that he would be ready to give up to him the control of Fanny's fortune, which he had been enabled to recover.

That same day he wrote to Mrs. Austin, saying that he would be glad to finish the task of looking over her husband's papers, but conveying not the slightest hint of anything being wrong with his affairs.

Now Mrs. Torrance had congratulated herself exceedingly on the clever way in which she had put a stop to the attentions of Mr. Huntingdon. He had never once called since the evening on which Mrs. Torrance had communicated to him that little piece of information concerning her daughter's fortune, nor, though she knew that Ellen had met him at Fanny's, had there been the slightest renewal of those attentions. Nay, for some reason or other, perhaps because of his drawing back so suddenly, Ellen had of late manifestly avoided him. There remained only Philip to be dealt with—by far the most dangerous of the two. Not only had she a conviction that Ellen cared more for him than for Mr. Huntingdon, but she felt that Philip was more strenuous in anything he undertook, and might not readily take a negative answer, unless it was a much stronger one than Ellen was likely to give. Then the loss of income on her marriage was but a very partial loss to him—what she lost, he and Mr. Tabor gained; besides, she also thought that the money argument would have very little weight with him. So she sat, knotting and scheming, and scheming and knotting, through those evenings during which Philip's visits had been postponed, but coming to no conclusion on the matter. Perhaps, when the papers were disposed of, they would meet but seldom after all. Philip was not the only young man, however; the Tabors were constantly having them about. It was very strange, she reflected, how scarce young men were when they were wanted. When her own daughters were growing up, she knew none. All the families she knew had been daughters, daughters—not an eligible young man among them, so that she had had no choice in the matter of sons-in-law. But when they weren't wanted, as in the case of a wealthy young widow, they were sure to come about as thick as bees.

Mrs. Torrance and her daughter sat a good deal in the library now, and being left there alone to her netting and reflections, while Mrs. Austin was in at Fanny's, on the day when Philip was once more expected, she got rather weary of both, and began to look over the papers in the box. Her dutiful daughter had left her keys with her in case she should want anything, and the key of the box was among them. The box lay quite handy at her feet, between the hearthrug and the table, having been placed there by Mrs. Austin's orders, and she got down on her knees and opened it. She might find another packet of love-letters perhaps. But, whatever she might find, it was not her intention to conceal her movements from Ellen. She would tell her all about it when she came in. Perhaps there was nothing that her daughter could not dispose of without Philip's aid. There were the usual bundles of legal-looking papers, of not the slightest interest. Putting these aside, she directed her attention to the letters, and very soon lighted upon one marked "private," which she seized, of course, with interest. There was something quite familiar in the handwriting, which was explained when she glanced at the signature—"Philip Tenterden." She had seen Philip's handwriting. The letter was his. She began to read, and to read with eagerness. She rose to her feet, and became more and more agitated as she went on. Why, the letter was a confession of fraud and of impending ruin! It was dated nearly three years ago—no doubt he had gone on all this time undetected. It was horrible! What a mercy it was that she had thought of looking in that box! If he had found this, he would most certainly have destroyed it. She had been the salvation of Ellen, and she would tell her so. As for poor Fanny, was it not shameful? She had not a penny; and what was to become of her, now that the fellow was found out, it was impossible to say. Having finished the letter, she put it in her pocket, and with these new subjects of thought sat down to await her daughter's return.

"She, too, recognised the handwriting —p. 298.

In less than an hour Ellen returned, coming straight into the library.

"My dear, what a mercy that I thought of looking over those papers!" burst out Mrs. Torrance.

"What papers, mamma?—what is a mercy?" asked Ellen calmly, accustomed to her mother's fashion of breaking intelligence.

"Read that!" replied Mrs. Torrance, producing the letter.

Ellen took it. She, too, recognised the handwriting, but not as Philip's, only as having a great likeness to his—a likeness which often runs in families. She, too, looked at the signature, and read the letter, light breaking on her face, like the clearing of a morning mist, as she read.

Mrs. Torrance would not suffer her to conclude it in peace. "Now, my dear!" she exclaimed, "you see what that man is. If he had laid his hands on that letter, he would have destroyed it—and I can't think what made me open the box; but as I sat looking at it, I seemed to have a feeling that I ought to look inside it. It's always the way with me; I seem to know by instinct when people are not what they seem to be. Now, my dear, that man must be exposed. Leave it to me; I will expose him."

"Expose him, mamma! he is cleared. This is a letter from Mr. Tenterden's father, and explains a great many things."

Mrs. Torrance's countenance fell; but she did not give up her point. "Nobody has known anything about it all this time," she said. "He must have known, and kept it to himself, and acted under false pretences; so he is just as bad."

"This money was lost years ago, mamma. Can't you see that Mr. Tenterden has taken the loss upon himself? It has not affected Fanny's income, and Mr. Tenterden, no doubt, intends that it never should."

"My dear, what nonsense you do talk! as if anybody would do that," said Mrs. Torrance. "You must take the letter at once to Mr. Tabor."

"I cannot act so suddenly, mamma. I must have time to think what is best to be done. Besides, I cannot see Mr. Tabor until the evening now." Ellen held the letter in her hand, and went up to her own room, leaving Mrs. Torrance in a state of extreme exasperation.

When she had shut herself in, she threw herself into a chair, and was conscious of a reflection of herself in a full-length mirror opposite; but it was to her the reflection of another self, so great was the difference between the thoughts of the present and the thoughts of the past—even the past hour. She pitied that old, pale self, as she smiled at it with a curious kind of pity,—that self that seemed to have hardly any reality in it,—whose generous impulses had all been quenched,—who had known no nobleness except what lived in books—this self, which had awakened at the contact with true, living nobleness, was so much keener and sweeter. She sat, with the letter in her hand, and one glove, with the shape of her hand within it, fallen at her feet, catching glimpses of Philip's character and purpose, which gave her a happiness such as she had never tasted before. This was the clue to his self-denial; for this, perhaps, he had given up Lucy Tabor, loving her all the while: he had been sacrificing himself that Fanny might not suffer.

It was her own smiling face and eyes suffused with glad emotion which recalled her to herself, and to the question, what was to be done with the letter? Should she take it to Mr. Tabor? That, for some reason or other, was the very course the writer deprecated.

"Oh, Austin! I shall go mad," it began; and went on in short, disjointed sentences. "I have come here"—it was dated from Brighton—"to escape for a day or two from the people about me—especially from my son. Fanny's money is gone; I used it in speculation, when I was on the brink of ruin, and but for the failure of Smith and Co., might have won everything back. I cannot face Philip, and do not speak to Tabor—at least not yet. If I could only live to work it up again, she should be paid back every penny. The lads are provided for; they might even help me—at least Francis would—Philip, too; but I dare not tell him. He is not so lenient as Francis. I gave you a hint of this; and now you know all. Be merciful, Austin, and help me to begin again, and keep my secret, especially from Philip."

She read the wild appeal again and again before she made up her mind. Her mother found her sitting there an hour after, when she came to beg her to come down to dinner. She found her there, and did not venture to approach the subject with which she was consumed, for Ellen was in a mood she could not understand.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

UNUTTERED.

Mrs. Austin and her mother had finished dining, but were still lingering in the dining-room, when the former said, in a tone as unconcerned as she could command, "Mamma, if Mr. Tenterden comes this evening, I want to speak with him alone."

Mrs. Torrance took alarm. "My dear," she replied, in a tone of mild remonstrance, "had I not better see him instead? I think I ought, certainly."

Ellen thought—certainly not. "I will see him myself, mamma," she answered.

"Now, do be firm, Ellen," Mrs. Torrance ventured to urge; "you know you're not firm, dear; that is the reason I have for wishing to see him myself."

"I do not see what firmness has to do with it, mamma," said Ellen; "Mr. Tenterden deserves the greatest sympathy."

"Sympathy!" exclaimed her mother, thrown completely off her guard. "Really, Ellen, you are too absurd. Who but you could have any sympathy with a set of swindlers?"

"It is quite clear to me," said Ellen, "that Mr. Tenterden has had nothing to do with the loss of Fanny's fortune."

"But his father had, and that is all the same. He must know all about it too; because his father has been dead two or three years, and he has never acknowledged it. Depend upon it he is no better than his father. It's my opinion sons are generally worse than their fathers: very likely he is."

"Mamma," said Ellen quietly, but firmly, "it is not for us to condemn faults and misfortunes in the same breath."

Mrs. Torrance understood the allusion, and was silent. Some of Mr. Torrance's transactions had not been quite clearly defined between these two. She was obliged to acquiesce, too, in her daughter's wish. In her new character of independence she might not be meddled with.

The knocker sounded. Ellen started perceptibly, "That is Mr. Tenterden," she said. "Stay here a little time, it may save him unnecessary pain;" and she stooped and kissed her mother's forehead, in deprecation of her displeasure.

Mrs. Torrance consented sulkily, and determined to stay there till she was sent for. Ellen could never offend her without compunction, whereas to her compunction was unknown.

Philip, for it was he, had entered, and was waiting for Mrs. Austin in the library. "Are you at leisure?" he asked, after the customary greeting.

"I am quite at leisure," she answered. "I was about to write to you, when I received your note."

"Were you?" he answered, somewhat absently; "then I am glad I came: most things are better said than written."

Something of unusual excitement of a grave kind had shown itself in Ellen's manner, and prepared him to some extent for what was to come.

"I do not know," she answered; "I have become acquainted with a private matter which deeply concerns you, and it is of that I wish to speak."

"Mr. Tabor has been consulting you, I presume," he rejoined, "on the subject of our dissolution of partnership."

"No," she replied, quickly; "I have heard nothing of it. I hope it has no connection with this."

"With what?" he asked, abruptly.

"The matter of which I speak is contained in this letter. It was found among my husband's papers, and, unfortunately, not by myself."

She handed him the letter as she spoke, which he took and glanced at, with only too sure an intuition of its contents. He read it, however, before looking up. When he did so, it was to ask, half curiously, half bitterly, "What do you mean to do with this?" and he offered it again to her.

"That is for you to decide," she answered, putting it back, and a little hurt by his manner, which took for granted on her part an utter want of sympathy.

"I should like to know the worst," he said. "Has any one else seen it?"

"My mother," answered Ellen, with a slight flush.

"Everything is against me," he said. "And now, Mrs. Austin, I will explain my share in this miserable business."

"I feel sure," she hastened to say in a voice of deep emotion, "I feel sure that you have no blame in it whatever; and that you have done, and are doing, all in your power to remedy the wrong that has been done."

"I have," he replied, "and it has been made impossible for me to do it in my own way, which was to make up the loss without saying one word about it. You can understand why."

"Yes, indeed," she answered.

"I have done something toward it," he continued; "one thousand pounds I have already invested in Government securities in Fanny's name. But so large a sum cannot be replaced in a moment by a penniless man."

"And her income?" said Ellen.

"That, of course, I paid out of my own. I thought I had met every contingency," he added, making a clean breast of it; "for my life was insured to the full amount in case of my death."

Ellen uttered not a single word, but any one would have thought she was listening, not to a story of defeat, but of victory—a victory, too, in which she triumphed.

"My plan has exploded," he went on; "but my brother has come forward to help me, and I mean to sell my interest in the business for as large a sum as I can, place it to Fanny's account, and emigrate."

Ellen's countenance fell. "Why should you do this?" she asked. "Why not go on as you have been doing? A few years would suffice to pay the debt, and trusted as you are——"

"Am I?" he interrupted, "It has taken me nearly three years to do what I have done, at the same rate it would take me other ten, and already I believe all sorts of rumours are current against me; I can feel them in the air. Even those who have known me all my life have learnt to distrust me. It was bad enough going on with this millstone hung round my neck in secret, but to carry it openly is too much for my philosophy."

"Only your friends would know anything about it," she said.

"Consider what Fanny is," he answered; "and then these new relations of hers, who would have led to this disclosure sooner or later, even if this letter had not been found."

"But your prospects," she said faintly, "you are giving them up."

"They are not brilliant, I think," was his reply.

"And your friends?"—— she faltered.

"Will be quite content to do without me."

"They would stand by you in this matter, I am sure," she rejoined. "There is Mr. Tabor,"—and she hesitated and blushed crimson—"Mr. Tabor and I would do so to any extent."

"Your are very kind. I believe you would," and he gave a wistful look at her which seemed to speak regret and tenderness."

With a sudden impulse she held out her hands to him, no longer looking at him, but standing before him with veiled eyes and downcast face. He understood the action. She had taken her life into her hands, and offered it to him to make up for the world's wrongs. There was no need of words; there was perfect consciousness between them. He understood her, and she knew that he did.

Philip felt the thrill of an emotion very like love. He hesitated in his turn. Neither of them might ever meet their equals again in generosity of spirit. They felt how near they were to each other, how perfect a friendship theirs might be.

And Philip hesitated, but it was only for a moment. Then he took one of the outstretched hands; he took it in both of his caressingly. "What would you think of me," he said, "if you knew that I have been tempted to secure your friendship and your help—to offer you a heart nearly as empty as my purse? Forgive me for a thought so unworthy of you, and believe me, that I shall carry into my banishment the memory of your sweet kindness as my greatest solace; but I can never love you as you deserve to be loved—as I have loved from boyhood."

"IT IS WELL."

AND can we say when troubles sore
Assail the heart, and pierce it more,
Yea, e'en before the pangs are o'er,
That it is well?

When sickness and when sad disease
Destroy our rest and mar our ease,
Can we then feel on bended knees
That it is well?

When disappointment chafes the mind,
When friends once dear become unkind,
When loss of sight has made us blind,
Then is it well?

When those we fondly love are dead,
Their bodies stretched upon the bed,
Can we then say, when life is sped,
That it is well?

Oh yes, if God indeed be near,
There is no cause why we should fear;
His Spirit will both calm and cheer,
And it is well!

In sickness He will make our bed;
In sad bereavement sore bested,
The sorrowing heart when comforted
Will say, 'Tis well!

For blest are they, so speaks His Word,
Who when they die, die in the Lord—
Eternal rest is their reward,
And it is well!

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. No. 13. NEW SERIES. JOHN, THE BELOVED DISCIPLE.

Chapters to be read—parts of Matt. iv., x.; 1 John v.

TO THE TEACHER. As the incidents recorded of St. John are but few, this lesson is intended to set forth the lives and work of the disciples generally, with mention of St. John individually.

I. THE CALL OF A DISCIPLE. (Read Matt. iv. 21, 22.) Ask the children the name and occupation of the first apostle called. Such an event would cause a stir amongst the fishermen of Galilee. Andrew probably returned to his fishing for a time: he was a partner with James and John (See Luke v. 7), so now when Christ called him again, his partners were ready to follow Christ also. See the effect of speaking of Christ to friends. What made them follow Christ? They believed in Him as the expected Messiah (John i. 41), and joined themselves to Him. What good did they get? (1) They learned of Him:

the word "disciple" means a learner. He was always speaking to them of Himself, His work, His kingdom, &c., so as to prepare them to teach the world about Him after His departure. (2) They held communion with Him. For more than three years living with Christ daily they imbibed His Spirit, and by degrees grew like Him. See the difference between the fiery spirit of St. John, wanting to call down fire from heaven (Luke ix. 54), and his tender spirit of love as seen in his Epistles (1 John iii. 14, &c.) (3) They suffered for Him. Thus John's brother James was killed by Herod (Acts xii. 2). John himself with Peter was put in prison (Acts iv. 3; v. 18), and John as an old man was banished from Ephesus, where he lived, to the Island of Patmos, where he wrote the Revelation (Rev. i. 9).

II. THE WORK OF A DISCIPLE. (Read Matt. x. 1—15.) The apostles were sent (1) To bear witness to Christ as man. Ask what was the notion of the expected Messiah—viz., that of a mighty king coming to deliver the Jews from the Romans. Show how Christ always tried to counteract this notion, withdrawing from public notice, not allowing public display towards Him: point out that to His disciples He always called Himself the Son of man; how He lived with them, shared their food, houses, &c., so that they recognised fully His humanity. (2) To bear witness to Christ as God. This by far the most important. So they were told to preach about the kingdom of heaven (Matt. iv. 7); had power to work miracles in Christ's name. Ask for any miracles in which St. John had a share. He with Peter healed a lame man at the gate of the Temple (Acts iii. 4), and with James and Peter was present at the raising of Jairus's daughter, and the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1), on both which occasions Christ especially showed His Divinity by raising the dead, and receiving the testimony of God to Him. Ask how Christ especially showed that he was the Son of God. To what were the apostles above all to bear witness? (Acts i. 22.) Show that others had risen from the dead and died again, such as Lazarus, the widow's son, &c. Two also had ascended to heaven—viz., Enoch and Elijah: but no one except Christ had died, risen, and ascended without dying again; which, therefore, showed His Divinity (Rom. vi. 9). Now read John v. 1—13, to show how St. John in his writings proved Christ to be God, and the importance of believing in Him, because without Him is no life. Ask what Christ is called in the Gospel according to St. John (ch. i. 1—4). and tell the children that this Gospel was written in order to teach especially that Jesus was God.

III. THE CHARACTER OF JOHN. Ask what he was called. How did Christ especially show love to him? Remind how he sat next to Him at the Last Supper (John xxi. 20); how he followed Jesus to the palace of the high priest (John xviii. 15); was alone of all the disciples at the cross, and received the charge to take care of Christ's mother (xix. 25—27); was first of the disciples at the tomb (xx. 4), and first to recognise Christ at the Sea of Galilee (xxi. 7). What does all this show? Love, longing to be near, to hold communion with, to see the last of the one loved. Show how he was honoured; was with Christ at the Transfiguration, the Garden of Gethsemane—was allowed to write the Gospel—outlived all the other apostles, and when banished to Patmos had a glorious revelation of the mysteries of heaven.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. "Will ye also be His disciples?" Then must learn of Him; must attend to instructions; must search the Scriptures; must hold communion with Him. May be called upon to suffer; but this only a proof of love (Heb. xii. 6). Can testify to Christ by example, words, and influence, and will be rewarded by crown of glory.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the call of St. John by Christ.
2. What are the three things required of all disciples?
3. What did the apostles bear witness about Christ?
4. What is St. John called? How did Christ especially honour him?
5. Name any acts of St. John by himself which showed devotion to Christ.
6. How can we be disciples?

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM, AUTHOR OF "WORDS OF HELP," ETC.

ADULTERATION.

"WELL, sir, I don't see the necessity of making a lot of bobbery about a little matter like that. There was chicory in the coffee you bought, and chicory improves coffee, sir! It gives it a fresh edge like. I am sure, sir, some of our people wouldn't enjoy the original article without a little intermixture of the nutritious chicory. You must excuse me, sir, for telling you plainly that there's hardly any coffee sold without it."

"Dear me, Mr. G.! You quite surprise me. I have found some honour in Africa; there the natives do sell honest ivory, for they cannot veneer that; and they sell honest skins, for they cannot damp them, or press them, or put size into them! And these said natives of the bush are supposed to be heathens—poor benighted heathens—ignorant as yet of the pure moralities of Christendom. But, really, Mr. G., chicory is chicory, and coffee is coffee; and if I like the intermixture, I really can buy them separately, and so know what I am about. I have no doubt that good water is not injurious to milk, but I like to pay for the water-rate separately from the milk-can! Where on earth are we to stop, Mr. G., if the chicory argument is accepted as a sound one? If every dealer acts on this principle, then you know Mr. H. may think iron-filings give a 'tone' to tea, and just introduce a few; and Mr. J. may consider butter more cohesive if strengthened with the addition of some clammy composition; and Mr. K. may think it healthier for the human foot to have an intervening space of clippings between two very thin strips of leather which look to me like a strong thick sole to the boot; and Mr. L. may think that mustard by itself is rather too pungent for the digestion, and may introduce into it a large element of flour; and Mr. M. may consider that to put potatoes into bread improves the nutritive properties of the staff of life. Indeed, Mr. G., I cannot see, if this sort of private judgment is to enter into the adulteration of trade commodities, where we are to stop. I have in times past ventured to ask my friend the chemist, 'What is in this pill?' Of course, a pill is, for the most part, an unknown quantity, and the chemist has, in its preparation, a legitimate enough sphere for the introduction of medical varieties. But even he feels it wiser to print the magic words—'Rhubarb, camomile, dandelion, and ginger,' on his delicate little boxes. I admire his plan. I know now the kind of visitors I am introducing into the secret chambers of my constitution. But how can I possibly know what I am eating or drinking, in the present age, unless the milkman will kindly specify qualities; thus—'Chalk, water, brains, milk'? Then the purchase is fair enough. After qualities have been considered, quantities might be taken into consideration, and I might agree as to the modicum of each element in the compound.

"'Ridiculous,' you say; 'as if people who conduct trade have time to consider each man's particular likes and dislikes, or, as a well-known writer would put it, each man's particular vanity! People must take care of themselves, and discover for themselves and then patronise the best place.'

"My dear Mr. G., are you really serious? Has it come to this in a civilised country, that adulteration is part of the science of trade-success, and that actual fraud is elevated to a post of honour in England? God forbid! I can imagine nothing so surely operative in the direction of national decline and dishonour as this. The question of nomenclature lies at the root of our national character for honesty as Englishmen, hide it from ourselves as we may. Like every evil, this one is a leaven which spreads with remarkable swiftness, and the people generally will have to fortify themselves with milk, wine, and tea tasters.

"What is that you say, that 'it is hard enough to get an honest living now, and that it is ungenerous and unfair to expose as fraud that which has become an accepted state of things'? Indeed, then it appears that iniquity, which is really in-equity, has only to become an accepted fact to lose its quality of evil! Where shall we all be landed in regard to morals if this free-and-easy dictum is once admitted as a popular creed? It is surely worth while to see the result of all this. That is apparent enough. Not only in the human world, but in the animal world, we shall come to a pretty pass! A vendor advertises 'pure linseed cake' for cattle-feeding purposes: it is largely purchased, and thousands of beasts are fed with it. Presently there is sickness amongst the fattened cattle; all manner of seeds are found to have been introduced into the feeding-cake, and when the accusation of adulteration is made, 'Oh,' says the vendor, 'we do not mean to say that all the cake is linseed cake, but that what linseed there is in it is pure linseed.'

"O tempora! O mores! What are we coming to, Mr. G.? Beasts are poisoned as well as men by the popularly accepted creed that we must all test for ourselves! We are supposed to be sensible enough to find out what we are really buying.

"'That sort of thing is as old as the hills,' you say. True—so is pestilence, so is poison; but one would really like to know whether antiquity is, after all, a test of preciousness.

"'Never mind,' you say, 'the laws of political economy will settle it all. The awful Nemesis will avenge the wrong, and honest goods will, in the end, oust the adulterated ones.'

"In the end, my friend? Perhaps so; but the end is a long while coming, and before Nemesis avenges the trader, perhaps the law of fever will avenge the buyer! I suppose we most of us believe that an avenging Nemesis will avenge the murderer, that his conscience may possibly, even in the present life, become so hot that he will give himself up to the judgment of human law rather than bear any longer the intolerable misery of an agonised soul. But for all that, we do not decline to do our best to catch and to punish the murderer if we by any possibility can find him. Depend upon it, my dear friend, that laws of political economy can never set aside the God-created laws of right and wrong, and that when we play fast and loose with these we are taking away the pins which hold the tabernacle of society together. There is an amusing proverb which says, 'There is nothing like leather,' and we may give to it this new application. There are some things which are positively unadulterable, although I have shown you that even in making up this said leather into thick-soled boots, there may be an ignoble commingling of thin shavings, brown-paper, and even papier-maché wadding. What we want in this age, Mr. G., is loyalty to truth everywhere, and a national confession and forsakement of our sins. Look at calico for instance. You may buy it apparently firm and thick, and then find that, after you have gone to the expense of shaping and stitching it into garments, it is so doctored and sized that it is flimsy and worthless.

"'The evil,' you say, 'is not so great as it seems, and it is unfair to forget the general honour manifested in trade.'

"Oh! then, Mr. G., you admit the facts I have mentioned, and now you want to ride triumphantly off, and present to me the parting excuse, that it is 'only a thing of degree!' Would you say that of a slight crack in a loosened arch, or a slight leak in the outward-bound steamer? Not you. You would say at once, and rightly so, that cracks and leakages have a tendency to spread, and that precious life would be endangered; and it is just because these evils have such a tendency swiftly to spread through an entire community, that you and I should lift up our voices against them.

"'Mind I don't preach against them,' you say. Indeed! 'The doctrine isn't popular,' you say; 'and people would call it a cold sermon on morality.' Perhaps so; but popular taste is a poor standard, my friend, for any one of the prophets of God. We must not forget that although there may be morality in character without spirituality, there can be no true spirituality without morality, but only a poor gushing sentimentalism, or a cold stiff doctrinalism which will alike leave the conscience untouched, and, as of old, lead us to pass over justice and the love of God.

"Oh! you think that 'if unpopularity won't warn me off, that uselessness will, and that it is idle to try and remedy popular abuses.' Perhaps, so. 'The people will have it so,' you say. Nay nay, my friend, excuse me; not the people—they murmur and bear it, because isolated action is ineffective; but if once the popular conscience is really touched, this vice of adulteration will be as sternly swept away as the West Indian slave trade was, which once found plenty of apologists. If we could all leave off our theological wranglings for a time, and make a united effort to educate the conscience and quicken the sense of eternal right in the hearts of our fellow Englishmen, there would be a noble field of usefulness before us all. What's in a name?—some people say. Much every way, I reply. It may be a very clever French dodge to give some special flavour of essence of veal to any or every dish, and then call a slice of horse a veal-cutlet; but it is a dodge, and nothing more. Besides, we cannot adopt the self-determining policy; we cannot carry, in our limited pocket-room, aquafortis for gold-testing, and milk-testers, and weights and scales, and all the chemical analyses of the laboratory.

"Good-bye, my friend. Thank God, I know that what I have been speaking of is not the practice of all, but only of a few. The great mass of English tradesmen are as pure and high-minded as any men in the world; and so it is that I have reasoned against bringing discredit on a class so honourable. Besides, trade is not the only sphere of adulteration. I know that perfectly well; and we shall never be right in the dear old England that we all love so well, until we not only call a spade a spade, but sell honest and well-tempered iron, and until we adopt those ideas of reality which one or two have done so much, as prophets of the present day, to awaken our sense of the everlasting value of. The law of the land will soon treat adulteration as a crime when the national conscience thinks of it as a vice."

THE GRIEFS OF CRIPPLE TOM.

CHAPTER VIII.

WHEN Miss Burton returned to the rectory she found that the exposure to the raw November air had done her harm, and that she would not be able to leave the house for two or three days. Meanwhile she heard from her uncle, who visited Tom daily, that he was gradually growing weaker, and it was feared that the internal injuries he had received were more serious than had at first been supposed.

"Indeed," said the rector, "I very much fear that he may not recover; he is certainly much weaker than he was three days ago. Perhaps his lungs have been injured."

"Might I ask you, dear uncle, how he seems to feel in his mind? Of course, I do not ask you to repeat anything he may have said to you. Has he any suspicion of——" here Miss Burton's voice failed her for a minute—"of what may happen?"

"I think he does know that his end may be near. He says very little. At times I think him stupid, and at other times I think I have been mistaken in thinking so. But he seems quite at rest in his mind—quite at peace."

Miss Burton would have liked to tell her uncle something of what she knew of Tom's state of mind, but she felt that she could not. How could she tell to another the confidences of a human heart? She merely said that she believed that the lad knew well the foundation of his peace. She longed to see him exceedingly, but at that time she was not allowed to leave her bedroom.

It was a Thursday morning on which she had visited Tom, and on the Thursday following she determined to wrap herself up well, and to venture out to Joe Robinson's cottage. She went very early in the forenoon, and when she arrived there and knocked at the door her heart sank, for the place was very still, and when the door was opened, she saw that Mrs. Robinson's eyes were red with weeping. The curtains of the bed were drawn, and the room was darkened. Tom had died early that morning. At the sight of the lady the poor mother's tears burst out afresh, and sitting down she gave way to her grief, swaying herself backwards and forwards, and moaning piteously. Miss Burton drew a chair to the woman's side, and sitting down beside her, put one of her hands on hers and tried to soothe her. But the grief was too new and too sore to be comforted; and Miss Burton thought that it would be better to sit in silent sympathy beside her now, and come if possible the next day and speak of the place where Tom had gone, and how it was only in love that his Saviour had taken him to be with Himself. So she sat beside the poor woman, listening to her praises of her lost son, and her cries of grief, and saying a kind and comforting word occasionally. At last she felt that she must go, and when she rose, Mrs. Robinson went to the bedside, and pulled aside the curtain. Lucy Burton felt that she could not refuse the mother's evident desire that she would look upon her son, although for her own part she would rather have carried away the remembrance she had of what he was like the week before, as her last look of him.

"About the last thing he said, ma'am," said the poor woman through her tears, "was for you. 'Tell the lady I'm sure I love her.' I was to remember to tell you—'Tell the lady I'm sure I love her.'"

Just then the voices of Mrs. Robinson's sisters, who were coming to be with her in her sorrow, were heard in front of the cottage, and Miss Burton moved towards the door—her heart too full to speak. As she went she turned and took another glance at the quiet face on the pillow. The dull and heavy look, which had never, indeed, left his face, was still there; but his friend knew that now the veil was taken away from his heart—that now he was able to love in return, with something of the tender, unchanging devotion with which he had been loved.

"THY SON LIVETH."

JUST then the shadow of the tomb,
A choking sob, a darkened room;
A little plant, whose trembling spray
Seemed floating on the breeze away;
A cradle, with a ruffled bed;
A fevered hand, a restless head.
Just then a baby's helpless cry,
A marble brow, a shrouded eye;
Just then a rosebud in the dust,
Just then a mother's failing trust.
Just now the curtain's heavy fold
That mother's hand has backward rolled,
And to her own in close embrace
Is pressed the baby's clinging face.
I saw upon his ringlets play
A summer morning's golden ray;
The deepening gloom, the lengthened night,
Have vanished in that sunbeam's light.

A RETROSPECT.

SWATHED in deep bloom upon the lea,
One radiant summer came and went;
One summer's radiant hours we spent
Together on the banks of Dee.

Our perfect love far banished strife,
And joy and beauty filled the land—
I little thought of golden sand
Fast dropping from her glass of life.

We walked among the sheltering firs,
  And saw the hills of purple heath—
  I did not see the hue of death
Slow stealing o'er that smile of hers.

I only dreamt of wealth of life,
  In one bright round of happy love;
  And age that should at last remove
In calm an old man and his wife.

Alas! it is not as I dreamed!
  My waking soul laments the change;
  And all the happy past is strange,
And seems as if it only seemed.

One sweet, short summer come and gone—
  A few brief hours of sunny light
  And joyous heart-bloom—then the night;
And in the night I am alone! J. Hue.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER XVI.

"YOU have no idea, Ruth, how much happier it would make me," said Tina, letting her work fall into her lap, and taking Ruth's hands. They were sitting under one of the willows by the water's edge, shaded from the hot sun by its delicate leaves.

"Of course I should be only too delighted to stay," answered Ruth; "but you talked to papa about a few weeks, and now it is six since I came here, and it will be eight by the time you are married, and then——"

"Now listen to reason, Ruthie. Your papa must know that a certain amount of licence would be taken with such a vague expression as 'a few weeks;' he knows the country air is good for you, and he would quite understand how dreadful it would be for the others if you left directly after my marriage."

"Yes," said Ruth, doubtfully. "The thing is——"

"Wait a minute, I have not done yet, for I will now propose my plan of conduct to you. What should you say to my taking the affair entirely into my own hands, and writing to your papa about it?"

"Oh, Tina!" exclaimed Ruth, "I know your eloquence will quite vanquish him; and there is nobody to whom I would more willingly trust the manage- of any affair like this, where a woman's tact can master the eccentricities of the lords of the creation."

Tina was leaning back in the garden chair, snipping long blades of grass with her scissors, then suddenly rising she said, "How I am dawdling; I must get my work done by the time Robert comes. He is such a tyrant that he likes me to be quite idle when he is here. I shall have to cure him of that bad habit," she added, smiling, as if she thought the process would be a pleasant one.

"Well, I must go in, and I hope my absence will enable you to go on faster," replied Ruth, as she rose, and parting the branches that drooped nearly to the ground, walked away to the house.

Somehow, Tina was in a very idle state that afternoon, for Ruth had not long gone when she relapsed into idleness, and sat lazily watching the rippling water, and the branches dipping in, whenever the wind blew. She was roused from her meditation by Robert's appearance, and she sprang from her seat, exclaiming, "How early you are!"

"What a cruel speech," said Robert.

"Why is it cruel?" asked Tina.

"Because it implies that you were unconscious of the passing of time; a most improper proceeding when you were expecting me."

"No, it was because I was thinking of you so much that I didn't remember you were not with me," answered Tina. "And I was thinking how strange it will be to have any other place than this for a home."

"And do you like strangeness?" asked Robert.

"Yes. But, Robert," said Tina, looking up frankly into his face, "I have a few regrets. I am sorry to leave the dear old home where I have lived all my life. Well, they will miss me. How strange it will be, especially when Maurice goes away."

"Where is he going?" asked Robert, in surprise.

"To different places in England. I think he is going as soon as we are married."

"I thought he would settle down when he returned from Italy, but that journey seems to have made him more restless than ever, don't you think so?"

Tina did not answer immediately, and Robert continued, "He has altered a great deal lately, and I date the change from his return to England, and I can't account for it."

"It is not the travelling that has changed him, Robert," said Tina, sadly. "I have noticed, too, that he is different, but I think I can account for it."

"How?"

"I noticed it first when Ruth came down here, and I soon guessed what it was. But I don't see what should hinder him from telling Ruth he cares for her."

"Are you sure it is that? don't you think he would speak if he loved her?"

"Well, not if there were some real reason against it; but I see no reason now, for I don't think Ruth would say no. Oh, Robert! I wish every one could be as happy as we are!"

Tina wrote to Mr. Leighton that very evening, and her letter was answered speedily and satisfactorily; so Ruth now felt settled for some time to come, much to Tina's relief and her own delight.

Swiftly the week passed away, and brightly shone the sun on Tina's wedding-day. Her marriage was a great event to all the village; for the Ashleighs were the most important family in the neighbourhood, and the Raes were universally beloved. The little ivy-grown church was crowded with people, and many of the villagers stood on each side of the path, to have a good view of the bride as she passed into the church, each hoping for a recognition, and each thinking it likely to be specially favoured with a nod or a smile.

Inside the church, besides other villagers, and farmers' wives and daughters who lived in the vicinity, were many of Dr. Rae's patients, and friends of the Ashleighs and Raes.

There was no long waiting for the bride, during which the imagination could weave many a romantic story about her, and there was no crying nor fainting during the ceremony; but every one agreed that it was the prettiest wedding that ever was seen, and nobody who saw it regretted having come, even though it went off very calmly for such a portentous affair.

The excitement of the day found its vent when Tina left the house, and a shower of old shoes fell on the retreating carriage; Tina looked out of the window, and laughed as Mrs. Rae, in glorious emulation of the rest, flung a shoe to a little distance, though it did not approach the carriage. This caused such a laugh at Mrs. Rae's expense that the little shadow that hung over the party as the carriage rolled away was dispelled; and though all knew how much Tina would be missed, it was impossible to continue gloomy on the day of so happy an event.

Maurice's intention of going away was not forgotten, and two days after Tina's wedding he put it into execution. How long he would remain absent was unknown to himself, and therefore to all. Ruth tried to imagine that she should be glad when he had gone, but when the last few minutes before his departure arrived, she could not deceive herself, though she tried to deceive him.

"Good-bye, mother," said he, kissing Mrs. Rae fondly, as the servant came to say that the trap was at the door.

"We shall hear from you soon, I hope, Maurice," said Mrs. Rae; "and don't get so infatuated with your sketching and your travels as to stay away long."

"No, no, mother," replied Maurice, shaking hands with Ruth, "I will obey you implicitly, in both your wishes, you may rest assured. Good-bye."

Stephen walked to the street door with his brother, and grasping his hand, said gravely, "I am glad you are not going to stay away long, for we shall all miss you, and I believe a short absence will do all that is required."

Maurice sprang into the trap, already speculating on the future with a newly-awakened hope, pondering on Stephen's words with wonderment. Had he meant to convey any hidden meaning, or was it his own fancy that made Maurice perceive one?

Stephen walked round the garden deep in thought. He was not sorry that Maurice had gone away, because he believed his absence would do a great deal to bring about an understanding between him and Ruth.

"How strange it is," thought Stephen, "that Maurice should be so utterly blind to his possession of happiness. To see this suffering and uncertainty makes it harder to bear the knowledge that Ruth can never be mine. If I saw her happy, I could bear my own grief more easily."

As Stephen approached the stream, he heard a sound of sobbing, and saw Ruth lying on the grass, crying as if her heart would break. She heard his footstep and rose hastily to her feet.

"Don't run away from me," exclaimed Stephen, impetuously. "To see you in trouble is pain enough. You used to come to me at one time, Ruth," added he, as he held her hand.

Ruth leaned her head against him caressingly, but she could not speak directly.

"Oh! Dr. Rae," she murmured at last, "I don't want to run away, only—this is different—I can't explain exactly, and you won't ask me, will you?"

"There is no need to ask," ejaculated Stephen; then, as Ruth quickly raised her head and looked wonderingly into his face, their eyes met. "Will you forgive me if I have guessed your secret, my dear?" Stephen asked, recovering himself instantaneously.

At his question Ruth's eyes fell, and the colour rushed over her face and neck. After a pause she faltered, "You will not speak of it any more, will you? for I mean to forget it now, because—Dr. Rae, it is no use to be unhappy."

"No, Ruth, there is no use in it, and there will not be need for long."

"Ah! you must not think too well of me. I will try to be the same, but it is very difficult."

"I must not contradict you, but time may do what I must not," replied Stephen after a pause. He longed to give her the hope that he felt sure was true, but he was not sure that it was best, so, painful as it was, he had to keep silent, and try by other means to make Ruth as happy as it was in his power to make her.

Stephen's time was so much taken up in attending to the needs of others, that he seldom had any to spare for idle reflections of his own. If his face looked a little stern sometimes, and his manner was rather graver and preoccupied, it might be attributed to nothing more than the extreme pressure of business just at this time. There was a good deal of illness about, for the summer was a hot one, and all through July and August there was great want of rain.

With September came cooler weather. This made Ruth feel that she must at last go home, and her departure was fixed for the following week. She must go back to the old life and monotony, leaving behind all her pleasures, and pains which now seemed like pleasures too. (To be continued.)

DAVID'S EARLIER YEARS.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM HANNA, D.D., LL.D., EDINBURGH.

IN the old homestead of Bethlehem a bright-eyed, fair-haired child sits at Jesse's feet, listening intently. The boy is the Benjamin of this household; the last-born in a family of two daughters and eight sons, and so his father has called him David, the beloved—the darling. To his eager listener Jesse is repeating the romantic story of his own grandmother, Ruth. He tells of a household driven away by famine from Bethlehem to the far-off land of Moab; how the father and the two sons died there, and how the widowed mother Naomi spake to her two Moabitish daughters-in-law when she arose to return to her native village, and how one of them, Ruth, said, "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if ought but death part thee and me." And where, the child asks, was that land of Moab from which Ruth came? His father takes him to the hill-top on which Bethlehem stands, and points to the distant line of dusky hills away in the east. And what were the other gods that Ruth gave up? His father tells him of Chemosh, and the gods many and lords many that the blinded nations worshipped. And where were Naomi and Ruth buried? Remembering the reiterated injunction—"These words shall be in thine heart, and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way," his father leads the boy out to the burying-place, discoursing as they go about that one great God, Creator of heaven and earth, whom they alone of all nations worshipped, and who had so wonderfully revealed Himself to their forefathers, especially to Abraham and to Moses. They stand before the tombs of Naomi and Ruth, of Boaz and Obed; and as he stands and gazes on them, David's young heart swells with strong emotion, and he says—"Their people are my people, and their God shall be my God."

The picture fails to convey anything like a full idea of the impression which such a story as that of Ruth, told in the very house she had occupied, overlooking the very corn-fields where she had followed the gleaners, close by the very threshing-floor on which the crisis of the story had occurred,—told by her own grandson, perhaps, in the very words in which he had heard it in his childhood from herself, and told to such a child as David, must have made both upon mind and heart.

There was another grave to which David would be early taken—the tomb of Rachel, close to Bethlehem. And there it would be told him how, from a country much farther off than Moab, Abraham at God's call had gone forth; leaving, like Ruth, home and country, and giving up the "other gods" that "his fathers worshipped." The whole history of the patriarchs would be greedily drunk in; whilst those hills in the south would be pointed to behind which lay Hebron and that cave of Machpelah, in which Abraham and Isaac and Jacob lay buried. Joseph and Egypt; the long captivity and the wonderful deliverance; the Red Sea passage; Sinai and the Law; the march through the great wilderness, in which David's own ancestor Nahshon, the grandfather of Boaz, had borne, as prince of the children of Judah, the standard in the van, ranking in honour next to Moses and to Aaron;—and then, nearer at hand, the troubled times of the Judges; the dagger of Ehud; the song of Deborah and Barak; the trumpets and pitcher-lamps of Gideon; Jotham and his parable; Jephthah and his vow; Samson and those feats of wile and power which there would be old men then living who had witnessed—what rich materials would all these supply for those earliest instructions of his childhood, which fell upon David's wondering ear, and sent home to his heart the one great lesson which they all combined to teach—of faith in Jehovah, only Lord of heaven and earth, peculiarly and sublimely his father's, his country's God.

Deeper, however, than any springing from a mere recital of the history of the past would be the effect upon the impressible spirit of childhood of the events transpiring around. David was born in the midst of that singular revival of the piety and patriotism of the country inaugurated by Samuel.

"And Samuel grew, and the Lord was with him, and did let none of his words fall to the ground.

And all Israel from Dan even to Beersheba knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord." Urged by a voice new to their ears, recognised as one speaking to them from heaven, "the whole house of Israel lamented after the Lord. The children of Israel did put away Baalim and Ashtaroth, and served the Lord only." The idols being cast away, the old worship restored, and the old faith rekindled in that land where piety and patriotism were so singularly interlinked —there awoke in the heart of the people a deep sense of the degradation to which they and their religion had been exposed from the tyranny of the neighbouring heathen tribes. It was one of the first acts of Samuel, as at once prophet and judge, to express and embody this sentiment. The great gathering at Mizpeh, when he cried unto the Lord, and the Lord heard him, and the Philistines were smitten before Israel, and the memorial stone of Eben-ezer was erected, may have happened before David's birth. It was but a single and premature outbreak of a spirit that needed to be sustained, extended, deepened. As a new and powerful instrument for effecting this, Samuel established what have been called the "schools of the prophets." Till after their return from the Babylonish captivity the ancient Jews, like the early Romans, had no public or national schools—properly so called. The primary education of the children, confined almost exclusively to religious instruction, lay in the hands of the parents. And in Jesse's case we may believe that the duty was faithfully and efficiently discharged. The schools which Samuel instituted were companies of youths, who had caught something of the fervour of his own burning zeal, and whom he encouraged to live for longer or shorter periods, in different parts of the country, in close companionship, cultivating music, song, and dance, employing these to stimulate even to the highest pitches of enthusiasm the spirit of loyalty to Jehovah. One of these schools was at Naioth, close to Ramah, within a short distance from Bethlehem. Can we doubt that David visited it and shared occasionally in its exciting exercises? His early fondness for music and for song would be fostered there by those who had carried each art to its highest perfection. Nor was it long till it was generally confessed that among them all his was the harp which gave forth the sweetest melody, and his the ode whose rhythmic words most thrilled the heart. For we may well believe that his first efforts in the way of written and uttered speech and lyric dated from this period.

His boyhood, with all that home and the schools of the prophets had taught him, terminated in his being sent to tend his father's flocks. This shepherd life, with its days of wandering over those hill-tops, from which, on the one side through gorges dark and deep he looked down upon those glittering waters which were backed by the mountains of Moab; and on the other, across the Philistinian plain, caught sight of that great sea, beneath whose waves the sun each day went down—brought him face to face with Nature in many of her different forms and moods, of which marked traces remain in the Psalms. Two things strike us in those which are undoubtedly of David's composition. The imagery in them drawn from the material world is almost exclusively that which the district over which as a shepherd he wandered supplied. No notices of flowery meads or verdant banks, or thick groves with boundless contiguity of shade; but of great mountains, and great deeps, and pastures of the wilderness, and valleys covered with corn, and water-courses, and water-floods, and rocks which are fortresses and high towers. So far as the description of natural scenery given in them is concerned, it is not the expression or reflection of human passion, or human interest in the world without and around him which engages David as it does our modern poets. The one idea of the ever-present, ever-working Jehovah pervades them all. It is His glory that the heavens declare; His handiwork that the earth showeth forth. The darkness is His secret place, the thick clouds of the skies are His pavilion. If the tempest passes by, it is He that is riding upon the wings of the wind. If the thunder roll, it is His voice that speaketh. If the lightnings flash, they are His arrows that are sent out. It is He who by His strength setteth fast the mountains. It is He who visits the earth and waters it, settling its furrows, making it soft with showers, blessing the springing thereof. It is His name which is so excellent in all the earth.

The shepherd period of David's life, which may have occupied from his twelfth to his twentieth year, suffered two memorable interruptions. The first sprung from a visit paid by Samuel to Bethlehem. It was with a heavy heart that the prophet had announced to Saul that the Lord had rejected him. Beneath the stern manner which he assumed when he delivered the Divine message Saul might not have discovered what a tender heart towards him the denouncing prophet bore; but there was an eye that saw into the depths of its pity, and watched its long continuance, and there was a voice that came at length to Samuel, and said, "How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him? fill thine horn with oil, and go, and I will send thee to Jesse the Bethlehemite, for I have provided me a king among his sons." The horn was filled, the road was taken, the village reached, the heifer slain, the elders assembled, and all being ready for the sacrificial feast to commence, Samuel asked Jesse to present to him his sons. One by one they passed before him, but one by one were set aside. "And Samuel said to Jesse, Are here all thy children? And he said, There remaineth yet the youngest, and, behold, he keepeth the sheep. And Samuel said unto Jesse, Send and fetch him; for we will not sit down till he come hither." What must David have thought and felt when the swift messenger found him among the sheep-folds, and told him to come at once, for the great prophet was at Bethlehem, waiting impatiently to see him? At once he started, and in his shepherd's dress, fresh from the hill-side and flushed with the quick movement, David stands before Samuel, "ruddy"—we are told—with hair coloured like Esau's, of red or auburn hue; "of beautiful eyes," bright as those of Rachel, and "goodly to look at;"* graceful in form—modest yet manly in bearing. And the Lord said to Samuel, "Arise and anoint him: for this is he." In silence, all eyes fixed in wonder upon the prophet and the boy, the horn was emptied over David's head. The feast proceeded: at its close Samuel arose and returned to Ramah, and David went back to the sheep-folds. Nothing had been said as to the meaning and object of this singular anointing, neither at the time in the presence of the assembled guests, nor in any private interview afterwards with David, as had been the case with the anointing of Saul. All that David could have known or conjectured was that the aged and honoured servant of Jehovah had in this manner solemnly set him apart for some high office or service. "And from that day forward the Spirit of the Lord came upon him," in form of a quickening, sustaining, elevating consciousness that the great God of heaven and earth had sent him into this world with some special work for him to do therein. It has been said of those who have left the deepest impress of themselves upon the age in which they lived, that they were haunted from boyhood with the impression that they were born to distinction, marked out to do something great upon the earth; the budding impulse of young ambition producing all kinds of restless dissatisfaction and multiplied activities. Not such the spirit that came now upon David; he went back to the guiding and protecting and providing for the flocks entrusted to his care; that was the work God gave him now to do—that and no other, till to some other service he was Divinely called. But what a new dignity was thus thrown over that work! what a new strength given for its discharge!

He had all the physical and moral qualities fitting him to be a good shepherd. "His feet were like hinds' feet, his arms could break a bow of steel." (Ps. xviii. 33, 34). Wise in guidance, powerful in protection, tender in care, he would in any case have done well the shepherd's work. But now the strong conviction fills and animates his spirit that God was with him, ever near him, ready to be to him all, and more than all that he could be to his flock—that the eye of the Eternal was ever on him to direct—those everlasting arms ever around him to uphold and to protect. There came a lion once, and a bear, and took a lamb from the flock. The watchful shepherd saw the savage spring, and heard the piteous cry. He ran and faced the lion, and caught him by the beard, and slew both him and the bear. He had skill enough, courage enough, strength enough to do what few else among all the shepherds of Judea could have done. But he knew whence the skill and the courage and the strength came; he knew, and was ready to acknowledge, that it was the Lord that "delivered him out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear."

The fame of this and other unrecorded deeds had spread abroad—reached even to the court of Saul. Fits of moody madness had come upon the king. The counsel had been given and accepted that he should try the soothing power of the harp. But where was the best minstrel to be found? Then one of the courtiers said, "Behold, I have seen a son of Jesse the Bethlehemite, skilled in playing, and a brave man, and a man of war, eloquent, and a handsome man, and Jehovah is with him."* The youth was sent for—the harp was touched—its melodious sounds accompanied, let us believe, with words of equal sweetness—some pastoral ode, the sounds and words carrying the thoughts and feelings of the poor distracted monarch away to the quiet uplands of Bethlehem, to rest there upon some scene of beauty—some incident of shepherd life. Under the soothing influence the troubled waters were calmed and the evil spirit departed; but only for a time, and so for a season David "went and returned," (1 Sam. xvii. 15)—sent for when the fit came on, returning when his harp had done its work. Saul loved greatly that comely, discreet, gallant youth, whose minstrel skill carried with it such healing power, and would have attached him permanently to his court. And David pitied greatly the sorely-afflicted king, and would have grudged no service that he could render. But a crisis came that woke up the king to effort, and turned into a new channel the tide of David's life.

Burning to avenge their recent defeat at Michmash, the Philistines had gathered all their strength for a fresh invasion of Israel. Saul summoned the tribes to battle. When they met, they found the enemy already encamped on Jewish ground—in Ephes-dammim, not more than a day's march from Bethlehem. In those times campaigns lasted but a few days. Each Hebrew soldier, equipping himself at his own cost, carried with him provisions enough for the short period that the struggle was likely to last. Jesse had sent three of his sons to join the army, and knowing that the two hosts had met, was daily expecting to hear of the battle and its results. But five weeks and more go by, yet no tidings from the camp. Getting impatient, he sends for David and dispatches him with a fresh supply of food to Ephes-dammim. He had four other sons at home; why fix on David for the errand? Perhaps he thought that had he sent any of the elder brothers, they might have been drawn into the ranks, and selected David as the one least likely to be detained. Entrusted with the commission, David hastens to execute it; and sets off from Bethlehem so early in the morning that he reaches the camp at Elah "as the host was going forth to fight." He comes in the very nick of time. An hour later, and he might not have seen Goliath nor heard his impious challenge. A day later, and he might have met his countrymen in inglorious flight. Already it was the fortieth day on which, morning and evening, the Philistine had presented himself, defying the armies of Israel. Who can tell but that this was the last day the challenge was to be given, and who can doubt that if, following their stalwart champion, the Philistines had made the assault that evening, the craven Israelites would have been routed? The scene that followed is told in 1 Sam. xvii. in manner so simple, so natural, so picturesque, that it were vain to try and describe it in other words. Rather let us fix our thoughts upon that feature of David's combat with Goliath which gives it its chief significance. It is easy enough to conceive that at such a sight as met his eye when he joined the army the spirit of such a brave youth as David would be stirred to the intensest indignation, counting it foul scorn that for forty days the best and bravest of his countrymen should cower in such slavish terror before one whose huge bulk and mere brute force might, after all, be his only superiority; who might readily enough fall before the sword of a weaker but more agile and practised hand. At no other prompting than that of his own native courage, he might have resolved to peril life in order to wipe off the disgrace that the unaccepted challenge threw upon all Israel. But it was not mere martial impulse that prompted him to say to Saul, "Let no man's heart here fail; thy servant will go and fight this Philistine." It was no proud reliance on his own skill and strength that inspired the confidence in which this proposal was made. He lets us into the secret of that confidence when he says, "The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion and the paw of the bear, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine, that hath defied the armies of the living God." And when he flung Saul's armour off, and for the shield took his shepherd's staff, and for the sword the sling, it was not alone because he felt that he would fight better with the weapons that he had been most used to, but because a victory won by an unsheathed youth with sling and stone would make it all the more apparent that the victory was of the Lord. It was the practice in those old times, when single combats often took place upon the battle-field and in presence of the opposing hosts, for the champion sent forth on either side before closing with his foe to boast his own individual prowess, and calling upon his gods, denounce their vengeance upon his adversary. So was it with Goliath, as with step of pride and eye of scorn he strode forth, fixed his look upon his puny antagonist, and "cursed him by his gods." David answers, but as we meditate on his words we feel that there is something in them quite different from all like speeches—such as those with which Homer's heroic verses have made us familiar from our childhood. They are not words of boastfulness. It is not because he thinks himself the only man in all that Hebrew host fit for it that he fronts the giant. There was Saul himself, not much less in stature and far more skilled in war than Goliath. There was Jonathan, who not many weeks before had fought with as great odds against him as if he had faced this foe. The king, indeed, might think it did not become him to put such a life as his in jeopardy, and the people, who so lately had rescued Jonathan out of the king's hand, might not allow him to incur this risk. But in that host there were besides many old and fearless warriors, humanly speaking, far better qualified than David. Why is it that while they all shrink, he steps forth so boldly? The writer of the Psalms, with fancy quick enough to picture the whole risk, and with sensibilities alive to all ordinary emotions,—he who was brave enough to confess that he knew well what fear was, and frank enough to say, "What time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee,"—he was not the man to rush on with blinded eye and spirit dead to all feeling but the thirst for strife and victory. It was from quite another source than that from which the bravery of the battle-field is ordinarily drawn, that he drew his strength. It was to quite another quarter than that to which the common soldier looks that he looked for victory. "Thou comest to me," he said to the Philistine, "with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield: but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied. This day will the Lord deliver thee into mine hand, that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

MR. TABOR ENLIGHTENED.

NOW Mr. Tabor had chosen that very evening to confer with Mrs. Austin on the subject of the dissolution of partnership, and he had come in shortly after Philip, and been shown into the dining-room where Mrs. Torrance was.

"Shall I tell Mrs. Austin that you are here, sir?" said the servant, and before the deliberate lawyer had time to reply, Mrs. Torrance answered for him. "I will let Mrs. Austin know, Sarah. She is engaged just at present."

So, she had caught Mr. Tabor in her net, and was determined to hold him there for her own purposes. She was a great believer in the power of the tongue; and being withheld by no feeling of delicacy, she determined to make full use of her opportunity of damaging Philip. So she put on an air of profound anxiety and said, "I am so glad to see you, Mr. Tabor. I don't know when I was ever so glad to see any one. I have been sitting here in the greatest trouble and agitation."

"Indeed," said Mr. Tabor, who indeed looked worn and anxious, as if the troubles of the last few weeks had been too much for him.

"Mr. Tenterden is in the library with Ellen," said Mrs. Torrance, with a mysterious air.

Mr. Tabor coughed to conceal his agitation. He actually trembled as he thought of the encounter, but he only repeated, "Indeed."

Mrs. Torrance went on glibly: "We have found out the most terrible thing against him," she said; "the most dreadful dishonesty."

"I fear that is the right name for it, though one does not like to hear it," he answered.

Mrs. Torrance triumphed visibly. "Yes, it is a shocking thing. It is robbing the fatherless, too, which makes it worse."

Mr. Tabor winced. "Then Mrs. Austin knows already the tidings I came to break to her?" he said.

"Oh yes, she knows of it; only Ellen is so charitable," she answered discontentedly, "that I am afraid she does not look upon it in the proper light, as you do. What step do you think of taking?" she added.

"Mr. Tenterden and I are about to dissolve partnership," said Mr. Tabor, "and the whole of the money is to be replaced. We are very anxious that it should be managed privately. By the way, how did the facts come to your knowledge?" he added.

"By the merest chance," replied Mrs. Torrance. "It came into my mind to look into the last box of Mr. Austin's papers, to see if I could help Ellen with them, and I found a letter there confessing that he had made away with the money in speculation."

"Have you got the letter?" asked Mr. Tabor.

"Ellen has it now. She was bent on showing it to Mr. Tenterden."

"Why should she think it necessary to show him his own letter?" said Mr. Tabor. He was rather afraid of women in such matters, and wished that he had seen Mrs. Austin before the interview which was going forward had taken place.

"It is his father's, you know," explained Mrs. Torrance.

"His father's!" exclaimed Mr. Tabor.

"I wish you would go in and see that he does not come over Ellen with some fine story. I never knew any one so easily gulled."

Like a man in a dream Mr. Tabor rose to his feet. Mrs. Torrance preceded him, anxious, in introducing him, to obtain a glimpse of how matters had been going on in the other room.

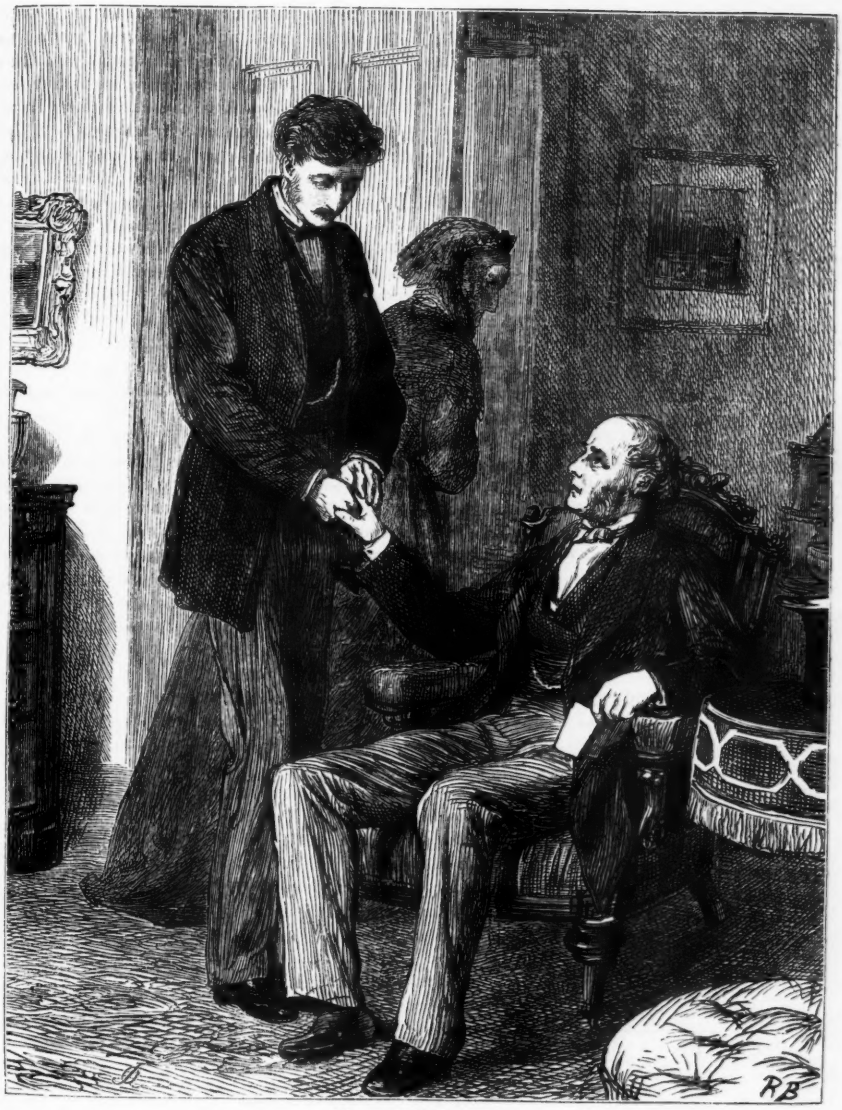
Philip and Mrs. Austin were standing together. He still held her hand. The words we have recorded had just died on his lips as she and Mr. Tabor entered together. An open letter lay on the table beside them.

"Is this the letter?" said Mr. Tabor, advancing without ceremony and pointing to it.

It was Ellen who lifted it and placed it in his hands, with a look at Philip which claimed the doing this as a special favour.

Mr. Tabor took and read it in silence, and then sat down, looking so white and faint, and beginning to breathe so heavily, that Philip began to be alarmed.

"Can I get you anything?" said Ellen, going up to him; and Mrs. Torrance, who had remained a deeply-interested spectator, bustled off for assistance.



"Philip, you have nearly killed me!" said Mr. Tabor. "Why did you allow your obstinate pride to carry you so far as this?"

"Why did you distrust me so readily?" was Philip's retort.

"Because your conduct had become inexplicable. How is it you have managed to conceal the loss from Fanny for so long a time? You must have continued paying her income."

Philip nodded acquiescence. Mrs. Austin added the further particulars of his plan.

"And Francis, what has he done?" said Mr. Tabor; "has he done nothing hitherto?" he asked, a new light breaking in upon his mind.

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"Philip began to be alarmed"—p. 312.

Philip evaded the question slightly, for he answered, "He has promised me a thousand pounds towards the repayment of the debt, and whatever more I am unable to make up before leaving England, he will lend me on my personal security and the insurance."

"Ah!" exclaimed Mr. Tabor, reserving his opinion of Mr. Francis, "we will arrange all that. Forgive me, Philip," and he held out his hand, which the latter took and wrung heartily, a suspicious moisture standing the while in the eyes of both.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

LAKES AND MOUNTAINS.

It was like waking out of an evil dream to Mr. Tabor, to find that Philip was not only blameless, but entitled more than ever to his highest confidence and regard. "You will surely never think of carrying out your scheme of emigration now," he said. But Philip did think of it, and it was not without much persuasion that he was induced to give it up. However, he did give it up, for Mr. Tabor, desiring to place the management of the business entirely in his hands, offered him the most liberal terms—terms which would enable him to replace the lost fortune in far less time than he could hope to do under any other circumstances. He even offered to advance the whole, and make Philip his debtor to any amount required. And this was the solution of his difficulties which Philip at length accepted.

Mr. Tabor also took upon himself the final settlement of the affairs with all whom it concerned. With Albert Lovejoy, whom he confronted with his foolish speeches, and, finding him incorrigibly impertinent, dismissed. With Fanny, who blubbered and blundered over it, and immediately communicated a version of it to Ada, which omitted all that was unfavourable to the memory of Philip's father, and was therefore slightly vague and unsatisfactory. But Fanny would have considered it the grossest treachery to blame the departed Mr. Tenterden. She was certain that if he had lived he could have told them where to find the capital which to her fancy was lying unclaimed in the coffers of some unknown bank.

But there was one to whom the story, when at length it reached her ears, communicated a severe shock, and that was the wife of Francis Tenterden. She had hitherto placed the most implicit confidence and trust in her husband; but it was clear he had not placed the same confidence in her. He had never told her. That would have been pain enough of itself. But she could remember numberless instances in which he had actually deceived her—he who had seemed so frank and open. His very frankness was deceit. So it seemed to her, for in the bitterness of her heart she condemned him without mercy. Deceit was not his fault. His frankness was not assumed: but his judgment was weak and his selfishness was strong, and the latter had triumphed. He had resolved not to divulge the story of his father's disgrace before his marriage, lest a portion of the disgrace should rest upon himself, lest the respectability of his wife and his wife's pious little circle should be offended, and he should lose her; and after his marriage he had found it impossible to confess that he had kept back so much. And now an element of discord was introduced into their lives which had not previously existed. Indeed, it had justly been considered a very happy second marriage, for the self-indulgence which marked the character of Francis had never degenerated into vice. It had not even appeared under its true aspect to the devoted wife, who encouraged it rather than repressed it. But the veil had been rudely torn from her eyes, and she could not help letting him see that it was. He had often allowed her to blame Philip for his unbrotherly conduct, and she now tried ostentatiously to make it up to him by a kindness and tenderness which her husband inwardly resented.

Those gifted with insight sufficient might have seen indications of an unhappy future for the pair, of estrangement and hardening of heart, and deterioration of life, which might even issue in absolute ruin; so subtle are the workings of character and conduct, so surely do they act and react upon each other.

At the first, Lucy Tabor went about quietly glad. "Come and see Mrs. Tabor and Lucy," Mr. Tabor had said to Philip, that first night at Mrs. Austin's, when everything had been made clear; and Philip had followed him into the house and been welcomed with the warmest of welcomes. There was no need for him to keep aloof from Lucy any more, and he did not. Lucy, he thought, would soon be the wife of another, and for his own sake it would be well to establish between them such relations as befitted the fact.

The summer had come, and Lucy was drooping as she had never drooped before. Both father and mother were very tender to her just then—very tender and delicate; but they could not help noticing, though they tried hard not to notice the change in her—how her interest flagged in all the simple innocent things her fresh and busy young life had been so full of. She still played to her father, and sang his favourite songs, but it was an evident effort to her to shake off the listlessness which was upon her. Sometimes, indeed, she would forget herself—or rather forget others, for she was constantly forgetting herself—and then she would sigh heavily, and sweep her hand across her brow in such a weary way.

"She is tired," said Mr. Tabor, on one of these occasions, when she had left the room. "I don't like her being always tired; such weariness is often the precursor of illness."

"She will get over it after a time," replied her mother, soothingly; "she is very brave, and her love for us will help her. You are looking a great deal worse than she is."

And it was true; Mr. Tabor had not recovered from the anxiety he had undergone, and at length he had really to give in. The doctor prescribed entire rest, and release from business for a time, and if possible a change of scene, and Mrs. Tabor took Lucy into her confidence, and formed a very notable scheme for the benefit of both, in which each appeared to be doing everything for the benefit of the other.

Lucy and her father were to go away together. Mrs. Tabor was to remain at home. She knew that if she went, she and her husband would be always together, and Lucy would be only the third, and would mope as much or more than if she were at home. So she said she was too old to leave home for such an excursion as they had planned. Cunning woman, she had planned it all herself, every step of it.

Of course they would alter their plans to suit her. No; she would hear of no alteration whatever.

"You are not too old to enjoy it, Lucy, that I am sure of," said Mr. Tabor.

Mrs. Tabor was privately of opinion that she would enjoy it more than either of them; but she was determined not to be moved.

"You are not older than I am, Mrs. Tabor," said her husband.

"Oh yes, I am ever so much older. You have kept thin and spare; but look at me," and she surveyed her rather portly person derisively. "Where should I be before I got up to the top of Scaffell Pike, I should like to know!"

"You could go up on a pony, mamma," suggested Lucy.

"A nice sight I should be on a pony then, with a mushroom hat on, slipping over the animal's nose at one time, and almost holding on by the tail the next. No, no; you shall take care of papa, child—mind, I trust him to you—and you must write me nice long letters when you come home in the evenings from your excursions. And, papa, you will take her over the very ground we went over on a certain occasion, and lodge in the very same rooms, if you can get them, in the little farmhouse under the hill, near Loughrigg. I shall enjoy seeing it through your eyes again quite as much as if I was there myself."

So Lucy and her father went away together to explore the fair counties of Westmoreland and Cumberland, and they took up their abode, in the first instance, in the very farmhouse at the foot of the hill, which Lucy's mother remembered so well as the scene of her first weeks of wedded happiness. They had the same low-roofed sitting-room, looking out on the old-fashioned garden, gay with roses and sweetwilliams, and scented with thyme and with marjoram, and the same white-curtained, cosy rooms under the eaves, smelling of lavender, and inviting to rest as no luxurious London bedroom ever does.

From this spot, in the very centre of the loveliest scenery of "the Lakes," they made daily excursions in every direction, and Lucy wrote long accounts of them to that plotting little woman at home, who was so exacting with regard to every detail, that Lucy had to lay aside all languor and indifference, and be continually on the alert, in order to satisfy her, and not to bring down upon her own head a shower of notes of interrogation concerning things which she ought to have seen and hadn't.

Lucy was too dutiful—not in the sense of mere submissiveness, but in the sense of having a high ideal of duty, and of the worth of life, to pine a love-sick maiden, and she gladdened her father's heart by her returning gladness; and she did not count that as nothing, as love-sick maidens are wont to do. She counted it much. She did not think there was no more happiness for her in the world. On the contrary, she thought of all the blessings of her lot with thankfulness and gratitude. She knew she could not be unhappy without making others so, therefore she came to the resolution that, God helping her, she would not be unhappy. The beauty around her helped her—was God's help to her. She felt so small a thing up there on some great hillside, with all that lovely world beneath her feet.

They went up Helvellyn, and the highest of the Langdale Peaks, and even mounted hoary Scaffell, where Lucy realised the truth of her mother's description, going up on a stout country pony as far as the pony could go, and then having to take ignominiously to hands and knees. They explored every lake, spending a night at the inn at Keswick, in order to pass a long summer day on Derwentwater, and sit perched half-way up the rocky stair, down which leaps in thunder the fall of Lodore. And they found out wonderful nooks not in the guidebooks, little brawling brooks hidden among elder and mountain ash, and tarns dimpled and smiling, garlanded with water lilies, or black and still in the shadows of the rocks; and they lost themselves, and wandered into wayside cottages, and were regaled with home-baked bread and butter, and tea out of the best china kept for ornament, and laid up stores of pleasant memories for days to come: and in doing this Mr. Tabor forgot that he was ill, which is a more effectual way of getting well than ever was found out by physicians, and is just as good as being well. And Lucy forgot that she was unhappy, which, if not quite so good as being happy, is the next best to it, so that Mrs. Tabor had every reason to be satisfied with the results of her plotting.

Nor did that devoted woman ever once complain of the desperate dulness which settled down on No 2, Park Villas, in their absence; especially when Mrs. Austin and her mother, went to Folkestone for a fortnight, and Fanny and Ada followed. But she was glad enough when her absentees gave signs of returning, when her husband declared himself as well as he ever was in his life, and Lucy, wrote: "Dear mamma, it is very delightful to be here, but I think it will be still more delightful to be at home again. I did not know that I had this thought at the very bottom of my heart till I got up to the top of Scaffell, and stood on the highest point of land in England, and caught a glimpse of the sea. Then I felt that I was not cut out for solitude. I did not know till then how dear that dingy old London was. I should have been glad to have changed into a swallow, 'flying, flying, south,' only to have dropped in upon you all at once."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

BY THE REV. J. D. GEDGE, DIOCESAN INSPECTOR OF SCHOOLS.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 14. ST. PETER. PART I.

Chapters to be read—Parts of Matt. iv., Luke v., John i.

TO THE TEACHER. The life of St. Peter is so full of incidents, that only a few prominent ones can be noticed. There are opportunities for much graphic picturing and pointed application, which should not be lost.

I. PETER AT HOME. (1) His abode. Ask who was first called to be an apostle, and what was the first thing Andrew did after coming to Jesus. Ask where Peter and Andrew lived—first at Bethsaida (John i. 44), then at Capernaum (Mark i. 21). As a countryman, would be despised by Jews of capital—Jerusalem—for manner of speech, &c. (see John vii. 52; Mark xiv. 70). (2) His work. Ask what this was; describe the process. Sometimes with nets (Matt. iv. 18), sometimes with line and hook (Matt. xvii. 27), sometimes out all night unsuccessfully (Luke v. 5), exposed to contrary winds, storms, &c. (Matt. xiv. 24); yet with its pleasures too (see Ps. cvii. 23). So when Christ called him, He told him he should be a fisher still—only of men. (3) His education. An unlearned man (Acts iv. 13), still doubtless versed in the Old Testament as read in the synagogues (Acts xv. 21), took part in the great feasts, joined in the prayers, and listened to the reading in his own synagogue like any Jew. All this work and simple Bible education made him a simple, earnest, zealous man, fit to be trained for the work to which Christ would send him.

II. PETER CALLED BY CHRIST. (1) The first call. (Read John i. 41, 42.) Probably had heard John the Baptist preach about Christ, and been baptised by him; now received by Jesus. What was given him? Ask for other examples of new names given at remarkable periods of life—e.g., Jacob changed to Israel, Saul to Paul, &c. Explain that Cephas and Peter mean the same—viz., a rock. What sort of character would this indicate? (Read Matt. xvi. 18.) Ask the qualities of a stone—hard, enduring. So Peter should be firm and steadfast in faith and work. Was he always so? His natural character earnest, but not steadfast; became so after his fall and conversion. (2) The second call. (Read Matt. iv. 18—20.) Peter and Andrew stayed a while with Jesus, and baptised as John did (John iii. 23), then for a time went back to work. Now wanted again; Jesus calls to leave all and follow Him. What are they to do for Him? How would their work be similar? It would be toilsome, wearisome, dangerous; yet with peculiar joys, successes, pleasures. How would it be different? Work for God, not themselves. So they counted the cost: what they must give up, and what they were to undertake; and decided to come and help Jesus in saving their fellow-men. (3) The third call. (Read Luke v. 1—11.) Picture out the scene. The people crowding round Jesus. Why? because had seen miracles, and wanted to hear the loving words of this new preacher; two boats drawn up on the beach; the fishermen sitting about mending their nets; Jesus gets into one of them belonging to Peter; the boat pushed out; the crowd sitting still on the sands; little children playing with the shingle—perhaps trying to spell out Peter's name on the stern of the boat; Jesus preaching; then asking Peter about his night's success; the command given to let down the net; the result. Now describe Peter's feelings. The sight of Christ's power made him afraid. Why? (a) He felt himself a sinner—he felt in the presence of God. Had before seen Jesus work a miracle for the bridegroom at Cana, but this one for himself; realised fully who Jesus was, and therefore felt his sins. (b) He felt himself unworthy to be a disciple. Perhaps had been too anxious about fishing while Christ was anxious to teach, so asks Christ to choose some other disciple in his place. How was he encouraged? He need not fear, he shall have strength—he shall yet catch men. This renewed call sufficient. Peter's devotion henceforth is complete; he left all and followed Him.

III. PRACTICAL LESSONS. Show how we are called too to give our hearts and energies to Christ's work—i.e., He requires that He shall be first, and the world second in our thoughts. How does He call us? By His word, ministers, teachers, conscience, &c. Do we ever go back? He will call us again, by trials or by blessings; joy and sorrow, both from Him to lead us to Him. He requires whole heart, mind, soul. Shall we give it? Show how His service may sometimes be hard—having to bear ridicule, shame, contempt; yet is easy compared with slavery of sin (Matt. xi. 30), and then there is future blessedness of reward.

The next lesson will speak of Peter as a disciple during Christ's life.

Questions to be answered.

1. Where did Peter live, and what was his occupation?
2. What education had he received?
3. How often was he called? What was given him at his first call?
4. Describe the third call.
5. Why did Peter ask Christ to leave him?
6. What lessons may we learn for ourselves?

OUR AUTOGRAPH-BOOKS.—III.

BY THE HON. MRS. GREENE.

IT will be seen at a glance that the space of a few pages cannot take in on its field all, nor half, nor even a quarter of the great names of our own age. Since the year 1800 dawned we have had giants in every branch of art, literature, and science. We have had statesmen, theologians, lawyers, writers, naturalists, astronomers by the score, and our difficulty is not how to fill our pages, but to compress our matter. We have, therefore, selected the letters most likely to amuse and interest the public, and repressed those (numbers of which must be in every collector's volumes) which bear on dry matters of business, courtesy, or patronage, together with not a few interesting in themselves, but bearing in the corner the word "private," and containing records of family hopes, feuds, or fears, into which we scarcely look ourselves, and therefore, both of necessity and justice, hold sacred from the publicity of print. This will account for many omissions, and especially among our more modern celebrities, as we would not willingly cause pain or unpleasantness in the minds of persons now living who claim kindred with the great, the wise, and the brave, who have gone to the grave perhaps within the limits of only a few years, or even a shorter period.

We begin this article, therefore, with the well-known name of Dr. Parr, whose memory can scarcely be rendered more extraordinary and eccentric at our hands than it was at his own. A wonderful genius was he, rushing up into the zenith of literature like a rocket, blazing, crackling, spitting, making a furious noise, and then falling back to every-day earth in a few bright sparks, which died out one by one, and left the memory of the man more astonishing than the works which emanated from his mind. His letters will show an entire satisfaction with his own powers of eloquent writing and epigrammatic style. He must have been a most amusing and rare study, though scarcely an agreeable every-day companion. In his domestic relations he was not altogether happy. Moore relates an amusing incident in his home life, in which he is represented to have cut the throat of his first wife's picture one day when she had irritated him very much by destroying his favourite cat. This same wife summed up her husband's character very cleverly, as having been "born in a whirlwind and bred in a tempest."

He had a passion for composing epitaphs on his departed friends, and even went so far once as to make this offer of friendship to a living nobleman younger than himself, and who was still in the possession of the blessing of good health. It was at a dinner at which he and Lord Erskine had been guests, and the latter had been amusing and brilliant in his sallies. "My lord," cried Dr. Parr, in an ecstasy, "I mean to write your epitaph;" on which Lord Erskine with great wit and promptitude replied, "Dr. Parr, it is a temptation to commit suicide."

Dr. Parr was also an inveterate smoker and bon-vivant; his motto was, "No pipe, no Parr;" and the letters which we copy from our autograph-books add another testimony to his love of good cheer.

"May it please your Ladyship to accept the tribute of my best thanks for the present of a gorgeous cake, which does equal honour to your country and to your taste. It reached me last night. It seized the admiration of my wife and two Oxford friends. They gazed upon its magnitude. They eulogized the colouring and the guilding (sic) of the figures with raptures. They listened gladly to the tales which I told them about the beautiful, ingenious, and Noble Donor. I perceive that your Ladyship's gift was sent by the Crown Prince Coach, which I had pointed out, and upon which I depend chiefly. My wife and my cook and her auxiliary are waiting with some anxiety for a magnificent Turbot with which Lord B—— intends to decorate the banquet. You may be sure that grateful and honourable mention of your names will be made in our Toasts. I shall write to Lord B—— when I know the fate of the Fish. As it did not come by the Crown Prince, possibly it may be conveyed by the mail which passes my door about Nine, or by the Liverpool, which passes about the middle of the day. My village peal of Eight Bells is ringing merrily, and I wish that you and Lord B—— were here the witnesses of their musick. I probably shall visit the capital in the spring, and with the permission of your Ladyship I shall pay my personal compliments to you. I have the honour to be with the greatest respect, your Ladyship's faithful well-wisher and much obliged, humble servant, "S. PARR.

"Hatton, Jan. 26, 1822."

"Hatton, Jan, 27, 1822.

"INGENIOUS AND HONOURED LADY B——, Accept my praise as a critic and my best thanks as a well-wisher for the honour which you have done me in sending me a most elegant poetical congratulation on the return of the anniversary of my birthday. I have ventured to impress three kisses upon the precious communication, and I will order it to be preserved among my papers as a memorial of your ladyship's taste and courtesy. The cake, from its magnitude and its richness, would have adorned the table of a Cardinal. Be assured that not only was your name pronounced in the second Toast with that of the Duke of Sussex and some other contributors to our dainties, but that I took an opportunity to speak about the gracefulness of your person and the lustre of your talents. I hope that in the spring we shall meet together and talk upon many interesting subjects which must present themselves to our minds. Soon after the conclusion of my first letter another coach brought me Lord B——'s magnificent Turbot, and a very eminent scholar bestowed a classical Eulogium on the 'Spatium admirabile Rhombi.' Lord B—— will tell you that the expression occurs in the 4th Satire of Juvenal, and if you have a translation, pray amuse yourself with an account of Domitian's feast, and his guests, and his wicked nature, when a huge fish had been presented to him, and he had summoned his trembling companions to the Banquet. I am sure that Lord B—— would like to assist his memory, and after certain military outrages at Manchester, Hyde Park Corner, and Kensington, I shall applaud his Lordship for committing to memory the whole 16th Satire of Juvenal.

"Dear Madam, your faithful well-wisher and respectful obedient Servant, "S. PARR."

Perhaps the most suitable autograph to follow in the trail of Dr. Parr will be that of Joseph Jekyll, the famous wit and coiner of bon-mots, with which he delighted his brother barristers, and by means of which he gained entrance into the most brilliant circles of London society. The following extracts from a letter of his afford a characteristic specimen of his style and talents.

"How kind and considerate to launch a letter from the prettiest main potelée in the world, to relieve the monotony of a chateau by 'Quips and Cranks' as interesting as the 'wreathed smiles.' Yet I have as many agremens here as content me. A good library, far niente, total uncontrol, and daily gratitude to William Rufus for the drives he left me in the New Forest. We had at the Bar a learned person whose legs and arms were so long as to afford him the title of Frog Morgan. In the course of an argument he spoke of our natural enemies the French, and Erskine, in reply, complimented him on an expression so personally appropriate. We breathe here an imperial atmosphere; one queen sailed away, and the embryo of another reigns in the Isle of Wight, who endures royal salutes from a Yacht Club every half-hour. The French Admiral Mackaw squalled horribly at Cherbourg when he found himself invaded by a squadron of Cowes. They have swamped the pretty town of Southampton with a new Pier, though they had Lord ——, an old Irish Peer, residing there, whom they might have repaired for the purpose. Sydney Smith was asked what penalty the Court of Aldermen could inflict on Donkey for bringing them into contempt by his late escapade: he said, 'Melted butter with his turbot for a twelvemonth instead of lobster sauce.' I was asked gravely if Quinine was invented by Dr. Quin.

"Paulton, Romsey, Totally yours,
"Sept. 19, 1833." "JOSEPH JEKYLL."

Let us now turn to a mind less witty, more poetical, and yet containing a germ of the same self-arrogance and eccentricity, Walter Savage Landor. His life has been so lately written by one of the cleverest and most admired biographers of our day that we need enter into no details; but the extract from a letter of his, which we now copy from our autograph-volumes, furnishes a rather interesting specimen of his opinion of other authors, while it affords another proof of his somewhat overweening ideas of his own powers as a writer.

"Mr. Brown accompanied poor Keats on a visit to Wordsworth. Keats read to him a part of his 'Endymion,' in which I think he told me there is a Hymn to Pan. Wordsworth looked red, then grave, and said at last, 'A pretty piece of Paganism.' This reminds me of Kenyon's question to Robinson. 'Did you ever—you who have travelled with him for months together—did you ever hear him speak favourably of any author whatsoever?' Robinson's reply was, 'He certainly is not given to the laudatory.' He well deserves the flagellation I have given him for his impudence in regard to Southey; but, to make amends, if ever he writes five such things as you will find at the end of my volume, I will give him as many hundred pounds. I will now publish nothing more for the remainder of my life. The little I have to say on this subject, I say in a few lines to good Southey which I prefix to the five Dramatic Scenes. "I am, ever your very obliged and sincere,
"W. S. LANDOR."

PRESENT PAIN FUTURE GAIN.

IN THREE PARTS.

PART I.

"I HATE lessons, they're perfectly horrid!" exclaimed Lilian Watson, peevishly, after having failed the third time in an attempt to say a by no means difficult portion of English history.

"If you were to apply yourself more to them, you would find them easier and like them better," said Miss Banks, the governess, looking up from her work of correcting an exercise.

"But I can't apply myself," rejoined Lilian; "I'm not clever like Bertie."

"Cleverness has nothing to do with it," joined in Bertie. "You're suffering from a fit of laziness, Lily, and in your present frame of mind, you prefer anything to the 'present pain.'"

"There, there, do stop," cried Lilian, impatiently, "you are always throwing that in my teeth. I hate that horrible motto; I can't think whatever made mamma stick up such a nasty thing in the schoolroom. Learning when you feel inclined is much the best way, I'm sure. I can learn a lesson in no time if I'm in the cue for it, but if I'm not I can't learn at all, try as hard as I will."

"Fetch your portfolio, Lilian," said Miss Banks; "you may leave your lesson for the present."

"Drawing," pouted Lilian. "I can't bear drawing. I know I shall never be able to draw a straight line."

"Please, Lilian, don't shake," asked Bertie, after a few minutes' silence.

"I can't help it," replied Lilian; "it's rubbing out shakes the table."

"Then you've been rubbing out all the time," rejoined Bertie, laughing.

"I know I have," she replied; "I'm rubbing out what I drew yesterday."

Bertie looked up at Miss Banks. "Let her go and practise," he asked, and Miss Banks, knowing Lilian of old, judged it the best thing to do.

Lilian was only too glad to escape, music being the only study of which she seemed really fond, and presently the sound of "The Harmonious Blacksmith" came faintly to the two pairs of ears in the schoolroom from a distant part of the house.

"What a dunce Lily will grow up," said Bertie, thoughtfully, without looking up from his drawing.

"I am afraid so," replied Miss Banks; "she is so full of health and spirits that she hates restraint, and is never happy except when romping about."

"And I am so deveid of both that I can take no pleasure in any other pursuit but study," rejoined Bertie, somewhat sadly.

"Ah, but does it not yield you as keen a pleasure as other boys find in their games and their idleness, besides being something laid up for the future?" replied Miss Banks, glancing at the illuminated motto over the mantelpiece.

"I know what you are thinking," said Bertie, following the direction of her eyes; "and I think you are right. If I turn it to good account, my present pain may be my future gain, I suppose. If I had been strong and well like other boys, intellectual pursuits would not have had the interest for me they now possess. But, Miss Banks, I am quite frightened when I think of all there is for me to learn, before I can know as much as those who have gone before have already discovered on any one subject. I think what Petrarch says about riches applies equally to knowledge. He says they are of such a nature that the more you gain, the more the thirst for them increases; and so there is the greater room for poverty, and that's just what I feel."

"When did you read Petrarch?" asked Miss Banks.

"I have his Life and Letters up-stairs, and the book is so interesting, but, unfortunately, I cannot read his works," replied Bertie. "That is such a disappointment. When I am reading his Life I long so to be able to judge of him by his own writings, but that will be beyond me for many a long year," he added with a sigh as he gathered up his drawing materials, for the clock was striking one, and Miss Banks was preparing to leave the schoolroom.

Bertram Watson has, by his conversation with his governess, shown you better than I could have done the bent of his disposition; that he was a very delicate boy, one glance at his thin white face would plainly show; that he was a clever one, the same glance would equally well discover; that he was a studious one, no one who spoke with him for five minutes together could fail to know. His books were to him a keener source of delight than cricket and football to other boys; and already, though only fourteen, he possessed an amount of knowledge and a keen appreciation of the intellectual and beautiful that was as far beyond his years as it was rare.

His sister Lilian was in these respects as exact a contrast to her brother as could well be found. Books were her aversion, every kind of study a bore; romping her chief delight. She was indolent and self-willed, yet neither stupid nor ill-natured. Among her play-mates she was always a favourite, and by the little ones in the nursery her coming was hailed with delight, because of her boisterous merriment and cheerful good-nature; but, as Bertie said, she stood a fair chance of growing up a dreadful dunce.

A few weeks after our story opens Bertie and Lilian received a startling piece of intelligence. They had an uncle Barnard, an engineer, who was greatly mixed up with railways, and was in consequence a great traveller. He had just undertaken the superintendence of a new line in Italy. In all probability the undertaking, being a very vast one, might take some years to accomplish, therefore there was nothing for it but to break up the English home and remake an Italian one.

Now Aunt Barnard was very fond of children, and having none of her own she was in the habit of running away with one of her little nieces or nephews, and keeping the child with her until Mrs. Watson insisted upon having it back. So this notion of going so far away was rather a dismal one to her, for there she would have no little children with whom she could run away. But at the last moment a brilliant idea occurred to her, and this was that she might adopt for a time, at least, one of her sister's children and take him or her with her to Italy. She mooted the idea to Mr. and Mrs. Watson, who, at first utterly rejected the idea of parting for so long a time with one of their family, but when Aunt Barnard urged so eloquently her own loneliness, and the immense advantage such an opportunity of travel would afford, they at length reluctantly consented to spare one of their two eldest children.

The difficulty now was to decide which. Mr. Watson thought it would be a rare chance for Bertram to pursue with advantage the studies to which he was so attached, and to gain an invaluable acquaintance with the wonderful works of art, which at so great a distance his soul revelled in and loved. The boy himself was almost wild at the prospect of visiting that wonderful land of poetry and romance, and having as it were a royal road opened to him of attaining his ambitious desire of reading Petrarch and Dante in their beautiful native tongue; but his mother, while acknowledging how great and rare the chance, was filled with dismay and grief at the idea of losing sight of her invalid child. "He is so delicate," she said, "that I fear the fatigue of travelling might be too much for him. I have watched him from his cradle, and know better than any one else how to guard against the fits of depression and ill-health to which he is so subject."

Mr. Watson represented that the change might be of bodily as well as mental benefit to Bertram, but the boy's mother knew that sympathy and appreciation were absolutely necessary to his sensitive nature, and these, in the true sense of their meaning, he would assuredly never gain from good-natured, matter-of-fact Aunt and Uncle Barnard. She knew, too, full well that with Bertie mind and body were so intimately connected that what affected the one must of necessity influence the other. For these reasons, as well as the motherly yearning to be always near the child who held but so frail a tenure of life, Mrs. Watson was fain to keep him at her side and let Lilian accompany her aunt. Bertram was terribly disappointed at this suggestion. The bare thought of visiting the glorious city which still bore indelible marks of the wonderful genius to which it had given birth opened up to him a new and delightful vista of beauties of art and learning to revel in. His mother therefore, seeing how much his heart was set upon going, at last gave her reluctant consent to a plan of Uncle Barnard's, that whoever should draw him the most faithful representation of the pretty house and grounds in which they lived should be the one to accompany the travellers.

Lilian, who was a year older than Bertram, could draw very well indeed when, as she herself said, she felt inclined. Now, as she was very fond of Aunt Barnard, and was delighted at the notion of travelling about and seeing all sorts of strange things, besides getting off no end of lessons, she determined to do her best.

"I have made up my mind to go," she said to Bertram, "and you will see what I can do when I try."

"And thoroughly you will appreciate the genius-laden atmosphere with which you will be surrounded, my romp-loving sister," replied Bertram. "I also have determined to go, and you shall see what I can do."

"Suppose neither is better than the other?" suggested Lilian.

"We had better leave discussing such an event till it occurs," rejoined Bertram, with the most perfect good-temper, for though they were both much interested in the result of the test Uncle Barnard had proposed, they were far too affectionate to feel any ill-will in the matter, and either was prepared to take defeat as kindly, so far as their brotherly or sisterly feeling was concerned, as victory.

SPRING FLOWERS.

DEAR flowers of spring,
To me you bring
Bright places far away;
Green lanes I see,
Where bird and bee
Make music all the day.

By wood and stream
I muse and dream,
And read as in a book
The welcome sign
Of love divine
In many a fairy nook.

Oh, gentle flowers,
Oh, golden hours,
When Life was in its spring,
And love's delight
Came warm and bright
On Hope's celestial wing:

Each tiny grief
Was then as brief
As short-lived, flowers, as you;
As quickly sped
The tears we shed
As trembling drops of dew.

As never more
From Nature's store
Spring's firstlings shall depart,
So still shall blow,
Where'er we go,
The spring flowers of the heart.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER XVII.

ONE evening, on entering the house, Dr. Rae was met by Ruth in the hall.

"Mrs. Rae doesn't feel well, she has gone to bed; will you go and see her?" said Ruth.

Stephen ran up-stairs, and Ruth waited for him in the study. A few minutes passed without his returning; Ruth began to wonder, and went to look for him in the other rooms, but did not find him. He was away so long that she felt uneasy, and listened anxiously for his footsteps. At last he came.

"What is the matter with her, Dr. Rae?"

"I hardly know yet; she seems very unwell."

"Do you think she is going to be very ill?" asked Ruth, anxiously.

"I hope not, Ruth; you must not worry yourself now. It is late; you had better get to bed."

"Can I do nothing?"

"Nothing, except please me by doing as I wish," answered Stephen, smiling.

"Do you think she will be better to-morrow?"

"It is not likely, but, Ruth," said Stephen, taking her hands, "I can see you are anxious; there is no need to feel so at present. Now I wish you not only to go to bed, but to go to sleep too, do you understand?"

"Yes. You will promise that if I am wanted I shall be called. If Mrs. Rae will ring her bell I am sure to hear it."

"Very well, I promise that."

Ruth was satisfied, and went to bed. Susan called her at the usual time, and Ruth, sitting up in bed, directly asked how Mrs. Rae was.

"Oh! Miss Ruth, she's very ill, the doctor's been up with her all night, and now he's writing to Miss Tina and Mr. Maurice."

"Why wasn't I called?" exclaimed Ruth; "Dr. Rae promised I should be if I were wanted; I had no idea he was going to sit up."

Hastily she dressed herself, and running down-stairs, found Stephen in the study. She put her arms round his neck. "Why did you let me sleep?" she asked reproachfully.

"Because it was better for you. I want to speak to you, Ruth," continued Stephen, drawing a footstool beside him for her to sit on, and gently stroking her hair. "Do you know that mother is very dangerously ill?"

Ruth looked up, answering with her tearful eyes, and took one of his hands in hers.

"I have written to Tina and Maurice, and they will be home soon, I am sure. You were to have gone next week, but I want to send you away to-day now that mother is ill."

"Send me away!" echoed Ruth; "oh! why mayn't I stay? I could not bear to go now."

"It is best though, Ruth; your health is much improved with your visit here, and if you go home now you will be well, but if you stay here with illness in the house, and in the midst of anxiety, it will be bad for you. You came for a change; it has done you good, but if you remain now, it will be harmful."

Ruth's head was bent down, and when Stephen finished speaking, she said, "Do let me stay and help to nurse Mrs. Rae, I shall be miserable if you tell me to go. Please don't."

"My dear child, you must not ask me; it would be wrong to allow you to remain, and your father would be most justly displeased at my doing so."

"Oh! no, no, indeed he would be glad," exclaimed Ruth, earnestly. "He would not like me to come here, and be so kindly treated, and then to run away directly there is any trouble. Oh! Dr. Rae, you don't know how cruel you are to send me away."

"Cruel to you, little one? I could never be cruel to you."

"Then let me stay; let me write to papa: if you love me you will!"

Stephen started from his seat, and walked down the room; then stood looking out of the window, and Ruth waited in vain for an answer.

At last she spoke. "May I stay?"

Stephen turned round, and seemed suddenly to recollect her question. He returned to his seat, and answered, "It is very easy to persuade me when I am so glad to have you, Ruth. If your father consents—you must ask him—I cannot withstand your entreaty."

With eager haste Ruth wrote a letter to Mr. Leighton, telling him of Mrs. Rae's illness, and begging him to let her remain where she was for the present, she was going to say "until Mrs. Rae is better," when the sickening fear of what might happen took possession of her. Quickly Ruth despatched her letter, and then went up-stairs to begin the weary work of nursing, and watching in anxious suspense the varying condition of the patient.

Ruth hardly left Mrs. Rae's bedside, and Stephen came up-stairs whenever it was possible. A telegram came from Tina, saying she would be with them the next day, and when she arrived she took her share in the nursing with the others.

Maurice did not come, and Ruth expressed surprise, but Stephen reminded her of the uncertainty of his movements, and remarked that there might have been some delay in the receipt of the letter.

Another day passed heavily by, and the next morning dawned; the sun rose, and shone brilliantly upon the dewy grass, the purling stream, and luxuriant trees and flowers. Everything looked so bright and glowing with the early autumnal tints that when Ruth looked out of window she wondered she could take no pleasure in the sight that met her eyes.

Tina, too, looked out, and then glancing at Ruth's face said, "Go into the garden, it will do you good."

"I can't, Tina," answered Ruth, turning back towards the bed; "besides, you ought to rest now, I will stay here."

"Not now."

"Yes. You will be knocked up if you don't rest, and that would be worse than anything, because we don't know how long this will go on."

There was a sound of a carriage stopping in the road, then a hushed commotion in the hall. Tina ran out of the room to see if it was Maurice who had arrived, and Ruth stayed watching alone. She had often mistrusted her own powers of enduring the anxieties of nursing, but she bore up bravely now she was put to the test, and Tina and Stephen felt that she kept up their spirits, and was as efficient as possible.

The previous day a letter had come from Mr. Leighton, telling Ruth to stay as long as she liked; and he was evidently pleased that she wished to remain during Mrs. Rae's illness, though, at the same time, he seemed disappointed at her delay in returning.

Ruth had not long remained alone when the door was gently opened and Maurice entered. He came to the bedside, and, shaking hands with Ruth, looked at his mother lying unconscious before him. His expression was very grave and tender, as he watched her; and Ruth thought he had altered during his short absence, when she recalled how gloomy and stern he had often looked before he went away.

"I am so glad you are going to stay," said Maurice, after a long silence.

"So am I," answered Ruth, with a thrill in her voice, and feeling suddenly happier than she should have thought possible while Mrs. Rae was so ill. This happy moment was soon forgotten in the continued anxiety and fatigue of nursing. One day followed another, and the invalid lay in the same condition. Dr. Rae at last had very little hope of her recovery, she grew so exhausted with the continuance of the fever. All the neighbours sent in inquiries, and offers of any assistance they could give.

Robert began to grow anxious about Tina, who looked tired with nursing, and Stephen and Maurice noticed Ruth growing paler day by day. The unbroken suspense was terribly trying for all, and the time seemed to creep at a snail's pace.

One evening Stephen was driving home from his afternoon rounds, after he had been several hours away from home. This was the time when his anxiety always became most painful, and his wish to reach home was counteracted by an overpowering dread, which became almost unbearable by the time he reached the Willows. He sprang to the ground as soon as the horse stopped, and throwing off his hat, ran up-stairs, and entered Mrs. Rae's room.

Ruth stood beside the bed, leaning forward, and so earnestly watching Mrs. Rae that she did not hear the door open. Stephen's heart had stood still. What had happened? In another moment he was beside Ruth, and looking down, saw his mother sleeping peacefully, the look of pain having left her face completely.

Ruth never forgot that moment. Long afterwards she could recall the expression of Stephen's face as he turned towards her, and clasped her in his arms; she could remember how the sunset lighted up the room, and the soft wind rustled among the leaves. It seemed to her as if she had never before noticed how beautiful everything looked, and for some time she and Stephen stood side by side, thinking of nothing but the light which had pierced the gloom.

"Where are Tina and Maurice?" whispered Stephen at last.

"Tina is sleeping. I don't know where Maurice is."

"Child, you must rest. Go down to the drawing-room and lie down, and tell Maurice, if he is at home, the good news. I shall stay here. Poor child, you are nearly worn out."

"Am I?" said Ruth, becoming suddenly conscious of her fatigue, as she had not been before.

"Yes, I think so. You will do as I say, won't you?"

Ruth assented and went down-stairs, first to the studio, which was empty, then to the kitchen, where she told the servants of Mrs. Rae's sudden improvement, and asked Susan to go and let Tina know it as soon as she awoke.

"Where is Mr. Maurice?" she asked at last.

"I don't know, miss; shall I look about?"

"No, thank you; I will." Ruth went to the drawing-room, and on entering saw Maurice standing before the fire. Her face told the news before she said, "Oh, Maurice! she is better; she will get well again," and coming eagerly forward, put out her hands and shook Maurice's heartily.

"Thank Heaven!" he exclaimed. "Ruth, is it true? Has Stephen seen her?"

"Oh yes—yes! he told me to come and tell you."

"You are not going away, are you?" asked Maurice, "you are not fit for anything. How you are trembling." He placed her on the sofa as he spoke, and drew it nearer to the fire, which he stirred until the flames glowed brightly, and made a red flickering light, to give the room a cosy look in the grey twilight. Then he did not talk, but after drawing the window-curtains began walking about the room, while Ruth lay quite still, looking into the fire, and listening to his steps as he paced up and down. The clock on the mantelpiece ticked on and on, and Maurice still paced the floor silently, keeping monotonously in the same part, until some impulse made him come on to the rug in front of Ruth to look at her. She raised her eyes as he stood still. "I thought you were asleep," he said, as if in explanation. Then, as Ruth made no answer he asked, "Why haven't you gone to sleep?"

"I was thinking—I mean, I don't know," and Ruth shut her eyes from a sudden desire to make Maurice fancy she was sleepy and disinclined for conversation. However, Maurice did not resume his walk, but remained where he was, watching Ruth. In a short time she opened her eyes again, feeling too wakeful to be able to keep them closed. She saw Maurice's eyes fixed on her face, and with her unconquerable shyness she rose to her feet, with the intention of beating a hasty retreat.

"Ruth, I have seen so little of you since I came home—stay here."

Ruth stood still and doubtful. "Do you mind staying?"

"No," she answered.

"That is more than I deserve. I wonder you don't hate me—I hate myself." He paused, and there seemed no likelihood of his breaking the silence, so Ruth was forced to say, "Why?" because she could think of nothing else.

"Because of the way I behaved to you before I went away. I was cruel to you often, and I am cruel now, because I cannot hope that my cruelty was a matter of indifference to you. Ruth covered her face with her hands, but Maurice drew them down that he might look at her, while he added in a low voice, "Do you know why I was cruel?"

Ruth gave one quick glance up at him, but long enough for him to see that she understood.

"And can you forgive me for it, and love me a little in spite of all?" He drew Ruth to him, and bending down his head, caught her whispered answer, "I can't help it," uttered with a despairing sigh that could only express how happy she was. When she had made this confession Ruth's embarrassment completely vanished, and she looked up into Maurice's face frankly, not afraid to let him see how much she loved him, and not shrinking away from the kiss that was more eloquent than words.

The door opened suddenly, and Stephen entered. Standing in the firelight he saw Maurice with his arm round Ruth, whose head rested against him. She looked round, and immediately came forward into the dimly-lighted part of the room, and Stephen met her unhesitatingly.

"Do you guess, Dr. Rae?"

Stephen did not speak. He bent down to kiss the little upturned joyful face, and still holding Ruth's hand, walked up to the fireplace where Maurice was standing, and grasped his hand. Suddenly the bright flame was extinguished, but in the darkness it sounded as if Stephen were smiling when he said, "I am a true prophet, Maurice; I foretold this."

SONNET.

BENEATH the brooding, dewy skies of spring
The swallow flocks, that every purple dawn
Came to the coast, with autumn days are gone,
Through golden sunsets southward vanishing,
Until reoreant April; and the shore
Now takes the hues of age and youth once more.
But ne'er, alas! can human smiles and tears
Again o'ergreen our hearts once withered years;
And as the summer's warmly wandering breeze,
Listlessly floating through the full-leaved trees,
Lulls us to rest with whispers soft and light,
The dismal moan and the inconstant rouse
Of winter's barren, gnarr'd and jarring boughs,
Keep the sad soul awake in the dark spectral night.

CHRIST AND HIS CHURCH.

BY THE REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A., CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN, ETC.; AUTHOR OF "AIDS TO PRAYER," ETC.

"Feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents. I have compared thee, O my love, to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots. Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, thy neck with chains of gold. We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver."—Song of Solomon i. 8—11.

ONE other direction is given by Christ to the Church, in order to her spiritual prosperity—namely, "Feed thy kids by the shepherds' tents." By kids we plainly understand the young of the flock; those who, if left to themselves, would be in danger of going astray, feeding in pastures that are not good, playing on the hole of the asp, and lying down at the mouth of the cockatrice' den. And the command to the Church is that she be careful to feed her lambs "by the shepherds' tents." By "tents" the Targum understands "schools" or synagogues, so that the injunction is here laid upon the Church to bring her children early under the influence of those who have it in charge to tend and feed Christ's little ones, enlisting their young affections on the side of ordinances and truth and goodness, for fear, as the Church before expresses it, they "should turn aside by the flocks of thy companions." We have here the counsels of Solomon pointing to the necessity of early religious education; of feeding the kids in pastures which should join on close to the "shepherds' tents." In regard to such parental obligations, we know there are many in our day who think themselves much wiser than Solomon; "but we have not so learned Christ." We have faith in the blessing promised to Scriptural training. We believe in the wisdom that makes wise unto salvation, as superior to all other wisdom. And until it can be shown that our nature's bias will always incline the young to select for themselves the most wholesome pasture, we hold it to be safe to act upon the instruction Christ here gives: "Feed thy kids by the shepherds' tents."

But the Church, thus instructed as to the way of safety both for herself and for her children, is next to receive words of encouragement and promise, both as to her present state and her future-awaiting glory. She had already been addressed as the "fairest among women." Further commendations follow—"I have compared thee, O my love, to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots." Here the affectionate title should not be overlooked—"O my love." To be thus addressed by Christ after all the faults and blemishes she had confessed to, must be very assuring to the Church. It declares her to be the object of His personal regard, His inextinguishable affection, —virtually implies that all the members of the mystical body have a part in that promise, "having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end." "His own." Hardly can we overrate the comfort to a believer of standing to Christ in such a relation as this. It seems to take the certainty of his final salvation so entirely out of his own hands, to raise up a new form of security for him, above the promise, above the oath, above the covenant—even the glory of the Divine name, which would suffer reproach and hurt if anything of evil should befall those whom Jesus has loved as His own. To be addressed, "O my love," implies that Christ has a property in us. He has deigned to call us "His own;" and if, in addition thereto, He has given us desires which He only excites in His own, has appointed crosses for us which He only lays upon His own, has bestowed a joy and peace in believing which are never felt but by His own, we have in our hands a golden thread of destiny, winding in and out through all life's changes, its last coil wound round the pillars of the everlasting throne. Dark clouds may overshadow our providential path; the bread of adversity and the water of adversity may be our daily portion—nay, more, day after day of blank, dreary deadness may darken and embitter our soul's life, and yet we can say, "I know Christ loves me through this, perhaps loves me more on account of this." Nothing can effect a severance between Christ and those whom He addresses "O my love."

But the expression is sometimes taken in another sense. By the Septuagint and some Hebraist commentators it is rendered, "O my near friend." The expression intimates the nearness and closeness of Christ's fellowship unto His redeemed—the going forth between them of loving confidences. Without distrust, or fear, or anything of keeping back, we tell Christ all our hearts. We lay bare to His sight our souls' inmost secrets—that root of bitterness, that worm of pride, that cankering hate, that fretting discontent, that grieving thorn of some unsubdued infirmity, that unhealed scar of some early but unforgotten sin—things that we could not speak of to common friends, however close the tie, but only to Him who, drawing us closer and closer to His side, addresses us "O my near friend."

"I have compared thee to a company of horses."

The introduction of horses among the Hebrews, whether for purposes of warfare or of luxury, is mainly attributable to Solomon. He had obtained them from Egypt, the horses of which country surpassed in grace, in strength, in swiftness, the horses of any other nation; and having married the daughter of Pharaoh, he would, of course, have the finest horses of the country at his disposal. The general spirit of the comparison, therefore, would go to promise that believers should be invested with all those attributes of spiritual vigour, and alacrity, and undaunted courage, which should make them as fit for the spiritual warfare as a company of "horses in Pharaoh's chariots" would be for the day of battle. "I have compared thee;" that is, "I have made thee worthy to be compared." We have a like promise in Zechariah, where it is said, "The Lord hath visited His flock the house of Judah, and hath made them as His goodly horse in the battle." As His goodly horse in the battle!—as that noble creature that "paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength;" that mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted; that suffereth the quiver to rattle against him, the glittering spear and the shield."

And has not God often made good this word? Look at those three captives in Babylon, walking with unfearing calmness in the midst of the burning fiery furnace. Look at Daniel, the man of prayer, as he shrinks not from companionship with devouring lions. Behold Peter and John, as they testify with defiant boldness for the Crucified before the angry Sanhedrim. Look at Stephen, as he stands unmoved before the gnashing fury of his murderers, and say, have we not in these a representation of the Christian, like the ancient war-horse going on to meet the armed men, turning not his back from the sword, saying, "Among the trumpets, Ha, ha, and smelling the battle afar off?" Truly, "the righteous are as bold as a lion;" they are like "a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots."

"A company of horses," it is specially noted. The Church is in a militant state. Arrayed against her are all the enemies of truth and godliness. She must not dissipate her forces by divisions, by aimless beating of the air, by random or ill-concerted action, but must exhort her members, with one shoulder and one consent, with one spirit and with one mind, to strive together for the faith of the Gospel. The Church is not compared here to a company of horses—loose, straggling, scattered hither and thither—but to a team of noble steeds, drawing orderly and harmoniously together, to speed onward the march of the chariot. The great needs for spiritual warfare are multitude and unity. "We being many are one body in Christ," and we must present to the enemy a compact and united front. The powers adverse to truth and holiness are not slow to perceive the force of combined effort. Gebal, Ammon, and Amalek—infidelity, superstition, and irreligion—all these knew how to merge minor differences in a common assault upon the truth as it is in Jesus; how much rather should the friends and followers of the Bridegroom allow themselves to be yoked together as war-horses for the battle, and without regard to uniformity of harness and trapping, go forth in the strength of God, holding the faith "in unity of spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life."

In the two succeeding verses we seem to have a description of something which the Church is, and something greater and nobler she is yet to be: "Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, thy neck with chains of gold. We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver." In the former of these verses we have figurative language employed which would admit of being referred to either of the two images the Church is here compared with—either the beautiful woman decking herself with ornaments, or a troop of horses assumed to be caparisoned in the most rich and gorgeous trappings, like the camels of the kings of Midian which had chains of gold about their necks.

Of the spiritual application of these personal adornments it will be sufficient that we let Solomon be his own interpreter. In the opening verses of the book of Proverbs we read: "My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother: for they shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, and chains about thy neck." Hence by the "rows of jewels" with which the Church is here said to be decorated, it is permitted us to understand those moral precepts of Moses which pious parents were taught to inculcate upon their children; whilst the "chains" would be a type of those graces of the religious character by which the holy law of God is most honoured and adorned. And the reason given by Jewish interpreters for comparing the moral law to rows of jewels is worth our attention—namely, to intimate its connectedness, its regularity, its perfect and majestic symmetry. "The law of the Lord is perfect." It is a great unity. It allows of no graduated scale of its enactments, as if some were of greater and some of less obligation, but whether in Deuteronomy or in James, announces as the one broad and unchanging condition of its observance, "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." The perfectness of the row of jewels is broken; the string has lost a pearl.

And what is the string upon which these pearls hang, which binds and keeps the rows of jewels together? It is "love," always set forth in Scripture as "the fulfilling of the law." "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and all thy mind, and all thy strength. This is the first and great commandment." We must worship from love, and pray from love, and observe ordinances from love. Of what account in the estimation of the Father of our spirits can we suppose would be that deportment of filial respect which has no love in it—the base hireling's crouch—forced, distant, and unnatural? Of what avail would be any number of "young-ruler" moralities, which, while not suffering us to defraud any, or to injure any—nay, even causing all men to speak well of us, yet come not of any love to Christ; flow not from the inspiration of His Spirit; but are mere fits and starts of spasmodic amiableness, broken rows of jewels without coherence and without a bond? being destitute of that Divine charity which is "the very bond of peace and of all virtues."

And then, lastly, in this description of the Church's spiritual beauty, it is said, and "thy neck is comely with chains of gold;" that is, not only hast thou the law, or jewelled bridle upon thy lips to restrain thee, and guide thee, and keep thee in the way that thou shouldest go, but thou hast the golden chain of spiritual excellency, the ornament of grace and sanctity and truth and holy tempers, the light shining before men, gold tried in the fire. And it is a chain—grace added to grace, link joined on to link; to faith, virtue; to virtue, knowledge; to knowledge, temperance; to temperance, patience—no ring wanting, no jewel displaced from its setting. "The king's daughter," we are told, "is all glorious within." In the heart of the hidden man are gems of grace whose price is "more than rubies." But she has a form and comeliness outside also—virtues which shine through, and cannot be hid. Her chaste conversation, her even and blameless walk, all the parts and actings of the outer life laid out after a pattern of Divine symmetry and perfectness; these things sparkle like jewels in rows or chains of yellow gold. "Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, thy neck with chains of gold."

With such glowing imagery does the sacred writer set forth the dignity of the Church in her present state. Yet is not this worthy to be compared with her future glory as set forth in the succeeding words?—"We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver." The fuller consideration of these must be deferred to another chapter. The language evidently points to the time when the Church, purged of her dross, disencumbered of her weakness, emancipated from her bonds, not "having spot or wrinkle or any such thing," shall take the form of "a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, a royal diadem in the hand of her God." "The Lord will give grace and glory," we are told, and the grace is an earnest of the glory. All the graces of the earthly state are but the rough drafts and rudiments of some higher and more Divine similitude. Faith is the germ of sight. Hope is the forecast shadow of enjoyment. A blind though trustful feeling after Divine guidance will terminate in the open manifest following of "the Lamb whithersoever He goeth," and the silent, uncomplaining submission to a heavenly Father's will will develop into a song of praise. The work of the Lord in the souls of His redeemed is perfect. It were a small thing to give them strength for their day, grace for their trials, a sword for their conflicts, a shield to beat back the foeman's darts—this were merely to give them "rows of jewels and chains of gold." He must prepare for them mansions, thrones, dignities, glory, honour, and a crown: "We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver."

OUR AUTOGRAPH-BOOKS.

BY THE HON. MRS. GREENE.

NEXT on our list comes the familiar name of Marryat, at once a novelist and a brave and successful naval officer. The public rewarded his skill as a writer by reading and admiring, and last, though not least, by purchasing his books; while his country, though somewhat tardily (as we may see from the accompanying letter, written before his promotion), rewarded his bravery and skill. Marryat stands unrivalled in his graphic descriptions of sea life, and his name is that of one almost equally a favourite in the drawing-room and the schoolroom. We need not enter into any fuller details relating to the life of this clever and amiable author, as his memoirs also have lately been given to the public, by an author whose talents and genius entitle her not unworthily to take the rank of being her father's daughter.

"Now for Grumble No. two.

"Twenty years ago, soon after the peace, I was requested by Lloyds and the shipowners to write a code of signals for the merchant service. I did so, and in the various annual reports of their societies they have stated that the saving of lives and property by the means of these signals have been enormous. They were, at the request of Lloyds, supplied to the British men-of-war to enable merchant vessels to communicate their wants etc., and eventually they have been used in all the English colonies and Dependencies by the Government, to communicate with vessels and along the coast. The French, perceiving their advantage, had them translated and supplied to their men-of-war and merchantmen. Now, independent of the value they may be to the country in saving lives and property, and the claim which I have on that account I have one also in a pecuniary way, for during the 26 years that they have been established they have always been supplied gratis to the British navy, and if it is considered how many vessels we have had in commission, had they been paid for, it would have amounted to a very large sum. For this service I have never received any remuneration whatever from our own Government. When I was at Paris some years ago, Admiral De R——, then French First Lord, sent for me, and without any application on my part, informed me that in consequence of the important advantages derived by the use of my signals, the King of the French had been pleased to give me the Gold Cross of the Legion of Honour (equivalent to the C.B. in England); so that I have been rewarded by a nation for whom the signals were not written, and from my own Government have received nothing. I beg pardon, I did receive something—a letter from Lord Palmerston prohibiting me to wear the distinction granted to me by the King of the French. Now I call that also a capital grumble.

"I do feel that the party I have supported, now that I have decided claims upon the country, should not throw me away like a sucked orange; if they do, why, Virtue must be its own reward; it will be all the same a hundred years hence.

"I have now let it all out, and I feel a great deal better.

"Ever truly yours, "F. Marryat."

Following in the steps of Marryat, we come upon an interesting letter from Eliot Warburton, the traveller and historical writer, whose terrible fate in the burning Amazon sent a shudder, not many years ago, through all the world, and especially into the hearts of those who had read and delighted in his imaginative and interesting works—indeed, one of his best descriptions of savage life records with a fearful distinctness the horrors of a death by fire. He was cut off in the prime of his life, but had lived long enough to leave to the world many precious and enduring legacies of his genius.

"I am more and more bent on the East, and shall feel greatly obliged by your furnishing me with any clues through the labyrinths of divellent attractions. I have written also to L—— and K——. I need not say with how much interest I have read Lamartine. He was quite new to me, and his style is as interesting as his subject. His simplicity and childish naked-heartedness have something Oriental in themselves, which accords not ungracefully with his matter. I am sorry, however, to tell you that his long conversations with Lady Hester Stanhope were purely imaginary. She assured K——, who passed some days with her, that she had never even seen Lamartine, but had refused him an audience. Believe me yours most sincerely,

"Eliot Warburton."

We have now come to the last letter which we propose to transcribe from our stores. It is from the pen of Lady Morgan, the well-known beauty, wit, and queen of society, whose name is familiar in every mouth. Though so voluminous an authoress herself, she does not seem, from the letter before us, to hold out much hope to others, and we cannot but contrast her description of the literary remuneration of her time with the liberal sums given by the publishers of our own day, to incite emulation and to reward the efforts of genius.

"Madam,—In the present state of literature I really do not know of any publisher in England or Ireland who would give the price of one guinea for any M.SS. novel, whose author is unknown to fame, nor who would publish such a work if given for nothing. Authors of considerable celebrity have published at their own expense and risk during the last season—an experiment I should be sorry to recommend to a debutant, however gifted. I was absent from Dublin when the first letter with which you honoured me arrived. I found 6 other applications of the same nature from young ladies and gentlemen unknown, and I do assure you that were I to answer all who write to me on their own business, I should find life too short for the task. Since my return to town I have been severely afflicted with a malady in my eyes from overworking them, and I am not allowed to write, which I do now with pain and difficulty, but as you have requested secrecy, I would not employ an amanuensis.

"I have the honour to be, Madam, with grateful acknowledgments of the kind opinions you have expressed of me, your obliged servant, "Sydney Morgan.

"Kildare St., October 7, 1833."

We must now close our autograph-books, and put them aside on their shelf; but before doing so we wish to apologise for the absence of some well-known modern authors, whose names are so constantly in our mouths that we can hardly bring ourselves to believe that their owners have left us for ever. It is for this very reason, and because their memory is still so green in our recollection, that we refrain from publishing their letters. Had they been alive we might have written to ask their permission before inserting them, and now that they are gone the same grounds for scruples exist.

In conclusion, we have striven carefully to keep back all that could give the living pain, or reflect upon the dead; and we trust that in so doing we have not rendered our articles less agreeable to those who, like ourselves, are interested in the collection of genuine autographs.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

CHAPTER XL.

MAKING A LIFE.

LUCY'S return to her home was not to be a return to her old, happy, careless girlish life. She had no sooner tried to take it up again, than she found that she had left it behind for ever, and that she must make for herself a new life. Not that the old life was one to be despised, or to be looked back upon with regret. On the contrary, it had been good and beautiful in itself, as the blossom is good and beautiful in itself, even without its promise of fruitfulness, and has its place in this world of ours—ay, and its use, though that should perish with its beauty. So the girlish life had been good and beautiful, but the season for it was past, and the time for the fruit had not yet come. Such a season comes sooner or later in every life, be it man's or woman's, and on it hangs the determination of the future.

Having been at a day school in the neighbourhood of her home, Lucy had plenty of companions of her own age, and she was allowed tolerable freedom of choice in the matter of companionship. Her parents had cultivated her judgment and her taste, and left her free to exercise them in this as in less important matters. Lucy, whose taste was catholic, knew and liked a great many girls as unlike herself and each other as possible in character and pursuits; the only class from whom she really held aloof were the fast girls, of whom there were plenty in the neighbourhood. Lucy shrank from loud tones, loud costumes, and loud manners, as she would have shrunk from any other manifestation of want of refinement; but she was naturally too bright and gay to fall into the opposite extreme, and shrink into the dull, colourless routine of a life devoid of every purpose save that of living, in which only too many round her seemed to end. One or two of Lucy's companions were considered strongminded—more, I think, from a little aggressiveness of manner than from any quality of intellect; and Lucy had escaped the opprobrious epithet more from her extreme gentleness of temper than from any lack of the quality of strength. In truth, the set were bright, thoughtful girls, enemies of dulness and inanity. Instead of dawdling over novels and worsted work, they really read and really worked, and if it must be confessed, wrote. They gained much useful knowledge, and learned to practise many a useful household art; and, of course, they had their notions, as a Yankee would say—one of these being the extreme desirability of a career, if possible a profession. Two of them—Agnes Rivers and Isabel Story—had made up their minds to be prodigies of learning, and had passed with credit the New Cambridge Examinations as a preliminary step.

"I wish you would join us, Lucy," said her friend Miss Story. "You know we shall have to work very hard, and encounter the usual amount of opposition; but that is nothing. No more idleness; no more dulness; no more 'don't-know-what-to-do-with-myself-ism.'"

"I wish I had been in time for the examination," said Lucy; "but, you know, I am older than you, and it was too late for me to join you; and I have no special aptitude."

"You don't know till you have tried," said her friend; "and for want of an aim your whole life will be frittered away."

Lucy sighed, and acknowledged that there was some truth in it.

Mrs. Tabor was sitting by, smiling at the discussion. She was quite in the confidence of the band, who always thought her criticisms worth listening to; though Isabel and her set were a little apt to set aside the opinions of those older than themselves, on whom the new lights were supposed not to have dawned.

"There is nothing," she said, breaking in upon the dialogue, "that may not be pursued from frivolous and unworthy motives. Yours are neither, my dear," she pursued, nodding to her daughter's friend. "To redeem your time, and do good in the world, are the best incentives you could choose; but then you must not learn to condemn others who do the same things in a very different—possibly in a humbler way. You must not forget that there is nothing which the motive may not render worthy of the highest."

"Thanks, mamma, for coming to the rescue," said Lucy.

"But don't you think that by making virtue cheap and easy you make it hardly any virtue at all?" said Isabel.

"I do not think virtue can ever be cheap enough, or easy enough," said Mrs. Tabor.

"Simply to do good," said Lucy, "sounds very easy; but it is the most difficult thing in the world."

"Doing good used to mean giving in charity," said Isabel, with a merry glance at Lucy; "and we know now that that sometimes means doing positive harm." (One of Lucy's charitable objects had just turned out a failure.)

"Now I'm not going to be condemned wholesale," said Lucy.

"You give for the mere love of giving, Lucy—now, confess that you do."

"Willingly," said Lucy.

"But such charity is not disinterested," replied Isabel.

"Perhaps not; I did not claim for it any lofty title," said Lucy; "though disinterestedness is my pet virtue, and I don't think there can be any real greatness without it."

"That is my own feeling," said Mrs. Tabor. "So many fail and fall short of excellence for the want of it, unable to resist the temptations to cultivate social and other kinds of success, instead of the true success, of which that is but the echo. That will lie among your temptations, Isabel."

Isabel blushed, and played with a glove out of the boxful which Lucy was mending. "That's a bit of work I can't abide," she said. "I wonder you have patience to go in for it so thoroughly."

"They are not my own," said Lucy, simply.

"Oh! that's still worse. Whose are they?"

"Our next-door neighbour's."

"Ada Lovejoy?"

"Yes."

"Why can't she mend her own gloves?" said Isabel; "it's too bad to put it upon you."

"I offered to see to her things," said Lucy; "for, you know, if you let everything go as she does, you must either look like a sloven, or spend a great deal of money; and she is so absorbed in her work that she has not a moment to spare. She practises twelve hours out of the twenty-four, I am sure."

"I wish I had some one to mend mine," said Isabel. "The younger ones only cobble them, and I don't know what to do since Miss Adams left. She was so good-natured; she never wanted asking."

Miss Adams had been governess to Isabel's younger sisters; but had gone home to nurse her mother, who was ill.

"By the way, how is Miss Adams's mother?" Mrs. Tabor asked.

"I believe she is better," said Isabel; "only it is almost a pity, I think, that she has got over it, for the doctor says it is sure to return next winter, and every winter, until it kills her."

Nothing more was said, and Isabel Story took her leave. Then Lucy, blushing for her friend, and conscious of the trouble on her mother's face, went to her and whispered, "You must not think she meant to be so hard. Isabel is very fond of her mother, and would nurse her as tenderly as Miss Adams."

"I doubt it, my dear. That little speech of hers shows a tone of mind which I dislike and dread—a spirit of impatience with the weak, the useless, and the suffering, which is spreading nowadays, and which is certainly not the spirit of Christ."

Lucy sat and mended Ada's gloves till dinner-time; and dinner-time brought her father and the daily duties she did for him—little enough, but then he would have missed them so much. Then in the evening came Ada, and soon after her Arthur Wildish, and the business of the evening commenced.

Mr. Tabor was very fond of music; but even he had enough of it, and would sometimes beat a retreat. Singing singly, or altogether, one by one, or in pairs, the three would remain round the piano till it was time to separate for the night—a fact of which they very often needed a gentle reminder.

Arthur Wildish had accepted his second rejection by Lucy with a better grace than might have been expected. Yet, in spite of this, he was as much at home in the house as ever.

"What can he be thinking of?" was Mr. Tabor's reflection; "surely not of going on as before."

"He has asked Lucy, it seems, if she objects to his coming, and she has answered no. But I believe they are not going on as before," said that wise woman, with a little smile.

"What then?" asked Mr. Tabor, lifting his eyebrows.

"I believe he is coming for somebody else," she answered.

"You don't mean Ada!"

"Yes, I do."

"Rather awkward, I think," said Mr. Tabor, reflectively, "rather awkward."

"I shouldn't interfere if I were you, but let things take their course," said his wife.

"No, I won't interfere," answered Mr. Tabor. "Lucy hasn't done him much harm after all." And unconsciously, but rather unfairly on the whole, Mr. Wildish went down a whole row of pegs in Mr. Tabor's estimation.

And this was why sweet, unselfish Lucy sat and mended little Ada's gloves, and saw to her ribbons, &c. She knew what a quick eye Arthur Wildish had for the little details of dress, and that he took a pleasure in seeing Ada look nice.

"She loves no one else at least," thought Lucy, "I wonder if she will love him when she knows."

CHAPTER XLI.

ASHMEAD GRANGE.

After Mr. Tabor's return, Philip, too, had a holiday, quite in the dead season; and though his sister-in-law wanted him to come with her and her children into Scotland, he declined, and went and hid himself in some out-of-the-way place, where nobody heard of him until he came back again, bronzed with the sun, but thinner than ever, as also were the soles of a considerable supply of boots which he was in possession of before he started. He certainly had not estimated the inexorable cost of shoe-leather before setting out.

The long vacation was over, and the business of the legal year was about to open briskly for the firm of Tabor and Tenterden. Among other matters, they had coming into court a will case, which promised to be of considerable importance—the case of "Hindley v. Baselow." It was coming into court contrary to Philip's advice. Mr. Hindley, the nephew, was convinced that he should be able to prove his relative insane at the time the will was made, and determined to go on at all hazards, so that Messrs. Tabor and Tenterden had no alternative save to lose their client or conduct his suit for him. And as some connections of Mr. Hindley were old and valued clients of the firm, a good deal of pressure had been brought to bear upon the mind of Mr. Tabor, who was thus led to entertain a much more favourable opinion of its success than his partner. Philip, too, when pressed, had made the admission that such a life as old Mr. Baselow's was insane from beginning to end, though only as all sin and folly, and confusion and beastliness are insane. The old man living down there on the dreary flat, adding acre to acre and field to field, with no enjoyment save possession, and never raising his eyes higher than his own swine-troughs, was essentially mad to Philip's apprehension. But that was not the view likely to be taken by an enlightened British jury. And he also pointed out that Mr. Baselow had been able to transact his business up to the end, and moreover to make that business pay. He knew the number of his sheep and the count of his cattle, and nobody about him had ever managed to cheat him with impunity.

Beatrice and her husband were coming up for the trial, which was fixed to take place early in November. They had had a good deal more of each other's society lately than either of them had bargained for, and they had found it a very different thing to be companionable for a leisure hour in the evening in the stirring London streets, and to be alone for days and weeks together in a lonely house on the Essex marshes.

From the first, their neighbours—at least, all who had the remotest claims to respectability—held aloof. The new-comer's antecedents were well known, and were not in his favour. None of the small proprietors or farmers of the district, who had been his equals, had ever been within his inhospitable doors, and it was not at all likely that they would seek the society of a son of his, holding at the same time so equivocal a position—a position from which it was not impossible that he might be ousted any day. On these grounds the respectables ignored Ashmead as much as ever.

Now at this period of his life there was nothing John Baselow craved for so much as respectability. He held it to be the most independent, the most comfortable, the most enjoyable state of being, and he desired to begin a career of respectability at once. Therefore, on the very first Sunday of their stay at Ashmead he drove his wife, very prettily dressed, over to church, and almost gained by so doing the suffrages he so much desired. Almost, but he and Beatrice had had a quarrel on the way thither, and he looked so savage and morose, and his beautiful wife so unhappy, sitting as she did as far apart from him as possible, that before the service was over their neighbours had drawn the worst possible auguries concerning the future of the pair, and had set Mr. Baselow down as a worthy son of his worthy father. Of course they compared notes when they came out of church, and set the ball of scandal going.

"Poor thing, she is to be pitied,—and she so pretty," said one kindly matron, with young married daughters of her own.

"He's his father's son—a lowering villain," said her plain-spoken husband; "best have nothing to do with them."

"She looks quite ladylike," said a younger dame; "I should like to know where she orders her bonnets."

"Perhaps she was a milliner," said another, coming pretty near the mark. "You know, if she had been a lady, she would never have married him."

"And see how he treats his foster-mother," said a third.

"Ah, by-the-way, what has he done with her?" was the reply—a question to which there were various answers and surmises returned.

On this latter point rumours began to circulate. People shuddered as they heard it whispered that he had shut her up in one of the empty rooms at the top of the lonely old Grange, and meant to keep her a prisoner there for the rest of her life. People shuddered and called to mind the horrid stories they had read of neglected creatures kept thus in inhuman misery, till released by death from the custody of cruel relatives. Then it was reported that she had gone mad, and that Baselow had taken her away and shut her up in a lunatic asylum. Thus the old house was in a fair way of getting a worse reputation than ever.

Now, the only truth there was in these stories would have told rather in favour of John Baselow than otherwise. It was true that he had shut her up and taken her food to her with his own hands; but it was because she had several times appeared in a condition of helpless intoxication. When she was comparatively sobered, he had entreated her to go away with him peaceably, that he might place her with decent people, who would see to her, while he paid the charges of her maintenance. But she declined this provision, saying she would rather go into the union; so that he took the liberty of locking her up, and then of deporting her, greatly subdued by a continuation of enforced abstinence from strong liquors, to the neighbourhood of London, where he settled her in respectable lodgings, and paid her board and all other necessaries, making provision with the utmost care for her comfort and safety. The sobbings and ravings which had been heard at the Grange were but those of a tipsy woman; but then respectable people could not possibly distinguish.

Money, too, was scarce at the Grange. There was plenty of everything else, but there was little cash that John Baselow could lay hands upon, and everybody knows that without money it is useless to begin to try to be respectable. They could kill a sheep or a pig, and have as much pork or mutton as they pleased. There were ducks by the dozen, and green peas by the bushel; and John was very fond of duck and green peas, and, for that matter, so was Beatrice. There was milk, butter, eggs, flour, in abundance; but there were things only to be bought for money, and when there was no money, they had to be got on credit, and credit was difficult to obtain down there it seemed.

Then one half the house was unfurnished, and the other half not fit to be seen, as Beatrice said. If she had been allowed, she could have given pretty strong evidence as to the filthy condition of the late Mr. Baselow's house—evidence as pertinent as any in showing the condition of its owner's mind. The wainscoted drawing-room was a mere receptacle for old lumber, of which there seemed to be a preternatural quantity. Other rooms had been used as storerooms, and were in a shocking condition. One ground-floor chamber was stained with blood from floor to ceiling—the blood of pigs which had been slaughtered here. The dining-room was, indeed, the only room that had remained intact. The furniture there had resisted tear and wear better than the rest. It was of dark, solid mahogany, with chairs and sofas of horsehair, little the worse for wear—that is, with the exception of one, which Beatrice, with a look of disgust and aversion, caused immediately to be expelled. The long dining-table and the ponderous sideboard, though coated with dirt, were intact, and Beatrice had them rubbed till they shone like mirrors. Four blackened pictures decorated the walls of this apartment, destined to be her only sitting-room. A grim-looking lady in turban and ruffles, and a villainous-looking man in a blue coat and brass buttons, represented, or misrepresented, the Mr. and Mrs. Baselow of an earlier generation; and two girls in what appeared to be white frocks, with the shortest of short waists, the one holding out what seemed like a black apple, the other, a rose of the like hue, did the same for the long-forgotten sisters of the dead miser. Not a book, not an instrument, not an ornament was in the house; they had all been destroyed long ago, with the exception of two queer goblets that stood on the high mantelshelf, and had the faculty of making distorted reflections of everything that was within their range. The very chairs became objects of horror, with crooked legs and bent backs when they stood opposite; and as for the human face divine, it was rendered hideous beyond expression. Beatrice would have swept them away likewise; but they amused her husband, especially when they annoyed her by making her face at once ridiculous and detestable.

Beatrice did the best she could for this dismal apartment, cleansing and brightening whatever would cleanse and brighten, and filling earthenware jugs and basins with such garlands of roses as were worthy of china and Sèvres. It gave her employment for a week or two to do this, and do it likewise for the bedroom and dressing-room which she had selected. It was even more difficult, for the miser's bedroom had been squalid beyond description. The hangings had dropped piecemeal, eaten by the moths, which nearly put out the candles the first time they were lighted, and the carpet was gone from the same cause, the remains of it lying in a corner of the lumber-room. The chairs—they had once belonged to the drawing-room, for the seats and backs were embroided with wreaths of flowers on a ground of drab cloth—probably the girls whose effigies were in the dining-room had worked at them for years, summer and winter—were half eaten up. Slender-legged toilet tables and washstands had given up the ghost, and were lying, wormed through, among the lumber. A broken chair held a brown earthenware basin, and a cracked glass hung on a nail above had sufficed for old Mr. Baselow.

It was wonderful, the improvement Beatrice made with the materials at her disposal, and a few inexpensive purchases. For the rest nothing could be done until the case of the will was settled. Then John Baselow intended to furnish the house in first-rate style. But in the meantime the only glimpse of happiness which visited Beatrice was that which came to her in the course of making those rooms in the old house habitable for herself and her husband.

REST AND PEACE.

DUSKY twilight and darkest night—
These are the hours for rest:
Close the sad eyes, for the aching light
Has faded away in the west.

Trouble, sorrow, and cruel pain—
For all that is better not—
Ye are over, and Rest returns again—
Peace after the battle fought.

Peace!—yes, the peace of an answered prayer,
Not oblivion's easeful rest;
Like the peace and rest of the old, old air
I heard on my mother's breast,

When a little child, long, long ago,
Tired out with my lessons and play,
Listing her lullaby, soft and low,
On her loving breast I lay.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 14. ST. PETER. PART II.

Chapters to be read—Parts of Matt. xiv., xvi.

PETER'S WORDS (I.) Read Matt. xvi. 13—20. (1) Confesses Christ. Ask whom the Jews had been expecting to come; why did they want a deliverer? Refer to the tribute-money (Matt. xxii. 21), and the frequent mention of Roman centurions. Which of our Lord's names showed His office as Prince? Messiah (Hebrew), or Christ (Greek), both meaning anointed. But was His kingdom of this world? Whom did the Jews first think was the Christ? Where was John the Baptist now? Refer to John's testimony to Christ (John i. 29). Others thought He was Elijah, because of prophecy in Mal. v. 5. Show how they ought to have known better, because Christ's miracles and teaching (John v. 36), besides the witness of Scripture (John v. 39), spoke plainly of Him. Jesus now asks disciples its opinion of Him. Who answered? Show how bold and full and clear Peter's answer was. What made him so certain? Because not only had testimony of John and miracles of Christ, but went about with and lived with Christ; therefore Peter had witness in himself revealed by "the Father." Now see the result of his confession of Christ. (a) His nature is changed. No longer merely Simon (a hearer), but Peter (a stone). Upon him, and such as like him are strong in faith, Christ will build His Church. Ask how this was fulfilled. At his preaching 3,000 believed and formed the infant Church (Acts ii. 41). (b) He is to have authority. By his strong faith he will open the kingdom of heaven to many (Acts x. 34; xv. 7); he will make laws, punish, settle matters in the Church in Christ's name (Acts v. 9; vi. 2, &c.) Why was he thus honoured? Not for any good in himself, only as "Peter"—i.e., made strong by faith, could do anything. Were these promises to him alone? Does he claim them for himself above others? No; they were for all Christ's ministers, who through faith receive power (see 1 Cor. iii. 7, 11).

(2) Rebukes Christ. (Read Matt. xvi. 20—23.) What would Peter want to do at once? Was he allowed to go out and use his power of persuading men that Jesus was Christ? Why not? Show that the people having refused the evidence are not to have more teaching now; besides, the disciples want more instruction. They have received Christ's earlier teaching; must now hear new things. What are they? What strange words! Surely Christ, the anointed Messiah, can conquer enemies. What does Peter say (ver. 22)? How is he answered? Show why this was. Peter before, speaking God's words, was blessed; now speaking his own words is a tempter like Satan. Wherein lay his fault? (a) Conceit: thinking he knew all about Christ; only knew part—His power as seen by miracles, not His atonement by means of pain and death. (b) Love of ease. What was his mind full of? Reigning, power, glory; did not like to hear of suffering and death. But sin could only be put away by death of Sinless One; therefore when speaking thus was speaking in Satan's cause, who would have triumphed had Christ not died.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Ask what we must think of Christ. Not merely as man, great example, but as Christ, Son of God. What effect this faith will have upon us—make us strong in working for Christ, teaching others about Him, building up His Church. Are we doing this? (2) Christ requires His servants to be like Him in suffering. No cross, no crown (Rom. viii. 17). If shrink from suffering are not His.

II. PETER'S DEEDS. (1) Walks on the water. (Read Matt. xiv. 23—33.) The story being well known the teacher will not need to dwell much upon it. In a few vivid words bring before the children the scene: the dark night; the raging storm; the apparition on the waters; the well-known voice; Peter's leaving the ship; the others all crowding to see; the few steps in safety; the fear, cry for help, rescue; return to the ship; the calm; the adoration of the sailors (ver. 33). Then draw out the following points: (a) Peter's boldness. Have seen his strong faith in Christ. How is faith shown? (James ii. 14.) This walking on sea a wonderful sign of what Christ's power can make a man do; but Peter did greater things than these afterwards (Acts v. 15). (b) Peter's fear. Why was he afraid? Because looked away from Christ to the waves: his faith failed. So did Abraham's when in Egypt (Gen. xii. 11). (c) Peter's cry: his sinking made him again turn to Jesus; he had some faith, though only a little. Was Christ ever called upon in vain?

(2) Denies Christ. (Read Matt. xxvi. 69—75.) This story, too, is well known. Remind how Christ had foretold the denial. Ask what led to it. Fear of man—of ridicule, perhaps of death. Had been specially warned, prayed for, still fell into sin because trusting to himself, instead of seeking Christ's aid.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. Show children how must cling to Christ, not merely in sunshine, but storm; not merely on Sunday in religious services, but in week; exposed to ridicule, reproach for Christ. If endure, are happy (1 Peter iv. 13), like Paul and Silas singing in prison (Acts xvi. 25). If deny Christ, liable to be denied by Him (Mark viii. 38).

Questions to be answered.

1. What sort of a prince were the Jews expecting?
2. Explain the word Christ. When was Christ anointed, and for what offices?
3. What confession of faith did Peter make, and how was he rewarded?
4. What led to Peter's rebuke of Christ?
5. Describe his walking on the water.

PRESENT PAIN FUTURE GAIN.

IN THREE PARTS.

PART II.

FOR the next two days Lilian worked away at her sketch more steadily than she had ever been known to apply herself to anything before. It was a point of honour between the two that neither was to see the other's drawing till it was complete, so that no little curiosity was felt by the young artists as to the result of their respective efforts. But at last both were finished and submitted for inspection. Uncle Barnard was to be kept in ignorance of whose individual hand had been at work, so that he might give a true and impartial judgment.

How Lilian's heart beat when he took up the topmost drawing. It was with the utmost difficulty she remained silent while Uncle Barnard scanned her work so leisurely.

"Beautiful! upon my word," he exclaimed presently; "it's almost like a photograph."

This was certainly a tribute to the faithfulness of the representation, if nothing else; but Uncle Barnard was not much of an artist.

But there was Bertram's drawing yet to be seen. Uncle Barnard took it up and slowly lifted the tissue paper.

"The other is beautiful, but this, I should say, is perfect," was Uncle Barnard's fiat, and Bertie's picture certainly was wonderfully well done. Both were carefully finished studies, but there was an unmistakable difference; Bertie had certainly won.

There was no further time to be lost, so preparations were set on foot at once for his departure, but, before many days had elapsed Bertram could see that his mother was greatly distressed; her face bore the traces of sleepless nights and many tears, and he was grieved to see how greatly she dreaded the parting.

"Are you so averse to my leaving, mother dear?" he asked suddenly one day, prompted by the sight of her sad, tearful face.

"I am trying to think that it is the best thing for you, dear," she replied, with an attempt at cheerfulness.

"Are you not quite sure, then, that it is?" he demanded.

"Not quite," she replied; "but perhaps that is a little selfishness on my part, for I cannot bear the thought of my poor boy being so far away from me, suffering I know not what anguish of body or loneliness of mind, and I unable to soothe or tend my darling. You know, Bertie, I have always been your nurse, and I do not fancy that you are strong enough to do without my care."

"Why, you poor, silly, darling mother, have you been storing all this grief in your heart, without letting me know anything about it?" he exclaimed tenderly, kneeling down by her side and placing one arm lovingly round her. "What treason! I have hit on a suitable punishment. Your ugly, tiresome, deformed Bertram shall be bound to your apron-strings for ever. He utterly refuses to quit your side. Let me see how you bear up against the sentence," and he turned his mother's face towards him, and looked at her with his large expressive eyes, full of the tenderest devotion.

"My dear boy, I cannot accept such a sacrifice at your hands. My fears may be groundless. God grant that they may be."

"Sacrifice!" echoed Bertram; "I repudiate such a notion. You are treating me shamefully, putting all the love on your side, and crediting me with none. I really won't stand it, you most unjust of mothers. Acknowledge your injustice and crave my forgiveness if you wish to preserve peace among us."

"This is but the decision of a moment," she continued, smiling at his enthusiasm; "you would soon repent it," she added, arguing as much with herself as him.

"So you would drive me away from you," he answered. "And what should I do without my mother? We must all have been mad ever to have thought of such a thing. I have been so well lately that I have only thought of myself as in tolerable health, and ignored the probability of my having another terrible bout of illness. Mother mine, you have brought me to my senses; it is not too late to get Lilian's things ready if we work hard. Good-bye for the present, I am going to inform the household generally, and my father in particular, of the change in our arrangements, and expect to see Lily execute a jig on her head as a token of her delight.

"May I change my mind about going? I am afraid after all I am not strong enough," he asked of his father, and beyond a little reprimand for not having made up his mind sooner, no objection was made.

Bertram had spoken truly, when he denied feeling disappointment. His devoted love for his mother having been roused to an extraordinary degree, and being at that moment paramount, he was rendered incapable, for the time being, of any other strong feeling, but when this ebullition had calmed down, he began to realise that it was really a very keen disappointment. His visit to Rome was to furnish him with an inexhaustible fund of knowledge, to strike the key-note of future achievements, to be in fact the opening up of a new career; and now all these day-dreams must vanish. "Oh! but what a wretch I am," he said to himself, when these ideas began to intrude themselves upon him. "I am placing my craving for knowledge in the scale against my mother's love for me, when one is light as dust in comparison to the other." At this moment his eye fell on the school motto hanging over the mantelpiece. "I wonder whether my present pain will be my future gain," he thought. "I doubt not that it will be, for I feel that my decision is God-directed."

Lilian could scarcely believe her ears when she heard the good news, and so much was she taken up with the idea of becoming Aunt Barnard's adopted daughter, that it was not until the time of departure drew very close that she began to have some sad thoughts in connection with leaving her childish home. "But it is only for two years, and that is not such a very long time," she argued with herself.

The leave-taking was, of course, rather sad. Mrs. Watson was too affectionate a mother to bear easily the parting from any of her children, but her intense thankfulness that Bertram had been left behind prevented her from feeling so acutely as she might otherwise have done.

Lilian's first letter was dated from Paris. She was enchanted with everything; she had turned out a capital sailor, and had quite enjoyed the trip across Channel, but poor Aunt Barnard had been terribly upset. They had already seen some lovely scenery, and were going to stay a day or two in Paris to see some of the sights. A little postscript added that she wished she knew a little more French, at which Bertram laughed, and remarked that Lilian was soon beginning to find out the value of study.

In Lilian's letter came a slight description of some of the sights she had seen in Paris. "It is so different from London," she wrote; "the streets are so wide and the buildings so handsome, and the people, oh, so beautifully dressed! I never saw anything like it before. We have been to see lots of churches, which I didn't think were very interesting, though they certainly were very grand, especially La Madeleine and Notre Dame; and at one very old church called St. Germain's, we were told that by its bell the signal was given for some dreadful massacre—that of the Huguenots, I think. We have seen lots of statues," Lilian went on. "I never saw such a place of statues; there are whole galleries full of them, besides those in the streets; but I really cannot see what there is in them for so many people to run after, for they all have very large waists, and their hair twisted into ugly little nobs."

"Poor Lily, she is incorrigible," laughed Bertie after the letter had been read, and just a little feeling of bitterness crept into his heart that Lilian, who understood it so little, should be having an opportunity that, if it had been his, he would have so keenly appreciated.

The next letter they received was from Florence. It contained an account of more beautiful scenery, grand churches, monuments, and sculpture. The sight of mountains seemed to have struck her more than anything she had yet seen. "You cannot imagine how grand they are," she wrote; "they seem to reach from heaven to earth. We have tried one ascent, but I did not enjoy it at all. It was terribly cold, and felt frightfully dangerous."

No more letters came from Lilian until she had reached Rome, and then they were so full of wonderful things she had seen that it would take up all my space to give an account of them. She saw St. Peter's—most gorgeous of cathedrals; and the Vatican, which contains some of the rarest works of art the world has produced.

Uncle and Aunt Barnard settled down finally in a charming villa on the outskirts of Rome. And then Lilian found time for a little home-sickness, which, however, soon wore off as she became taken up with masters and studies, which seemed to have become more genial to her. Music was her chief passion, and she seemed to be in a fair way of attaining excellence in it. "The music in the churches here is so lovely," she told them, "that no one who has heard it could possibly forget; but you must not imagine that we are neglecting our own church in this Roman Catholic country. It is quite a treat to hear an English service so far away from home." By degrees a smattering of Italian crept into her letters, which drew from Bertram the remark, that Lilian would "turn out an accomplished young lady after all."

TO A MOSS-ROSE IN CHEAPSIDE.

BY W. C. BENNETT.

WHAT you, you flush our city air,
You, Summer's boast and pride;
You born to show all things most fair
Less fair by your sweet side!

What with our feverish thirst for gold
Have you, sweet thing, to do?
Where all things else are bought and sold,
Rose, will they barter you?

Why not? O welcome, welcomed come,
Of hidden Nature speak
Of whom all else is here so dumb,
Our thought of her grows weak;
Show us with more than this poor life
Of streets we have to do;
Adieu to all the city's strife,
I'm far, sweet rose, with you.

What pleasant thoughts you bring to-day!
What leafy country hours,
Haunts where the long day dies away
From grass-plots heaped with flowers!
With fountained lawns my eyes you bless;
Trim walks I loiter through;
In peace and garden quietness
I dwell, sweet rose, with you.

Ah, now a cottage front you bring,
A porch cool shadows fill,
Up which sweet honeysuckles cling
And wander at their will;
The vine is green, and you I see
The casement peeping through;
The glowing summer moon for me
Is flushed, sweet rose, with you.

O quiet thoughts, stay with me, stay,
You leafy summer hours!
Ah me! but life must deal to-day
With other things than flowers!
Come, city thoughts! come, work and care!
Adieu, sweet dreams, adieu;
Of thoughts full poor must be the share
I give, sweet rose, to you.

O drooping bud! O weary change,
This grey and stony street
For all that to our eyes is strange,
All yours were wont to meet!
Yet I too, Nature's child, I pine
Her far-off face to view;
As weary are these thoughts of mine
As those that wither you.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER XVIII.

IRINA had returned to London about a fortnight when the day arrived for Ruth's departure; Maurice was going too, partly to escort Ruth, and partly to see Mr. Leighton, who had already written him a very cordial letter, and wished to see him. Accordingly, one day early in October, Stephen drove Maurice and Ruth to the station and for some time the three walked up and down the platform, waiting for the train. When it arrived at length, and Maurice and Ruth were seated in the carriage, Stephen stood with his hand on the door, talking to Maurice, while Ruth listened silently, and looked wistfully at Stephen's sad face, which appeared almost sadder when he turned to her with a smile, and said, "Ruth, this departure is different from your last. You never looked happier than now."

Ruth's happiness seemed of rather a doubtful cast, for her eyes filled with tears, and she answered with a quivering lip, as she put out her hand, "I don't like going away from you though, Dr. Rae."

The train began to move. Stephen waited on the platform until he could no longer see Ruth looking out. When the little station was out of sight, Ruth sank back on her seat with a sigh.

"What is the matter with my little Ruth?" asked Maurice.

"I don't know," she answered tremulously; "I don't know whether I feel happy or unhappy."

"Isn't that treason to me?" asked Maurice, smiling.

"No. But I can't help thinking that Dr. Rae looked so sad. I don't know what is the matter with him."

"Is it not natural that he should look sad when you are going away? You seem hardly to recollect your importance to every one."

"Oh, Maurice! if I didn't recollect my importance to you, should I be as happy as I am?"

"I was setting myself aside, because I regarded that as a matter of course. But I have often noticed your tendency to disregard your own influence on others."

"That is because I feel as if I did not have any. I am so dependent on others." Then Ruth suddenly looked up with a laugh, and said, "I never could have lived a Robinson Crusoe life; it would have killed me."

"You would have been

> 'A flower born to blush unseen,
> And waste its fragrance on the desert air.'

In that case what would have become of me? I should have lived and died a bachelor."

"No, you would have seen some other girl that you would have cared for. I don't think you are of the bachelor type."

"Then you don't regard my choice as any compliment to you especially. From that I am to infer, I suppose, that it is merely chance, your preference of me."

"Yes, in one sense. Because, Maurice, I don't think there is only one man in the world that I could have loved. Of course, now, I could never love any one else but you, only in the first instance circumstances decide the question."

"My darling child," said Maurice, who had been listening with some amusement to Ruth's avowal, "this certainly does not sound like the romantic love one reads of in books; it takes down my pride, and humbles me considerably."

Ruth smiled, but then became grave again, and began very earnestly, "Maurice dear, I do want you to understand, and not to laugh at me. It isn't a prosaic idea at all, really; it only shows that sympathy is wider spread. And love is sympathy, isn't it?"

"Yes," replied Maurice, "I agree with your doctrine in reality; but I like to make you talk about things. Do you know why?"

"No."

"For two reasons. Firstly, because sometimes you are shy with me, and I mean to cure you, so that I may have the benefit of all you can say if you will; secondly, because then the expression comes into your face that you used to have when you were dreamy, and would never tell me what you were thinking about. I used to try and catch that look in sketching you."

CHAPTER XIX.

Maurice took up his abode in London for the ensuing year, and as soon as he was settled he began to work hard at his painting, which had lately been somewhat neglected. In the spring he sent some pictures to the Academy, which were highly spoken of in the papers, and Ruth collected all the notices she could lay her hands on, and treasured them carefully, as some compensation for the fact that all the pictures were sold, and that she would not be likely to see them again.

In the summer Ruth went to Manchester, on a visit to Mary and Dayrell, and stayed there long enough for Maurice to grow impatient at the length of her absence. The consequence was that he came down unexpectedly and after a few days carried her off to the Willows in triumph.

One evening Maurice was going home with Ruth, up the stream from the Forsters'. He rowed diligently for some time, then resting on his oars, he said exultingly, "Only three weeks to-day, Ruth!"

Ruth looked up from the water, in which she had been idly dabbling her hand, and sighed in answer.

"This has been such a short year! I almost wish we were going to have another like it," she said presently; "no, I don't, except——"

"That you do repent a little," suggested Maurice, smiling.

"No, I only feel as if by making any change we should break the spell of happiness."

"You superstitious little goose!" laughed Maurice. "What calamity does your vivid imagination conjure up?"

"Nothing especial, and of course, really, it will be more perfect than ever, as we shall live so near, because we shall see Mrs. Rae and Stephen so often. Do you know, Maurice, I think it would be nice if we came down here at once, just because of that," said Ruth, laughing.

"It is better as it is," answered Maurice, rowing more vigorously again, and looking gravely at Ruth for a minute before he said, "Darling, I think you ought to know, now that Stephen has decided upon it, that he is going away."

"Going away!" echoed Ruth in dismay; "when?"

"In about a month. Have you never heard him speak of wishing to go to France, since the war broke out?"

"Oh, Maurice! is he really going there? I have heard him speak of it, but I never thought he meant it seriously." Ruth turned quite pale as she spoke, and then suddenly exclaimed, "Can't he be persuaded not to go? It is so dreadful!" She shuddered and covered her face with her hands.

"I have dreaded telling you this, dear child," said Maurice, tenderly. "I waited until I knew it would be impossible, even if desirable, to keep it from you. Stephen is quite determined now."

"Maurice, I must try to persuade him—but it is sure to be of no use. What can be done?"

"Nothing, dear. Remember he wishes to go. He will be happier if he does so. Why should you try to oppose it, or be so unhappy about it?"

"I am afraid, Maurice," sobbed Ruth, "there will be danger, won't there?"

"A doctor is not necessarily exposed to great danger. It depends upon where his duties lie. You must not at once look on the dark side of the case, Ruth. Look at mother. Is she not devotedly fond of Stephen?"

"Yes."

"She knows he is going, and yet she is cheerful, and does not attempt to persuade him to remain. Stephen has told her all about it, so run in and talk to her, and hear all she has to say."

Maurice jumped out of the boat and then turned round and helped Ruth out. "Stephen would not like to see your pale little face," he said as he kissed her.

"Maurice, the spell is broken now," she whispered.

"My darling!" he exclaimed, reproachfully. Ruth looked up quickly, and seeing his pained expression, added remorsefully, "No—no, I don't mean that, because it can never be in one sense—never." And she put her arm round his neck and clung to him, so that Maurice could not doubt her earnest words.

A long talk with Mrs. Rae that evening, and another with Stephen when she went out for a drive with him the next morning, besides the overwhelming sense of happiness, which Ruth felt in spite of herself, restored her to something like her ordinary condition, and the days glided away, bringing the wedding nearer and nearer.

Letty Heath and Maude Ashleigh were to be Ruth's bridesmaids, and Jack Forster the groomsman.

"It seems to me as if all the world were going to be at your wedding, Ruth," said Mrs. Rae one evening, as they were seated in the garden, "you ought to feel honoured."

"The honour is chiefly Maurice's, I think," answered Ruth.

"Not at all," said Maurice.

"Oh! but I like to think so, because I am very proud of your having so many friends. I wish I could be a spectator of the wedding, to see how pretty it will look."

"If you were only a spectator it would not look pretty."

"Oh, Maurice! don't be silly," said Ruth, laughing; "and rude too. Think how pretty Mrs. Rae will look, and Tina, and Maude, and—everybody. I mean all the ladies. Oh, Stephen! I meant to tell you to be sure not to have your hair cut on your forehead again, it will be just the right length by then."

"I will remember your injunctions," replied Stephen, opening a book which lay on his knee as if to read, but after all watching Ruth as she laughed and talked, while his thoughts were dwelling on the wedding day. Not on the wedding itself, but on the parting which would follow it. He could not shake off his thoughts, and presently rising, he walked into the house.

"Why is Stephen so much away now? It is worse than ever!" exclaimed Ruth, a few days later, as he hurried off from dinner, in order to keep an appointment in the town.

"I suppose he is preparing for his absence next week, and perhaps even for his final departure," replied Maurice. "He is gone to see Dr. Lambert, who is to take his practice."

"I should have thought that after his return from London there would have been plenty of time for that. It seems to me I shall hardly see anything more of him," sighed Ruth, as she and Maurice strolled into the garden, where they remained until it grew dark, and then they went in, and Ruth sang and played.

The next few days seemed to pass by very quickly, as they often do before any great event, and now there were only two more days before the departure of the Raes, and of Ruth to London, where the Ashleighs, Heaths, and Forsters were to follow the day before the wedding.

The evening had passed in conversation and music, and Stephen had been at home all the time—a rare occurrence now.

"Oh! how I should like to sit up much later," said Ruth, "I don't like to break up such a nice evening."

"Nice evenings come every evening though," replied Maurice, smiling.

"Stephen isn't always at home," said Ruth, a little mischievously as she came up to where he was standing, to say good night. "I do appreciate your being at home, you see."

Stephen kissed her in answer, and when Ruth mounted the stairs at the bottom of which they had all been standing, he turned towards his study, saying, "Maurice, I want to speak to you."

Maurice followed Stephen into the room and closed the door, then flung himself into the arm-chair and waited for his brother to speak.

Stephen was standing with his arms folded, in front of the fireplace, and after a pause he began: "You know I had intended leaving in about a fortnight;" and then he stopped abruptly, looking at Maurice, who said, "Yes?" in a questioning tone.

"Well, I have altered my plans. I find I must go immediately—early to-morrow morning." He spoke quickly, and in a constrained voice, unlike his usual tone.

"Impossible!" exclaimed Maurice, impetuously. "What do you mean, Stephen?"

"That I must go to-morrow morning."

Maurice's eyes were fixed upon his brother's face, and as he looked at the rigid mouth and contracted brow he suddenly sprang to his feet, and putting his hands on Stephen's shoulders, said breathlessly, "Why must you go?"

There was a pause. That pause confirmed Maurice in a suspicion which had haunted him at times, and which he had shaken off, but it now rose up so vividly that he felt he must know the truth, as the suspense was worse than the knowledge would be.

"Stephen, do I know why? Tell me quickly." He said this in a harsh, peremptory tone, looking at Stephen all the time.

"Maurice, I have told you all I have to tell."

"Are you keeping nothing from me?" asked Maurice, eagerly; "if I thought so I should be happy; but——"

"Be happy," replied Stephen, in a calm, steady voice.

"It is impossible now that I believe my happiness has caused so much trouble to you. You don't deny that it has caused you trouble," added Maurice, with a convulsive sob. "Then it is true, Stephen?" He threw himself down into the arm-chair, and exclaimed passionately, "If my death could make you happy, I would——"

"Maurice, think what you are saying. Your life, your happiness, are not your own. If anything can cause me pain, it is that you should say anything that would pain Ruth. You have no right to wish a single difference in all that has happened."

Maurice made a gesture of impatience, and was about to answer; but Stephen placed his hand on his shoulder, saying, "Let me speak."

"I cannot: every word cuts me. I have a right to wish that you had not loved Ruth, or that she had loved you," said Maurice, fiercely.

"No; to alter what is, would be to alter Ruth herself—and, my brother, you cannot wish that. Listen to me for a minute longer," continued Stephen, "even though I go now because I cannot bear the pain of wishing her good-bye, I firmly believe this love to be the greatest blessing of my life. I can't realise it now, but nevertheless it is so. Let me keep this treasure that I could not part with, and don't grieve for me, Maurice."

Stephen's eyes filled with tears as he looked at Maurice, whose smothered sobs were so passionate and uncontrollable, "Can I ever forgive myself for letting you know this?" he asked sadly; "I meant to keep it a secret all my life."

Maurice looked up into Stephen's face, and his breast heaved as he tried to speak again; but he could not form the words that he wished to say. Springing from his seat, he flung his arms round Stephen, and they met in one long fervent embrace. Then Maurice turned to the door, and left the room.

Neither Maurice nor Stephen slept that night, and as soon as it began to grow light, Maurice dressed himself that he might accompany Stephen to the station. As the sun rose, and cleared the white mists from the valleys, shining more and more brilliantly every moment, the two brothers walked to the station to catch the first London train. Until the train came up they had not talked much; for Stephen could not trust himself to give a message to Ruth, and Maurice was too sad to converse; but just before Stephen stepped into the carriage, he turned back again, and taking Maurice's hand, said, "Give my love to Ruth—and, Maurice, don't let her think me unkind."

"She will not, and, believe me, she shall not, Stephen. Write soon. Good-bye."

Stephen grasped his hand. "Good-bye, my boy! you know all that I wish you."

Maurice turned away and walked slowly home. How to break the news to Ruth he could not tell. He thought of a thousand ways of breaking it to her, but they all seemed so abrupt, as if they would make the shock too great for his sensitive little Ruth to bear. When he arrived home, he stood in the garden, longing, yet dreading for her to come out; and then he had a restless desire to go away, and come back when she knew it. But no—nobody but himself should tell her.

At last there was a little trilling song in the house, the sound travelled gradually downwards, and Ruth appeared, singing "Summer is a coming in." Maurice heard the words as she danced across the lawn.

> "Prophet of the merry throat,
> Loudly sing, cuckoo;
> For thou bring'st, whene'er thou sing'st,
> Good tidings, ay, and true."

"Oh, Maurice! how early you are," she exclaimed, breaking off her song as she drew near. Maurice stood quite still; he could not go to meet her. Ruth stopped when she had come nearly up to him, with the wondering and rather frightened expression that made Maurice blurt out suddenly, in spite of his carefully-arranged speeches,—"I have been to the station with Stephen; he has gone away this morning."

"To France?"

"Yes." (To be continued.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

III.—WITH THE CHILDREN'S CHILDREN.

THAT great invading French army of nobles, gentry, artists, traders, handicraftsmen, of which some account has already been given, was added to from time to time, even as lately as the Revolution, and the restoration of the dynasty after the downfall of Napoleon, when a strange reaction against the Protestants was commenced, partly as a pretence for concealing political animosity. The department of the Gard was once more the scene of horrible atrocities, against which Lord Brougham invoked the aid of the English Parliament, and obtained the help of Austrian bayonets to protect the people, who were being murdered, tortured, or outraged, in defiance of feeble local authorities. But by this time there was a new generation of the first great Anglo-French colony in London. Spitalfields had grown to the dimensions of a township. Bethnal had begun to lose its greenness. There was, as there still is, a remarkable settlement about Soho. "Petty France" was as well known as the exhibition of needlework in Leicester Square, or Mr. Salmon's wax figures in Fleet Street.

Those poor refugees who fled to escape from the horrors of Sainte Guillotine, or the ruthless cruelties at Nismes, came to brethren many of whom had never seen the glowing valleys and golden fields of Languedoc, whence their forefathers escaped only with life and hands to work. They had preserved their national characteristics; they attended churches and chapels where the pastors still spoke in their native language, and where they had established schools for their children; but they had settled down to a quiet, though a busy life, in the heart of the great workshop of the world, and only a few of them—principally the gentry, some of whom had regained a portion of their property—felt frequent or urgent impulses to return. More than a hundred and twenty years had elapsed since the "Royal Bounty" had been expended in the relief of the 27,000 émigrés who yet were without any permanent refuge for the destitute, the sick, the aged, and the insane among their number. This was in 1688, and it was not till nearly twenty-eight years afterwards that any regular institution was organised. The earlier refugees had become aged or had died, after having obtained such temporary help as could be afforded by subscriptions or the large benefactions of their more wealthy fellow-countrymen. Still, the later emigrations increased the number of applicants for permanent relief. At last, in 1718, a great concourse of French refugees assembled in a chapel which formed a special portion of a building only just completed, but which had already received the dignity of forming the subject of a Royal charter granted by His Majesty King George I. to his "right trusty and right well-beloved cousin, Henry de Massue, Marquis de Ruvigny, Earl of Galloway, and a number of trusty and well-beloved gentlemen, all naturalised refugees, who made the first governor and directors of the "Hospital for Poor French Protestants and their descendants residing in Great Britain;" otherwise known as the French Hospital, but soon to be spoken of with simple pathetic brevity as "La Providence."

The idea of founding such a charity was due to a distinguished refugee in Holland—no less a personage than M. de Gastigny, Master of the Hounds to Prince William of Orange; a ruddy, jovial-looking gentleman withal, whose portrait, should you go to see it, will set you wondering whether he could ever have been classed among the "sour sectaries" to whom it was the fashion to attribute a disregard of social pleasures. A bequest of a thousand pounds sterling from the bluff keeper of the kennels was to be divided into equal sums—£500 for the building, and the interest of the remaining £500 to be spent on its maintenance.

Not a very adequate provision, truly, for any such purpose; but sufficiently suggestive to set the more prosperous members of the great Anglo-French colony to increase the amount. The astute Master of the Hounds must surely have foreseen this result when he left this legacy to the management of the trustees of the already existing relief fund, still miscalled "the Royal Bounty." They exhibited that prudence in money matters which is a French characteristic, and let the thousand pounds accumulate for eight years, after which a general subscription was invited from successful merchants and traders, while with a just appreciation of the benefits which had been conferred by these good citizens on the land of their adoption, some wealthy Englishmen added their contributions to the general fund.

Thus it came about, that a piece of land was purchased in the Golden Acre—a queer old half-countrified precinct of St. Giles, Cripplegate—that a building was erected for the reception of eighty poor persons, that a charter was granted, and that the new charitable association was consecrated in the new chapel by Philippe Menard, the minister of the French Church of St. James's and secretary of the enterprise.

This was, indeed, something worth working for. The aged or afflicted poor among the refugees were no longer mere mendicants living on precarious alms. Out of their abundance the more prosperous gave cheerfully. In 1736 another adjoining site was purchased, and another side of the great open quadangle of garden ground was built upon, so that by 1760 the "Providence" numbered 230 inmates. This, however, was its culminating point of usefulness. Religious persecution had diminished, and at length may be said to have ceased altogether. Even as early as 1720 only 5,000 persons required relief from the "Bounty," so that eventually the trustees were enabled to devote part of it to the assistance of those who fled from the Revolution—many of whom were the descendants of those who had been the persecutors of the Protestants. The great industrial colony, prudent, temperate, and industrious, had almost grown beyond its earlier needs—and all that it required was that some adequate provision should be made for infirm or aged men and women, who being widowed or unmarried, and without means of support, required a refuge in which they might peacefully end their days. The same causes which had diminished the number of applicants had also reduced the amount of current subscriptions, so that some portion of the building was removed, as being no longer necessary, and in order to secure a sufficient endowment an Act of Parliament was obtained, empowering the directors to let their land on building leases. By that time the neighbourhood was known not as "the Golden Acre," but as St. Luke's, and on the ground once purchased by the Marquis de Ruvigny and his trusty and well-beloved companions, grew Radnor Street, Galway Street, Gastigny Place, and part of Bath Street, while the number of inmates was reduced to sixty—that is to say, about twenty men and forty women, all of whom were to be above sixty years of age, of French extraction, and professing the Protestant religion. It was a queer old range of building, that retreat; pleasant enough, perhaps, when as a rather blank series of red brick houses, it looked across its own formal walled garden to the pleasant fields and open country, but strangely silent, and with a crumbling, dreary look about it, when the lunatic asylum of St. Luke's dominated all the surrounding tenements of a crowded, sordid neighbourhood. Only the initiated could easily find the little low black door that opened in the bare wall, and led to the large irregular space, which was laid out in weedy beds and stony borders, distinguished by an air of decay rather than of production—especially where in certain dank corners a tangle of sapless stalks and tendrils indicated some faintly hopeful attempt to rear an arbour, in which persons of robust imagination might fancy they were sheltered from impending blacks that issued from the manufactory chimneys close by. The visitor to this out-of-the-way corner of the great city, seeing the old people walking up and down the paved causeway in front of the row of crooked-paned lower windows, or airing themselves at the doorsteps, might be excused for the fancy that they had the imaginative faculty of children; and were expected to "make believe" a good deal before they could quite reconcile themselves to the notion that this dingy area of quadrilateral plots and paths, in which the wet stood in small puddles, was ever a "pleasaunce" gay with garden blooms, and smelling of knotted marjoram and fragrant thyme. Yet there were still evidences of the invincible cheerfulness of the old French nature, among the old creatures with faces streaked like winter apples, and hands which, even though they trembled, were swift of gesture and of emphasis.

There were old fellows there who had still about them indications of true comeliness and grace that distinguished them from all vulgar surroundings;—ancient gentlemen, who would go out on wet days to sweep away any rainpools that might lie before the doors of the old ladies, and so besmirch an otherwise immaculate shoe. It should be remembered, too, that there was no livery there. Those who had some one to help them to the garb of gentility wore what pleased them; those who were dependent on the charity for clothing, were neither bound in one pattern, nor condemned to the uniform of poverty. Neat or lively cotton prints, or warm stuff gowns, with proper hose and caps and kerchiefs, for the women; plain Oxford mixture, black, steel grey, or brown, for the men, and each one measured for his suit. Those who entered there were not the recipients of a dole grudgingly conceded. It was no poorhouse, but the "Providence." Even ten years ago there were some evidences of the old meaning of the place in the remnants of the antique furniture which adorned the queer rooms. They were not wards or dormitories, but veritable bedrooms; and each one had its own peculiarities, even in the bedsteads with spindle posts and dimity hangings, the boxes and cupboards, and special chairs which distinguished it from the rest. Some of these things had evidently been heirlooms either of the institution or of the individual; and, indeed, the preservation of individuality was a cheerful feature of the place, despite its dim and somewhat dreary surroundings.

The Board Room was, in its way, one of the most extraordinary apartments in London: with its tables supported by a tangled puzzle of legs, its high-backed, polished chairs with leather seats, worn till they reminded one of the cover of an antique ledger bound in unfinished calf; its wonderful old black-framed prints representing the meetings of the Huguenots in the Clerk's field in the times when men and women carried their lives in their hands, and dragoons rode congregations down and slashed them with sabres as they fell. Its dimly-seen portraits of the noble, broad-browed, dark-eyed Ruvigny (the first governor), who refused to go back to France even at the invitation of the King; of the gentle Pastor Menard, with high, capacious forehead, and calm, strong mien; of hale, shrewd, ruddy Gastigny; and of some men of later date, with Frenchman written in every line of their finely-marked faces.

The little room set apart as a chapel—a barely-furnished place enough, with desk and raised platform and plain seats—was venerable because of all the meaning that lay in its studied absence of all ornament, and because of the intensity of meaning that it must once have had to the sad-eyed men who crowded into it, some thinking, perhaps, how it had come about that they could stand there without a hand upon the hilt of a sword.

There were even, at that later time, old men and women in the dim old building who could repeat family legends of the emigration—for they lived to a great age, these French folk, many of them being still alert of eye and ear and foot, even though they had heard the click of the shuttle and the rattle of the loom eighty years before.

Some of them have survived the old place itself; for while they are in a new home, the ancient building has changed, if even it be not altogether dismantled. The leases paid good interest, and eight years ago a new French Hospital arose—away from the dingy old precinct of the Golden Acre.

To see this later "Providence" aright, you must come through the very heart of that neighbourhood which was once the great Silk Colony, thread the bye-ways of Poverty Market, note the tall silent houses where the looms no longer rattle, nor the sharp whirr of the shuttle stirs cage-birds to sing; pass along the debatable land lying on the edge of Shoreditch, where human beings live in sties built in the backyards of other houses, in streets that are still with the blank silence of misery and want. You should pass among pigeon and dog fanciers; call in at certain dingy, slipshod taverns, where at night a slouching company will meet to hear bullfinches pipe for wagers, and where starving men and women stand and drink away the pence that are all too few to buy food for the starving brood at home, and so are flung upon the sloppy counter in exchange for the drugged drink that feels like food and fire in one. Through Bethnal Green, with its "townships" and its "Follies," extending in sordid rows of tenements built to one dreary pattern. Over districts which, only a few years ago, were fields and open spaces, leading to farm lands and hedgerows, and so away to the great expanse of marsh land where the dappled kine wade knee-deep in the lush pastures, and the stunted pollards stand like patient fishermen upon the river's brink.

CHAPTER XLII.

REPENTANCE AT LEISURE.

WHEN she had set things as right as it was possible to set them at Ashmead, Beatrice and her husband found themselves with more leisure on their hands than they knew what to do with. They drove about the neighbourhood a good deal at first, but they got tired of that, and of each other's society before long. The days lagged interminably. Their only interest was in the approaching trial, and that was not a pleasurable interest. It began also to take John Baselow to London frequently, much more frequently, Beatrice began to understand, than there was any necessity for, and she was thus left in absolute loneliness to chew the cud of reflection during many a long bright summer day.

There was the garden—a homely one, it is true, for old Mr. Baselow had preferred the useful to the ornamental, but even he had had some sympathy with the luxuriousness of Nature—and the rose bushes still blossomed round the cabbage and potato beds. Beatrice had gathered them diligently at first, but now they withered neglected, as they had been used to wither. There was an old orchard, whose moss-grown trees still bore downy plums and rose-cheeked apples; but Beatrice saw the fruitage form, and swell, and plump, and colour as the days went by, till she almost hated the sight of it, so much a part did it seem of the dreadful monotony. All round lay the flat meadows, and the long, low horizon, unbroken save by a line of feathery willows marking where a streamlet crawled along, or stagnated, or by a cluster of roofs round a grey church tower. There was plenty of life about the place. Cows calved and sheep ran about with their lambs, pigs littered and countless broods of chickens, and ducklings were brought forth, but Beatrice took no interest in anything of the sort. When she had made up with her clever fingers the last new bonnet or gown, for the materials of which she had had a journey to London, almost the only thing worth living for, her occupation was gone, and the terrible weariness of having nothing to do took possession of her.

In default of servants—for good servants were not to be had without the prospect of regular wages, and besides would not have been likely to put up with the accommodation at Ashmead, so that the pair had had sense enough not to seek to introduce them in the present stage—in default of servants a man and his wife had been brought in from one of the cottages on the property. The man was a labourer—a great, rough, hulking fellow; the woman, a small, slight, rather pretty-looking creature. They had one child, a girl of ten, who was thrown into the bargain as it were. The man was to be allowed to go to work as usual, and the woman was to earn the house-room and food of the family. In her girlhood the woman had been a respectable servant, and she was remarkably quick and clever, as was also her little girl, so that Beatrice was better off for service than she was at all aware of. But she was by no means a gainer by Mrs. Baffles' society. She, poor thing, had had so doleful an experience of marriage, that she was not only ready to pour out the sorrows she had endured, but to prognosticate the like sorrows to all who had entered on the same evil estate. Three of her children had been born dead through overwork and ill-usage. She had been beaten; she had been starved; she had almost been frozen to death, and she was but seven-and-twenty, and she poured out her desperate experience of matrimony for the benefit of her sympathising mistress, Beatrice being forced into sympathy by solitude. Mrs. Baffles had already formed a very bad opinion of her master, and it was she who had set afloat the rumours concerning his cruelty to his mother, in which she herself firmly believed.

One day John Baselow had left Ashmead early and gone up to town by one of the morning trains, saying that he would not return that night. After a long day's absence Beatrice did not make returning home as agreeable to him as he thought he had a right to expect. He had just replenished his purse by the sale of some of the stock, and had promised himself a little pleasure, as a reward for the not very pleasant business which he had to transact in seeing the lawyer who was managing his case, and in the periodical visit to his mother's quarters, in order to pay her board, which he had guaranteed a month in advance.

He might say what he chose about business, however, Beatrice knew that he was bent on pleasure, and she wanted to share it. She had asked to go up with him, and he had refused to take her. But that was no reason why she should stay moping there all by herself. She could surely go up to town without asking her husband's leave. She wanted to know how they were getting on at home—whether Jerry had recovered (poor Geraldine, on whose grave the grass was growing green already); whether Ada still lived with her cousin, and what father and mother and Albert and his wife were about. The desire to see them had come upon her often of late. She was discovering, rather to her dismay, that she had a heart after all, and that the memories of home were stirring it strongly.

To-day, no sooner had she begun to long for home, than she resolved to gratify her longing; and no sooner had she formed her resolution than she began to act upon it. She dressed herself without delay in her plainest and quietest things, and started off for the station, about a couple of miles off from the house. She was so far fortunate that she almost immediately caught a train, and modestly seating herself in a second-class carriage, was soon whirling along the line to London.

When she arrived at the London terminus, she hailed an omnibus and proceeded on her journey. Ere long she reached the familiar main road, and was set down close to the door of the house which she had left as Beatrice Lovejoy. She hurried up to it, oppressed by a feeling of consciousness for which she could not account, and which made her shade her face with her parasol, and keep her eyes steadily fixed on the ground. At length she stood before it, and was about to lift her hand to the knocker, but she had almost fallen forward, for the door stood wide open. She advanced a step or two and looked into the front parlour. It was empty. It seemed as if the painters were in the house, for there stood on the hearth a bucket and a brush, but no one was there. She stood still for a moment, and the life she had lived there passed before her eyes with a vividness she had never before realised the possibility of. Turning away, she passed up the stair, which echoed as the stairs of empty houses echo. She looked into every room; each seemed to have some old story written on its walls. A feeling of loneliness, of desolation, almost made her weep. She quitted the house without knowing what she should do next. Timidly she ventured to knock at the next door and inquire where her friends had gone to. The woman who opened it recognised her, but treated her as a stranger, evidently more than doubtful of her respectability. Beatrice asked if she knew where her neighbours had gone to? It was a difficult question to ask, for it revealed her ignorance of what she ought certainly to have known—the abode of her own parents. More than ever doubtful of her, the woman answered that she knew nothing about them, adding that she always kept herself to herself, a statement which she made as if it contained the sum of human wisdom.

Beatrice turned away, hiding her hurt. She was feeling faint, for she had breakfasted early and lightly, and had still a long journey before her, so she went into the shop of a third-rate baker and confectioner, and bought a penny bun, with which, and a glass of cold water, she regaled herself, debating in her mind the while whether or not she should cross London's extreme breadth, and seek from Fanny some information concerning her family. She had just made up her mind to do this, when, turning a corner, she ran up against her husband. But for the actual contact causing both to start and stare, they would have passed unrecognised and unrecognising.

"What are you doing here?" cried John Baselow, in a voice of angry astonishment; "I thought you were safe at home."

"I am safe enough here," replied the reckless Beatrice.

"I ask you what you are doing here?" he shouted.

She looked at him defiantly. "I have been to see my father," she said.

"What business had you to come without letting me know?" he replied, thoroughly enraged.

"I did not think of it till after you were gone," she answered. Her instinct told her that the tug of war had come, and that if she yielded she would be this man's slave for the rest of her life. They stood still, glaring at each other, and Beatrice did not flinch.

"Well, and where are you going now?" he asked.

"Home," she thought fit to answer. She did not care to pursue her purpose that day.

"You'll be sorry you married me if you do this sort of thing often," he said.

"For that matter," she answered, "I'm sorry enough already, and I mean to do as I please."

Beatrice certainly was not a manageable person at the best, reckless and defiant she was still less so. She looked dangerous.

"The sort of woman to get a man into a regular mess," was her husband's flattering opinion of her.

He turned with her, however, and saw her into the omnibus, and on leaving her he touched his hat mockingly, an action of which she took outwardly no notice, but which roused her passionate and vindictive temper to the utmost.

Once at home, Beatrice gave way to her passion, and indulged in fits of hysterical rage and weeping. Calm succeeded storm, and storm succeeded calm in her ill-disciplined mind, till she had completely worn herself out; then she went to bed and fell asleep from exhaustion before the evening light had faded from the sky. How long she had been asleep she did not know, but she was suddenly awakened by the crash of some heavy body falling. She started up, and listening intently, thought she heard a suppressed scream. She jumped out of bed, and opening her bedroom door, stood rooted to the landing, while the man and his wife below carried on a horrible altercation. Beatrice's blood was rising and her heart beat wildly as she heard the poor creature pursued and taken, pleading all the while to be let alone for fear of waking the mistress. Beatrice was brave; she hastened back to her room, threw on some clothes, and went down-stairs, making as much noise as she could.

"There's the mistress coming," she heard the woman say, who immediately came out of the kitchen and met her on the stair, entreating her to return.

"He will murder me—he will murder both of us!" she whispered. But Beatrice went on. She paused, however, on the threshold and looked in. The drunken wretch had flung a chair at his wife's head. That was the cause of the noise which had resounded through the house and awakened its sleeping mistress. There he was, a strong, terrible beast, and Beatrice wavered, though he looked cowed when he saw her. Just then she happened to see the key in the lock outside the kitchen door, and adroitly, and without the least appearance of terror, turned it on him, and left him to his own reflections, commanding his trembling wife to come and sleep in her room, where she made a bed for her on the floor.

Beatrice was learning to make herself formidable, if need were. In the morning she went down and released her prisoner, waking him at the same time, and threatening, to his dimly apprehensive mind, a number of penalties unknown to the law, if ever he transgressed in the same way again. At the same time she resolved that nothing should induce her to stay another night alone at Ashmead.

CHAPTER XLIII.

"HINDLEY v. BASELOW."

THE case of "Hindley v. Baselow" was not a cause célèbre. It was very quietly disposed of, one dark November day, at Westminster Hall, in a thinly attended court. Beatrice and her husband were there, and Beatrice looked unusually beautiful under the veil which she kept over her face to hide the flush of anxiety and excitement that had settled upon it. Both she and her husband had suffered a good deal during those final weeks of waiting—neither of them confessed to the other how much; neither of them sought the sympathy of the other. John Baselow was doubtful of the issue of the case, on which for him so much depended, because he was doubtful of his father ever having any good intent toward him, and he had naturally communicated his doubt to Beatrice; and Beatrice had not assured him that it would make no difference to their happiness, as most young wives would have done, fully believing also in their own anticipations, however fallacious. Neither had he whispered, as married lovers will, that with her he held a prize greater than wealth or worldly inheritance. There was certainly no romance about Beatrice and her husband. The question which had absorbed them day and night was, whether they were to be sent back from whence they came, into the crowd of strugglers for bread, or were to grasp the reality of that wealth and position, whose semblance had been tantalising them for those months past. They coveted wealth now as they had never coveted it before. There was no longer any possibility of happiness for them apart from it. They positively shuddered at the prospect of the life which might once have satisfied them both—he at his desk in the City, she at the cares of the little household which a City clerk could maintain. They were each too selfish to imagine what the depth of the other's disappointment would have been in the event of the loss of their cause, else they would have displayed a little more sympathy when the end came—a sympathy which might have gone far to sweep away the barrier which was rising between them. The case broke down even before all the witnesses had been heard on the side of the defendant, the jury declaring themselves satisfied that old Mr. Baselow, up to the time of his decease, was in full possession of his faculties.

Philip was in attendance at court, and but for him so would Fanny Lovejoy have been. She had proposed bringing Ada and Lucy, as they were very anxious to hear the result; but a hint from Philip had sufficed to keep them away. Philip was a purist, and he feared that the facts of this man's impure life might be brought out during the trial, and therefore desired to keep Lucy and Ada away from it. But Fanny was to bring them to the Hall in the afternoon when the trial was expected to be over, and Ada was to meet her sister there for the first time since her marriage.

Beatrice had made another effort to see her family. She had written to Fanny, and ascertained the address of the lodging to which her father and mother had removed. Ada had refused to communicate with her. Ada was like a musical instrument of great compass, passive till struck, and then capable of waking up into tones of wrath, as well as of love. And her wrath was the wrath of love. She loved Beatrice still, though her heart was hot against her for her cruel desertion. Beatrice's mother, too, resented her conduct, and refused to be a party to the reconciliation which Beatrice sought.

The latter had no sooner received the address sent to her by Fanny, in as formal a manner as possible, for Fanny, acting under Ada's influence, was no longer slipshod and undecided, than she set her husband completely at nought, and announced her determination to go and see her parents at once.

"Very well," John Baselow had answered, "do as you please; but mind, I have nothing to do with them. I don't want any hangers-on of my own or yours either."

The home of the Lovejoys had been once more completely broken up. Albert was going about idle, with very little prospect of doing anything else, only that Philip, whom he had so deeply maligned, was interesting himself to obtain some kind of appointment for him; and Albert's wife and children had been joyfully taken possession of by her relations, who most devoutly hoped that some special providence might intervene to prevent the necessity of their ever being again a burden to their husband and father.

Therefore Mr. and Mrs. Lovejoy had taken lodgings for themselves and for Albert in a small house, not so far removed from the centre of things, and the old people maintained themselves and their son as best they could. Mr. Lovejoy had, at Philip's instance, succeeded to the post vacated by his son; but where the son had been barely tolerated, the father was speedily on a footing of special favour with every one in the office, from the highest to the lowest. The responsibility, if not the emolument, of his office filled his imagination. He magnified it, and it magnified him. He was delighted with his position, with his occupation, and with his associates, who were, for their part, delighted with him. Mr. Cator looked up to him as an authority on affairs of domestic economy, which he could discuss freely with a man who was able to dignify the humblest subject, as Mr. Lovejoy dignified it.

When Beatrice, in pursuance of her determination, visited the address she had obtained, she found her mother all alone, and the reception she met with was not quite affectionate. Mrs. Lovejoy was sweeping out her rooms in attire which, to her daughter's mind, was ostentatiously menial; Beatrice guessing shrewdly that her plain cotton gown and coarse holland apron were protests against the gentility of the rest of the family.

Mrs. Lovejoy offered her daughter no salutation, either by word or act, and left her to open the conversation.

"How are you, mother?" said Beatrice, who was proud and uncompliant, but knowing that her mother was the same, had come prepared to eat a certain amount of humble pie.

"I'm very well," said Mrs. Lovejoy, stiffly.

Her mother treated her as a stranger, and she looked like one there in her nice dress, which was not so fine as it was fresh and bright; nevertheless she went on, "I made up my mind," she said, "that I would come and see you in spite of him."

"In spite of whom?" her mother asked, knowing perfectly well who Beatrice meant.

"My husband," was the answer.

No response save a contemptuous "hem."

"Won't you speak to me, mother?"

"Best not, perhaps," Mrs. Lovejoy answered; "I've got little to say you'd like to hear."

"How's father?"

"Pretty well, thank you."

"And Ada? I suppose she's with her cousin still."

A mere nod of assent.

"And Jerry?" Beatrice went on.

This time Mrs. Lovejoy turned upon her daughter a never-to-be-forgotten look of anger and of sorrow.

"Jerry is in her grave."

"Oh, mother! I did not know," cried Beatrice, the tears coming as she looked down at her bright dress.

"Then you ought to," said her mother, sternly, and turned upon her with a volley of reproach. "I wouldn't mind the way you left us," she cried, "if you had not been so hard to her. If you had been a good sister to her, she might have been alive and well. I blame you for her death. I tell you it lies at your door."

"Blame me!" said Beatrice, trembling, but really unconscious of fault.

"Yes, you," her mother retorted. "Do you remember when she caught that first cold, you wouldn't lend me money to get her a pair of boots, and she got her feet wet and wet again, and it was the death of her?"

"Mother, I didn't know it would hurt," said Beatrice, stung to the quick; "you know she has often and often had wet feet before, and they did her no harm; and, for that matter, so have I. And you know, too, that when I lent you money I never got it back again, and had to go without decent things myself. I hadn't a chance unless I turned hard."

"Well, you've had your chance then," said her mother, turning away.

"I always meant to help you if I could," said Beatrice. "Do you want any money?"

"None from you," replied Mrs. Lovejoy, neither to be won nor bought.

"I've saved this," said Beatrice, holding out her hand with some coin in it; but her mother would not see, and she was obliged to return it to her pocket, deeply mortified. "Good-bye, mother," she added, without sitting down in the house.

(Drawn by W. BUCKMANN.)

"But at last his work of love was ended."

See "MY VIOLIN"—p. 349

"Good-bye," repeated Mrs. Lovejoy, sitting down as soon as Beatrice had left, and indulging in some rare and bitter tears. But when Mr. Lovejoy came home, and heard that Beatrice had been there, he rejoiced. Only too placable and ready to forgive, he was sorry that his wife had treated their eldest girl so harshly. "Look at the way she left us! "repeated Mrs. Lovejoy. "Have you forgotten that you nearly died of it?—fell down in the street in a fit; and Jerry—that she died because of her sister's hard-heartedness—have you forgotten?"

Mr. Lovejoy had not forgotten, but he needed to be reminded of the dark side of things, and he was quite willing to consign them to oblivion; and so he had written to Beatrice, and lamented his absence on the occasion of her visit. Such is human nature, however, that Beatrice valued that letter less than she would have done her mother's slightest word, and so she had never come again, and she had not seen her father till she saw him sitting opposite to her in court, trying hard to encourage her by look and smile, and contributing in no small degree to the excitement under which she laboured.

When the case was over John Baselow rose from his seat, and leaving Beatrice's side without so much as a congratulatory pressure of her hand, went over to speak to his lawyer. Beatrice, too, rose and left the court, walking calmly and steadily, but with a faintness at her heart which almost blinded her, and made her feel that she wanted her husband's arm to lean upon. It was her father who met her in the doorway, made way for her, and led her out. Standing on the steps of the court, he took both her hands in his and said, "God bless you!" The simple words moved and melted her, and she stood for a moment clinging to him, while one or two dry sobs shook her frame, while from the bottom of the hall Ada saw them, and hastened toward them where they stood.

Fanny had duly escorted Lucy and Ada thither at the hour named by Philip, which was that of the rising of the court, and they had paced up and down under its spacious roof but a very little time when the case was concluded, and Arthur Wildish hastened out to communicate the tidings to the little party. He knew they were coming, and with even more than his usual restlessness had rushed out of court several times to see if they had put in their appearance. And at last he had been rewarded by seeing Fanny sailing into the hall with a young lady on each side of her. Then he had hastened back to hear the conclusion, and be the first to carry the report of it. And there he was, striding down the hall in his gown and wig, his gown flying out behind him in the eagerness of his movements, crying as he reached them, "The case is won!" completely forgetting that, in identifying his interest with Ada's, he was separating himself from that of Mr. Tabor and his respected client. But, then, he had managed to decline being junior counsel on the other side, without violating the etiquette of his profession.

MY VIOLIN.

FASHIONED in the years of bygone ages,
By the mighty Stradiuarius' art!
Watched o'er by the music-loving sages,
Of their very lives and beings part!

On the mountain-side the tall tree, bending,
Gave itself a sacrifice for thee;
And the sough of light winds softly blending,
Sighs sometimes in thy sweet melody.

All the woodland sounds, the birds' sweet singing,
Rustling of the spring and summer breeze,
Often now are in thy tones heard ringing,
Learn'd long years since from the forest trees.

And the great Italian thought and pondered
Over thee for days and weeks and years;
Hoped sometimes, then feared, and ever wondered
What the end of all his hopes and fears.

But at last his work of love was ended,
Perfect every graceful curve and line.
Forth into the world by love attended
Went the violin I now call mine!

Mine I call thee! but not mine thy feeling,
And not mine thy wondrous moving art;
And not mine thy passion past revealing,
Touching chords long silent in my heart.

Many who have played on thee are lying
In the long sleep, peacefully at rest;
But their best and noblest thoughts undying
Ring out to the world by thee express'd.

All the best of each by thee is treasured,
All the wrong that might have been undone;
And 'tis thus as years roll on, unmeasured
Is the thrilling sweetness of thy tone.

In the case with purple velvet lining,
Gently lay I thee with tender care;
With the light of long years brightly shining,
Shedding over thee a radiance rare.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 14. ST. PETER. PART III.

Chapters to be read—Parts of John xxi.; Acts ii., iii., ix.

INTRODUCTION. A good many events in St. Peter's life have been necessarily passed over. Let the children name some—e.g., his being sent to prepare the Passover, his being with Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane and at the Transfiguration his cutting off the ear of Malchus, and running with St. John to the sepulchre. Ask what all these teach us about him—viz., that he loved to be with Christ, and to do something for Christ. What did this show? love and devotion. Did these ever fail?

I. PETER FORGIVEN. (Read John xxi. 15—19.) Bring the scene before the children. The apostles after Christ's resurrection return to their fishing; never idle, though apostles. Christ in the morning on the shore, just as before when Peter was called by Him; the net cast into the sea; the draught of great fishes; John recognising Christ first, but Peter jumping into the sea in his haste to reach Him: then the dinner, and after that the conversation. What did Christ ask Peter—how often? why three times? How must love be shown? who are Christ's lambs? (Ps. xxiii. 1; John x. 16.) How was Peter to feed them? (1 Peter ii. 2.) Did he like the question being put three times—why not? Was it meant to show a doubt of his love? how did Peter answer—boastfully or humbly? What a change in his manner! Then show the prophecy as to Peter's end; had been bold, free fisherman; going where he liked, doing what he liked; now called to work for Christ; must give up his own will, be carried into strange places, such as prison, and at last be crucified like Christ. Must suffer all things for Christ. All this a proof of his being forgiven. If Christ not cared for him, would have left him alone; being forgiven, must live and die for Christ.

II. PETER PREACHING. (Read Acts ii. 14—28.) Ask how long Christ was on earth after His resurrection; where the apostles saw Him; where He ascended; what they did then (Acts i. 12); what they were waiting for—how long they waited—how they spent their time; who was chosen in Judas' place. Then describe the scene of the descent of the Holy Ghost; the rushing wind and the cloven tongues; the strange languages. Ask what the people thought was the matter; then refer to Peter's first sermon. (a) The text (ver. 17); a quotation from Joel ii. 28, 32, showing that the Spirit had been promised, and was now come. (b) The heads. Point out how he appealed to them from their beloved Old Testament Scriptures as to Jesus Christ; what proof had He given of His Divine mission? how did He fulfil the Scriptures? Who spoke of the resurrection? Did David refer to himself? why not? had any one else been raised up without seeing corruption? then to whom must David have referred? Who were the witnesses of Christ's resurrection? Besides, where was Christ gone? had David ascended? No; therefore this same Jesus was exalted as both Lord (or King) and Christ, the anointed Prophet and Priest. (c) The application. (Read ver. 37—42.) How did the people feel? Why? what was their great sin? What question did they ask, and how did St. Peter answer? They must do three things. Ask what these were. What comes first? Explain "repentance" as a change of life including sorrow for the past; then they must be baptised in the name of Christ: why was this necessary? From Rom. x. 10, and Acts viii. 37, show that this was for the outward profession of belief in Jesus as the Son of God: and then the third thing was to "save themselves" from a wicked people—i.e., to live holy lives.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Doctrine. Ask why the resurrection of Christ so important; from 1 Cor. xv. 10—19, show how all our hopes are based on it. Christ, the risen, ascended Saviour, sending down the Holy Spirit, the centre of our belief and worship. (2) Practice. What effect should this belief have upon us? As He rose, we shall rise, What for? How then should we live? In readiness for the judgment; we must have repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.

III. PETER WORKING MIRACLES. (Read Acts iii. 1—12.) Question on this familiar story, and show how both in speaking to the man and afterwards to the people (ver. 12) St. Peter disclaimed altogether any power or virtue in himself; but in all pointed to Jesus Christ. Was this like his conduct before? Still bold, but boldness with meekness the truest boldness. Show also how eager he was to teach the people; he took this and every opportunity to set before them the life and death of Jesus Christ; he tells them plainly and boldly how they killed Christ (ver. 15); but shows how He is the Prince of Life, who blesses men by turning them away from sin (ver. 26). Then read Acts ix. 32—43, to show the kind of life Peter led, going about all the churches—i.e., congregations—everywhere doing good, healing the sick, teaching the people; in all things "feeding the lambs," and copying Christ's example.

Questions to be answered.

1. How did Christ show that He forgave Peter?
2. How was his death foretold?
3. Describe Peter's first sermon.
4. What great doctrine did the apostles preach?
5. Name any miracles worked by St. Peter.
6. Describe his character after the Resurrection.

PRESENT PAIN FUTURE GAIN.

IN THREE PARTS.

PART III.

THE beautiful long summer days waned at last and merged into winter, and winter in its turn gave place to spring, before any important event occurred to break the quiet routine of Bertram's life. He was sitting one beautiful afternoon with Miss Banks and his mother in the schoolroom, his fingers lazily employed in making garlands of primroses for the little ones, his soul engrossed in the beautiful poem his mother was reading.

"It is simply inimitable," he said with a sigh when she had finished, alluding perhaps to some hidden ambition. "I wonder whether Goethe was ever satisfied with himself. I should think not, for that would imply a certain limit to his genius, that I should be loth to assign to him, and would deprive him of a quiet heroism with which all men of great achievements are invested in my mind."

"What a hero-worshipper you are!"

"Thank you, mother," he replied laughingly; "I have Carlyle's authority that hero-worship implies something of the heroic."

Their conversation was interrupted by a hurried request that Mrs. Watson would go at once to her husband. Bertram followed his mother from the room with an anxious heart. Their worst presentiment had not pictured the truth. His father was lying on the floor in a terrible fit.

He was taken up from the place where he lay, to his bed, and recovered consciousness only a few minutes before he died. In this interval he bade his wife and child, who had never quitted him, a touching farewell, begging Bertram to watch over and guard his mother, and endeavour by his affection to console and cheer her in her sorrow. Bertram was deeply affected by this proof of his father's faith in so young a lad as himself; and he made a resolve to be worthy of the trust reposed in him, calling on God to witness the sincerity of his intention. In this solemn moment his heart was full of thankfulness to the kind Providence that had enabled him to receive his father's dying blessing and injunction, and appointed him to stand by and sustain his beloved mother in her bereavement. What were all the pleasures that learned Rome could afford in comparison with so great and holy a joy as had been afforded him? Truly, what he had gained was far beyond the past pain he had endured.

At first Mrs. Watson was stunned by her loss, and it was well that she had Bertram by her to think and act. He it was who executed the painful duties which inevitably occur at this sad time, doing all with a premature wisdom that had ever belonged to him.

From the will, which was found among Mr. Watson's papers, it appeared that the family would be left with a comfortable provision, but this was not really the case. The will had been made several years back, and since then matters had considerably altered. After a long and anxious period of waiting it was announced that Mr. Watson had died possessed of only a few thousand pounds, which would yield them a sum of about £150 a year, wherewith to bring up and educate a family of six young children.

It was therefore necessary to quit the far too expensive house in which they were living, to retain but one young servant, to dispense with Miss Banks' valuable services, and in every possible way to curtail their household expenditure. In spite of these alterations, it was with the greatest difficulty that Mrs. Watson could manage to make ends meet. She had just a little too much to expect help from her friends, and quite too little to do without it. It grieved Bertram sorely to see her denying herself even necessaries, so that her children might not feel want. His spirit fretted and fumed at his inability to do anything for her. Throughout his life he supposed he must be a burden to her, for his shrunken body and delicate health quite unfitted him for taking an active part in the race of life. In the bitterness of his soul, he almost wished that he might die out of a world where he was of so little use, but only a care and trouble to those he loved best. So deeply had these morbid feelings taken root in his sensitive nature, that his mother's loving assurances of her inability to provide the children with a suitable education without his able help, or to conduct her business matters without his clear-headed judgment, failed to comfort him. He was indeed suffering pain now, and without, so far as he could see, any prospects of its bringing him future gain.

A six months' trial proved their means to be indeed insufficient, and after a good deal of anxious deliberation, it was decided to start a little school, but from a variety of causes this plan failed to realise their expectations, and was obliged finally to be given up, a few private pupils that Mrs. Watson obtained being the only addition to their narrow income.

It occurred to Bertram to appeal to Mr. Barnard, who had been away over two years, and was becoming a rich man; but both mother and son shrank from asking more of friends who were already devoting a large sum to the bringing up of one of the family; so they eked out their slender means as best they could, living the brave life that so many live unheeded and almost unsuspected.

As Bertram's boyhood passed away, the knowledge of his unfitness for any bodily work pressed still more heavily upon him. His health was really affected by the weight that hung on his spirits, and even his mother's tender love was insufficient to disperse the melancholy that was gradually creeping over him.

His mother came in one bitter cold evening from teaching a distant pupil. He jumped up with outstretched hands to welcome her back, instal her by the fire, and take her bonnet and cloak from her. She had a parcel in her arms, which she handed to Bertram, bidding him open it at once and see whether she had fixed upon the right thing to please him. It contained a number of one of the higher class magazines, an expensive luxury which they had not indulged in for many months.

Bertram's delighted face showed how well he was pleased. "I will read aloud to you," he said, and opened the book at an essay on one of his favourite poets. "Do you remember I once wrote an essay on the same subject?" he asked his mother. "I shall enjoy this immensely. I wonder whether the author has chosen the same aspect of the poet's life as I."

He commenced reading, but broke off suddenly to notice that a certain remark was almost exactly the same as one that occurred in his own essay. He then read on to the end, commenting that it was strikingly written, but hardly complete. After this the book was thrown down, and he fell into a fit of musing; a light had dawned upon him; for several succeeding days his pen went busily to work, nor was it laid aside till an important-looking document had been folded and sealed, and sent on its way to the office of a certain magazine.

He turned back from the post-office with a light heart. His spirits, as easily raised as depressed, were buoyed up with a hopefulness that never admitted a thought of disappointment.

But, alas! the looked-for answer failed to make its appearance, and as the weeks passed away his last hopes died out, giving way to a deeper despondency.

When at length the tardy missive arrived, he was beyond the reach of the good tidings it brought, being laid on a bed of sickness.

The family doctor, a kind-hearted old man who had known Bertram from his babyhood, was at a loss to know what kept his patient in so miserably weak a condition, when there was no apparent cause.

"Do you know," he said suddenly one morning, "I have heard all about your attempt at authorship?"

"My unsuccessful attempt," Bertram replied, wondering where the old man had got his information, for he had kept the secret from everybody.

"Your unsuccessful attempt!" echoed the doctor in surprise. "Why, I just now met my friend Baring, the editor of the ——, and he told me he had received an essay from a young author who signed himself Bertram Watson, that he was delighted with it, that he had written to tell him so, and invite him to contribute other articles to his columns.

"Can it be true!" exclaimed Bertram, starting up with flushed and eager face. "It must be a mistake; I have received no answer from Mr. Baring, and it is nearly three months since I wrote to him."

"The letter may be down-stairs now," suggested his friend.

This was true. An inquiry from Mary the servant discovered the fact that a letter had come for Master Bertram, when he was so bad, and had been lying on the mantelpiece ever since. It confirmed Dr. Butler's good news, and rendered Bertram the happy possessor of a cheque for five pounds.

From this day Bertram began rapidly to recover. He had found his sphere at last. This he felt was the one pursuit he was fit for—in fact, the only one that was open to him.

Mr. Baring made his acquaintance before long. He became very interested in his history, and gave him much and valuable help in the beginning of his literary career. His highest ambition—that of relieving his mother of her anxieties, and helping towards supporting her in comfort, instead of being supported by her—was in a fair way to be realised; and when he remembered the past suffering which had been the means of discovering to him his true vocation, he could not but admit the perfect truth of the proverb which still spoke to him from his bedroom wall.

SAD TIDINGS.

OVER the distant hills twilight is creeping—
Swift come, O blessèd night,
Crush out the day too bright,
Let me forget the light in quiet sleeping.

Many a weary day for tidings longing—
Lo! they have come at last,
Undoing all the past,
And memories thick and fast round me are thronging.

Hark! from the old church tower solemnly swinging,
Chimes out the curfew-bell
In slow and measured swell,
Like a responsive knell Hope's requiem ringing.

Not one faint life-hued ray over me gleaming—
Cruel the letters stand,
Writ with an iron hand,
Traced with a fiery brand, or—am I dreaming?

Dreaming! a fancy wild, night visions weaving
Out of some story old,
Of a heart stern and cold;
All through the thirst of gold his true love leaving.

Dreaming! no—all is true, and I am waking—
All the past glitters bright
With an unearthly light,
Crowning with roses white my sad heart-breaking.

Darker the present now—dark grows the morrow—
Heavy the clouds roll round,
With muffled thunder sound,
All the world's brightness drowned in the heart's sorrow.

Broken earth's lilies now, yet kind is Heaven,
Bitter the cup to drain,
Hard the fight to maintain,
Yet God shall soothe the pain of a heart riven.

JULIA GODDARD.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER XX.

RUTH seemed as if she did not quite understand. She still looked at Maurice, as if she were going to ask a question; then suddenly staggered towards him. He caught Ruth in his arms, and carried her into the house. She did not faint, but Maurice laid her on the sofa, and bending over her, said gently, "My darling, speak to me. Forgive me for telling you so suddenly."

"Yes, Maurice," answered Ruth, absently, "Why did he go?"

Maurice did not know what to say. "He was obliged to go," he replied after a pause.

"Oh! but, Maurice, he has not said good-bye. He could have done that," she cried vehemently. "It is cruel of him."

She turned away, and hid her face in the pillow.

"Ruth, you must not think him cruel; you must not if——"

"If what?" she asked, raising her head.

"Nothing, nothing."

"Yes, there is something, Maurice. Did he leave any message for me?"

"He told me to give his love, and to say you were not to think him unkind."

"How can I help it if he doesn't explain why he didn't say good-bye? You know—you can tell me! Oh, Maurice! I shall be miserable if you don't."

"I can't, my own Ruth; don't ask me," said Maurice, kissing her forehead.

Ruth started from the sofa, her eyes flashed, and she stood up with her little hands clenched convulsively. "There is some mystery that you are hiding from me. You tell me not to think Stephen cruel, but I do; and you are cruel not to explain it all if that would make me think him not cruel. Why can't you tell me?"

"It would pain you, darling," answered Maurice.

"You are paining me now. Nothing is so bad as thinking Stephen unkind, and feeling as if he didn't love me," sobbed Ruth. "Maurice, I hardly know what I am saying; I spoke angrily, but it is because I am so miserable. Forgive me."

Maurice drew Ruth's head on to his breast and said tenderly, "I will forgive you if you will leave off crying."

"Tell me. It is so dreadful to feel as if—as if Stephen had left off caring for me."

"Does it look as if that were the case now? Think again, dear," said Maurice; "if he had not cared for you, would he have avoided saying good-bye?"

"Well, it can't be anything else; because he said good-bye to you, and he loves you; so why shouldn't he do the same to me? Maurice, do answer me," said Ruth, vehemently, freeing herself from his embrace, and standing before him again, trembling partly from simple excitement, and partly from anger which she evidently tried to suppress.

Maurice could not bear to see her look at him with her flashing eyes, which generally looked so gently and lovingly on him. "Do you guess nothing?" he asked.

"No; I wish I did," answered Ruth, impatiently.

"I wish you could trust me enough not to wish to know more. To believe that Stephen does love you, and never to do him injustice by thinking him, of all men, cruel;" and Maurice's voice was husky, and Ruth stretched out her hands to take his, while her eyes still sought his face with an eager look which told that she was not yet satisfied.

"It is because he loves you too much, Ruth, that he could not bear to say good-bye," said Maurice. "He loves you too much to be happy; but he prizes your happiness above his own, and, Ruth—my little Ruth," he cried, as she fell against him with closed eyes and pale face. She did not hear him call. The continued strain, following the shock on hearing that Stephen had gone, proved too much for her, and she fell into a dead faint.

Never before had Maurice realised to the full how dear Ruth was. As she lay before him on the sofa, she looked so fragile and pallid that there was something almost deathly in her appearance. He was not alarmed, but he shuddered as the mere idea of her death came home to him, and he gazed on the unconscious face, longing passionately to see a look of recognition.

Maurice rang the bell, and when Susan came, sent her to fetch Mrs. Rae, who appeared almost directly, and by dint of their mutual attentions Ruth soon revived enough to look up and smile at them; but then she lay in a prostrate state, not speaking, but holding Maurice's hand, and every now and then kissing it gently.

"It seems like a dream," she said, after some time. "Is it really, really true?"

"Yes, really, darling," answered Maurice, with a sigh. "You had no idea of it till now, had you?"

"Never. It does seem so utterly impossible for Stephen to—to care for me—in that way, Maurice; and oh! how I wish he never had!" she exclaimed, hiding her face in the pillow again.

"If he were here he would not let you say that. Last night he told me that I had no right to wish anything different. He said my happiness was not my own, and, Ruth, he would tell you the same. Stephen is the noblest man I ever knew. He thinks so much more of our happiness than of his own grief."

"Yes, he does," answered a trembling little voice. "When did you know this? Did he tell you last night?"

"Yes; but he would not have told me if I had not guessed it already. He only said that he was going away, and then I knew why it was, in an instant."

"When did you guess it, Maurice?" asked Ruth, still speaking in a wondering, suppressed voice, as if she could not yet realise the state of things.

Maurice paused, and then kneeling down beside Ruth so that he could look into her face, he answered, "In the summer, darling, when you thought that I disliked you. Thank Heaven, I can tell you now all the remorse I feel for the pain I must have given you, and all because I thought you loved Stephen. I was jealous, Ruth, of him. I behaved like a brute, and now when I know how he must have suffered, when he saw how things really stood, and remember how he behaved, I can hardly bear the reproaches that rise before me. Ruth, Ruth, why did you love me? I am not worthy of you as he is." All the doubts and self-torturings which Maurice had undergone he could keep from Ruth no longer; but when she drew his face down, and running her fingers through his hair, told him she could not bear him to speak like that, with a bewitching tremor in her voice, how could Maurice help being comforted? And how was it possible for either Ruth or Maurice, even when they thought of Stephen, to feel anything but happy, as they looked into each other's eyes, and there read the bright future that lay before them?

(To be concluded.)

THE HARVEST OF LIGHT.—I.

BY THE REV. HENRY ALLON, D.D., ISLINGTON.

"Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart."—Ps. xcvii. 11.

ONE of the advantages of poetic expression is that its metaphors suggest more than literal description can convey. Therefore it often suffers by comment, just as a rose suffers by botanical dissection: the text is better and more suggestive than the sermon. Ideas of truth and of privilege are conveyed, rich in instruction and comfort, just because they suggest rather than define. "Light," for instance, as a poetical expression for intelligence or joy, conveys a great deal more meaning than precise terms could do. It presents the idea beautified and illumined, the atmosphere as well as the form, the feeling as well as the truth: it is thought glorified. The term "sown," again, which, according to the older commentators, is a poetical expression for "reserved or treasured up," something which in due time the righteous shall reap, as men reap a harvest—is far more suggestive both of results and of processes than any literal assertion could be.*

Had the Psalmist merely said, "The righteous is now in darkness or sorrow, but by-and-by he will be enlightened and comforted," how cold and prosaic his assertion would have been. But when he employs the metaphor of light as sown seed, he suggests a whole world of laws and beauties. There is a process which prepares for his joy; truth must be deposited as seed, culture must be bestowed, else it will not fructify into a harvest. There is an intervening period of faith, during which the righteous must wait and hope before

* Modern critics maintain, however, that it simply means "scattered." Light is scattered along the path of the righteous man, so that he walks in it.

"Now Morn, her rosy steps in th' Eastern clime, Advancing, sow'd the earth with orient pearls."

the harvest fruit can be reaped. And there is a kind of natural certainty, that if the sowing be faithful, and the culture diligent, the harvest will at length be gathered, the silent processes that are secretly going on will duly be developed. The waiting interval is not wasted. It is not waiting merely—it is preparation, growth, ripening, without which the seed corn cannot be multiplied into the harvest.

How much more such metaphors suggest than they express! The thought is full of undeveloped meaning, ever unfolding in forms of poetic beauty; it appeals not to the understanding only, but to the imagination, and the heart.

In the poetry of the Psalms, moreover, there is often a reduplication of the idea; it is presented under a second metaphor, slightly different from the first—sometimes for the sake of explicitness, sometimes for the sake of emphasis. For example, in the eighth verse the Psalmist tells us that "Zion heard, and was glad;" instantly explaining what he means by adding, "The daughters of Judah rejoiced." The doubtful reference of the metaphor "Zion" being explained by the metaphor, "the daughters of Judah." So here, any doubt we might have as to the meaning of the first term, "light," in the first member of the sentence, is removed by the use of the word "joy," as its equivalent in the second. Light and joy are identical. Light is the joy of the understanding, joy is the light of the heart. So, again, if there be any difficulty in identifying the "righteous" as those for whom light is sown, it is removed by the phrase "upright in heart," which is employed as its equivalent. So that interpreting the one designation by the other, we get the beautiful definition of a "righteous" man, that he is a man who is "upright in heart;" suggesting the distinction between a man who merely does right acts, keeps his outside life correctly, and a man who keeps his heart upright; does right things because he loves them.

God has nothing comforting to say to a man who is not upright in heart; no sowing of light can produce a harvest for him. A man who is righteous in outward appearance only, who is consciously wearing a mask to make men believe that he is a lover of righteousness when he is not, is not the man to whom God's promises are addressed; he is not the man in whom any good spiritual processes can be carried on, in whom any good seed can fructify; whatever may be the foliage that covers the field, the soil is essentially bad, and even good seed sown in it must perish.

If a man be consciously insincere, his own consciousness must neutralise all spiritual processes, keep him from all joyous appropriation of God's promises; neither in public worship, nor in private prayer, nor in reading the Bible, nor at the table of the Lord, can he sympathetically and fearlessly draw near to God, and take into his soul the joy of God's love and help. The real joy of religion is necessarily the exclusive privilege of the upright in heart—the man who receives whatever good seed is sown into a good and honest heart, into feelings and desires that are in sympathy with it, and who sincerely and earnestly nurtures and cultures it, so as to make it fruitful. He only deals faithfully with God's sowing; he only has the religious faith and feeling that can patiently wait in long trials, and trust in dark hours, until the day of sorrow be past, and the day of gladness dawn.

Whatever, therefore, the sowing of which we may have to speak, it must be borne in mind throughout that its fruitfulness depends upon the faithfulness of the heart that receives it.

The psalm is one of triumph; it supposes victory over adversaries. They who triumph are God's saints, who are delivered from the machinations of the wicked. God delivers them. He appears in majesty, and destroys all who oppose Him; and the psalm describes His coming and its effects.

It is a psalm that in their Babylonian exile the pious Jews might sing. It would comfort them in their long waiting, and be fulfilled to them in their deliverance.

It would have another fulfilment in the coming of Christ, and in the long, dreary time that preceded it, during which men, like good old Simeon, waited and prayed, and the close of which is indicated by his triumphant Nunc dimittis in the Temple.

It has had many fulfilments since, when persecutors have afflicted the Church, or strenuous opposition hindered it, signally overcome at length by God's merciful interposition: so that, like the apostles returning from before the discomfited Sanhedrim, the Church has uplifted its shout of praise.

In our individual histories, too, it has had fulfilments, when, after long sorrow and darkness and fear—with no gleamings of light or ministries of comfort; our hearts, like a field through which the ploughshare has been driven, torn and rugged, all its beautiful things buried in the rough furrow—light and comfort have come. "Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness." The seeds of good things were being sown for us. It was only the process of germination that was going on. The hidden seed was quickening and swelling, and now its shoots have parted the heavy clod, and the field of our life is covered with a vegetation of life and beauty and joy.

It is not, however, said that light is reaped by the righteous; that is not always the experience of their life here. It is the universal experience of the righteous only hereafter. But light is universally sown here for the righteous, and the reaping for them is certain—only it may not be here, only hereafter. Even when the most is enjoyed here, it is only the first-fruits; the full, affluent harvest of blessedness is enjoyed only by the redeemed in heaven.

But although light and gladness are not our certain portion here, processes are going on which will produce their abundant harvest hereafter. This is the comfort given to us; whether we enjoy here or not, the enjoyment is preparing. This is but the sowing time, the time when light is sown; the manifold knowledge and purity and blessedness of which light is the symbol. From this thought we derive our patience and strength for the process. What matters the darkness now, the ignorance, adversity, sorrow, if it be the sowing time of light for a future harvest? It is but the interval between sowing and reaping. There may be many a day of frost and snow, of drought and tempest —these are the dreary months of the year, when nights are long, and days are cloudy, and winds are keen. But summer beauty and autumn richness will come by-and-by. "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it beareth much fruit."

In order to reaping, there must be sowing in kind. "As a man soweth, he shall also reap." If he would reap light, he must sow light. "He who sows to the flesh, of the flesh reaps corruption; he who sows to the Spirit, of the Spirit reaps life everlasting." Men are ever sowing for the harvest of the future, seeds of some kind or other. A man is made to reap of the iniquities of his youth; or he enjoys the fruits of his industry and virtue, both in what he possesses and what he himself is. The seeds that we sow produce their appropriate social results on the one hand, and they develop into a rich harvest of character, of noble affections, and capabilities on the other.

Emphatically, therefore, must it be said that only for the righteous is light sown. The husbandman sows grain of the kind that he expects to reap. His seed is good grain as well as his harvest. Light is truth and purity. If a man do not sow truth and purity, he will never reap a harvest of spiritual good. The harvest that is his joy consists in noble affections, spiritual discernments, holy capabilities, a high godly consciousness, appreciating communion with God; and these are the natural fruits of spiritual seeds, nurtured through manifold processes. Thus the righteous man sows light: he already possesses in part that which by-and-by he hopes to reap in its fulness. He sows light in order that he may reap more light still. There may be darkness, but it is not all darkness; there may be sin, but it is not all sin; there may be sorrow, but it is not all sorrow. The harvest of light is for those, and only for those who sow light, who sincerely and earnestly break up the fallow ground, and sow the precious seed.

Bearing these general conditions in mind, let us look at a few illustrations of this great law of sowing and reaping.

I. Sorrow for sin is a sowing for light. It is the first of a man's right religious feelings; indeed, a man's sense of sin is the measure of his godliness. It is his consciousness of his wrong moral state, of the sins that separate between him and God, that pollute and destroy his soul, that keep him from the enlightening and quickening and sanctifying influences of fellowship with God.

But the consciousness of this is hopeful. He is not as he once was, "dead in trespasses and sins," "alive without the law," without a care or thought about spiritual things, save such as the sting of conscience causes. A true and earnest desire for holiness has been quickened within him. He mourns over the evil that he does; "the law of his mind wars against the law in his members." In his entanglement he cries for help, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Like Peter, he weeps bitterly; but like Peter, too, he could almost reply to the challenge of his Lord, "Thou knowest that I love Thee." There are in him the seeds of the holiness that by-and-by will wave as a harvest over the soil of his life. It is seed in its first quickening, swelling, and growing, and putting forth shoots. As yet his new life is feeble; he is overcome by circumstances; he yields to temptation; holiness is a struggling imperfection. It is life in its feeble rude beginnings, but it is a true life; that will pass through its stages of development, "first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear."

Let, however, the man who is struggling with sin fairly recognise that he is struggling. Let him not pervert this awakened sense of sin to the conclusion that he has no holiness at all. Because he has not attained to his ideal of Christian character, he may not conclude that he is without right feeling altogether. The very desire for right feeling is right feeling. There may not be in him all the degrees of Christian excellence, but there may be some degree. He may not be a "man in Christ," fully developed in Christian feeling and strength, but he may be a babe in Christ—very ignorant, very feeble, often yielding to temptation, and painfully conscious of his failures; but a true life may be begun in him, which by God's blessing shall develop into manhood. You do not say that there is no life in the newly-sown field because the harvest does not wave over it, or even because the first flush of green is not visible. This is the seed-time of our life, not its reaping; the time of the harvest is not yet.

This does not mean that we are not to be impatient and humbled at our imperfect holiness. No true life can be satisfied with its imperfections. But it is one thing to understand the first processes of spiritual growth, and another to say that there is no growth at all. The test of true life is not the degree of its attainment, but the vigour of its growth. Attainment will vary with Christian standing. It were an anomaly and an anachronism for the harvest to be reaped at the seed-time, for the babe in Christ to bring forth the fruits of the aged saint.

The only question for such is, Has he come to Christ at all? Do the beginnings of the new life manifest themselves in a quickened feeling of sin? Does he kneel before the cross imploring God's mercy? Has the Spirit of God stirred up his soul to holy solicitudes and strivings and prayers? If so, he has, so to speak, sown light for a future harvest, deposited seeds that by-and-by will spring up a luxuriant crop. They may be deposited in a cold uncongenial soil, and have to struggle with bleak and bitter winds; there may be choking thorns and entangling weeds to be pulled up, and fowls of the air to be kept off. Infinite care and culture may be necessary to make the crop grow at all. But if the righteous desire and effort be there, the blade will gradually appear above the brown clod, the stalk will grow stronger and stronger, the ear will form, and the full corn in the ear; and, all adverse influences overcome, the harvest will ultimately wave in rich and beauteous fruitage. For this the sowing and the culture are preparing by natural laws of the kingdom of grace. Repentance is every day renewed; faith is ever growing to a stronger habit; resolution is becoming more firm and persistent; prayer more quietly true and confiding; habit more naturally and unconsciously religious; consecration more entire, easy, and joyous; the heart more tender, holy, and devout. The harvest of life is thus simply the development into perfection of its seed corn. The motions and workings of the Spirit of God, too, are freer and fuller through our growing sympathy and habit. Light and truth break forth from God's Word more fully and gloriously through our increased power of spiritual perception, while our communion with God is more intimate and spontaneous. Thus inward growth and the outward ministry of Divine things conspire to fill us with religious light and filial confidence, and Divine love. All this is but the fructifying of the seed of light sown, and righteously nurtured.

SCRIPTURE HEROINES.

THE WIDOW OF NAIN.

"When He came nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow."

THEY bore him forth, her only son, and dead,
Herself a widow! The brave, manly arm
That should have sheltered her from want and harm
Was cold and powerless. Her last hope fled,
Out by the city gate she sadly sped,
To lay him in the quiet sleeping-place
Where slept his fathers. So, by God's high grace,
Do heroines stand e'en now by grave or bed.

"Weep not," the Saviour saith; and though the eye
Of all around be wet, what time the dear
Departing one lies stretched on bed or bier
The cheek of those brave women still is dry.
Faith points their vision up to God's blue sky,
Where live the miscalled dead. Nay, visions bright,
In haunted homes, through the still solemn night,
Act o'er this scene at Nain. The lost ones are so nigh!

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 14. ST. PETER. PART IV.

Chapters to be read—Parts of Acts iv., x., xii.

INTRODUCTION. Refer to the wonderful miracles of St. Peter mentioned in last lesson, showing how Christ's words were fulfilled, that the apostles should do greater things than even He did (John xiv. 12). Now they get into trouble because of their miracles.

I. PETER BEFORE THE COUNCIL. (Read Acts iv. 1—22.) Ask what great doctrine the apostles taught? Who did not believe in the resurrection (Matt. xxii. 23)? Sadducees wanted, therefore, to crush the disciples. Now describe Peter and John before the council. (a) The court. Explain that it was a council of seventy elders of the Jews; high priest presided (Acts xxiii. 2), who decided questions about Jewish law. Had power to punish, imprison, &c., but not now to put to death. When had they seen that assembly before? Contrast the two occasions: then, fearful, downcast, lookers-on, saw calm fearlessness of Jesus. What would Peter especially be reminded of? Now, they the prisoners, bold, full of faith. What made the difference? The power of God's Spirit. Remind how Christ had foretold a trial like this (Matt. x. 19), and had promised His support. Now His words came true. (b) The question and reply. Asked by what power did the miracle. How did Peter answer? Ascribes to Jesus, whose claims to be Messiah, rejected by them, had been established by fact of resurrection; also took opportunity to preach about Jesus as only hope of salvation. What did all this show? Great boldness; and whence learned? Ask the effect of this boldness? The fact of the miracle being so clear could not punish apostles. Yet they fear such preaching. What can they do? Try threats. What use are they (ver. 19)? Apostles realising presence of God and His protection, will not fear men (Ps. xxvii. 1). (c) The result. How had Peter left council-hall before? How now? What makes difference? Before, trusting to own strength, now to power of God; before, puffed up by thinking of his past fidelity, now prays for grace to be more bold. Prayer answered, and great boldness given (ver. 29—31).

Application. Sometimes children questioned about their religion—why they do or don't do something unusual. Must ask for boldness to speak exact truth, must not be afraid. God promised to help. Holy Spirit will make bold, and put words in mouth.

II. Peter sent to Cornelius. (Read Acts x. 1—16.) Ask about Cornelius? Remind of other good centurion who came to Christ. What do we call all who are not Jews? To whom was Gospel first sent? Yet were many promises to Gentiles. Remind of first Gentiles who saw Christ (Matt. ii. 2). Yet seemed a strange thing to Jews that any should be saved besides them. Called a great mystery (Eph. iii. 6). Apostles had to be taught that Gentiles were equal to Jews in God's sight. Now turn to Peter, staying for a time quietly at Joppa. Describe his going out to pray on flat housetop, looking down on little sea-side village—sea with ships spread out before him; then the trance—sort of waking vision. Remind how often at this time God spoke in dreams, and ask for instances. Tell how many animals were classed as unclean by Jewish ceremonial law. How often was vision repeated? What other message came three times to him? Would remember this, and see typical meaning in vision. God has cleansed the Gentiles; they no longer to be avoided; law been altered; so determined to go to Cornelius. Now read Acts x. 44—48, and ask result. He went, preached, set before them same subjects—life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. They believed, received the Holy Ghost, and baptised in Christ's name.

Application. Children apt to despise others in inferior position or with less abilities. Show how all are equal, how blessed we may be to others. Peter's office as apostle helped him much in teaching Cornelius and his friends; at first they even going to worship him! So must be careful to keep down pride and prejudice, remembering how many will rise and condemn us in the great day.

III. Peter in prison. (Read Acts xii. 1—17.) The story is probably familiar. Question upon it, and then bring out the following points. (a) Peter's peace of mind. Sleeping calmly, though in prison and knowing death at hand. What does it show? Conscience at rest, and heart at peace with God (Rom. v. 1). (b) The prayer of the Church. Show how fervently they prayed, yet so little expected an answer immediately and exactly as they prayed, that doubted if it was he when released. (c) The mission of angels. Remind of how often sent to aid—e.g., Christ in wilderness, Elijah in desert, Daniel among lions; so now. (d) The deliverance. All God's doing. Angel opened doors, &c. Sometimes God works by man's hands, sometimes does all Himself.

Practical lessons. (1) Trust in God not misplaced (Ps. lxxxiv. 13). Peter afraid on sea, bold at council, calm in prison, had learned lesson, and put whole trust in God. (2) Benefit of prayer; Peter's on house-top for Jews, was made blessing to Gentiles. Now his friends' prayer for him prevails while he sleeps. Pray without ceasing.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe Peter and John's appearance before the council.
2. How did they reply to the questions put to them, and what was the result?
3. To what Gentile was Peter first sent? How was he shown that he ought to go?
4. What lessons does this teach us?
5. Notice any points with reference to Peter's being in prison.
6. Give two practical lessons.

FANNY'S FORTUNE:

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XLIV.

IN WESTMINSTER HALL.

"GOD bless you, my child!" repeated Mr. Lovejoy, soothingly; "and I hope you and your husband may live long and enjoy your good fortune."

Was it good fortune after all? Beatrice doubted it, standing there, leaning on her father for support; doubted it for the first time—not, alas! for the last. But to have somebody to believe that it was good fortune was something; and there was Ada advancing also—Ada and a barrister, who had stood opposite to her all day, and had evidently taken the greatest interest in the case; a friendly interest, too, Beatrice had thought, for she had more than once gained encouragement from an exulting flash from the eager blue eyes of the handsome stranger when a point was made in their favour.

But how did Ada come to know him, and to know him intimately it seemed? He was talking to her with animation, and she was answering with ease, and with the slightly imperious air which Ada unconsciously wore. And how lovely the girl had grown! A pang, almost of envy, shot through the heart of her sister; for was not Ada free as well as beautiful—free, and not likely to part with her freedom as she had done? One more glance sufficed to show her, penetrating as she was, that this man was Ada's lover.

"Who is he?" she asked, mechanically.

"Who is who, my dear?" asked her father, slightly bewildered.

"The gentleman with Ada," said Beatrice.

"Oh, his name is Wildish," replied Mr. Lovejoy in a whisper; "and he is engaged to that young lady behind, Miss Tabor, Mr. Tabor's only daughter."

"The young lady with Cousin Fanny?"

Mr. Lovejoy nodded. "She is very pretty, is she not?" he added.

"Not so pretty as Ada, and Mr. Wildish is of the same opinion," said Beatrice, cynically, much to her father's alarm, as she began to descend the steps to meet them.

The girls kissed each other, and Mr. Lovejoy introduced Beatrice, who stood surrounded by the little group, when her husband came out to look for her. It was Mr. Wildish, conspicuous in the midst, in his wig and gown, who drew her attention to him. She turned, and he beckoned to her rather boorishly, and did not advance. Quite deliberately, she said good-bye, and went to join him, her father, after a moment or two of hesitation accompanying her.

Mr. Lovejoy saluted his son-in-law with his usual courtesy; but Beatrice did not introduce him. She was sufficiently glad that her husband was civil, and he was civil. It was his habit to be civil to gentlemen, and Mr. Lovejoy, dressed in his best, and enjoying the triumph—the only one indeed to whom it came as a triumph unalloyed—looked and (what is more) felt as a gentleman.

"Who are those people?" he said to Beatrice, as he led her away, when her father had left them.

"They are my friends," she replied coldly, adding with some exultation, "the old gentleman is my father."

"Why didn't you say so?" growled her husband.

"I thought you didn't want to have anything to do with them," she answered.

And the two left the hall, George Baselow murmuring something unintelligible, but unpleasant, leaving the group standing as Beatrice had left it, variously impressed by their behaviour.

Almost immediately Philip joined the party, and attached himself to Fanny, as he found that Mr. Wildish intended doing the honours of the hall to Ada, who it appeared had never been there before, Lucy, who had been frequently, remaining also by Fanny. With them he continued to walk up and down, evidently a little impatient at the length of the dissertations bestowed upon Ada, an impatience which was not lost upon Lucy, and which added to her constraint in Philip's company. She was painfully shy with him now. It was one thing to sacrifice her feelings—as she had dreamt of—to raise him from the depth of dishonour, to shield him from despair, and quite another to suffer him to discover that he was loved unasked, though worthy. And ever since that confession of hers, which had been passed over in such delicate silence that she could scarcely believe she had made it, she had been morbidly afraid of betraying herself, and actually overdid her coldness and reserve. But Philip only set it down to indifference. She was answering him at random, not because she was anxious to conceal her interest in the speaker, but because she had no interest at all in him or his speech. It vexed him to think this, and then he was angry with himself for feeling vexed.

Instead of feeling profoundly relieved at what had taken place, as his friends expected him to be, Philip had been gloomier than ever. A stain rested on his name which could never be removed. That stain was the sore point with him now. It had wounded him in secret before, but now that it had been revealed to other eyes it hurt him still more. It bled anew, like a wound from which the bandage has been removed before it was healed. Had he been able to carry out his plan it might have been otherwise. He might then have felt that he had redeemed the wrong as it was intended that it should be redeemed, and that it would live in no memory save his own, and there only as a thing blotted out for ever. But he had been defeated, and that defeat involved disgrace. Not that he was one of those who pass lightly over such wrongs provided they pass unpunished. The unpunished and unpunishable dishonesties were perhaps more hateful to him than any other; but he may well be pardoned the sophistry which would have substituted, in such circumstances as his, his own virtue for his father's crime.

As it was, he said to himself that he was dishonoured,—that the burden which he had taken upon his shoulders had been removed only to substitute another which never could be lightened, and which he would ask no one to share with him.

What a contrast he was, pacing up and down there moodily, to Arthur Wildish, who was so light, and bright, and full of wisdom too in all the lighter affairs of life. He could not help seeing the contrast himself, and making an effort to be gay.

But instead of rewarding his effort, Fanny heaved an immense audible sigh, which checked him at the outset. He had fancied that Fanny increased his constraint, as cyphers increase the sums they are added to on either side the balance, and he could hardly help laughing when she heaved that tremendous sigh.

Lucy looked grave. "We are tiring you to death, Fanny," she said, meaning that they had exhausted the physical powers of their kindly chaperon, which was the truth.

But Philip chose to read the little speech in his own perverse fashion. He shook hands hastily with both her and Fanny, and saying, "I will send Mr. Wildish to you," left them, and cut that gentleman short in his prelections, by sending him back to Fanny, telling him and Ada that both she and Lucy were tired of waiting.

Fanny, of course, protested that she was not tired in the least, and was taken at her word. Arthur Wildish wanted to stretch those long limbs of his by walking with Ada under the lamplights, and the party were at Charing Cross before he found the cab which they had proposed to call.

Meantime Arthur had found out that Ada had not seen the abbey even. "I should like to be the first to show it to her," he said. "Will you and Lucy come with us to-morrow?"

He said this to the good-natured Fanny, whom he was intent on victimising, and Fanny promised—she would have promised anything in the stage of exhaustion which she had reached through maintaining the perpendicular for some hours, and so they were driven home for the present.

On the morrow, however, they were all under way again for Westminster. They were to meet Arthur in the hall, where he was, of course, waiting for them, and from which they crossed over without delay to the abbey.

It is like passing into another world to enter that place. The dim light, the awful beauty, the solemn hush rendered audible, as it were, by the sound of subdued voices and chastened footfalls, strike the hearts of most with reverential feeling, and under this influence the little group stood still within the sacred precincts, before advancing, each experiencing the momentary check to the current of their thoughts. Lucy felt the simple and sincere devotion which was natural to her, but Ada almost drew back with a look of trouble on her face. She said afterwards that it seemed to take away her breath like the attempt to sing in a key too high for her. Arthur was speedily absorbed in observing Ada, but Fanny, who had not recovered from the fatigues of the previous day, no sooner saw herself within reach of a comfortable seat in the vacant chancel, than she hailed it with unfeigned thankfulness, and declared her intention of sitting there and waiting till her companions had gone the round of the cathedral. And Fanny did not think it strange when Lucy proposed to remain with her. Something of eager light in Arthur's face, something which she had seen there before, told her that it would be acceptable, that he would like to have Ada all to himself. Was it unnatural that she should feel a little chilled at heart to be thus set aside? It was not that she wished Arthur at her feet again, as some might have done. It was a deeper feeling—the feeling that love itself could change, that touched her with sorrow, and made her glad that she could sit there by her silent friend, and indulge in thoughts too deep for words or tears.

Ada and her companion were speedily out of sight, and long before they had returned, Fanny was fast asleep, with her chin upon her breast, and Lucy had lost herself in the wide regions of reverie. They both started when the pair reappeared, Fanny from her slumbers, Lucy from her waking dream. The latter looked for some change in Ada's manner; but change there was none. She had had all the freedom and unconsciousness of a child about her when she disappeared with Arthur down the aisle, and she had the same freedom and unconsciousness still. Surely he had not spoken. Or (for he was looking graver) was he doomed to disappointment in this quarter also? There was a third possibility which struck Lucy: perhaps Ada had accepted him as coolly as she had accepted his presents and his attentions, without in the least understanding how much it involved. It was a possibility which roused all Lucy's sympathy on behalf of her quondam lover, and she watched Ada in the hope of discovering the least sign of affection for him, but in vain. What she did discover showed her that she was right in her surmise that Ada had appropriated her lover without remorse.

When the two girls were alone together that evening, "Lucy," said Ada, abruptly, "I thought Mr. Wildish was engaged to you."

"No, dear," replied Lucy, "there was never any engagement between us."

"So he says," returned Ada.

"Has he said anything to you?"

"He wants me to be engaged to him," said Ada, smiling.

"Well, dear?"

"I told him I didn't mind," said Ada, "if you didn't care for him. He will take me to concerts and all sorts of places. Why wouldn't you be engaged to him, Lucy; don't you like him?"

"Not well enough, dear, and I don't think you do, or you would not talk in that way," said Lucy.

"How much ought I to like him?" said Ada, laughing; "and how am I to know when I like him enough?"

"Absurd child!" said her companion; "you will know when you feel it—when you like him better than anybody else in the world."

"I don't like him as I liked Jerry," she said, her eyes swimming till they became infinitely tender.

"This is different," said Lucy, gently. "Can't you understand, Ada. Do you like to be with him better than to be with any one else?"

"I like best to sing to him," said Ada.

"That is something," returned Lucy; "but, perhaps, it is only for the reason that he can best appreciate you."

"Yes," she answered thoughtfully; "but sometimes when I sit by myself I like it better, for I fancy that I am singing to thousands, and they all feel just as he felt one night when he knelt and kissed my hand. And do you know, he wants me to give up being a public singer altogether."

"You will do it, Ada," said Lucy, to whom nothing would have been more easy—nay, more desirable.

"I don't know," said Ada. "It seems to make me greater and better to think of it; there is all the difference"—and she laboured for expression—"between my common life and that other life, that there is between this house and yon great abbey."

The speech, almost beyond her own understanding of it, was not beyond her listener's sympathy. "I am glad you do not care for money, Ada, as I once thought you did."

"I think I only care so much for it because I care so little," said Ada. "When he promised me everything that riches could give, I did not care at all."

"I am glad of that," said Lucy. "You will try and love him for himself, dear, will you not? He is very good; I know very few better."

"Only Philip," said Ada.

Lucy blushed crimson. Could this little chit have discovered her secret? But Ada only spoke her own late appreciation of Philip's worth.

"But why should Arthur want me to give up being a singer?" Ada added discontentedly.

"Because he wants you all to himself," said Lucy.

"That is selfish, isn't it?" said Ada, laughing. "I don't think I want him all to myself."

"Then you had better tell him so at once," said Lucy, gravely, for it was clear to her that, whatever Arthur might fancy, Ada remained unwon.

CHAPTER XLV.

THE BAZAAR AT ST. LUKE'S.

Mrs. Torrance congratulated herself on the cessation of her cares for the present. Ellen's matrimonial prospects seemed once more in complete abeyance. Philip, it is true, had not been banished in disgrace: his honourable character had to be acknowledged; but it was not difficult to do this when Philip held aloof. The obnoxious papers, which had led to the former frequency of his visits, had been disposed of. The very boxes in which they had rested had been removed out of their places under the book-shelves; and where they had been the polished floor shone clear and vacant. There was nothing special to bring Philip to the house uninvited, and, as he was not invited, nothing brought him. So that on this score Mrs. Torrance's mind was at rest.

It was equally at rest on Mr. Huntingdon's account. Clara Huntingdon was a frequent visitor; not so her brother. His absence was more marked than Philip's, for as he had come for no special reason, there was no special reason for his ceasing to come. He seemed to have delegated to his sister the duty of visiting Ellen; and, indeed, he had taken it for granted that she would not wish to see him. It appeared likewise to Mrs. Torrance that the clergyman had no intention of getting married. It was rumoured that he was about to take a small house in the neighbourhood, and bring up his father and mother to live with him there; and Mrs. Torrance soon obtained confirmation of the rumour from the lips of Clara herself.

The winter set in, and Mrs. Torrance began another set of curtains, having finished the others for "dear Julia," justly flattering herself that they would stand the tugging they were sure to get from Julia's children; and Ellen worked for those same children, read her novels, did her housekeeping, saw her quiet neighbours, and went to church on Sundays, the even tenor of her days unbroken. Her mother looked at her face, always mournful in repose, and saw no trouble there. And Mrs. Torrance began to feel dull.

There was no one to come in with the news of the day, and to get up a dispute with which would last till bedtime. There were no squabbles with servants, no disasters to children. The house was dull, so was the neighbourhood. It was too respectable. There was not a scandal to be heard of, and Ellen discouraged even gossip—had not liked her asking Clara about her brother's intentions with regard to taking a house. Mrs. Torrance began to languish for a little excitement; and, lo! the excitement was at hand.

It came in the shape of a visit from Mr. Huntingdon and Clara, who called together to ask Mrs. Austin to take a stall at the forthcoming bazaar. The ladies of the congregation of St. Luke's had proposed a bazaar for the purpose of raising money for a spire to the church, which had been left unfinished as well as in debt. The debt was still crippling the modest income of Mr. Huntingdon, and he had given his consent to a mode of raising money which he was assured was by far the easiest and most successful. He was not very clear as to what it meant; but he was told that he need give himself very little trouble about it, the ladies would manage it all, with the assistance of the very active churchwardens, whom they had enlisted in the cause. Clara was quite clear about it, and did not like it; but did not think it wise to interfere against it. Ellen, too, was a novice at this sort of undertaking, and would have declined the honour, but her mother interfered. Mrs. Tabor was to take a stall, and there was nothing to hinder Ellen from doing so. It was just what Mrs. Torrance liked—plenty of work, and plenty of gossip and rivalry, and trying of spirits, and so the interview ended in Ellen accepting the post.

The preparations were warranted to take months, and did. Mrs. Torrance laid aside her curtains as much too homely, and took to all sorts of herculean labours, and Ellen who disliked fancy work, dutifully laboured under her directions, doing endless grounding, as the least objectionable, seeing that it left her free to follow her thoughts. Mrs. Tabor and Lucy were equally busy, and Fanny began works innumerable, which Ada was called upon to finish. The whole terrace was kept busy, and numerous other terraces, rows, and roads besides. It must have been a perfect boon to the neighbourhood in the employment of so many idle hands.

Endless were the resources, boundless the ingenuity of the workers. They did wonderful things in worsted, in beads, in silk, in thread, in straw, in paper. The new corner shop, opened by a pale, sad-eyed widow with two slim, delicate girls in their first mourning, did an unexpected and increasing trade. The shop was named the "Fancy Repository," and had been in a state of extreme stagnation until the bazaar was inaugurated. But the widow had good taste and her girls had supple fingers, and besides supplying the materials above mentioned, they had to sit up many a night executing the work which their customers had planned and intended to finish, and adopt as their own. So the widow was able to pay her Michaelmas rent when it was called for, and could see the rate-collector enter her shop without trembling where she stood, because the amount in her little money-box was so sadly inadequate. She even welcomed the rate-collector with a smile, and in her heart she blessed the bazaar, and in this instance, at least, it proved a blessing.

During the winter several working parties were held in the drawing-rooms of the little coterie of Park Villas, parties at which a variety of useful articles were manufactured by fair fingers, and thrown into a common stock to be divided among the stall-holders. They were very quiet parties, and the amount of work done was not inconsiderable; but though they were called "Bees," they had very little resemblance to the American institutions of that name, which last through a long summer day—nay, several of them—accomplish thoroughly some great piece of work, and require immense preparations in the way of providing sustenance for the workers. Here they had a dish of tea and some thin bread-and-butter at four p.m., to enable them to go on for an hour or two. There was much reading, too, of "poems" and "selected passages," generally by an elderly lady, and so thoroughly dull and decorous were the meetings, that Lucy Tabor, laughingly listening to Mrs. Torrance's animadversions, suggested, that, instead of "Bees," they ought to be called "Drones."

But one occasion was illuminated by a novelty. Ada Lovejoy played and sang to the company, a larger one than usual, which had assembled at Mrs. Austin's. Her singing was, of course, very much admired, but one lady remarked rather loftily that she was too much like a public singer, and somehow it oozed out that to be a public singer was poor Ada's ambition, and she was thereupon privately tabooed, only, happily, Ada did not understand that it was so; her friends, however, understood it for her.

The next evening Ada spent at the Tabors', when Arthur Wildish was there, and she gravely informed him that she had made her debut—had appeared in public for the first time.

"And never told me," he said angrily, for some of the contemptuous things that had been said had reached his ears.

Instead of explaining her innocent little jest, Ada, resenting the tone in which he had spoken, chose to stand upon her girlish dignity. "Why should I tell you?" she said, raising her stately little head, and giving the least possible sniff with her delicate little nose, whereupon there ensued a pretty little lovers' quarrel; which, however, was not made up at parting as it ought to have been, in spite of Lucy Tabor's explanations.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

YES, the present "French Hospital"—the New Providence—was built nine years ago in the border-land beyond the Weaver's Garden, that great garden and pleasure-ground known as Victoria Park. It is the only garden left to the descendants of those old craftsmen who once dwelt in houses every one of which had its gay plot of flowers, its rustic arbour, or its quaint device of grotto work, built up of oddly-shaped stones and pearl-edged oyster-shells. Do you think there is now no remnant of the old French folk left? Come for a stroll among the grand beds and plantations of this East-end playground, and you shall see. On holidays and, alas! on those days when (to use the expressive term handed down from prosperous times) the weaver is "at play"—that is to say, waiting for woof and weft, and so wiling away the sad and often hunger-bringing hours—you will see him, with his keen well-cut face, his dark appreciative eye, his long delicate hands, his well-brushed, threadbare coat and hat; and the mark of race is plainly to be noted in his intensity of look and his subdued patient bearing. He comes of a stock which had it not been of the hardiest and the most temperate and enduring in the world, would have disappeared a century ago. On Sunday mornings, when the bells are sounding round about him, he is to be met with lingering (with who shall say what inner sense of worship) by the strange shrubs and flowering plants, or standing with a pathetic look of momentary satisfaction on his lean, mobile face, to mark the rare glow and gush of colour made by the blooms in a "ribbon" device of flowers on a sunny border by a dark background of cedar. But come and see what his forefathers might have called, in their Scripture phraseology, "the remnant of the children of Israel;" the old inmates of that French Hospital founded so long ago when De Ruvigny was the "beloved cousin" of George I., and Philippe Menard preached at St. James's; when the Duchess de la Force brought donation after donation to the work, and Philippe Hervart, Baron d'Huningue gave £4,000, all in one splendid contribution, to the building fund. Could they have seen (who knows that they have not?) this great French chateau rising beyond the park palings in a neighbourhood fast filling with houses, but still open to the air that blows from the Weaver's Garden and from the great expanse of land leading towards the forest, they would have recognised the familiar style of those grand mansions which in France succeeded the castles of the feudal nobility when Henry Quatre was king. The high-pointed roof with its irregularly picturesque lines, the quaint towers and spires, the slate blue and purple, and rosy tints of colour in slope and wall and gable; the various combinations of form and hue changing with every point of view, make this modern copy of the old French chateau a wonderful feature in any landscape, and the unaccustomed visitor seeing it as it stands there in its own ornamental ground, surrounded by a quaint wall decorated in coloured bands, wonders what can be the meaning of a building so full of suggestion; and if he be of an imaginative turn, may fall into a day-dream even while he peers through the gate that stands by the porter's lodge.

But let us pass through this gate, and so up to the entrance-hall, and we shall seem to leave behind us not only the Weavers' Garden, but most things English. The hall itself, paved with encaustic tile, leads to a flight of broad, shallow steps, beneath an arched ceiling of variegated brick and two screen arches. These steps conduct us at once to a central corridor, extending for the entire length of the building, and rising to the greatest height, of the open roof of timber with its lofty skylights. In front of us is a double stone staircase, one branch being for the old ladies, the other for the men; and immediately at the foot of the former division is the entrance to the refectory, a large handsome dining-hall, where, at two long tables, this wonderful company assemble, only the very infirm having their meals carried to the upper ward, where they are waited on by paid attendants. Separate staircases are provided for the servants of the establishment, whose rooms are in the tower above the main wards—or rather, let us say, principal apartments, for they are not so much wards as a series of twenty-two large bedrooms, linen-rooms, and two bath-rooms. The steward of the hospital, a venerable gentleman with the courteous air and speech of some seneschal of olden time, has also his own apartments, reached by a third stair, his sitting-room and office occupying a space close to the entrance. On the right of the main staircase and at the end of the corridor is the ladies' sitting-room, a fine high-windowed light and lofty place, admirably warmed, as indeed all the building is, and so furnished that at each large square table four old ladies can sit and have not only ample space for books or needlework, but on her right hand each can open a special separate table-drawer with lock and key, wherein to keep such waifs and strays—shreds, patches, skeins, and unconsidered trifles—as children and old women like to accumulate. There is another day-room beside this, and a similar, though not quite so large an apartment is provided for the men, both rooms being furnished with sundry books and a few periodicals of the day, amongst which, it may be noted, that THE QUIVER holds an honourable place in the regard of this simple family. It must not be forgotten though that many of the old gentlemen have grown accustomed to the use of tobacco, and here in the basement is a smoking-room, quite out of the way of the ordinary sitting and dining-rooms, and not far from the laundry and drying-rooms, which form an important part of the establishment. But, hush! there is a hymn sounding yonder in the refectory; a hymn sung by voices many of which are yet fresh and clear, though the singers number more than eighty years of life, and of life that has often been hard and full of heaviness. It is the grace before meat, and the hot joints, with the fresh vegetables from their own garden, have just come up from the big kitchen by means of a lift to the serving-room. There are no servants to wait at table, and the family dinner-party is a private one, inasmuch as it is the custom here for the most active of the inmates to agree among themselves who shall be butler, or beaufetière, for each day during the week. So the dinner-time goes pleasantly and quickly, the meat, the vegetables, and the capital household beer, of which each man has a pint twice a day, and each woman half a pint, being the only articles that require serving.

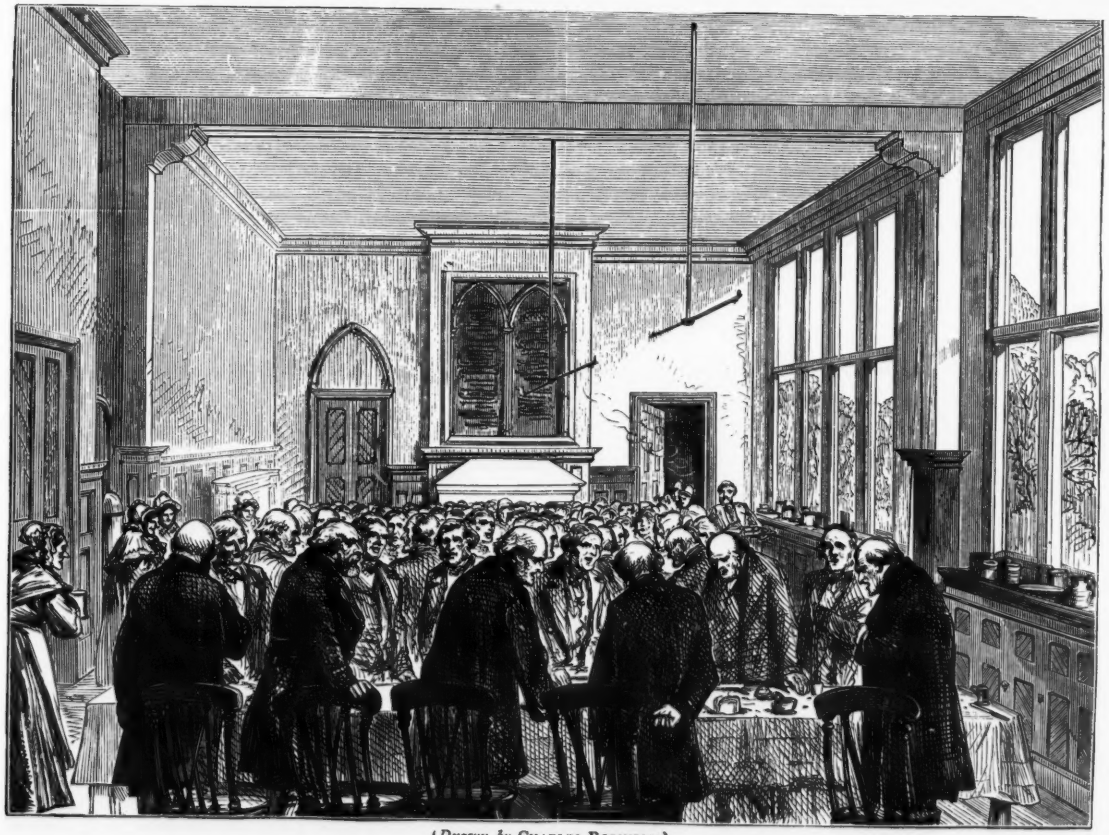
The good old-fashioned family custom of everybody having his or her own tea-pot is observed here. A great gas boiler stands on one side the refectory, and a row of convenient lockers on the other; and each inmate has tea and coffee from the stores, while bread and butter are also served out for consumption according to each individual fancy, and not in rations at each meal-time. Thus those old ladies and gentlemen who have spending money, or friends to bring them some of the little luxuries that they so keenly appreciate, can add a relish to their breakfast or to the evening beer.

We will not go in while they are at dinner, for there are those here yet who "might have been gentlefolk" but for the mutability of our mortal affairs. Stay! here come the old ladies, with old-fashioned curtsies, which are more than half a bow, and not a mere vulgar "bob." There is no mistaking some of their faces. You may see their like in French pictures, or in old French towns still. Some of them with eyes from which the fire has not yet died out; with deftly-moving fingers; with a quick, springy step; with an inherited remnant of the French moue and shrug, as they answer a gentle jest about their age and comeliness.

"Eighty-four; and I don't know how it is, but I don't seem to see so well in the dark as I used. When I went out to see my brother-in-law, I was quite glad he came part of the way home with me."

"Turned eighty, but I can't get up-stairs as I used to do."



"You speak French, madame?"

"Pas beaucoup, monsieur;"—this from one of the only two actual French women now in the establishment, the rest being lineal descendants only. The oldest, who is now going quietly and with a very pretty dignity out of the refectory, is ninety-four, and can not only hear a low-toned inquiry, but answers it in a soft pleasant voice. She bears the burden of years bravely, but the burden itself has perhaps been heavy; and she speaks in a mournful tone, as one looking forward to a mansion among the many—to a house not made with hands, may sometimes speak when even the grasshopper becomes a burden.

As to a young person of sixty-five or thereabout, nobody regards her as having any real business to mention such a trifling experience of life; while of the men—most of whom seem to have filed off for their pipe or newspaper—one remains finishing his dinner, for he has been on duty for the day, and is now winding up with a snack of bread-and-butter and the remainder of his mug of porter—a stoutly-built, hale, stalwart-looking gentleman, who, sitting there without his coat, which hangs on the back of a chair, might pass for a retired master mariner, or a representative of some position requiring no little energy and endurance. I fancy, for the moment, that he must be an official appointed to serve or carve, and employed on the establishment.

"Eighty-four," and one of the old weaving colony of Bethnal Green. There can be no mistake about it. Every inmate provides certificates and registers enough to make the claim undoubted; and as to the right by descent, half the people here carry it in their faces, and to the initiated, are as surely French, as they are undoubtedly weavers.

The morning here begins with family prayers, which the steward reads from a desk in the refectory, and so the day closes also. The Sunday services are in the chapel, and such a chapel! To those who remember the dim, barely-furnished room in the old building at St. Luke's, this gem of architectural taste and simple beauty at the end of the main corridor comes with no little surprise. Its beautiful carved stone corbels, mosaic floor, and charming ornamentation; its broad gallery entered immediately from the upper floor, so that the feeble and infirm may go to worship directly from their sleeping-rooms; its glow of subdued colour and sobered light from windows of stained glass; its simple decorations, and its spotless purity, are no less remarkable than the plainness which characterises the general effect. It is to be noticed, too, that there is no "altar," but "a table;" that neither at the back of the communion nor on the carving of the lectern, nor even in the windows, is there to be seen a cross. Where the Maltese cross would occur amidst the arabesques of the stained glass, we see the fleur-de-lis. French Protestantism has, perhaps, not yet lost its intense significance, at all events here, in this chapel where the service of the Church of England is observed, and an ordained clergyman ministers to the family of the children's children of the ancient persecuted people of Languedoc, the symbol under which the Protestants were burned and tortured and exiled has no place. This is probably in accordance with the traditions left by De Ruvigny, by Gastigny, by Menard, and by their successors, whose portraits still hang in the fine board room of the new Providence.

Of course, no contributions or subscriptions are now asked for to support this old French charity. With it are associated one or two gifts of money, such as that of Stephen Mounier for apprenticing two boys; and the bequest of Madame Esther Coqueau for giving ten shillings monthly to ten poor widows or maidens; but the directors do not seek for external aid. To the charity when it was first chartered was added a portion of the accumulations of the benefactions of the French Church at Norwich, and it may here be mentioned that at Norwich, where a contingent of the army of refugees had settled, the Society of Universal Goodwill was also established by Dr. John Murray, a good physician, who strove to extend to a large organisation a plan for relieving distressed foreigners. This was but ninety years ago, and it was less successful than its promoter desired, so that part of the funds accumulated were judiciously handed to another admirable society in London, of which I shall have something to say, "The Society of the Friends of Foreigners in Distress."

POLLY THORNE'S NEW FROCK.

CHAPTER I.

"I DO so hate sewing, mamma I wish you would let me put away my work," sighed little Edith Carson, as her needle came unthreaded for about the twentieth time that morning.

"But I want you to learn to like it, Edith, which you will never do if you put it by each time you come to any slight difficulty. I want my little girl to be useful, and able to help me when I require her to do so. You will like work well enough in time, dear, if you are patient and persevering."

"No, indeed, mamma, I am sure I never shall; I hate it more and more every day; and I think it is not kind of you to make me do it in my holidays."

"Hush, Edie," said her mother, reprovingly, "you should not speak to me in that way; it is not for you to judge what I think fit to do. You know I am not giving you any lessons to learn during these holidays; but as I do not like your being quite idle the whole day, I wish you to work with me for an hour every morning; surely there is no great hardship in that."

"But, mamma, I don't see what use there is in learning to work. I am too young to make my own things yet, and when I am grown up, of course I shall only do fancy work, like the young ladies who come and stay with you sometimes."

"Then do you suppose that those ladies, when they are at home, do only fancy work?" asked Mrs. Carson, smiling.

"Yes, I should think so," said Edith.

"What will you say, then, when I tell you that Miss Wilson, who stayed with me last winter, makes all her own dresses, besides helping to make her little sisters'? She has a very busy life at home, and I asked her to come here because I thought it would be a rest to her, and she told me she had scarcely touched a piece of fancy work for six months. Now, Edie, what do you say to that?"

The child was silent for a moment, then she said, "Well, but I should never be obliged to do that, you know; papa is so rich that we can always pay other people to do our things for us."

"Papa might not always be rich, dear," her mother said gravely. "Do you not remember last year when poor Uncle Fred lost all his money, and had to give up his beautiful house and go and live in a small cottage, whilst Cousin Mary had to take a situation as governess? Yet your uncle was a much richer man at one time than papa is now. And even if we can afford to pay people to do our work for us, it is no reason why we should not learn to be as useful as we can. God did not give us hands and fingers that we should merely use them for our own amusement, Edie."

"Well, I am sure nothing will ever make me like plain work," was poor Edie's reply; "and it does look so nice and bright out of doors, do, please, mamma, let me go and play with Tom now. Ah, here he is!" as a good-looking boy about twelve came bounding in at the door, his cheeks glowing from the fresh air.

XUM

"Do come along, Edie; I have been looking everywhere for you," he said to his sister; "and here you are poking over that horrid work, instead of being out in the garden."

"May I, mamma?" asked Edith, her eyes shining with delight at the prospect.

"Yes, you may put your work away now, and run off into the garden with Tom; but take care not to get wet in the snow, or you will be taking cold."

Delighted with the permission to put away her work a little earlier than usual, Edith ran up-stairs to put on her cloak, and to follow her brother into the garden for a romp, for she and Tom were great friends, and were never so happy as when together.

That evening there was a dinner-party at Mr. Carson's house, and Edith, after her tea in the nursery, went up into her own little room to be dressed in the pretty new white frock with rose-coloured ribbons, which was laid out in readiness on the bed. Like most other little girls, she was very fond of having new things, and was standing admiring her pretty red sash when Jane, the nursery-maid, came in to dress her. She looked so sad, and seemed so quiet, hardly taking any notice of Edie's merry talk, that at last the child turned round and asked her what was the matter.

"Why, you have been crying, Jane," she exclaimed; "what can have happened to you? and I have not heard you singing about the rooms at all to-day either. Are you ill?"

"No, miss, thank you," replied the girl; "but I went home yesterday and found mother in a deal of trouble, and it made me cry so. Father has been ill, and lost his place, and poor mother is so put about, she does not know which way to turn to get food for the children."

"I am so sorry, Jane; but why don't you tell mamma about it? she would be sure to give them something to eat," said little Edith.

"Your mamma has been so kind before, that I could not think of troubling her again. But, Miss Edith, I could not sleep last night for thinking of poor little Polly and Jim crying for food, and mother not able to give it them. And so cold, too, for they could not have a fire, except just to cook a bit of supper for father, because he is so ill;" and the poor girl began to cry again at the recollection of the pale, hungry faces of the little brother and sister she had seen the day before.

Edith was a kind-hearted child, and very fond of Jane, who had been with Mrs. Carson some years, and was a very good and faithful servant. Her parents were most respectable people, and Edith knew that they had lived in great comfort, so that she was much shocked to hear now from Jane that they were actually in want of food.

"Do not cry, Jane," she said. "I will tell mamma to-morrow all about it, and she will give you some money. To-night, you know, she is busy with the dinner-party, but in the morning I will tell her. And did you say your little sister was really crying for food? How dreadful that must be!" and Edith thought of the good dinner she had had that day herself, and of the beautiful sweetmeats and fruits which she had seen on the dining-room table, when they were laid out for dessert.

"Thank you, Miss Edie," said Jane, as she finished tying the pretty red sash; "but you must not let your mamma think that I wanted you to speak to her; she has always seemed so good to me that I would not for worlds impose upon her kindness."

Edith did not quite understand what Jane meant by the last words, but she would try to remember them, and ask her mamma to explain them.

She did not enjoy herself as much as usual that evening, for she could not help thinking a great deal about the poor little children who had cried from hunger; and as she was eating a cake and a piece of preserved ginger at dessert, she suddenly began wondering whether they had gone to bed without any supper, and wishing so much that she could have sent them some of hers. I am afraid that little Polly and Jim would have liked something more than the cake and preserve, which were quite enough for Edith Carson after the good tea she had had that afternoon.

AN ITALIAN GARDEN.

A MOSSY, mouldering terrace of white stone
Fences the undulating garden ground,
Its sun-dry marge with verdure overgrown,
With here and there a group, or vase, alone;
Columns with creepers closely clustering wound,
And ivies laced along a sunny mound;
Raised banks of grasses, squares of careless flowers;
A stately cypress walk, and one which ends

Where plays a fountain, where an old vine bends
Upon each side in two leaf-lighted bowers:
Anigh a peacock fans his pompous plumes,
Smoothing the spots, like sunflowers, and the rings
Amid their iridescent purple glooms;
And from a poplar, rustling grey in air
Above the hidden willowy hollow, where,
Insellient, a limpid rivulet cool
Swerves to its foamy fall into a pool
In the wide field, a bird exuberant sings.

CHILD RUTH.

BY BEATRICE LEIGH HUNT.

CHAPTER XXI.

"HOW late the postman is this afternoon, Maurice!" exclaimed Ruth, who was standing on a chair at the window, so that she could see over the garden wall part of the road leading toward the village.

"The watched pot never boils," said Maurice, laughing and walking to the window. "Come and sit quietly with me until he arrives, I must go to the studio."

Ruth with the assistance of Maurice's hands sprang from her chair, and accompanied him to the studio, where he was painting a picture for the Royal Academy.

The autumn and winter had passed away, and now Maurice and Ruth were quite settled in their home, at a distance of about a mile from the village, on a hill which cost the old postman many a grumbling complaint when he had to ascend it sometimes simply to deliver a letter at "Mr. Maurice's" house. Such was the case this February afternoon, when after all the other letters were delivered a foreign letter directed to Mrs. Maurice Rae still remained. The postman dawdled rather, talking to a neighbour part way up the hill, little knowing or caring that Ruth was impatient for his arrival. The impatience was no compliment to himself.

At length Ruth heard the garden door creak, as it slowly opened, and, regardless of the chilly air and wet gravel, she stepped out of the studio window and met the postman. How well she knew the writing on the envelope which he placed in her hand.

"It is from Stephen!" she exclaimed joyfully, as she bounded into the room again, and began with great eagerness to break the seal, supremely unconscious of Maurice's amusement at her failure to do it quickly. This was the first letter which Ruth had received from Stephen. His letters had been either to Mrs. Rae or to Maurice, though he had always sent messages to her, and finally, the promise of a letter. When at last the refractory seal was broken, Ruth sat down on the ground just where she had been standing, and began to read.

"MY DARLING RUTH,—I have often wished to write to you since I have been away, and now that I am coming home again so soon, I can allow myself to write. I dare say you wonder what I mean by that, and I will tell you.

"When I had Maurice's first letter I was shocked at its contents, though if I had thought reasonably, I might have known that he would be unable to help telling you the cause of my sudden departure. It made my heart ache to think that I should have cast a shadow over the wedding, which, as the precursor of your happiness, should have been unmarred by one sad thought. I made a resolution not to write to you until I could tell you that you had no cause to think sadly of me, and not to come home until I could write such a letter. I know, darling, that if I had told you not to grieve, but could not conscientiously tell you that you had no cause, it would be worse than useless, with you.

"Now I can say with perfect truth, with perfect remembrance of the whole past, that I feel no pain, and no regret, except the knowledge of the suffering I have caused to those I love. You will believe me, and let me cherish that past from which I have grown, not a 'sadder,' but a 'wiser man.'

"I am longing to come home again to my countrymen and patients, but above all to those whom I can call friends. Very soon, perhaps sooner than you expect, you will see

"Your loving brother,
"STEPHEN RAE."

When Ruth had finished her letter, she rose, and gave it to Maurice to read, and stood with her hand on his shoulder re-reading it herself. Then Maurice looked up, and said, "Does that make you happy?"

"Yes," answered Ruth, smiling, while the tears stood in her eyes. "Maurice, what does Stephen mean by saying sooner than I expect?"

"What he says, I suppose."

"No, dear, be serious. I mean what time will he come?"

"That I can't say. I should think he probably means in two or three days."

"Perhaps to-morrow!" exclaimed Ruth, with a bright flush in her cheeks. "I shall have to keep within these walls until he comes."

"Pardon me, I should not think of allowing that," said Maurice, calmly.

"Do let me, Maurice. It would be so dreadful if Stephen came while I was out."

"There will be no need to run that 'dreadful' risk. Trains are not coming in every hour of the day, and you certainly must not injure your health you know, Ruth."

"You ridiculous boy! As if staying in a day or two would do that. If so, you are in danger of ruining yours, for you have not stirred out of the house to-day. Now I tell you what you must do. Go and call on Dr. Lambert."

"Do you wish me to, really?" asked Maurice, smiling.

"Yes, because you have been rather rude not to call before. I think you ought to call. He will have returned from his rounds by the time you arrive, and Maurice, if ever I meet him by chance on the road, I always feel so uncomfortable, knowing what a long while it is since you have been."

"Then I will go. Give me my hat and coat quickly before my determination wears away," and Maurice, laughing, kissed Ruth and set off.

Ruth went into the drawing-room and seated herself at the piano; where in the twilight she began singing some of her own songs. While she sang she thought of Stephen, and almost unconsciously began the symphony of a very great favourite of his. It was a quaint little song, which she had composed when she was quite a child, and it took her memory back to the very first time that she had visited the Raes.

The night that Ruth had composed this song, she had found to her great consternation that Stephen had been standing in the doorway, listening. Was it the recollection of this that made Ruth suddenly turn her head towards the door? And was it the vivid likeness to the previous scene—the song, the firelight, the darkness in the hall—that made her fancy that Stephen stood there now?

Ruth stood up and then remained motionless, but only for a moment. The figure advanced, and Stephen clasped Ruth in his arms.

"That song was like a welcome, and like a promise that the old times shall return," were Stephen's first words, as Ruth led him to the sofa. "You are not angry with me for listening to it this time? are you?"

"Angry? No, but don't remind me that I was so silly before, Stephen," said Ruth. "When I had your letter this afternoon I did not know you meant so very soon."

"I was a little uncertain, as I thought I might have to spend a few days in London with Tina; but mother is not very well, so we thought it best that she should come away from London directly. That is why we came to-day."

"Nothing much the matter I hope? When I heard from Tina she said mamma continued well."

"I don't think London agrees with mother, and I find her weaker than when I went away. She is very weak, though I think the return home will do her good."

"And your return," said Ruth. "I have more faith in that than in anything else. Your return will do good to everybody," she continued eagerly. "You don't know how anxiously you have been inquired after, and how your return was longed for by all your patients."

"I am only too glad to come back myself," replied Stephen. "Not that I am sorry for one moment that I went away, because I am now more fit for my position; I have learnt a great deal during my absence."

Ruth looked into his face as the flames flickered brightly and lighted the whole room. The lines there had deepened, and in the brown wave of hair that lay upon his forehead the grey hairs were glistening.

"Learnt a great deal?—yes, and suffered too," she added mentally, as she unconsciously stroked the lock of hair, while her eyes filled with tears.

"What are you thinking about?" asked Stephen.

"Your hair is grey," answered Ruth, while a great tear fell. Stephen drew her toward him, answering, "Don't cry, Ruth, for that. I am fonder of the grey hairs than of the brown." In spite of the smile with which Stephen spoke, Ruth heard and understood his more serious tone. She kissed the hair fondly, and then kneeling down beside him, looked up with an answering look of smiling gravity.

When Maurice came home, he entered the room perfectly unconscious of Stephen's presence; and when he saw him, how his face lighted up with joy! Their meeting was so affectionate, so unusually demonstrative for men, that it made Ruth feel inclined to cry; for she then for the first time seemed really to know what they had both gone through She had known Stephen must have suffered, but though she knew that Maurice had too, she did not realise the extent of his suffering, or of his love for Stephen, until she saw his face at that moment, and heard him say, "Stephen, I can't tell you how glad I am to see you," in a voice that told the anxiety, the pain, and the pity which he had felt for so many months, but which he had concealed from Ruth, lest she should have suffered more.

After a few minutes' conversation, Stephen said he must go home, and Maurice and Ruth accompanied him, as they were desirous to see Mrs. Rae; and once more in the drawing-room at the Willows, Ruth sang a number of songs, until Mrs. Rae, being fatigued with the journey from London, went to bed.

"I will come again to-morrow to see if mamma has quite recovered from her fatigue," said Ruth.

"Yes, do, she will be glad to see you, especially as she will be a great deal alone," answered Stephen, as he, Maurice, and Ruth stood at the garden gate. "She could not have a better companion than you."

"Good night," said Maurice; "there need be no more good-byes now."

"No. How little we prize the words good night, until we know what a real good-bye is," added Ruth, and she repeated Maurice's good night with a dreamy lingering over the words that struck her with a new and beautiful meaning.

Stephen turned into the house again. It seemed so peaceful after the life he had been leading, and even the glimpse into the immediate future, which as a doctor he saw, could not disturb him. He could hardly regret that his mother should die soon, now that her life was completed,—that she was happy in seeing her children happy, that her duties were fulfilled, and that her husband had gone before her to that happy country, where pains and parting are unknown.

The next morning, when Ruth returned from the kitchen, where she had been giving her orders, she found Stephen in the breakfast-room with Maurice.

He rose and came to meet her, and the expression on his face made her exclaim, "Is anything the matter? Stephen, is mamma ill?

"No, Ruth, not ill; she has said good-bye to us," he answered gently.

Ruth burst out crying violently, and it was some time before she could say through her sobs, "Stephen, it is so sudden!"

"No, dear, it is not sudden or unnatural. You must not cry so, when we have only ourselves to grieve for. It is much better that it should happen now, than that mother should have lingered on a long time in suffering. When I went to speak to her before starting on my rounds, she called me to her and told me that she was very happy, and that she had nothing to wish for, except that we should not have our happiness disturbed by her gaining hers completely. We must all try to remember her wish," added Stephen, stooping to kiss Ruth, and then letting her go to Maurice, who was leaning his arm on the mantelpiece, and his head on his arm, but had listened attentively to all that Stephen had said.

"Poor Stephen; it is harder for him than for us, Ruth," said Maurice, after Stephen had left. "He will be alone now."

Stephen would live at the Willows alone, but solitude was not irksome to him, and he was so much with his patients, and so much with Maurice and Ruth, that he had very little even of solitude.

THE END.

THE HARVEST OF LIGHT.—II.

BY THE REV. HENRY ALLON, D.D., ISLINGTON.

"Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart."—Ps. xcvii. 11.

STRUGGLES with ignorance are a sowing of light for a harvest of Divine knowledge. "We know only in part," but the instinct of knowing urges us on, and our partial knowledge is the means of higher attainment; just as the alphabet which a child learns is the means of advancing to the wisdom of a sage. Our knowledge does not extend to all truth; but we are so constituted that we can follow on to know even God Himself. Our least knowledge, our feeblest light, is but a lower degree of the knowledge which fills those who know as they are known. We can never perfectly know God, but we can know Him in part—know Him to the extent of our created capacity; and our knowledge of Him is not merely regulative, it is true and valid. It is an earnest, a rudimentary sample of the future. It is as the seed corn to the harvest—the same in kind, only less in degree.

How God has prepared for our future knowledge, sown truth so that it shall spring up in harvests; hidden light in darkness, so that at the appointed time it shall break forth! He has sown the soil of the Bible, so to speak, with profound, inexhaustible truth. There it lies, a buried thing, its full meaning and glory to be recognised only a thousand years hence; quietly, unsuspected, buried, as it were. Hidden as seed, Divine meanings lie in the old Book—treasure hid in a field. We dig, all is dark and lifeless.

Christ is born. At once all the prophecies concerning Him, hitherto inscrutable, are flooded with light. The seed of prophecy becomes in history a harvest of light. Men are compelled to confess that it was God-buried truth.

Deep spiritual truths are uttered—as, for instance, by our Lord to His disciples. They understood not the things that He spake to them. His resurrection revealed to them a whole firmament of spiritual meanings. "When ye have lifted up the son of man, then shall ye know that I am He." Then there is the purifying of spiritual vision by teaching and discipline. Scales of prejudice and carnality fall from our eyes, we see spiritual meanings, in familiar records, where before we never suspected them. "The spiritual man discerneth all things." Thus the Bible means more and more to each succeeding generation, more and more to each individual man. Light and truth are ever breaking forth from it, and chasing away great forms of superstition and social evil; and society becomes more spiritually intelligent and pure. The harvest of virtue, religiousness, freedom that we are reaping now, was sown by Christ and His apostles; and our children's children will reap a richer harvest than we do. Things that are mysteries, to us will be clear to them. We puzzle over them, we ask of one another, "Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?" And, lo! the seal is broken, and the stone rolled away; and looking in, we see an angel of light.

What a revelation of God Himself, for instance, there is in the Bible, if we could but interpret it. Not the stern, avenging God of the earlier books, nor the gracious, benevolent God of the Psalms; but the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,

What infinite depths there are in His Fatherhood—deep below deep. How we are continually discovering them! Our fathers suspected no further meaning beneath their interpretations. How far the tenderness and love of our conceptions transcend theirs! nay, are we not ever transcending ourselves—rising on

"The stepping stones of our dead selves to nobler things?"

Are we not continually discovering new and more spiritual meanings in the Bible and in God? Not that there is more there than there was, but that we can see more. We are ever reaping the harvest of what has been sown for us.

Or take our own nature—our own spiritual necessities, privileges, and possibilities. God has sown the soil of our own spiritual nature with great religious truths—mysterious instincts, intuitions, sympathies, yearnings, ever developing spiritual knowledge and consciousness. How gradually we come to know ourselves, and the rich experiences of peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. How much of the realisations of spiritual life is as light sown—a process going on that will be a harvest by-and-by! God is ever leading us to higher knowledge of Himself—to richer spiritual experiences; spiritualising our affections, developing our spiritual resources, revealing the heart of His love to us, filling us with all the fulness of God.

III. The discipline of sorrow is a sowing of light.

God's painful providences are often the most inscrutable to a religious man. "Wherefore do the wicked prosper," and he, God's loving child, "cleanses his heart in vain, and washes his hands in innocency?" He walks in darkness, and has no light. God's mercy is concealed rather than manifested. "All these things are against me."

And yet what harvests of light are often sown for us in providential darkness. How signally it was so for Jacob. The bereaving of which he complained was God's mysterious preparation for the salvation of his household. None of God's ways are entirely dark—there is light in Him, if not in them. We may not understand what He does, but we can trust Him who does it. The thing itself seems all darkness; its mystery is impenetrable; its aspect towards us hostile and relentless; it comes down upon us like an avalanche; we cannot avert it, and it will not spare. If we did not know something about God, we should speak of it as a stern, inexorable fate—a cruel, unfeeling power. But we know Him to be infinitely wise and loving—a Father of unspeakable tenderness and pity—and this thing is in His hand, and is His doing. It is He who ordains for us this experience, wraps around us this thick darkness, lets fall upon us this heavy stroke, tears away from us this precious possession.

What do we say? Why that, however terrible or mysterious, nothing shall shake our faith in Him. It is easy to imagine some loving purpose, some wise process of which we are ignorant; it is not easy to think Him cruel or heedless. Our faith believes that in this great darkness God is sowing light for us, and that by-and-by it will be a harvest of light. Other men's light may turn to darkness; our darkness must turn to light. "All things are working together for my good," if, that is, I do but love God. Only a righteous use of sorrow, again, can cause it to fructify a harvest of light.

IV. Patient labour is a sowing of light. In the pulpit we sow, and for years the precious seed may be hidden, and apparently lost. In the school we sow, and the child may pass into the man, and no fruit be visible. In the mission field we sow, and one sower after another falls in his furrow, and the seed still lies buried. In our families we sow, with tears and prayers, and our children grow up impenitent and ungodly. In many fields of work the sowing must be patient and reiterated before the harvest is reaped—"One soweth, and another reapeth."

But what precious seed we sow—seed of light, the intrinsic quality of which is to enlighten and purify. The hidden germination may be a long and weary process, but the harvest-time will come. "He that goeth forth weeping, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." "In due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

V. Finally. Death is a sowing of light; it is precious seed that we put into the grave—the seed of light, that we sow for the harvest of the resurrection. "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." When we follow to the grave a righteous man, the thought of life is dominant over the thought of death. How strangely joy mingles with grief; how light from the celestial city shines upon the dark river. "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness;" he has sown in darkness, and the harvest is terrible. But "the righteous has hope in his death." All is light about him, within him, before him. "To die is gain." If you stand by his death-bed, no thought, no feeling of darkness is possible. His joy is "unspeakable, and full of glory." He sees heavenly visions, he hears heavenly songs. Not his the cry of terrible pathos, "More light! more light!" It is a glory that death cannot touch. The earthly tabernacle falls away, and the glorified spirit is revealed, radiant with life and joy. So pure and rational, and yet so unearthly and transcendent, that he seems to be treading the threshold of heaven, rather than that of the sepulchre. We "commit his body to the earth, in sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection at the last day." "Light is sown for the righteous."

Thus the mystic process is ever going on; preparation for greater holiness and happiness is ever being made. We reap to day what we sowed yesterday; we sow to-day what we shall reap to-morrow; we sow in youth what we reap in manhood. Our life has many harvests, the seed we sow a manifold reproductiveness.

Happy he who sows and reaps only light. Happy he who, by constant sowings of light, is ever advancing in knowledge and sanctity—growing in grace, realising richer experiences of spiritual things; sowing and reaping together—reaping the fruit of the past, sowing the seed of the future. Should we not, then, be patient during the sowing-time, and while the process of fructification is slowly going on? We may not doubt because we cannot see. We are not reaping light, but we may be sowing it. Sorrow may be the dark clod in which the precious seed is deposited, and out of which our most glorious harvest of light may break forth.

What a blessed hope it is! The light of the righteous is ever increasing, "shining more and more unto the perfect day." The light of his joy may not "crackle like thorns under a pot," but it is an ever-kindling, steady flame. His are not the pleasures of sin, but they are the more solid satisfactions of happiness. He may have his hours of darkness, but they are sown with light for his future joy. His joy is not a mere outward excitement passing with the exciting cause; it is an inward life whose springs are in itself. If he fail of joy, it is only through unfaithfulness to his own principles. It is a great prospect. Ever reaping light in God's presence—making fresh discoveries of God, fresh advances in blessedness.

What are we sowing in our life? We are told of some "who love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil;" they, therefore, are sowing darkness for a harvest of deeper and more terrible darkness still. Let us "sow to ourselves in righteousness;" let "the word of God dwell in us richly;" let us be faithful to every right feeling and desire—to the lightest touch of God's Spirit; do not let us "rebel against the light." Then, whatever the present darkness, and the weeping sowing, the precious seed is in God's keeping. He gives the sunshine and the rain, and orders the fructifying chemistry of the earth and the atmosphere; and when the process shall be finished, there will be a glorious harvest of light.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. No. 15. OUR LORD. PART I. CHRIST A CHILD.

Chapter to be read—Luke ii. (parts of.)

TO THE TEACHER—It is not intended in these lessons to go through the life of Christ, but simply to take up such parts as may exhibit His character in different circumstances of life, and as such be useful to children.

I. THE INFANCY OF CHRIST. (Read Luke ii. 1—18.) The story being familiar, ask a few questions upon it, pointing out the place of Christ's birth as fulfilling Micah's prophecy (Micah v. 2); the cause of Mary and Joseph's being at Bethlehem—the decree of the Roman Emperor Cæsar for a census; the time, just at the end of the reign of Herod the Great; the heralds of His birth being angels, and His first visitors the shepherds. Ask of what family Christ was to come, and remind how David the shepherd-king had kept flocks in these same fields, and sung of Him who was to be made lower than the angels (Ps. viii. 5). Now ask for any other circumstances of Christ's infancy—viz., the visit and offerings of the wise men, the flight into Egypt, and the presentation in the Temple when forty days old.

Ask the object of Christ's birth at all. What name was given by the angel before His birth? Why then did He come? But how did He come? Why as a babe born of a poor mother in worst lodging of all in the village? No child but He could choose how and when to be born. What does this show? Was this condescension to teach Himself or to teach us (2 Cor. viii. 9)? See then how Christ even as an infant is an example, and show how wrong it is for children to be discontented because they have not everything they want.

II. THE CHILDHOOD OF CHRIST. (Read Luke ii. 40—52.) How old was Christ when last heard of Him? Nothing more heard for twelve years. Lived quietly at Nazareth with Mary and probably John the Baptist. What relation was John to Him (Luke i. 36)? Remind how John's parents being very old were probably dead, and so the cousins brought up together. Now at twelve taken up to Temple for first time. What for? Ask how often all Jews had to go up to Jerusalem? Which feast was this? Ask a few questions as to the institution of the Passover, asking of whom the Paschal Lamb was a type. Tell the children that fourteen was usual age for children to go for first time, but that very forward children allowed to go at twelve. Show how this agrees with Luke ii. 52. Notice the following points as to our Lord's conduct at this time.

(1) He loved the Word of God. Picture out the scene of Christ's being lost; the large company of friends going home all together for protection—Christ missed—the search amongst the tents—the eager inquiries of friends—the return to the city—the search continued—the Temple reached—the little side-room—the grave doctors learned in God's law—perhaps some of the same scribes who searched the Scriptures at Herod's bidding to see where He should be born (Matt. ii. 4). Picture our Lord seated in the midst, eagerly asking questions—anxious to learn—unlike most boys hurrying over lessons—so increased in wisdom as well as stature (ver. 52). Ask why He loved God's Word? Show how all who love God love His Word; reminding of David (Ps. cxix. 97), Timothy, and others. Bible is as the voice of God to us.

(2) He loved the house of God. Probably been most eager to go. So afterwards always attended worship in the different synagogues. Most children can remember delight of first going to church: is there the same delight now? Why do we go to church? If Christ worshipped God, how much more need have we! Let children seek a blessing in the worship of God and hearing His Word and it will be sure to come.

(3) He was obedient to His parents. Ask what His mother said when she found Him, and how Christ answered. What was God's business for Him there? To learn and increase in wisdom. What an example to idle children! Then went and lived at country village till thirty years of age. Show how different this to many now—so eager to leave home quite young—so restless and impatient at the least thing said. Ask what commandment teaches this obedience, and show that it includes submission and respect not only to them, but to all in authority over us.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Contentment. If are poor and humble, only like Christ. He not a bit less happy for being so, nor need we be. (2) Perseverance. He increased in wisdom—how often children idle and careless; seem to make no way in goodness, or wisdom, or anything else. All this fitted Him for future life, and so will it us. The child is the father of the man.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the circumstances of Christ's birth.
2. Name the other incidents of His infancy.
3. What were the three great feasts of the Jews?
4. Give three points in our Lord's character in which as a child He was an example to us.
5. Give two practical lessons.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XLVI.

THE BAZAAR AT ST. LUKE'S.

THE winter had passed away into a late and wintry spring, and the early summer had come at a bound. In the last days of May, amid sunshine and soft winds, the trees had shaken out their leafy banners, and the flowers had come in troops as for a festival. The first three days of June had been fixed upon for the holding of the bazaar in aid of the building of the spire of St. Luke's, and as it was to be held under canvas the state of the weather had been a source of much anxiety to its promoters. It was a hazardous experiment, that of erecting tents in the meadow behind Park Villas, and trusting to the tender mercies of an English sky; but it was a matter of necessity, not of choice. There was not a public room to be obtained—there was no such thing in the district; how should there be? There was no public life there. It was an assemblage of units who had hardly a tie to each other, and who cultivated toward each other scarcely a sentiment more human than a feeble curiosity.

The preparations were to be completed by noonday on the first, when the bazaar was to be opened by an ex-Lord and Lady Mayoress—or rather by the latter, imported for the occasion. From earliest dawn the ladies had been busy arranging their stalls, and they had really succeeded in making a very fair display. There were suspended above them the inevitable festoons of red and white roses in the still more inevitable glazed calico; but more than all the colours of the rainbow glowed on the tables beneath, and on the persons of the fair holders of the stalls, while the gardens and conservatories of the entire neighbourhood had been laid under contribution for the supply of flowers, which had been placed under the care of the younger ladies.

At noon the bazaar was duly opened and the proceedings commenced. Elderly ladies made their appearance, surrounded by bevies of daughters, and made limited purchases. Younger mammas brought troops of children, who invested in dolls and other playthings, and speedily betook themselves to the sward outside, the sunshine, and the music. Lucy and Ada with their compeers got somewhat dispirited as the afternoon wore on. The elderly ladies and the children did not want their bouquets, and pretty button-hole nosegays were out of the question. For once Mrs. Torrance became a source of consolation to her friends and even the public; she occupied a prominent position in front of her daughter's stall, in the arrangement of which she was making minor improvements continually. Over her head, displayed bannerwise, was her magnum opus in the shape of a large hearthrug, on which was depicted a life-size lion with his feet on the yellow sand of the desert, and his head under the shadow of a palm-tree. For grandeur of conception and delicacy of execution in the shadings this work was the admiration of all beholders, and Mrs. Torrance was justly proud of it. It was one of the great features of the bazaar, and was not to be sold but raffled for before its close. Sitting under it, Mrs. Torrance comforted all who came to her by her way of saying, "Wait till gentlemen come."

About five o'clock they came dropping in, the younger and more zealous, who had dined on a mutton chop in the City, along with the elder and more obtuse, who had yielded to pressure, brought a pocketful of silver coinage, and intended to get home in half an hour or so to a comfortable dinner. The proceedings of these latter gave the utmost satisfaction; they bought their own roses at sixpence a piece and stuck them in their button-holes. Pincushions, needle-cases, book-markers, and what not were offered to their notice, and met with promiscuous purchasers, at least until one complacent buyer had paid the penalty of his indiscriminateness by thrusting his hand into his pocket, and bringing it out again with a rapid change of countenance, stuck over with needles like a species of porcupine, a treacherous article of the needle-holding class having given way in the interior of that receptacle.

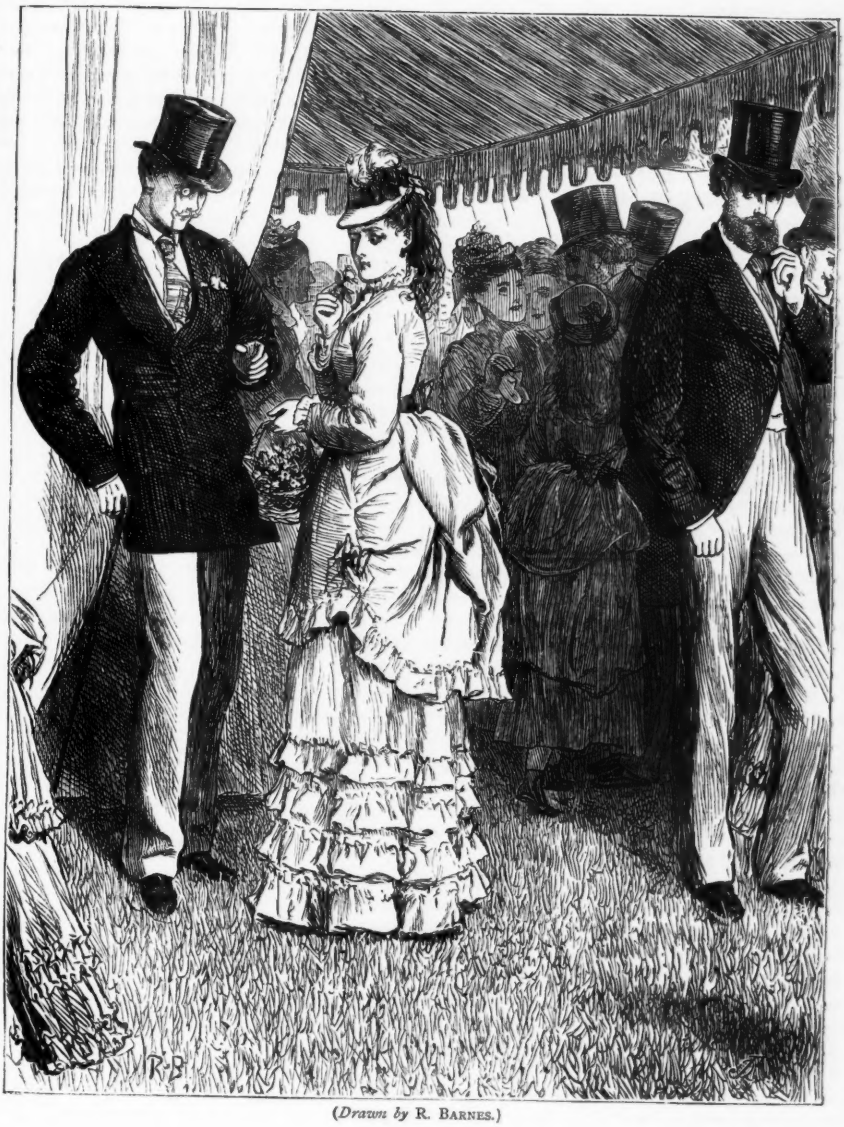
Then the papas as a rule departed under promise, alas! in many instances of a speedy return, but the brothers remained. They were only beginning to enter into the spirit of it. Their own sisters might not be particularly interesting, but other people's, were, and some of them were very pretty besides. Lucy and Ada were doing a thriving trade, for the young gentlemen were highly discriminating, and whereas paterfamilias was content with a sweet smile and a pretty timid request to purchase, they seemed to prefer to make their purchases from the hands of the prettiest of the saleswomen, and this greatly to the disgust of at least one spectator who had recently come upon the scene.

"What has brought Philip here?" said Lucy to herself, as she caught sight of his tall figure in the doorway. Mr. Tabor had just passed in, not unnoticed, for he was surrounded at once as a fresh victim.

No one had asked Philip; though everybody had asked almost every creature known to her, no one had thought of asking him. Perhaps for that very reason he was there. Mr. Tabor had been talking over some business with him, and had said abruptly, "By the way, I dine in solitary state this evening; you might come up and help me through it—my womankind are to be at the fancy fair. I must go and join them for an hour in the evening, but you needn't go unless you like." And so Philip was there; and he stood in the doorway, surveying what he was pleased to call "Little Vanity Fair," with what he believed to be calm indifference.

Calm indifference, indeed! There was not a man—no, not a woman there—less calmly indifferent to anything that affected his fellow-creatures, however lightly. Presently he has noticed Lucy, looking flushed, and, he thinks, happy, with Arthur Wildish by her side. She is decorating him with one of her nosegays. That is all a matter of course; but Philip glances behind him with a vague desire to retreat from the stifling tent. He sees Mrs. Austin sit down with a slight air of weariness, leaving the business to her mother, and he thoroughly sympathises with her. He will go over to her and ask if he can be of any use. A very pretty girl accosts him, making a little display of her bright eyes and pearly teeth as she offers him a rose, and his "no, thank you," is so harsh that she blushes crimson and feels inclined to cry. A very plain child is wearily parading a not very distinguished-looking doll at the low price of half-a-crown, and Philip startles her by saying, "You look very tired," and by becoming an unsolicited purchaser, and immediately bestowing his purchase on a disconsolate little girl, who had lost her pocket-money in a raffle for a doll bride and bridegroom, with four bridesmaids and a clergyman complete, and thereby greatly enlarging her views of the possibilities of life.

If any one had told Philip that he was to play a prominent part in the affairs of the bazaar, he would have scouted the idea; but nevertheless such was his fate. He had made his way, with some difficulty, to Mrs. Austin's side, and asked politely if he could be of any use to her. She was about to thank him, declining his services, when Mrs. Torrance turned round upon them, and declared that she could make him of the greatest possible use.



"Pray command me then," said Philip, gallantly, and he was taken at his word.

"In the first place," said Mrs. Torrance, in business-like fashion, "will you be good enough to take down that lion?"

Philip looked up at the work of art overhead, and answered, "Certainly."

"Here is a chair to stand upon," she continued, and forthwith Philip was standing on the chair, the observed of all observers, taking down the bulky trophy.

"Now you must take it round and get subscribers for it," said Mrs. Torrance, volubly. "Here is a pencil and book for our list. You must make up the number of subscriptions to forty; forty half-crowns make only five pounds, and it would be cheap at that."

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"He made a pretence of declining"—p. 379.

"But what am I to do?" asked Philip, helplessly.

"Only get people to give you their half-crowns by hook or by crook," said Arthur Wildish, coming up. "Shall I help to invest you as Knight of the Lion?" he added, laughing.

There was a good deal of chaffing as to how Philip should display his lion, some suggesting that he should place it on his back; but at length he was sent out to make the tour of the tent with the rug over his arm in stiff and massive folds. It was a position unlooked for and undesired; but Philip bravely determined to make the best of it, and mulcted Arthur Wildish of four half-crowns on the spot.

Arthur followed in the track of the lion, seeming to have no particular duty of his own, and both the young men came to a halt at the side opposite to which they had started. Just there a piano had been placed, in order that there might be music within if desired, in the intervals when the band was not performing without. The daughters of a local professor of music had been engaged to sing and play. Now one of these young ladies had become quite ill in the course of the afternoon, and had been obliged to go home, much to her younger sister's dismay and trouble. The poor girl had done her best single-handed; but a little programme of the music had been printed, and in it was a duet which of course she could not sing alone. Ada, who was one of her father's pupils, learning her difficulty, without consulting any one, and without considering her own feelings in the matter, at once volunteered her help. Therefore, just before Philip and Arthur had reached the spot where the piano was, Ada stood up with Marian James to sing.

There was a pause and a hush as her clear soprano voice rose above the general babblement, and floated the words distinctly over the heads of the crowd. Philip paused for pleasure, for it had not occurred to him to question Ada's position there, and he was astonished to find that she possessed so great a talent; but his companion's face expressed both displeasure and pain. He had been holding aloof from Ada. He was wearing a rose of Lucy's in his button-hole, and he had remained near the latter as much as he could venture to do ever since he had entered the tent; but he had failed in his purpose of piquing Ada. She had appeared totally unconcerned, and now she was openly breaking with him, throwing down the gauntlet of defiance in public as it were.

Now, the truth was that Ada, in her perfect simplicity, had never thought of him at all. She had not been jealous of Lucy, she had been perfectly unconcerned at his desertion, having been herself fully occupied, and she was singing away there, delighting everybody and herself included, not at all from defiance, but from pure pleasure in the exercise of her voice, for which she had found opportunity in obliging her teacher's daughter. A number of young men had drawn nearer and nearer, and now crowded round the performers, and the cessation of the song was hailed by a round of applause. One young man made himself particularly objectionable to Arthur by adding his rather noisy shouts of "bravo! bravo! encore!" to the little tumult.

Just then the sounding of a little bell by Mr. Huntingdon in person, and the announcement that the closing hour had come, put a stop to the music and the tumult also, and Arthur Wildish, saying good-bye to Philip, rushed out of the tent.

"He must have some other engagement," thought Philip, as he made his way back to Mrs. Austin, with his lion over his arm and his unfilled list in his hand.

"You will do better to-morrow," said Mrs. Torrance, consolingly.

"But I shall not be here," said Philip, bluntly.

"Nonsense," said Mrs Torrance; "you have done very well," she added, looking at the list. "You must come and see it awarded, you know."

"Must I?" he said in a vague way, and looking at Mrs. Austin.

She only answered, "If you have nothing better to do, which I think is unlikely;" but he thought she looked so sweet and wistful as she said it, that he turned abruptly to Mrs. Torrance, and said, "Well, I will come."

In spite of herself, Ellen's face lighted up, and Philip saw it, and in spite of himself felt happier.

The Park Villa party now assembled together. Mrs. Tabor came from the other tent, looking very fresh and bright, Fanny, who had been acting as her satellite, sailing after her, and Mrs. Tabor immediately invited them all to a little supper, as frankly accepted as given, upon the spot. But Philip was truly puzzled when there was a general inquiry as to what had become of Arthur Wildish, and no one, not even Lucy, could tell.

CHAPTER XLVII.

UNDER THE ELMS.

THE second day of the bazaar promised to be still more successful than the first. The day was, if possible, more brilliant, and the visitors more numerous and liberal, still it was not till after four o'clock p.m. that the real business of the day commenced. Then the victims of what some one has called "a pleasant species of robbery" began to make their appearance, and to judge from the reappearance of many of the sufferers they really had taken pleasure in being victimised. The moment a new-comer entered the tent he was seized upon by one or more young ladies, notebook in hand, and made to put down his name to one of some dozen or two subscriptions which had been started, and before he had made the round of the stalls he was probably in for them all. Philip, who had duly reappeared, went at once to his post, and took charge of the famous lion, which he found to be an immense protection to him, as no sooner was he assailed with any proposition to subscribe for some article, than he met it with a counter-proposition to go in for his own.

On his first round he encountered Arthur Wildish in the doorway, who nodded rather grimly and exclaimed, "You here again!"

"I believe I may say the same to you," retorted Philip, gaily.

"Yes, you may," said Wildish, savagely. "I wasn't coming near the place again; but I couldn't stop away," he added with characteristic candour.

"It seems to have its attractions," said Philip, and he looked over in Lucy's direction.

"Yes," said Arthur, comprehending the glance to a certain extent; "she is always the same," and he heaved a great sigh. He had somehow taken it for granted that Philip knew all about the cessation of his hopes concerning Lucy. He was aware, however, that he was ignorant of his new attachment, which under the circumstances he had not been able to mention.

"And there is that young niece of Miss Lovejoy's," continued Philip; "she has completely fascinated the gentleman who encored so madly last night. He must have lost his heart, by the way he is losing his money to her."

"Impertinent jackanapes!" exclaimed Arthur, hotly, and involuntarily starting forward.

"He is a harmless enough fellow," said Philip. "I have been watching, and his attentions are perfectly legitimate. He has bought a succession of bouquets, each of which he disposes of as speedily as possible by presenting it to some lady of his acquaintance, taking care that she is either sufficiently elderly or sufficiently juvenile not to mistake his intentions. He is now investing in sixpenny scent-holders, and you can trace his path by the perfumes he pours forth."

Instead of laughing, Arthur groaned, and left his friend wondering what was the matter with him.

On went Philip with his lion, making very little progress, for he was a bad beggar, and the competition was waxing hotter and hotter. Each time he passed Lucy he expected to find Arthur Wildish by her side; but no. Lucy was always standing alone. What could Arthur be thinking of? He seemed to be following the young gentleman who had just invested in a fresh supply of scent.

In some roundabout way the latter had managed to obtain a formal introduction to Ada Lovejoy, but as yet he had taken no undue advantage thereof. He had asked Ada if she was going to sing, and Ada had answered no; that she merely sang to supply the place of Miss James, who had been obliged to go away, and that another had taken that lady's place, so that there was no further occasion for her services.

So far all was well; but it is not in the nature of things to stand still at that or any other point—certainly not in the nature of youthful feelings, and those of Ada's admirer got warmer and warmer, and as they did he became more and more demonstrative, and began to attract towards both the subject and object of them more attention than was desirable.

Finding what she considered a good opportunity, Mrs. Torrance took it into her head to lecture Ada on the score of flirtation—an offence of which she was perfectly guiltless, and also to warn her against offending Mr. Wildish, who, she frankly insinuated, was a great deal too good for her. Most girls would either have defended themselves, or been vastly irritated by the tone of the old lady's remarks, hurried as they were. Ada, however, was not irritated; she took the rebuke quite mutely and meekly, as far as appeared on the surface. She was incapable of irritation. Almost all feeling with her took the form of passion, and a passionate pain was kindling in her heart. She had been slow to notice Arthur's desertion, for she was not exacting in a petty way; but now it forced itself upon her, and she was unable to divine its cause. But if it should be that he was too good for her, as Mrs. Torrance seemed to say, that he was rich and well-born and well-bred, while she was poor and low—none of them knew how poor and low she had been—instead of courting him, she would cast him off. Perhaps he would look down not on her, but on hers, if he knew all. She would have nothing more to say to him, she thought, and wondered why the thought should give her so much and such sharp pain.

While she was suffering from it, her admirer drew near among the moving crowd, closely followed by the seemingly aimless Arthur.

The young man hovered a little, and Ada held towards him a basket of flowers, which was swinging in her hand.

He made a pretence of declining. "I think I have done enough in that way; don't you?" he simpered.

Not the least little smile dawned on Ada's face as she answered, "Yes, but here is a very fine one. I am sure you will have this," and she drew a beautiful blossom from the group in her basket, and met a savage look from Arthur as she did so.

The young man leant towards her and whispered something. It was—"I will, if you will put it into my coat."

Arthur did not hear, but he saw. He saw Ada about to hand the blossom over to its purchaser. But, instead of doing so, she crushed it in her hand and fairly turned her back upon her admirer, while her basket fell at her feet.

It was Arthur who picked up its scattered contents and stood shielding her from observation till she had recovered her composure. Then he took a rather wilful and unwilling little hand upon his arm, and led her away, ostensibly and rather ostentatiously, to get some refreshment.

The refreshment (not altogether unworthy of the name) consisted, in the first instance at least, of a walk up and down outside under the elms, where the same wilful little hand underwent the tender operation of having a thorn extracted, the pain of which had to be healed with kisses yet more tender.

Ada seized the hand of the healer and kissed it in turn.

"So you do care for me at last," he said.

"A little," she answered, with her lips, but her beautiful eyes, suffused and glistening, said a great deal more.

"Not a little, Ada. With you it must be 'all in all, or not at all!'" he said.

"All, then!" she exclaimed; "only I have nothing to give. The all is yours. You are rich and learned, and I am poor and ignorant—I don't think you know how poor and ignorant. No, I can't take everything and give nothing," she continued, drawing back from him.

But he was not to be repulsed now. He seized the little hand once more. "Nothing to give, Ada, when you give yourself! And you are rich," he added, with a more passionate admiration than he had ever bestowed on gentle Lucy Tabor; "you are rich, Ada—you have genius."

"And I can give you that," she said, with sudden inspiration. "I will never play or sing to anybody but you."

He smiled. "You have convicted me of selfishness," he answered. "No—no, Ada! you shall be free. We will have faith in each other."

"But you did not like my playing yesterday," she said.

"I thought you did it to vex me, after our controversy on the subject."

"No, but I kissed that rose to vex you; only"—she hesitated, she could not express, or even understand, the sudden awakening which had come to her, partly from her own act, partly from the love and sorrow that had conquered every smaller feeling in Arthur's face, as she had been about to do what, to his refined taste, was a thing unwomanly; only Ada at the moment was a child in thought and feeling. She would never do such an act again.

They went back to the tent radiantly happy, Ada looking tenfold more lovely in that rosy dawn of love and joy; but they passed in unnoticed and mingled with the crowd. Arthur was too delicate, with all his demonstrativeness, to make a parade of his triumph.

"Where have you been?" said Philip, coming up to him. "I have been looking out for you to invest you with the order of the lion," and he flung that huge trophy over Arthur's shoulder.

"I have been under the elms," said Arthur, pleasantly; "am I to have it?"

And Philip answered, "Yes. Go and lay down your prize at your lady's feet."

BERKELEY CHURCH, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—I.

THE GRAVE OF DR. JENNER.

BERKELEY CASTLE, town, and Church would each supply abundant topics for a special article. But the noble work accomplished by Dr. Jenner is more important than Norman keeps, Gothic piles, or ancient borough annals. We must, therefore, for the present, pass by the seven hundred years of history, the story of the regal murder, and the long line of traditions which are associated with the feudal stronghold raised by Henry II. for Robert Fitz-Harding. Nor can we pause to describe the style of the church, the sculpture of the monuments, the sites of the ancient chantries, or the architectural details of the Berkeley Chapel, where the lords of the castle have been buried since the fifteenth century. The grave of Jenner, in the chancel, makes Berkeley Church more famous than many a stately pile, where "long-drawn aisle and fretted vault" attract the wondering gaze of the artist and the architect.

Let us now consider the life and labours of the kindly-hearted physician who was the means of conferring on mankind the greatest boon of which medical science can boast.

Edward Jenner was born at Berkeley, on the 17th of May, 1749, in the vicarage, his father, Stephen Jenner, being then vicar of the parish. A tablet in the church records his death, December 9th, 1754, when the education of the child was entrusted to an elder brother, Stephen. Dr. Baron says the family was "of great antiquity" in Gloucestershire. This may be so, but the earliest name in the ascertained pedigree is that of Stephen Jenner, of Standish Court, who died 1667. Young Jenner was placed, when but eight years old, in a school at Wotton-under-Edge, in the neighbourhood of which the boy's taste for natural history was first strongly shown. His early medical education was received in the house of Mr. Ludlow, a surgeon at Chipping Sudbury, and while here young Jenner's attention was first drawn to the preventive powers of vaccination. An accidental remark of a young woman, a patient of Mr. Ludlow, led the surgeon's apprentice to commence the long series of experiments and observations which won for medicine a great triumph, and for Jenner a long-enduring fame. The small-pox was raging in Sudbury; everybody was alarmed; but the girl confidently observed, "I can't take it; I've had cow-pox." This short statement turned the student's mind to the subject for life. Leaving Sudbury for London, Jenner became a pupil of the greatest of English surgeons, the famous John Hunter, then at St. George's Hospital. The teacher soon detected the talent of the pupil for close observation, and the collector of the great Hunterian Museum, now in Lincoln's Inn Fields, was naturally interested in a student who was, even then, noted for his zealous studies in natural history. So highly was Jenner's knowledge in this department appreciated, that he was employed to arrange the botanical and other specimens brought to England by Captain Cook from the South Sea Islands, and was even offered the post of naturalist on the second voyage in 1772. Jenner declined, resolving to devote himself to his profession in Berkeley and its neighbourhood.

When he had thus selected his home, he married, in 1788, Miss Catharine Kingscote, with whom all went happily to the end.

It seems proper, at this point, that we should briefly describe the means by which Jenner was able, like another Prometheus, to bestow a great remedy on the human race. The young woman's remark at Sudbury. to which reference has been already made, led Jenner to ask whether a substitute for inoculation could not be found. Even this artificial production of a terrible disease had not been without advantages, as it was proved that out of each 250 persons inoculated, only six died on the average; whereas out of each 250 who took the small-pox in a natural way, about forty-two died. The annual mortality from this horrid plague in Britain was estimated at 40,000, even so late as the year 1806. But even inoculation had its foes; it was preached against from the pulpit in London; one sermon, delivered in St. Andrew's, Holborn, asserting the practice to be "a diabolical operation," and kinting that the "boils" produced on Job's body by Satan were simply the small-pox pustules. This, at least, showed small-pox to be very ancient. It cannot be surprising that inoculation should be dreaded by many, or even stupidly opposed by a few, as it appeared to produce rather than to destroy the small-pox.

To Jenner's mind, then, the question was ever occurring, Can this awful pestilence be annihilated? He found there were many country people round Berkeley who could not take the small-pox; who went about fearlessly while the plague was raging round them. He ascertained that all these privileged people had caught a disease, called cow-pox, from the cows they milked. The infection seemed to be harmless, and yet was a wonderful preservative. "Cannot this mild antidote be given to all?" was the great question which the Berkeley physician answered.

Vaccination seems to have been used before the time of Jenner, especially by the country people in the dairy counties; and the vaccination of a girl appears to be referred to in a paper read before the Royal Society in 1725. But so little was the remedy employed until Jenner gave the great impulse, that no English dictionary appears to have contained the word "vaccination" until Mr. Todd inserted it in his edition of Johnson. Jenner's great merit, therefore, is not so much that of a discoverer as of a promoter; for it was owing to his sagacity, self-denial, and perseverance that the world was made to feel the value of a long-neglected preservative. The very attempt to persuade men that vaccine lymph could save them from the horrors of small-pox required no little courage. Some smiled at his supposed credulity; others settled the whole matter at once by calling it a vulgar superstition. A local association of medical men, who met for the discussion of professional subjects, were so "bored" by Jenner's persevering introduction of vaccination as a topic for their debates, that these gentlemen were inclined to request him to withdraw from the association. Even his firm friend, the philosophic John Hunter, was at first disposed to treat the subject as unworthy the attention of a scientific man.

Jenner was not daunted, and made the 14th of May, 1795, memorable in the history of medicine, by then taking the vaccine lymph from the hand of Sarah Nelmes, a dairy servant, and vaccinating with this matter James Phipps, a boy eight years old. He subsequently inoculated this boy with small-pox, but without effect, and published the details of the case in July. We scarcely know whether readers will class James Phipps with the heroes or the martyrs when they learn that the boy was inoculated no less than twenty times, and was on every occasion proof against small-pox. Having made numerous and most decisive experiments, Jenner published, in 1798, his "Inquiry" into the protective value of vaccination, and thus fairly put the subject before the world. The following year he published "Further Observations," to meet objections raised against his scheme. These works were almost immediately translated on the Continent, and such was the torrent of communications poured upon him from all quarters, that Jenner described himself as "the vaccine clerk to the world."

In the course of his investigations a startling fact became known; that the various eruptions called chicken-pox, swine-pox, cow-pox, small-pox, and even the "grease" in the foot of the horse, were only modifications of the same disease. He vaccinated his own child with swine-pox, producing simply the common results of vaccine lymph. A cow was covered with the blankets taken from a small-pox patient, and the disease was developed in the animal in the form of the common cow-pox eruptions. Lymph from these produced in a child the simple results of ordinary vaccination. Mr. Tanner vaccinated a cow with the "grease" from the horse's heel, producing the common vaccine pustules. Jenner, therefore, inferred that the poison of small-pox became modified and deprived of its virulence by passing through the bodies of animals.

These speculations did not interfere with the extension of the new remedy; the people round Berkeley came to his house by hundreds for vaccination; and the Jennerian Society was established in London, 1803, to distribute proper vaccine lymph over the country. In about eighteen months no less than 19,352 "charges" of the vaccine matter were given gratis, from the central office in Salisbury Square. Some notion of the zeal with which vaccination was adopted may be formed from the statement by Rowland Hill, at the anniversary of the Jennerian Society in 1806. The popular preacher then declared that he had vaccinated above 5,000 persons. By that year the remedy had been extended to the Red Indians of America on the west, and to the people of Ceylon on the east. The spread of vaccination was, of course, promoted by the published reports of its preventive and ameliorating powers.

Jenner's attention was early drawn to the mortifying fact that his great remedy was not always a complete safeguard against small-pox. He carefully examined all such cases, and frequently found that unsuitable lymph had been used; and most earnestly did he warn practitioners on this point. Is it not to be feared that these warnings have been somewhat neglected? While writing these lines we have before us the statements of the public journals respecting numerous deaths from small-pox, both in London and Paris. We also read a communication from the great-nephew of Jenner, in which he says, "Dr. Jenner was continually renewing his matter from the cow . . . and was very particular in regard to the health and constitution of the person he vaccinated;" and then adds, "Numbers of arms I have seen were so vaccinated that the eruption would have no more influence in protecting from small-pox than a common boil."

Jenner was, however, aware that, under very peculiar circumstances, the best administered vaccine lymph might fail, as even an attack of small-pox does not always exempt from a second seizure.

Some easily-explained failures of vaccination, combined with the intense fanaticism which often belongs to thick-headed prejudice, raised a storm of opposition against Jenner. Dr. Squirrel published a work, entitled "Pernicious Consequences of Cow-pox;" and a Dr. Rowley printed "500 cases of beastly new diseases produced from cow-pox," and illustrated his arguments by two portraits, one showing how a vaccinated boy had become "ox-faced," and the other representing a girl afflicted with a terrific skin disease. Dr. Moseley boldly supported the assault by calling vaccination "a diabolical conspiracy," and by describing the awful case of one who had been operated on by Rowland Hill. The result of this clerical vaccination was the growth of something "very like cow's hair" on the body of the luckless patient. Dr. Rowley tried to import a little theological bitterness into the discussion by gravely assuring the horror-stricken public that vaccination was "a profane violation of our holy religion." Dr. Gillum added to the fright by a mysterious hint that "the stoppage of the small-pox might bring back the plague;" while another gentleman gave utterance to the solemn metaphysical dogma, that "the Creator had permitted two evils to exist—Bonaparte and vaccination!" Such was the excitement produced by these extravagant statements that large placards were posted about London, warning people against vaccination. The College of Physicians published a declaration in favour of vaccination; but this did not wholly allay the terrors of the multitude.

POLLY THORNE'S NEW FROCK.

CHAPTER II.

WHEN she first awoke the next morning, Edie had quite forgotten all about Jane's story, but the sight of the nursemaid's face soon recalled it to her, and whilst she was being dressed she asked a good many questions, so that she might be able to tell her mamma all about it. She was so full of it, and so impatient to begin her story, that it seemed to her as if her mamma was a longer time than usual in giving her orders, and arranging different things about the house, but at last Mrs. Carson was ready to sit down to her work in the morning room.

Then Edie began at once, and told her all she had heard from Jane, and how sorry she felt to think of those poor children who had not food enough to satisfy their hunger, whilst she had more than she could possibly want, and all sorts of good things besides. Mrs. Carson listened with great interest to her little daughter's story, and then rang the bell at once for Jane, from whom she heard a good deal more. It seemed that the girl's father had been out of work for some weeks, having been very ill, and all his savings had been spent in getting medicine for himself and food for his wife and children, so that now there was nothing left for them. They had not liked to write and tell Jane their troubles, because it would have seemed like asking her mistress to help them, and it was only when she went to see them on her holiday that she found out the state to which her parents were reduced. She said her father could not get well, because he was fretting so to see his children suffer, and also at having lost the good place he had before his illness; her mother, too, was getting quite ill from want of the good food to which she had always been accustomed.

Now Mrs. Carson was not a woman to talk about kind actions without doing them, so she at once made up her mind how she could best help these poor people, and then set about doing it. She ordered the carriage to be at the door immediately after luncheon, as Jane's home was some miles off, and had some strong beef-tea made for the sick man, as well as some good wholesome food prepared for his wife and children.

Edie begged very hard to be allowed to go with her mother, but this Mrs. Carson would not allow, as she did not know what sort of neighbourhood she was going into.

It was late before the carriage returned, and Edith was standing idly looking out of the window, drumming with her fingers upon the panes of glass, when she saw it drive in at the gates. She ran to the door, but was quickly driven back by the icy cold wind that blew in fresh off the snow, which still lay thickly on the ground. Mrs. Carson shivered as she came in, though she had warm wraps on, and had been in a closed carriage. She kissed Edie, who ran to meet her, and then sat down by the fire to drink a cup of hot tea.

"Well, mamma, were the little boy and girl very glad to have something to eat? and is the poor man better? and will he soon be well again?" she asked, all in one breath.

"One question at a time, Edith," answered her mamma, "though I hope I may say 'yes' to all you have asked. The poor man has been very ill indeed, but I trust that with care and proper treatment he will soon be well again. It was very sad to see them all, sitting in a room without any fire this bitter day; the little boy had just cried himself to sleep, and the girl was trying to help her mother with some work, but her poor little fingers were so cold she could hardly hold it, and she had to keep breathing upon them, to try and put a little warmth into them. They were all very grateful to me, and I think I left them a good deal happier than I found them. I stayed there whilst I sent John with the carriage to buy some coals, and they had a good fire just lighted when I left."

"Oh, mamma! how kind you were to them; Jane will be so pleased when she hears it all."

"I was very glad to have the power to help them, Edie; papa and I often say that the greatest happiness we have is that of being able to help others with our money. I told Mrs. Thorne she ought to have let me know before she got into such a sad state; she might have known I should have helped her."

"Mamma," said Edith, after a moment or two, "I wish I could help them too. I am so sorry I spent all the money papa gave me on my birthday, and I shall not have any more till Christmas. But do you think you could lend me some, that I might buy a frock for that little Polly?"

"No, dear, I could not do that; it would not be your present if you had to borrow the money for it. We can only give what is our own. Perhaps you may think of some other way in which you may help those poor people."

"But you always tell Tom and me that you like us to give away some of our money," persisted Edie in rather a discontented voice.

"So I do, my child; I always encourage you to do little acts of kindness when you have the means; but I should never like you to borrow money to give away. When you are older you will see what I mean. And now I must go and change my dress; papa is not coming home to dinner to-night, so I am going to be very busy."

When Mrs. Carson came down again she brought a large parcel, which she opened, and which contained a quantity of warm, thick, grey linsey, besides some flannel, and a few other things.

"Are those for Mrs. Thorne, mamma?" asked Edie, as she saw her mother undoing the parcel.

"Yes, dear; this nice linsey is to make a dress for her, and one for Polly. She told me she had put by some money to get winter clothes, but had spent it all on her husband's illness, so I bought this as I came home. She is too busy now to make the things herself, so I am going to help her, and to set Jane to work too."

Mrs. Carson's busy fingers had soon cut out part of the little girl's frock, and she commenced her work, whilst Edie sat on a stool by her side, doing nothing. Something was evidently going on in her mind, for she watched her mother very closely for some time, and seemed as if she wanted to say something, but did not quite know how to begin.

At last Mrs. Carson said to her, "It is a pity, Edie, that you do not like work; you might have helped me with this little frock, and I should have got on so much faster; it is nice soft work, too."

To her mamma's surprise Edith burst out crying, and hid her face against the arm of the chair. "Oh! I am so sorry I have been so naughty about work, mamma, and if you will only let me do some of the frock, I will try and do it so nicely."

Mrs. Carson laid down her work, and drew her little girl on to her knee, smoothing the pretty curls back from her face as she kissed her, saying, "You shall help me as much as you like, my darling; you can work almost as well as I can when you take pains, and I think the pleasure of helping to give this poor child a new, warm frock will be so great that you will not mind not being very fond of sewing. That was what I meant when I said you might help in some other way than in giving money; but I thought I would wait and see whether you could find it out for yourself. Now we will set to work, and see how quickly we can make this frock. You shall hem it at the bottom, whilst I do the sleeves."

So Edith began her task at once, and the evening passed away so quickly and pleasantly that she could hardly believe it was really bedtime when Jane knocked at the door to say she was quite ready for Miss Edith. Mrs. Carson had been telling her little daughter such amusing stories about what she used to do herself as a child, that the time had flown away rapidly, and Edie was forced to admit that she had really quite enjoyed herself, and had no idea she could have done so much work in a couple of hours.

The next morning was a wet one, and finding it impossible to go out, Edie settled herself by her mamma's side, beginning her work again entirely of her own accord; and as she thought of the pleasure it would give Polly Thorne to receive a present of this nice warm frock to wear instead of the thin cotton one she had on yesterday, it seemed as if she could never get on fast enough.

The frock was very soon finished, and very pleased and proud did Edie feel when her mamma thanked her for her help, telling her that without it it would have taken her so much longer to finish it, that Polly would most likely have had to wait another day before getting her dress. As a great treat Edith was allowed to accompany her mother on her next visit to the Thornes' cottage, and herself to present the frock to little Polly; whose delight on finding that it was intended for her to wear was more than enough to make up to Edie for her many hours of hard work. As she drove home again with her mamma she confessed that she had never felt so happy as when Polly was thanking her for the frock—or rather Polly's mother, for the child herself was rather shy, though her eyes shone brightly with pleasure, and she turned the new frock over and over in her hand, as if she could not look at it enough.

And from that day Edith Carson quite changed her mind about not liking plain sewing; she became a most useful little girl, and was always ready to help her mamma in any acts of kindness, always declaring that the time passed more quickly when she was making something for other people, until at last she became such a capital little workwoman, that she wondered how it was possible she could ever have disliked such a pleasant employment.

I hope my little girl readers will all follow her example, and they will soon learn that nothing gives in the end such true and lasting pleasure, as giving happiness to others.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

145. Name two individuals—one from the Old and the other from the New Testament—who, although wicked persons, were at least once in their lives possessed of the prophetic spirit.

146. Where were the children of Israel encamped when the spies were dispatched to "search the land of Canaan?"

147. In what respect does the Lord's Prayer differ as given by St. Matthew and St. Luke?

148. It is recorded in Exodus that the patterns of the ark of the covenant, with the mercy seat, cherubim, &c., were exhibited to Moses in a vision on the mount. The same fact is twice referred to in the New Testament. Give the three passages.

149. That the Lord Jesus Christ was descended from David is stated both by St. Luke and St. Matthew. Quote a passage to the same effect from one of St. Paul's Epistles.

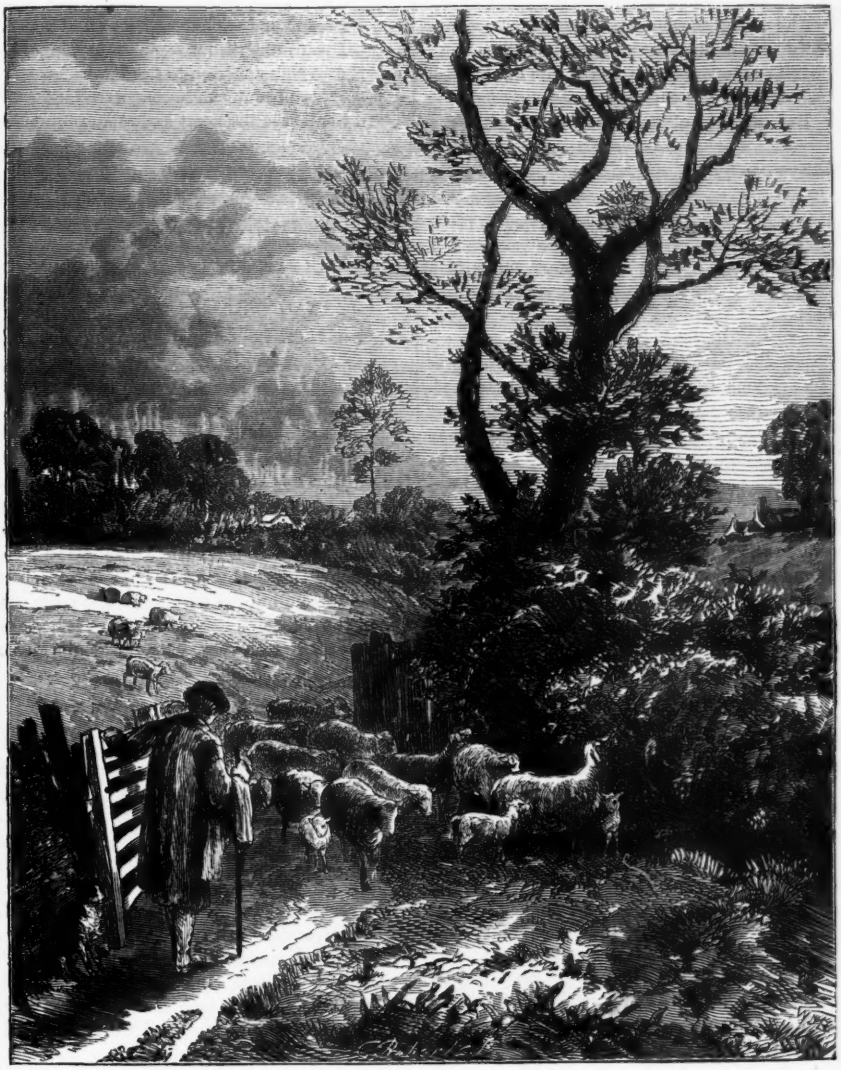
150. Where do we read that when Joseph was cast into prison his "feet were hurt with fetters?"

151. How many of the Evangelists relate the circumstances connected with the night of our Lord's nativity?

152. "There shall come a Star out of Jacob," said Balaam. Quote a passage from the New Testament in which our Lord speaks of Himself as a Star.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 352.

132. "And they were offended in Him" (Matt. xiii. 57).



133. St. Luke (vii. 36—50; xxiii. 39—43).

134. Ps. lxxviii. 24.

135. 2 Kings xxiii. 11.

136. We learn from St. Mark that he was "the father of Alexander and Rufus" (xv. 21).

137. 1 Chron. xxix. 29; 2 Chron. ix. 29.

THE SHEPHERD.

AH! happy shepherd, I would give—
What would I not?—like thee to live,
With Nature for a bride; to be Alone in haunts where none might see
Our wooing, and where none might hear
The secrets whispered in mine ear.
For thine the joy at morn to trace
The rapture on her beauteous face;

To gaze upon the midnight skies
And drink the glory of her eyes.
To hear her voice in glen and wood,
In lisping stream and roaring flood;
And when, through gleaming fires, she speaks
In thunder to the mountain peaks.
Ah! happy shepherd—happy lot,
To live and dream where care is not;
With conscience clear and spirits light,
With health attendant day and night;
Untouched by all the woes that crown
The luckless dweller in the town.
Like some caged bird that longs to flee
From cruel bondage and be free;
That sick of heart, yet now and then
Breaks into song, where busy men
In ever-restless, countless hosts
Pass to and fro like soulless ghosts,
I pour, unheard, my hapless lay,
And sigh and sigh to flee away
Where bounteous Nature, ever kind,
Shall ease the heart and soothe the mind.

OUTWARD AND INWARD RELIGION;

OR, "ROOT DOWNWARD, AND FRUIT UPWARD."

BY THE REV. ROBERT MAGUIRE, M.A., VICAR OF CLERKENWELL.

Isa. xxxvii. 31.

"'UPRIGHT and downright,'—this was your father's motto, my lads, and let it be yours!" Such were the bracing words of a fine old English gentleman to his boys, on sending them to Rugby School; and such in a spiritual point of view, may suitably form the motto of this paper. I would here urge the adoption of that religion which is found in the golden mean between the excitements and sensationalisms of all kinds, and in all sorts of directions, which characterise the present very unreal, but very demonstrative, age. I would here commend that deeply-rooted principle that stands the wear and tear of time and weather; that withstands the winds and waves of trial and temptation; that lifts its head serenely above the reach of storms and tempests; and brings forth its fruits, "the peaceable fruits of righteousness." The longer we live, and the more experience we gather, the less are we likely to think of mere profession, and the more we learn to prize the actual possession of grace and truth—that steady-going pace that, without excitement or stimulant, without sudden spurt or extraordinary demonstration, but simply fed on the "daily bread" supplied from heaven, and in the strength of that food, goes steadily on, and wins the race at last. This is what one of our Collects calls serving God "with a quiet mind." It is the gentle life of the soul, minding its own business, doing its own duty, growing in grace day by day, and "perfecting holiness in the fear of God."

"Outward and inward Religion." Some might imagine my purpose to be to decry and depreciate outward religion; but it is not so. "Outward and inward"—"root downward, and fruit upward;" I uphold both. These two include cause and consequence, seed and harvest, root and branch, leaves and fruit, inside and outside; and why should either of these ignore or despise the other? They are joint witnesses: where there is fire, you need not advertise the fact, for there is the heat of the fire to tell its own tale. Where there is air, you need not publish abroad that it is so, for life is there as its result. Where there is water, behold the outward and visible sign, the verdure of the meadow land. Possession does not ignore profession, but it necessarily implies it. The tree does not hide its fruit, but it rather manifests it. Moses' face shone with the brightness of the Lord, because he was in communion with God upon the mount. When the alabaster box of ointment is broken, the house is filled with the odour of the ointment:

> "You may break, you may ruin, the vase if you will,
> But the scent of the roses will hang round it still."

Yes, it is outward and inward religion, both; hidden, and yet made manifest; unseen, and yet made known; "the hidden man of the heart," and yet "known and read of all men." Are these contradictions? are they contrary, the one to the other? No; for a genuine outward religion is but the activity of the inward life, the outgrowth of the inward root. Inward religion is love, faith, fear, trust, and a true heart. Outward religion is prayer, praise, reading and hearing God's Word, and keeping the commandments of God. If, indeed, the two are brought into competition, and I am asked whether of the twain I would prefer, I unhesitatingly choose that which is inward—in the heart. Inward religion must be always true; but outward religion may be sometimes false. Inward religion deals with the substantials, outward religion with the circumstantials, of faith and worship. Outward religion must of necessity be occasional or periodical: we cannot always be in church, nor always on our knees; such communion with God must be limited by time and circumstances. But inward worship is the ever-burning lamp in the heart, which is the shrine of the temple of the body—the lamp of God, that must never go out. Wheresoever outward and inward religion co-exist, there everything will be included—the whole man, "body, soul, and spirit;" root and branches; the inward oil, and the light thereof. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify (not you, but) your Father which is in heaven" (Matt. v. 16).

Be it remembered, then, a true and genuine outward religion is the outward manifestation of the inward life; the external development of the inward root; the harvest grown up from an adequate seed-sowing. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." These two together must be always consistent the one with the other—"acceptable to God, and approved of men" (Rom. xiv. 18). If only to illustrate this a little further, let us see what they would be, if severed and apart, each from the other. Separate the twain; and then, what follows? Outward religion would be like a railway train without the engine. There it is, full of passengers and busy traffic; but no engine to draw it—you must return the people their money, and there is no dividend. Then, inward religion, by itself and apart, is like the engine without the train. There it stands, puffing and blowing, and all steam up; but what use is it? There is no traffic, and no gain: it doesn't pay its expenses. Outward religion, apart and alone, would be like a clock-dial without the works; what possible use could it be? And inward religion, by itself and alone, would be like the clock-works, in due order of working, but no index hands to the dial-plate. That clock might work on most regularly within, and greatly "edify itself;" but it would be incapable of ever telling to any passer-by what was the time of day. In a word, outward religion without inward religion would be hypocrisy; and inward religion without the outward manifestation would be as the seed "abiding alone," and bringing forth no fruit. But both together constitute a power, vital and fruit-bearing—"root downward, and fruit upward."

And this is according to the analogy of nature in trees: every tree must have a double growth; inwardly, in the root; and outwardly, in the branches. We can see only the outer growth, but surely we must know that for every new offshoot of the branches, there must be a corresponding offshoot of the fibres of the root; spreading its roots like Lebanon, and extending its branches to the river. This is the secret seed-growth of which our Lord speaks in the parable, "As if a man should cast seed into the ground, . . and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how" (Mark iv. 26, 27).

> We know not how, but grace when given
> Doth ripen all the soul for heaven.

And even thus is it with religion in the soul; it must first be inward, and from within it must begin to grow. The root is hidden; and that root must spread and deepen itself, must hold the soil and drink of the springs of water, and imbibe the vitality of the soil; and only thus can any root grow and multiply and fill the land.

"Taking root downward, and bearing fruit upward," was originally addressed to the Church of Israel. It is now a spiritual promise to the Church of God; and, descending to particulars, it is a promise or command to each individual soul. It thus belongs to each of us. There can be no growth in grace without the root of grace. There are no endings without beginnings; and that which is begun within us must be of God, and He will also make an end. "He that hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ."

> The evening shade, the noonday sun,
> The trunk, the branch, the bud, the fruit;
> No end can be, if ne'er begun,
> And that beginning is the root.

There is, undoubtedly, an outward religion which is in vain; and it is this that has brought the profession of religion into disrepute. The New Testament teems with testimonies to this effect; and the ministry of our Lord especially so. It was an age of Pharisaism, and of outward observances, consisting of the style of dress, the length of prayers, and a highly demonstrative worship. Making clean the outside of the platter, and "straining at gnats," their righteousness stood in carnal (i.e., outward) ordinances, and in the commandments of men. Now, against all these was the great mission of Jesus. "Mercy and not sacrifice" was His cry; the "spirit," and not the "letter," was His prescription. "For the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." Therefore, Christ pursued religion to the inward parts, from the outward acts to the inward motives that produced the acts. For example, the sin of murder—we are free from that, no doubt; but are we as free from envy and hatred and malice and jealousy, which are the seeds of murder? The sin of adultery, no doubt, we would abhor; but what of the thoughts of evil, or the glance of the evil eye, which, if only abstained from at the first, the bitter end had never been reached by any. The sin of theft we would, doubtless, regard as mean and wicked; but have we not the seeds of covetousness and selfishness and extortion already largely developed in us? Thus the searching words of Jesus awoke their echoes in all men's hearts, because each man's conscience told him how much of sin was lurking there—"He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her."

Hence the difference between what we may call "highway prayers" and "fig-tree prayers." The former were those of the proud and self-sufficient Pharisees, who ostentatiously prayed "in the synagogues and in the streets" (Matt. vi. 2), that they might have glory of men. The latter were as the prayers of Nathanael, when (as is supposed) in the seclusion and solitude of the shade of the fig-trees, he retired for prayer and devotion, and thus was seen by the All-seeing Eye; and was pronounced to be "an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile" (John i. 47, 48). It is such as these that God, who is a Spirit, seeks to worship Him.

Hence, also, the rebuke administered by our Lord to the self-righteous of His age: "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. v. 20). Their religion was all externals, and no inward root. It was not as fruit naturally growing from the root and fatness of the tree, but it was rather as the fruit of a "Christmas tree," put on or taken off at pleasure. Therefore was stress always laid by our Divine Lord on inward and spiritual religion. When He spake with the woman of Samaria, all turned on this: "Neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, shall ye worship the Father;" in this mountain by all means, or in Jerusalem, if you will, but not there only; for there is no one place to which God's Presence is confined. "God is a Spirit," and, as such, is everywhere (John iv. 21—24). In the conversation with Nicodemus, again, everything turned on this—the inward religion as the source and root of all. The "new birth" was a phrase perfectly familiar to Nicodemus, as a Jewish teacher. The rabbis taught that the heathen, when circumcised, were newly-born.* Nicodemus was ready enough to apply the expression to the heathen; but that it could at all apply to himself—a Jewish ruler, a circumcised child, already born of Abraham's seed—that he could not and would not receive. And so remote was his idea as to any necessity in his own case, that he actually fell back on the allusion to the bodily birth, thus preferring to interpret our Lord's words by the unlikely and the impossible, rather than apply them to himself, in their spiritual sense.

Thus, then, did Jesus, our Divine Teacher, ever lay stress on that which was inward and spiritual, because this, and only this, was the source, the root, the cause of all true religion. Thus, also, the apostle rebuked Jewish pride, and the merely external religion of his day, "For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh: but he is a Jew which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God" (Rom. ii. 28, 29). These words, once for all, laid the axe to the root of a merely external covenant; yea, more, the apostle elsewhere turns the tables altogether, and appropriates to the Christian the claim of the true circumcision: "For we are the circumcision, which worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii. 3).

This inward root is planted of God. "The seed is the Word;" and the soil is the human heart; "whose heart the Lord opened" (Acts xvi. 14). The seed, thus planted, is watered by heavenly and earthly means, "the dews of heaven above, and of the earth beneath;" by grace, by the power of the Spirit, by the Word of God, by the means of grace—(ordinary and extraordinary means); and through all these "God giveth the increase" (1 Cor. iii. 7); and that increase is outward—"root downward, and fruit upward." It is fruit on the tree, and from the tree; to be gathered and enjoyed for our own satisfaction, and that of others, in holy, active, useful lives, spending and being spent, as the tree is; for what nourishment it receives, it gives; and thus are we also challenged to do—"Freely ye have received, freely give."

Thus, then, let us do. From the inward and genuine root of faith, rooted and grounded more and more, let us bring forth the blessed fruits of faith and holiness, more and yet more abundantly.

* "Nicodemus knew, indeed, the language of the prophets respecting circumcision and the renewal of the heart (Deut. x. 16; xxx. 6; Jer. iv. 4; Ezek. xi. 19, 20; xxxvi. 26, 27); he might also be familiar with the circumcision of Jewish proselytes as new-born children."—Lange.

"The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy, and honour."—Esther viii. 16.

STAR of thy people's hopes, whose lambent ray
Shone unexpected 'mid the gathering gloom,
As shines some orb of hope above the tomb,
Prophetic of the Resurrection Day!
Even these distant times their homage pay
To her whose history still reads pure and bright,
And charactered in letters all of light,
What time the Purim Feast brings holiday.

How often God by unexpected ways
His lofty purpose works! How seldom man
Can probe the inner workings of God's plan!
How lips of babes and sucklings perfect praise!
Who his own destinies will dare appraise,
Or say God hath no work for him to do,
No mission whereunto He calls him? who Ignore the high vocation God on each one lays?

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART II. THE TEMPTATION. PART I.

Chapter to be read—Matt. iv. 1—11.

INTRODUCTION. Tell the children the old story of the Romans and Albans—old feud; great armies collected; agreed to decide by combat between three on each side. At last one champion of Romans defeated enemies and left victorious. Ask how long had been enmity between God and Satan (Gen. iii. 17); and servants of Christ (seed of woman) and evil spirits. Going to speak of single combat between chiefs of two armies. Who are they? Satan, called prince of this world (Eph. ii. 2, vi. 12), and Christ, Prince of peace (Isa. ix. 6). Ask what is the cause of the quarrel: the soul of man.

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES. (Read Matt. iv. 1—11.) (a) The time. Ask the children what had happened to Christ just before; what had descended upon Him, and whose voice had been heard? what was He declared to be? Directly afterwards undergoes temptation. Show how similarly after church services, special prayers, we seem more tempted than at other times: why is it? because when "filled with the Spirit" would be a noble prey for Satan. But the same supply of the Spirit will help those who "watch and pray" to overcome. Remind of parable of Sower. Ask who caught away the seed of the Word as soon as sown, and show the need of special watching after special times of prayer, &c. (b) The place. Ask who fasted in the same wilderness of Sinai for same time. Point out difference between Moses and Christ; he on the mount "talking to God," so that his face shone with glory; Christ alone with wild beasts (Mark i. 13), talking to Satan, hungry, faint, &c., so as to realise the most solitary and painful position in which man can be placed.

II. THE TEMPTATION. (1) THE FIRST. To doubt God's care and love. Ask what "If Thou be" means (ver. 3) i.e., Can God be your Father and thus let you starve? Also, food is needed—take your own way to supply it—i.e., doubt God's love, and provide what you want in any possible way. Now ask why Christ fasted. To sympathise with poor whose fast so often is compulsory. Any one who has gone long time without food would sympathise better with a starving man. So Christ in all points like us, and can feel for us. THE ANSWER (ver. 4). Turn to Deut. viii. 13, for meaning of reply. Ask how long Israelites were without bread; what food they had, and how obtained. Ask how Elijah was fed in unusual manner by ravens, and he and Moses kept alive without food at all. So Christ would not doubt God's love, because no food.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. Show how poor or those in trouble often tempted to doubt God's love. Can He be Father and make me suffer? But show from Heb. xii. 7 how this is proof of love. Also instance cases in which might be tempted to supply ourselves unlawfully—such as a man stealing money to obtain medicine for sick wife. Only one way to resist; full trust in God's love, and appeal to His Word. "Thou shalt not steal." "Man doth not live by bread alone." God can and will provide in His own time and way.

(2) THE SECOND TEMPTATION. To presume on God's care (ver. 5, 6). Remind of prophecy that Christ would suddenly come to the Temple (Mal. iii. 1). Temple now crowded, as at all feasts. God would take care of Him as promised (Ps. xci. 11, 12); the Jews would believe in Him, hail Him as King, and acknowledge as Messiah. Notice how this was also a temptation to do things in unlawful manner. How was it a temptation? To hasten on time for His being hailed as King, instead of waiting patiently, and to do so by presuming on God's care. Point out the words Satan left out, "in all thy ways." Ask when Christ was kept safe from the rage of the people (Luke iv. 30); but was this in His way—i.e., a right thing for Him to do? THE ANSWER. From previous lessons ask meaning of "tempt." Must not "try" or provoke God—i.e., take our way to bring about God's promises. Remind of Jacob; promised the blessing; took his own way to get it; but had life-long punishment.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Show how careful should be in way we apply Scripture, referring to warning in Rev. xxii. 19, to those who "take away from" God's Word. Great sin to do anything pleading an authority of God which He has not given. (2) The danger of presuming on God's love. In path of duty will always be kept safe, but must not place ourselves in temptation. Contrast Lot, who chose to live in Sodom, amongst idolators; his troubles and dangers; with Daniel, who was placed amongst idolators, and by his example and influence won over the king to fear the Lord. So with children. Show the importance of choosing a situation amongst god-fearing people, with religious privileges, &c. May be kept safe if go and live amongst ungodly, but run great risk to souls, and have no right to expect it.

Questions to be answered.

1. At what time and what place was Christ tempted?
2. What was the nature of the first temptation?
3. Name any other persons kept alive without food, and narrate the circumstances of each.
4. What lessons do we learn from the first temptation?
5. What was the nature of the second temptation?
6. What lessons may we learn from it?

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

IV.—WITH THE STRANGER IN A STRANGE LAND.

DO we ever try to realise the full meaning of the declaration that they who are afar off shall be made near by the blood of Christ? Surely it does not stop at the nearness to God by redemption, for the only true redemption is Christ-likeness, and nearness to God assumes nearness to each other in the exercise of that loving-kindness which is the very mark and evidence of our calling.

It would be well if we sometimes ceased to separate by our vague imaginations "the next world," or "the other world," from the present world, which is, perhaps in a very real sense, if we could only read the words spiritually, "the world to come" also;—as it is obvious that the world means the people around us—ourselves, those who are near and those who seem to be afar off; and no world to come that could dispense with this identity would be of any particular significance to us as human beings.

Let us then, for the present purpose, try to see how effectually Christ-likeness should bring near to us those who are afar off, by taking us near to them; how He who came not to destroy but to fulfil, looks to us to entertain strangers; and to "be careful" in the performance of that duty, as to Him who will say either, "I was a stranger, and ye took me in," or the reverse.

At the beginning of the present century, with the exception of the French Protestant organisation, there existed in London no established association for the relief of destitute foreigners who, having sought a refuge here, or being, as it were, thrown upon our shores, were left in distress, hunger, or sickness,—unheeded, only obtaining such temporary casual relief as a few charitable persons might afford, if by any chance their necessities were made known to them. At that time the foreign Protestant clergy, to whom alone many of these destitute men and women could apply for relief, were themselves mostly the poor pastors of congregations consisting either of refugees or of artisans and persons earning their livelihood by precarious labour connected with the lighter ornamental manufactures. The means at their disposal for charitable purposes outside their own churches were consequently very small, and they were unable to render any really effectual assistance, even if they could have undertaken, what would at that time have been the difficult task of verifying the needs for which relief was claimed.

Some attempt had already been made by Dr. John Murray, a good physician of Norwich, to extend to London the benefits of his "Society of Universal Goodwill;" but the scheme had been only partially successful. To him, however, the credit is due of having striven to give definite shape to an association which was afterwards to take up the good work of caring for strangers. The foreign Protestant clergy settled in London met to consider how they might best organise a regular plan for relieving the wants of those who had so often to apply to them in vain; and having settled the preliminaries, which were heartily approved by several foreign merchants and others, who were willing to assist in any scheme that would include inquiry into the circumstances of those who sought assistance, called a public meeting in order to found a regular institution. This was on the 3rd of July, 1806, and the result of the appeal was the formation of the society of "The Friends of Foreigners in Distress." By the following April, a committee had been formed and the Charity was in working order, nor were funds long wanting with which to commence the work in earnest. The cases requiring relief were so numerous, however, and the demands on the society's resources were so constant, that though some large donations were afterwards obtained from senates, corporations, wealthy merchants, ambassadors, noblemen, and Royal benefactors, a considerable subscription list became necessary in order to enable the society to grant even partial relief to cases the urgent claims of which were established by careful inquiry.

There is a wonderful suggestiveness in the list of "Royal Benefactors (deceased)," headed by his late Majesty King William IV., and her late Majesty the Queen Dowager Adelaide. More than one of those Royal donors themselves died in exile; and several of those who shared their misfortunes, and were their faithful followers, have shared the small benefits which the society had to bestow. "His late Majesty King Charles X. of France" contributed £300; "His late Majesty Louis Philippe," 100 guineas; the unfortunate Maximilian, Emperor of Mexico, £25; and his late Imperial Majesty Napoleon III., £50: while their Magnificencies the Senates of the Free German Towns, as well as the humbler companies of London's citizens, appear to have given liberally. Notwithstanding all this, however, the Society has not been able to retain funded property to any considerable amount, and it is to the annual subscription list—to which our Queen contributes £100, the Emperor of Germany £100, and the Emperor of Austria £100—that the charity must look for support. Unhappily there are evidences that these annual subscriptions are fewer than they should be. There seems still to be some reluctance on the part of the general public steadily to support an effort which has a very distinct and pressing claim upon Englishmen, who pride themselves, justly enough, upon the free asylum which this country affords to foreigners, and who appear ready to give largely in the way of occasional aid. The disparity between the number of handsome donations and of very moderate annual subscriptions is a painful feature of the society's report, and even public appeals have hitherto been followed rather by increased applications from persons recommending cases for relief, without accompanying the recommendation with a subscription, than by any decided augmentation of the funds. The Friends of Foreigners in Distress are principally to be found amongst prosperous foreigners in London, and doubtless this is no less than just; but until larger aid is given by the English public, we have no particular reason to include this association in any boastful estimate of British charity.

That the committee does its work carefully, and that cases of distress are relieved only after due inquiry, and with no such careless hand as would encourage idle dependence or promote pauperism, is evident enough to anybody who will take the trouble to inquire into the method of assistance. Let us go and see.

Perhaps not one Londoner in a thousand could tell you offhand where to find Finsbury Chambers. It is probably less known even than Prudent Passage, or what was once Alderman's Walk; and may be said to be less attractive than either, for it is a dingy, frowsy, little out-of-the-way corner in that undecided and rather dreary thoroughfare —London Wall. It is, in fact, a space without any outlet, and looks as though it ought to have been a builder's yard, but that the builder took to erecting houses on it as a speculation which never answered, even though they were let out as "chambers;" that is to say, as blank rooms and sets of offices, the supposed occupiers whereof committed themselves to obscurity by causing their names to be painted on the doorposts, and leaving them there to fade till time and dirt shall wholly obliterate them.

And yet it is in one of these lower rooms, occupying the ground floor of No. 10, that a good work is going on; for here, in an office almost representatively bare and dingy even in that place, the Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress holds its weekly meetings of directors, and the secretary, Mr. William Charles Laurie, or his assistant, Mr. C. P. Smith, gives daily attendance (Saturdays excepted), between eleven and one o'clock. Assuredly, the funds of the charity are not expended in luxurious appointments for its headquarters. Even a German commission agent just commencing business could scarcely have a more simply-furnished apartment. The objects which first strike the visitor's attention are a row of japanned tin candlesticks, meant for the use of the board at any of their Wednesday meetings which may be prolonged till after dusk. The furniture, if it was ever new, must have been purchased with a regard for economy in the very early history of the society. The work is evidently so organised as to require no long daily attendance. The place is furnished only according to the temporary necessities of business quickly dispatched. Neither in official salaries, nor in expensive official belongings, are the funds of the institution wasted.

The system is, in fact, simple enough, and is conducted on the principles laid down by the first meetings of the committee above seventy years ago, with one important exception. Formerly, applicants for relief must have been for some time resident in England; but changes in transit, and the more rapid intercommunication of nations, have made it necessary that some ready aid should be granted to those who find themselves cast upon the terrible London wilderness without a friend to help them, ignorant to whom to apply for help, and little able even to make known their sufferings.

Every Wednesday, then, the directors meet for receiving applications for relief, and reports of cases that have been investigated by the Visiting Committee.

The plan adopted is to issue to the governors of the charity a number of small tickets, each of which, when signed and bearing the name of the applicant for relief, entitles the latter to apply to the weekly committee for an investigation of his case. Every subscriber of a guinea is regarded as a governor for a year, and there are, of course, life governors also. Both these are entitled to recommend cases either for what may be termed casual relief, or for election as pensioners to receive weekly assistance (of from 2s. to 5s., and in cases of extreme old age or great infirmity, 7s. 6d. a week), sick allowances, or passage money to enable applicants to return to their own country.

It may easily be believed how even a small weekly contribution will often save a destitute man or woman, or even a poor family, from that utter destitution which would result from the inability to pay rent even for a single room; while in cases of sickness, the regular allowance even of a trifling sum will enable many a sufferer to tide over a period of pain and weakness, during which the small earnings are either reduced or cease altogether.

In cases of urgent necessity four superintendents are appointed from the board of directors, with the power to grant immediate relief; and of course many applicants receive temporary assistance from the governor who recommends them, until their case is investigated by the committee, and the worthy and indefatigable "visitor" Mr. Mohrman.

After the expulsion of the Germans from Paris during the late war, that little dingy quadrangle in London Wall was filled with a strange crowd of lost and helpless foreigners, whose condition would admit of only a temporary inquiry, and indeed needed little investigation, since want and misery were written legibly enough in their faces. For a large number of these, passage money had to be paid, and the relief was continued till the press of refugees from France abated. There was a special subscription for the relief of these poor creatures, raised chiefly among German merchants living in London, and even now the society has to extend a helping hand to some who still remain.

Any one wandering by accident into Finsbury Buildings on a Wednesday forenoon, would wonder what so many subdued and rather anxious-looking men were waiting about for in such an out-of-the way locality—some of them leaning against the wall inside, others sitting in the bare room, just inside the barer passage. Every one of these has had his circumstances carefully inquired into, and is in attendance to receive what may be called temporary relief. During the last official year 150 homeward passages have been paid, and in the two years from 1871 to 1873 the number of persons who received relief was 21,333, who with their wives and families represented perhaps above 12,000 souls. During the year 1,983 grants were made of sums varying from less than 10s. to 1,324 persons, 10s. to 431, 15s. to 47, £1 to 135, and so on to £5, which was allowed in six instances, while sick allowances were granted in 292 cases. One important and suggestive feature of this excellent society is that it numbers among its members not only subscribers to other charitable institutions, but members of the medical and legal professions, who frequently render their aid to applicants free of expense, in order either to relieve them from suffering, or to protect them from the errors or impositions to which their ignorance and helplessness might expose them.

There is no restriction either as regards creed or nationality, and though each case is matter for inquiry, the only persons disqualified for receiving relief are those who are detected as impostors—persons who are deemed to have sufficient support from any other source, those who cannot give a good reason for having come to this country, and proof of their having striven to obtain work and to labour for a maintenance, those who are proved to have been guilty of fraud or immoral practices, and beggars or drunken, dissolute persons.

As regards the numbers of persons who have received relief since the institution was founded, there is the tremendous total of 21,645 applicants on behalf of 129,299 individuals. What an army it represents! Of these Germany (which till recently included Austria, Hungary, and Bohemia) represents 71,913; Sweden and Norway, 9,422; Holland, 8,878; France, 7,339; Russia, 7,006; Italy, 5,415; Belgium, 4,578; Denmark, 4,215; the West Indies, 1,716; Switzerland, 1,685; and so on in a diminishing proportion till we come to "Central Africa!"—a very recent case, no doubt.

Can any one question the good that has been effected by an institution so careful not only to relieve with rigid economy, but also to do its work on so truly voluntary a principle? If the temporary and comparatively casual aid afforded to poor and destitute strangers works so beneficially, however, the pensions, to which only very extreme cases are elected, are even still more in the nature of help given to those who are ready to perish. Here are some specimen cases:—

A watchmaker of Frankfort, seventy-four years old, and nearly seventy years in this country, disabled by paralysis, with a wife, who is a waistcoat maker, unable to compete with the sewing-machine; one son, twenty years old, who, having some small situation, lives with them, pays the rent, and "does what he can;" a boy of fourteen who works as an errand boy.

An Italian looking-glass maker, seventy-three years old, and fifty-three years in this country. Has lately lived by making light frames, but health and strength fail, and he is suffering from asthma. His wife, an Englishwoman, and aged sixty-six, works as a charwoman. He has two sons, each married and with large families, so that they can do nothing for him.

A French widow, sixty-seven years old, and thirty-two years in this country, and paralysed for the last thirteen years. Her only daughter, who is in delicate health, earns her "living" by needlework, but can only gain enough for her own maintenance.

These are only three of the first cases in the last official report of pensioners recently elected, and they are not selected because of their peculiarly distressing character. When it is remembered that this society, for the most part, has not sufficient means to grant more than two shillings a week in the way of relief, and when we take the trouble to observe that in the majority of cases where a pension is granted, the recipients have been so long resident here that they may be said to have lost their nationality in ours, will it be too much to ask of England—alike the asylum for the persecuted and the teacher of liberty and of charity —that the "Friends of Foreigners in Distress" shall be regarded as the friends of all of us alike in the name of Him of whom it was said, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?"

But I have not quite done with the pensioners. I must ask the reader to go with me to Lower Norwood, where amidst a strange solitude, that is almost desolation, we will visit three ladies of the ancien régime, one of whom at least, began life nearly ninety years ago as a fitting playmate for the daughter of a king.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

A MOONLIGHT WALK.

THE third and last day of the fair was a Saturday, and the bustle and excitement were consequently at their height at an earlier hour. Philip's services had been in request, and there he was again, muttering that old monosyllable of his, but unable to resist the attraction which drew him thither. On this occasion, however, it was a rather different kind of attraction from the merely social and friendly one which had prevailed with him hitherto. It was an attraction of strangely conflicting pain and pleasure. At the close of the previous day he had made a discovery, or at least half believed that he had made it. What could Wildish mean by presenting the lion, which ought to have been handed over to Lucy, to Ada Lovejoy? He had promised to lay the trophy at the feet of his lady-love. What could it mean, save that Arthur was wavering in his allegiance to Lucy—nay, that he had already deserted? Philip had no sooner entered upon the scene than he set his powers of observation to work upon the problem. In the first place there was Arthur in his highest spirits. He, and Ada, who seemed to have wound up her own concern, were "flying round," as our cousins phrase it, helping everybody. Presently they withdrew to the smaller tent where the refreshments were served, for the purpose of devoting themselves to Mrs. Tabor, whose stall, with one or two others, was there. There was everything to confirm Philip's suspicion, and he felt duly indignant at Arthur's conduct. It was despicable. But he felt yet more indignant and despiteful towards the recreant, when he saw, or thought he saw, that Lucy was suffering under it.

Lucy and her flowers were, indeed, suffering from neglect. They were drooping, and she was downcast, for she felt the neglect as any other simple, natural girl would, and the more she felt it the more she shrank into herself. She was, in truth, too modest and too sensitive to engage in the unbounded solicitations which were going on around her, and in which the loudest and most persistent were the most successful. She, as well as Mrs. Austin, had sat down before their respective stalls in despair, for nothing was now to be done except by a pressure which they could not bring themselves to use.

But at length the ordeal was over, ladies and gentlemen took their departure laden with the spoils of the day. The things that remained were packed up and left in charge of servants. The very decorations were being taken down, and the men were in waiting to remove the tents, the stall-holders and a few of their friends remaining up to the last.

"What a lovely evening!" exclaimed one after another as they emerged upon the grass under the fast fading light of a serenely beautiful sky.

"I should like a breath of fresh air," added Lucy, putting her arm within her father's. "It is so calm and sweet, let us go just to the top of the slope."

"Won't it tire you, my love," said her father, "after all the standing about you have had?"

Lucy assured him it would not, and he led her away over the field, while Mrs. Tabor went home, intent on the third and last little supper with which she intended to regale the labourers. Mrs. Torrance and Fanny accompanied her, passing before the rest of the party, whom they believed to be bringing up the rear. But they were following Lucy's example, and straying over the field, Arthur Wildish with Ada, and Mrs. Austin following with Philip.

The evening was indeed lovely. The last streak of colour was fading from the sky. Its depth, its serenity, its tenderness, were unspeakable. The moon was rising over a clump of trees on the height. One or two stars shone up in the dim blue sky, and the air seemed to grow still and solemn with their distant light. Perhaps it was by contrast with the scene they had quitted that the feeling of the hour should penetrate the hearts of each. They hushed their voices, or walked on in silence.

"I dare say you are glad it is over, Lucy," said Mr. Tabor, after pause.

"Yes, papa," she answered, with a sigh, "I dare say I am."

He smiled. "It seems doubtful," he said.

"I am sorry to feel glad then," she returned.

"One of your paradoxes, Lucy."

"I can't very well explain what I mean; it is the feeling of everything coming to an end and finding us weary, that makes us feel sad, I think."

He would not answer her; his heart was feeling sore for her, and he sought to speak in a lighter way. "No wonder you are weary," he said; "weariness is the natural concomitant of a great deal of labour with very little result."

"But we have got a great deal of money, which we should not have got otherwise," said Lucy, seconding his effort, and trying to speak gaily.

"Why not?" said her father. "It would have been quite as easy for every one to have given what they have spent during these three days, and then you would have had a great deal more money, besides the saving in time. But you had to supply them with inferior motives, such as rivalry, love of display, and even cupidity."

"Oh, papa! you are too severe," said Lucy. "Many gave their work who had little money to give, and others bought it out of all sorts of kind motives, besides pleasure in its beauty."

"Well, there is good and evil in everything, Lucy," said her father, "and in everything the good is to the good, and the evil to the evil, that is it I fancy."

When they reached the little knoll they stood still, and turned to look back over the field. Ada and Arthur were coming up to them slowly, prolonging the new-found pleasure which they felt in being near each other—earth's most perfect pleasure, that of loving and being beloved. Further off, having lingered behind these, were Mrs. Austin and Philip. The latter had lost all the natural gaiety which, during those days, had lightened the prevailing seriousness of his character; a gaiety which had been a fresh revelation to his companion, who did not know that it had once been his chief characteristic. He had sunk into silence.

"How still it is," said Ellen softly. "That sky is like a promise of peace."

> "Peace, it is only a promise,
> Fulfilled in heaven to be;
> Only a broken rainbow
> Over a troubled sea."

He repeated the lines in answer.

"Whose are they?" she asked.

"Some little-known poet," he replied, "who has had his share of disappointment and sorrow, and has summed up his experience in these four lines."

"And yet peace is not joy," she said. "They only seek it who have no hope of bliss."

"A sad wise valour is the best complexion," he replied. "Do you know whose that is?"

"George Herbert's," she answered quickly. "I know his 'Temple' by heart, I think."

"He is the one religious poet I love," answered Philip. "In this, as in other things, Mrs. Austin, you and I are strangely in accord."

She was silent. Her companion little thought how the words had thrilled her.

He was looking before him at Arthur and Ada. Something in their attitude struck him. "What is the meaning of that?" he asked, indicating the pair before them.

She did not at first understand.

"They look like lovers," he said, indignantly.

"They are, I believe," she answered, smiling.

"Has Mr. Wildish given up Lucy Tabor for her?" he asked.

"I think it was Lucy who gave him up," she answered; "or rather, would have nothing to say to him. There was no giving up in the case."

"They were engaged, surely?" he said.

"Never," she replied.

"Are you quite sure of it?" he asked, in an agitated voice.

"Quite, quite. I have received Mrs. Tabor's confidences in the matter, and there never was any engagement," she answered.

"Then I have been making a profound mistake," he returned. "Mrs. Austin," he went on, "your sympathy is so true and sincere, that I do not mind telling you that I have loved Lucy Tabor all my life, and that till I die I feel that I shall never love another."

The gathering darkness kindly veiled the white sorrow that smote Ellen Austin's face. But it also hid the new light that dawned there with more than mortal beauty. A joy came to her keener than the anguish, mingling with it, so that she could not tell which was the anguish and which the joy. She could hold the cup of happiness to his lips which was denied to hers.

"You loved her when you were children," she murmured, "and you love her still. Are you sure your love is unreturned?"

"She loved me as a child; but that is quite another thing," he answered. "She seemed to care more for Mr. Wildish than for me." (Oh, Philip!)

"She never cared for Mr. Wildish at all; of that I am quite sure. But she cares for some one. It never struck me before, but it may be for you," said Ellen, thoughtfully. The idea—it was hardly an idea, it was the instinct of a supreme moment—grew upon her.

"How do you know that she cares for some one else?" he asked.

"I received a hint to that effect from her mother. Till this moment I have held it sacred. I never even tried to guess her girlish secret; but just now I feel sure that it is you. I had the same feeling for a moment when I saw you together on the night of the party."

Her companion was silent, but he was hastening onwards with increasing swiftness. Ellen could scarce keep up with him, and together they reached the little knoll, in advance of Arthur and Ada.

When they had all stood for a few minutes in the brightening moonlight, Lucy proposed going back. "We have loitered so long," she said; "mamma will be wondering what has become of us."

Lucy had loosed her hold of her father's arm, and was about to take it again, when Ellen gently stepped between them, and putting her arm within Mr. Tabor's, fairly carried him off, leaving Philip to take possession of Lucy and to follow them.

CHAPTER XLIX.

FROM STARLIGHT TO GASLIGHT.

Mrs. Tabor had been quite ready to sit down to the supper, which had been set, by her directions, with all manner of tempting viands for her guests, and so they had gone at once into the dining-room. The servant had turned up the gas, and they sat down, expecting the rest of the party every moment.

"What can have become of them?" "What can they be about?" were echoed and re-echoed in various tones of wonder and impatience, as the minutes past, and the dining-room clock showed that the best part of an hour had gone.

At length, however, they made their appearance, Mr. Tabor entering first, followed by Philip and Lucy, and all three seemingly affected by the change from starlight to gaslight, for they came in blinking like owls, as Mrs. Tabor afterwards remarked. But two of the party at least were making their slightly dazzled sensations a cloak to cover confusion of another sort, as that acute lady was presently to discover.

"Here you are at last!" she exclaimed heartily. "What have you been doing?"

"Having a moonlight walk," replied Mr. Tabor innocently, making for an arm-chair.

"And what have you done with Mrs. Austin?"

"Oh, she is too tired to come in. She hopes you will excuse her. She is quite worn out with her exertions," said Mr. Tabor. "She was hardly able to speak from exhaustion."

"Do let us have some supper now," said Mrs. Tabor; "I have been starving all day on a bit of dry chicken. Be as quick as you can, Lucy," she added, seeing her daughter quitting the room; and she motioned to the others to take their seats at the table.

But Mrs. Tabor's comfortable arrangements seemed doomed to overthrow on that particular evening, for Philip, in a grave aside, had asked leave to speak to Mr. Tabor in private for a few minutes, and Mr. Tabor, who had not had time to subside into his chair, had started up with a surprised "certainly," and led the way out of the room.

Of course, Philip had not intended to say a single word to Lucy on his way back to the house, except what the simplest friendship warranted. He was in no position to claim Lucy, even if she did care for him, which was a matter of uncertainty. And indeed, if he had chosen his own way, he would have kept aloof from her that evening, and they would all have come back exactly as they went forth. But to find himself standing beside her, with just enough of light to meet a timid, nay, half-frightened glance, and to take her hand and place it on his arm, and feel it tremble there; to walk on in silence, with the stars shining as if they shone for very sympathy with pure and fervent love; to sigh and hear the faintest sigh in answer, was more than Philip's philosophy could bear. And it took so very few words after all. He began caressing the little hand that lay upon his arm, with the old gentle fondness, and though it trembled more than ever it was not withdrawn. Then he murmured, "Lucy," and in the one universal language of love the word meant more than a million could have expressed in any other. And Lucy answered, "Philip," and in that strange language it meant exactly the same. Taken together they stood for, "I am yours and you are mine, for we love each other."

Then they paused for a moment and clasped each other's hands, and linked together thus they came on through the happy darkness.

But it was like Philip not to be able to sit down to his supper in peace, and allow Mr. Tabor to do the same; but to insist on making a clean breast of the matter first. No wonder either that Lucy had fled away to the sanctuary of her own room at the first hint of what was impending. Mrs. Tabor was in despair. It seemed as if that supper of hers would never get itself eaten, for again the time passed and again the question was re-echoed, "What can they be about to keep us waiting in this absurd way?" If she had only known, I think she would have joined Lucy, who was looking out of her window over the dim fragrant fields and shedding some happy tears, and have forgotten all about her supper too.

And meantime Philip was explaining that he had been to blame, and had said what he intended not to have said, and done what he intended not to have done; because while he was Mr. Tabor's debtor he could not seek to marry his daughter.

And Mr. Tabor had listened for a few minutes, and had then put a stop to that part of it by giving his hand to Philip and telling him, not without emotion, that he had made him a happier man than he thought it likely he should be again.

And when Philip again adverted to that debtor and creditor account, and signified that he must remain unmarried till he was a free man, Mr. Tabor silenced him by saying that he should have it all his own way in that particular, and that he had no objection to keep Lucy a few years longer. "She is not one, I think," he added, "who will suffer from a long engagement. Her mother never did, and I am glad to find her happiness secure, as we old folks could not secure it," and Mr. Tabor sighed over the inevitable. Then they shook hands over it once more and went into the dining-room.

This time they were received in silence. I think the expression of both their faces, so gravely, tenderly happy, told the whole story. However, Mr. Tabor said, looking still more explicit intelligence at his wife, "Mamma, will you go up to Lucy?"

Then after a little pause, during which Mrs. Torrance was unusually vigilant, and Fanny fell to nodding in her chair, not having found anything special to interest her, Lucy re-appeared, followed by her mother. And Lucy's fair cheek was flushed, and Mrs. Tabor's eyes honestly red with crying, but nothing more was said. Only everything was known even to an onlooker like Mrs. Torrance, though everybody seemed so subdued and quiet. And the supper was eaten at last, and the strangers dismissed, for the one who remained was no longer a stranger but a son.

It was like opened paradise to Philip to find himself set in that family circle, and made a part of it, another link in the golden circlet which promised to be the more united that its links were so few. Lucy might almost have been jealous of it had it been in her nature to be so, at the share which her father and mother seemed to have in her lover's heart.

Little was said concerning the event which had so changed their relations to each other, very little indeed of all the happiness they felt was expressed in words. As soon as Mrs. Torrance and Fanny were gone, Mrs. Tabor went over to Philip, and managing to put her plump hands on his high shoulders kissed him and said, "God bless you, Philip!" That was all. But the four sat late and long talking as only the nearest who are also the dearest talk in loving confidence, and when Philip rose to go Mr. Tabor would have had him remain. "We can give you a bed," he said, "if you will stay, and it is very late."

"Too late," replied Philip; "but my poor old landlady will not get a wink of sleep if I do not return." He had been amusing them with the details of his life in lodgings. "And Mary," said Lucy, "will lie down on the door-mat. You had better go," she added, always considerate for others, and her mother seconded her, and so Philip was sent home, and had a long walk in the starlight, and surely those stars were softer and brighter than any he had ever seen before.

Mrs. Torrance had returned home in a very amiable mood. Instead of feeling aggrieved at having had to wait for her supper such an unconscionable time, she felt delighted at the accidental arrangement which had enabled her to witness the little scene, which had conveyed so much to her thoroughly initiated eyes. To be present on such an occasion amply compensated her for any amount of waiting.

Of course she was in haste to retail the intelligence she had gathered; and if her daughter had retired to her room, she was quite prepared to follow her thither to communicate it to her. She found her in the library, however, waiting there to receive her. Ellen was lying on a couch, out of the circle of the lamplight, and Mrs. Torrance immediately sat down in front of her and began with great volubility.

"The moment they came into the room," she went on, "I saw that something had happened from Lucy's manner; and when the gentlemen left the room together I felt quite sure of it. When they came back, and Mrs. Tabor was told to go and fetch Lucy, I knew it was all settled, everybody seemed so satisfied. Well, I suppose it is a very nice arrangement, as Mr. Tenterden may have the business some day, but I never cared much for him. He has behaved very well, no doubt, but he can't have anything but what Mr. Tabor chooses to give him. It's worse even than that," she went on, thinking aloud; "he must still be in debt, paying off that money. I think Lucy has got a very poor bargain."

"Mamma, I am very tired," sighed Ellen from her sofa; "I think I shall go up-stairs at once, if you don't mind."

"Very well," said her mother, a little discontented with the seeming lack of interest with which Ellen received her story. "Dear me, child!" she added, "I declare you are looking quite ill. You are white as ashes. How little you can bear!" she ran on, as Ellen rose to leave her. "Just look at me. I am as fresh as possible, and I stood about twice as much as you did."

Ellen Austin kissed her mother mechanically, while these last words sounded dreamily in her ears. Somehow or other she reached her own room and flung herself into a chair that stood in the window. There was light enough in the summer heavens, and it streamed into the room, and threw across the floor panes of silver, barred with black. In the light again she sat, pale and motionless as a statue, looking over the garden, and across the field to the little slope toward which she had walked with Philip.

And close at hand, with only the partition wall between them, Lucy Tabor was sitting in the moonlight too, and looking in the same direction, lost in happy dreams, from which she roused herself to undress and sink into happy slumber.

But Ellen sat far into the night, till the moon had well-nigh run her course, and the stars alone were high. Not in wilfulness and rebellion, not indulging in the wantonness of passionate sorrow, but gaining resignation and peace. She was not a child to wear herself out with stormy weeping, and though a few heavy tears would fall—a sad relief—she strove to restrain them. Her tender and dutiful spirit bent meekly in acceptance of her lot, and so she could murmur, as this chapter of her life was laid aside with her garments, "At least there is no regret."

COMFORTABLE WORDS.—III.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK-ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S HIGHBURY; AND CHAPLAIN TO THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

"Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations."—1 Peter i. 6.

THE life of a Christian is a kind of paradox. "He is sorrowful," as the apostle says, "yet alway rejoicing." He is the only man who really enjoys existence, and yet he would not stay here alway, for he feels that this is not his rest. He is the only man who understands the real power of sin, and truly shrinks from it; and yet he is the only man who can regard sin as a vanquished foe.

Something of this paradoxical tone appears in the passage before us. St. Peter is writing to persons who are evidently passing through a great fight of afflictions. They are suffering now; they are expecting to suffer ere long more keenly still. There is a "fiery trial" awaiting them. It will come upon them soon. Under these circumstances they are naturally depressed. How could it be otherwise? But at the same time there is a deep-seated feeling in their breasts which underlies the sadness, and which is not disturbed by it—the feeling that they are begotten again to a glorious inheritance, and that they are kept by the power of God, to become in the end possessors of it.

In examining the words, then, let us consider, first, the sadness, and afterwards, the rejoicing.

(1) It is worth while observing that the apostle allows for the mental depression so frequently caused by sorrow. "Ye are in heaviness," he says. Some good people trouble themselves because they find their spirits giving way, their hearts weighed down by the pressure of the load which is laid upon them. They take themselves to task for not being always in a cheerful frame of mind; and thus they increase unnecessarily the acuteness of their trial, the weight of their sorrow. Would it not be well for them to consider that the body plays its part in matters of religion; that the spirits may sink and no harm be done; that we may be depressed, and yet never really question the lovingkindness and tenderness of our heavenly Father towards us? The Psalmist says, "He knoweth our frame, He remembereth that we are but dust." God does not forget our feebleness; He compassionates it. He does not judge harshly of us, because we are "in heaviness," when we are passing through manifold temptations.

Another thing may be noticed: the trouble is "for a season." To those who are suffering, suffering seems painfully long; but after all it is only for a time. Sooner or later the end comes; and what the length of the trial shall be is decided by the unerring wisdom and infinite love of our God. The refiner sits by the crucible watching the process, and watching the fire by means of which the process is being carried on. As the scum rises to the top, he clears it away, leaving the pure metal behind. But when the work he has in view is done, he removes the fire. He does not allow the flames to blaze a single moment longer than is absolutely necessary. God determines what the length of the "season" shall be; but anyhow it is only for a season.

"If need be," says the apostle; that is, "since there is a need for the trial." Sometimes we are enabled to connect our trouble with a particular fault or sin, and then we feel that we are suffering special and necessary discipline on that account. And perhaps, if we were perfectly honest with ourselves, the connection might be more frequently traced. But at other times we cannot explain, except in a general way, why we are severely dealt with. Yet, as the apostle says, there is a need for the treatment to which we are subjected. The trial does not befall us by chance. It has been directed by unerring wisdom to some particular end; and happy shall we be if we succeed in learning our lesson—in understanding what especial message the Lord our God is sending to us.

(2) Lastly we consider the "rejoicing." In spite of the sadness, there is a deep-seated fountain of contentment in the Christian's soul. He has the assurance of his heavenly inheritance. He has peace, in the sense of reconciliation; peace, in the fact of having found his home and repose in the bosom of God. Disturbed, overclouded that peace may be sometimes—but still it is there. His condition does not depend upon his own variable moods, but upon the word and the love of his heavenly Father. They tell us that out on the open sea, when the wildest storms arise, and billows run high, and fleets are tossed like corks upon the waves, it is only, after all, the surface of the water that is troubled. Below the confusion and the tumult lie calm depths which no wind can ruffle, no current disturb. Have we not here an emblem of the Christian heart? That heart is sensitive enough; it feels pain and sorrow keenly—more keenly, perhaps, than others; it is oftentimes saddened, troubled, depressed; but under the troubled surface lies a profound contentment, a restful feeling which the world cannot give, and can never take away.

WILLIE'S SISTER.

IN TWO PARTS.

PART I.

"COME along, Jenny; do walk quickly, or they'll see which way we go. What a time you were dressing."

"Yes, I couldn't help it; nurse would put on this clean frock. How far shall we have to walk, Willie?"

"Not very far; Tom says it's only three miles."

"Three miles! why, I don't think I shall ever be able to walk so far as that."

"Yes, you will; only let's be quick and turn this corner, then no one will be able to see us."

Willie and Jenny Howard were the only children of the Squire of Marshden, a pretty little village in one of the midland counties of England. They were left motherless when very young, but had been very carefully brought up by their father, and taught together by him until Willie was ten years old, when it was deemed advisable that he should go to school, in order that he might mix with boys of his own age. He was accordingly driven backwards and forwards every day to a large school in the neighbouring town. He got on very well with his lessons there, and liked it; but his father, who watched him very narrowly, begun to feel concerned, after he had been there a year and a half, at discovering symptoms of selfishness growing upon him: he was not quite so gentle with his little sister as he used to be; not that he meant to be unkind, but from sheer thoughtlessness. Forgetting her want of strength—for she was a very delicate child—he wished her to join in rough games such as they played at his school, and became quite put out if she pleaded fatigue, saying he wished she was like other girls.

Mr. Howard was called away from home, just before the time of which I am writing, in consequence of the severe illness of a friend, and on leaving charged the servants to take every possible care of the children during his absence.

Now Willie had heard from the boys at school of a fair that was going on at some little distance from his home, and had received such glowing accounts of the doings there that he came home full of it one day to his sister. His exaggerations of the previously exaggerated accounts he had received from his schoolfellows quite filled Jenny's mind with the conviction that it was, indeed, something wonderful to see, and she fully joined in his desire to go.

"Oh, I do wish papa was at home to take us," said she. "Do you think it will be over before he comes back?"

"Yes, long before; why, he told nurse, in his letter this morning, that he shouldn't be home for a month."

"Shall I ask nurse to take us?"

"No; she would spoil all the fun. We should have to walk about all the time, taking hold of her hands; and I should feel dreadfully ashamed if we met one of the boys, to be seen led about by a nurse; besides, she would be frightened to death of the guns. I can't bear old women. No, I tell you what we'll do—we'll go alone."

"But we mustn't."

"Yes, we may if we don't tell any one. Papa promised me a long time ago that he would take me to a fair as soon as I was old enough. I'm sure he wouldn't mind our going; and if we don't, we may not have another chance."

"I think we had better not go alone, because there are so many gipsies at fairs, and you know they often steal little children."

"I should just like to see them trying to run away with one of us. They only take stupid little children of five and six, who don't know how to take care of themselves. No; we'll pretend to go for a walk, as we always do on half-holidays, and then go off to the fair; but whatever you do, don't say a word about it to any one."

It required much persuasion on Willy's part to convince Jenny that it would be quite right for them to go without letting any one know, for she had always been in the habit of confiding every little thing to the nurse, whom she loved almost as a mother; but Willie persevered, and finally gained his point.

The following Saturday afternoon, after collecting their little savings together, they started off on their journey along the fields, thinking they were less likely to meet any one they knew by that way than if they went along the high road. They walked along very briskly for some time in the highest spirits, Jenny trying her hardest to keep up with Willie's long, quick steps; but her breath became short, and she was at length obliged to ask him to walk a little slower. He did so very unwillingly, saying at the same time, he wished she wasn't "such a puffy old woman."

"Why, you're more like an old woman of eighty," said he, "than a girl of nine."

"I can't help it, dear Willy. I do wish I was strong like other little girls."

"Yes, so do I. Why, there's Tom Ramned's little sister Lucy plays cricket splendidly, and can walk as far as he can."

"Wouldn't you like to have Lucy for a sister instead of me?" said Jenny, sadly.

Willie looked round at the little serious, flushed face for a moment, then said, in a very different tone, "Why, of course I wouldn't like any sister better than you; although Lucy is strong, she isn't half so kind as you are; she never gives Tom any of her pocket-money, like you do me."

A delighted, most loving smile passed over the little girl's face, as she caught hold of Willie's arm and stood on tiptoe to kiss him, saying, "If you will only sit on this stile just two minutes, I shall be able to walk as fast as you."

Willie consented, and they sat down. They had become very warm whilst walking, but after having been seated some little time, Jenny commenced shivering. It was one of those days on which people, deceived by the shining sun, and forgetting to watch in which direction the wind blows, go out in thin clothing, and come home with colds. The sun was shining brightly when Jenny's nurse dressed her in a pretty but thin dress, never thinking, of course, where she was going, nor that she would sit on a stile when overheated, allowing the cold wind to play havoc with her delicate chest. But so it was; the poor child, as she laughed at the idea of shivering on such a warm day, little guessed of what it was the forerunner.

With renewed vigour they started off again, and I am afraid Willie was almost glad his sister felt cold, for it was an extra inducement to make her walk faster in order to get warm; he went faster and faster, until in his excitement he again forgot Jenny's weakness.

"Oh, do come along," said he; "we shall never get there if you don't walk faster."

"I wish I had never come. Is it much farther? Nurse will be so cross if we're late."

"But we shan't be late if you're only quick."

"Oh! do look, Willie! I can see some people in the air in things just like boats; there's another—oh! there're a lot of them going round one after the other. Let's run."

Willie did not want twice inviting to do that; he started off at once, taking advantage of Jenny's excitement; but they soon had to content themselves with walking again.

"I saw such a lot of vans going there this morning," said Willie, "with large pictures outside; there's a giant and a dwarf there, a man who eats fire, and no end of other things; there's one man that lets a big snake crawl all about him."

"Oh, fancy, seeing a real giant! I wonder if he is as big as the one in 'Jack the Giant Killer;' I shall be so frightened if he is."

"But they won't let him touch any one, you goose; he is put in a place by himself, and people only go and look at him. We're very nearly there now, it's just round that turning."

When they arrived at the fair they were perfectly bewildered; poor little Jenny was quite frightened at the sight of so many rough-looking people, and at the loud harsh voices of men, calling out with their utmost strength about the wonders of their different entertainments, and between each speech making most deafening noises by beating on immense gongs. They went in to see the giant and the dwarf, the fire-eating man, a wonderful conjuror, and Willie was in a dreadful way because, after having paid for seeing those and bought some cake, they had exhausted their little capital, and would not be able to see some beautiful wax-works that were to be shown in the evening. They were both so excited that they thought nothing of the time, but went about in the crowd until evening, Jenny clinging as tightly as she could all the time to Willie's arm. He was pushing his way through a group of men, when, on looking up, he caught sight of his father's groom. He was terrified, and tried to hide himself; but before he had time to do so the man came up to them, and immediately began scolding Willie, and taking hold of a hand of each, led them out into the road. Fortunately he had a conveyance waiting there for him, as he had just gone in to look at the fair on his way home from the nearest village; so after having frightened both nearly out of their lives, he put them into it and drove homeward.

FLEETING.

"He fleeth as it were a shadow, and never continueth in one stay."

NOTHING on earth continues in one stay—
Day ever moves to night, and night to day;
Spring chases Winter, Summer treads on Spring,
Then at the voice of Autumn spreads her wing,
And flies afar—then, all their glory past,
Through naked branches howls the wintry blast.

Nothing on earth continues in one stay—
The sordid grub turns beautiful and gay,
See how she flutters in the summer sun;
But look again, her joyous race is run;
The sun is veiled, the storm beats fierce and loud,
And her drenched pinions serve but for a shroud.

Nothing on earth continues in one stay—
The raven locks of other years are grey;
The eyes, as keen and piercing as a bird's,
Peer through the glasses at the mingling words;
The mind, too, suffers change; the memory fails,
Halts at old faces, tells her twice-told tales.

Nothing on earth continues in one stay—
Bad men grow worse, or learn to weep and pray;
Around us falls the deepening gloom of night,
Or dayspring mellows into perfect light;
The children of the kingdom sin and die,
The blood of Jesus makes the far off nigh.

Nothing on earth continues in one stay—
Death comes at last, and turns us into clay;
Loosed is the silver cord; the golden bowl
And wheel lie broken; and the wondering soul,
Borne far away, from scenes and thoughts of earth,
In joy or woe sees Him who gave her birth.

There good and bad continue in one stay,
'Tis outer darkness or eternal day;
No rust in heaven to dim the precious gold,
No sin, to make the loving service cold;
No hope in hell; no Saviour to redeem,
Then seek the Lord to-day, for life is but a dream!

THE MYSTERY OF THE DIVINE CAREFULNESS.

"Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost."—John vi. 12.

THIS command of our Lord to "gather up the fragments," is not mentioned by the other Evangelists, although all agree in the fact that twelve baskets of fragments were gathered up. The union of such carefulness with such creative power impresses, beyond all doubt, a heavenly character on the narrative. It is a thing of which an impostor would not have thought, an incident which no mere invention of human intellect would have devised. "Nature, as the mirror of the Divine perfections, places everywhere before our eyes the same combination of boundless munificence and of frugal economy in unfolding her riches and imparting her blessings."

The miracle here narrated of feeding the five thousand is well calculated to teach us many important lessons. We are especially reminded by it of the infinite benevolence of the Lord from heaven, of His unfailing compassion for the sorrowing children of men, and of His ever-constant wish to minister to their necessities, and to do them good. And we ought further to be reminded by it of our own want and spiritual destitution, of the aspect of Christ Himself as the bread which came down from heaven, and of His infinite fulness; a fulness which dwells only in Him to supply every need, satisfy every desire, and fill up every aching void in the human soul.

But our business here is chiefly with this command of our Lord, with the principle it involves and the truth which it teaches. "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost."

The command, of course, indicates a desire in the mind of Jesus, for He could not command that which He did not desire. And since it was the desire of Christ, it must have been a desire in the Divine mind, the desire of God. From its nature, we may justly regard it as coming in the form and with the authority of a law. We can, it is true, easily conceive the Divine Being, under some special circumstances, desiring, commanding and effecting, in regard to man, that which He might not see fit to do at another time or under different circumstances. But the clause which is here added as the reason of this command, "that nothing may be lost," seems clearly to indicate a principle in the mind of God—a law of the Divine government.

These words, then, are suggestive and indicative of such a law, the evidences and operation of which are not confined to material objects, but enter into the spheres of the moral and spiritual, and claim for it a place and an influence in our consideration of every department of the Divine dominion. We may learn some truth to do us good if we consider this law in operation, and glance at some illustrations of it in the spheres of nature, providence, and religion.

I. Look at it in the sphere of Nature. In the works which God has made, and in the physical processes which, in His wisdom and power, He is constantly carrying on, this principle is abundantly manifest. Even although science is but yet, so to speak, in its infancy regarding many of the laws of the material world, enough is known to show very impressively the operation of the principle that nothing is lost. And every successive discovery may be shown to be, either directly or indirectly, a further development of this law. Amidst all action and reaction, amidst all production and decay, in life or in death, nothing is absolutely lost. The water that is spilt upon the ground, or the passing shower that descends upon the earth, is not lost. It will either sink into the soil to promote vegetation, or be evaporated into the atmosphere to minister to the component parts of the air which we breathe. Those leaves which strew your path so thickly in the autumn, when all vegetation begins to die, are not lost. Their finely-wrought and beauteous texture may perish, but their very decay and decomposition minister to the verdure, beauty, and abundance of the returning foliage of succeeding seasons. The very fuel which is consumed in the fire is not lost, for apart from its influences while burning, the gases which it engenders and the ashes which it leaves, minister in other departments to the harmony and perfection of Nature. So with the breath which we inspire and then exhale, impure and loaded as it is with the carbon of the animal frame, although unfit again for healthful respiration, it is not really lost. The impurities which it contains are needful to vegetable life, and the vegetable world returns it again purified and fit for the organs of man. The compensations of Nature in her various processes are wonderful indeed, and the more minutely that they are examined, the more clearly is the evidence seen that nothing is lost. The very storm which descends with violence, engaging the elements of Nature in the fiercest warfare, while it may partially injure vegetation, and appear, for the time, to destroy the hopes of the husbandman, is not lost; and oftener than not its influence is felt in the destruction of atmospheric agencies which, if allowed to operate, would have cast the shadow of famine over the land. There are many things in Nature which we may not be able to see, or penetrate, or comprehend; but in the wisdom and goodness of God nothing is lost. And surely, in reference to all such matters, where we have to deal with the blessings of Nature or the bounties of Providence, we are thus impressively taught the impropriety and the evil of needless expenditure and thoughtless waste. But there are still more important exhibitions of the principle than these.

II. Think of it in the sphere of Providence. It is of the highest importance for us practically to recognise the Divine supremacy in all departments of His dominion. The God of the Bible is the God of Nature and of Providence. The wisdom that inspired the sacred Page is the wisdom that presides in the world of matter and in the circle of events. There is much in Providence beyond the reach of our comprehension and the power of our unravelment. Yet there is enough, obvious and intelligible, to testify to us the operation of the law that nothing is lost. If it be true that God numbers the very hairs of our heads, and that without His permission or knowledge not even a sparrow can fall to the ground, then we may be assured that nothing of all those influences and agencies, those circumstances and events which we call Providence, will be lost. They are all tending to mark out some purpose in the history of individuals, families, and nations. That circumstance which we may regard as trifling and of no importance, that event which may pass before our eyes or in our own experience without evoking thought or exciting feeling, that incident of yesterday which is gone to be no more remembered, is not lost in the arrangements of the Almighty, but serves a purpose in our lot, and has a place in the completeness of our life and in the course of our destiny. Nothing is lost. The constant application of this truth would exercise a mighty practical influence on us for good.

If we trace the history of Moses—his being placed in the ark of bulrushes, and his discovery by Pharaoh's daughter, may seem to us marvellous incidents, especially in connection with his subsequent training in the court of the Egyptian king, his education in all the wisdom of the land, and his participation in the refinements and luxuries of a royal palace. Yet nothing in his history was lost. He was to be the leader and lawgiver of Israel, and it was meet for him to have a proper training for such a post.

In like manner if we trace the history of David, from his father's sheepfold to the throne of Israel, or the history of Abraham, from his departure from his country and his kindred until he was gathered unto his fathers, nothing in either case was lost; for the one was thereby fitted to be the king, and the other trained to that unhesitating confidence in God which was to make him the father and the pattern of the faithful in every age.

And so, if we pass from individuals to nations, the same truth holds good. It might seem to us a strange thing to send a nation who were to be the conservators of God's truth and worship on the earth into bondage for several centuries at the very outset of their history—to subject them to the cruelties of oppression and the degradations of a hard slavery; but now we know that nothing in that bondage was lost upon their future history. Thereby they were to acquire the habit of obedience, and to come forth as a new material prepared to receive the mouldings of a master-hand and the impress of a governing mind. And in ages afterwards, amidst their many provocations and repeated rebellions against God, why send them as a punishment to a different and distant land to remain in exile and bondage for a period of seventy years? Nothing in that exile was lost: for apart from its influence on themselves, thereby the God of Israel became known amongst nations who otherwise would not have known His name or had the evidence of His moral glory; and the world was thus better prepared for the advent of the promised Redeemer.

Whether we see it or not, then, we may be assured of this, that in the ways of Providence nothing is lost. The most trifling incident of life may be the crisis of our being, the turning-point of destiny. Nothing ought to be disregarded by us; and the devout study of events, the earnest contemplation of Providene, would tend materially to make us a wiser and a happier race. That we have no control over much that we may see or feel or hear of, is no reason why we should not seek to watch the control of God. He doeth all things well; and as nothing comes by chance, so nothing is lost in the universe of influences and events. But we advance to a higher region, and

III. Consider this truth in the sphere of Religion. Religion is the grand business which lies between the soul and God—that which pertains to the spiritual and the eternal interests of man. The design and practical influence of Divine revelation are to form the human character anew, and subdue the world to God. The religion of Christ carries on and works out the Divine purpose in reference to the individual and the race. It is well for us, and it will be for our safety and encouragement in this grand purpose and process, to see and feel that nothing is lost. God's word, and the moral influences which directly or indirectly it sets on foot, never return to Him void. In our relations to God and eternity, there are many manifestations of this law. It holds good in the formation of individual character, in the exercise of personal influence, and beyond these, in the furtherance and progress of the Divine purposes on the earth.

We see it (1) in the formation of individual character. Here, assuredly, nothing is lost; a truth which, alas! we are ever prone to forget. God has so formed our moral nature, and has so adapted moral agencies, and surrounded us with moral influences, that absolutely nothing in our course or character can be said to be lost. Apart even from the direct and immediate bearing which every man's conduct may have on his everlasting welfare, there is a positive connection between every thought of his mind, every emotion of his heart, every word of his mouth, and every action of his life, and his progress in that which is good or that which is evil. No unholy desire, no impure imagination, is lost. No vain thought, no sinful passion, is lost. No idle word, no wicked deed, is lost. We may treat these things with indifference as they pass. To spend an hour in foolish talk or sinful company may appear a matter of small importance. To indulge in a little deceit, or envy, or pride, or slander, may appear a matter of trifling moment; peradventure, it may promote our own purposes, or serve our own reputation. And in the world's opinion it may be so; but we may be assured of this, that nothing is lost of all that we do. Every sinful indulgence gives a touch to the character, filling up its rugged outline and preparing it for destruction. Every bad thought and deed makes the heart worse, and the power of depravity stronger. It may be the action or the exercise of a moment, but it abideth ever. So, on the other hand, every holy aspiration, every righteous victory over sin, every resisted temptation, every noble deed of self-denial or benevolence from love to Christ, purifies the conscience, strengthens virtue, and gives additional beauty to the character. No secret prayer, no silent tear, is lost. No holy desire or sacred sorrow is lost. No kind word, no liberal action, is lost. Everything good that is thought, or said, or done, tends to make us better. This is an invariable law in the formation of character, especially where Divine revelation and religious influences are enjoyed. Every touch of the artist's chisel develops a new beauty, or impresses a new feature on the form and appearance of the marble statue. So every holy thought, every lofty aspiration, and every virtuous action is like the stroke of the Divine chisel upon the character of man. When the statue is finished and the form perfected on earth, it is removed to adorn the palace of the Eternal King. Nothing in the process of preparation is lost.

We find it also (2) in the exercise of personal influence. That influence may be unconscious; very generally it is so. Where we exercise conscious influence, we do not wish it to be lost. It is the exercise on our part in some sense of power. But every man, especially in the sphere of morals and religion, where means of grace are enjoyed and Christian profession is made, is exercising an influence on those around him when he is not thinking of such a thing. Every one has an unconscious influence. And here is that which concerns us all very deeply. We have just seen how every word and act of ours tells upon ourselves; but it behoves us also to remember that every such word and act tells upon others.

"It is not those alone who purposely try to corrupt others that exert such an influence." No one can live without exerting influence. We may not see the effect now or at once; it may be as the seed cast into the soil, which first must die ere it can bring forth fruit. But we cannot live in this world and escape responsibility in this matter. Others are continually receiving impressions from our conduct and character. We are the sources of emotion, thought, affection, action in and to each other. Nothing that we do or say in the presence of others is lost. God has arranged it so, and it appears the more strongly as we come within the light of Christian principles and privileges. This is a truth of the highest importance for us, and it should be impressed upon our minds. It is at once awfully solemn and highly encouraging.

Here, for instance, is a Sunday-school teacher, careless, cold, irregular. He may think it a small matter to be often five minutes late at his post, or to come unprepared to his class, or to indulge in some frivolous remark or foolish jest with his neighbour, or to make fun at the supposed oddity of another; but nothing is lost. His influence tells to him unconsciously, but it tells powerfully for evil on the children of his charge. Here is another teacher—diligent, prayerful, earnest, kind, and always prepared to welcome his class. His influence also tells; but how different the result. No earnest appeal or encouraging smile is lost; no kind word or faithful rebuke is lost; no angry frown, no hasty reproof, no careless jest, is lost. This law holds good if anywhere in the sphere of personal influence. We are either infusing good or evil into the souls of those around us, and influences are continually streaming forth from us. Of what sort are they?

In this law we see the true philosophy of doing good. It is for ourselves to seek to be good and godlike, to cultivate a character that will of itself, by its very presence and contact with others communicate good. That is what God especially intends for His people. They are made the depositaries of His grace, that they may be the lights of the world, and "the salt of the earth." Let us evermore seek that our character may communicate good, as the sun communicates light and heat, for we may be assured that nothing going forth from us is lost.

This law holds good also (3) in the furtherance of the Divine purpose in the world. We advance from man's relation to God and to his fellow-man to see this law operating in God's revealed relation to our fallen race. His purpose, made known to us in the Gospel, is to bring back the world unto allegiance to Himself; not only to restore man to His favour, but to His image, to make this a happy world again in which His will shall rule, and His moral glory pre-eminently shine. The religion of Jesus is itself a proof of this principle in the moral government of God. This world had revolted from His rightful rule. It harboured guilt, rebellion, sin. The creature formed in His image had become His avowed, yet insignificant foe. But, although immensity teemed with worlds, and although creating power might have summoned into existence new ones to celebrate His praise and to show forth His glory, yet this globe, amongst the least of all, was not to be lost. He might have left it to itself, or blotted out its rebel existence for ever; but Jesus Christ came, and the incarnation of the Deity in Him was the grandest testimony to the universe that nothing is lost. Even the rebellion of man and the rebellion of hell were to show forth His praise. And nothing in the life of Jesus—humble, poor, despised as He was—was lost. Sometimes we may be tempted to ask, Why all His suffering, ignominy, agony, and tears? Why not majestic pomp, and indisputable authority, and glorious royalty on the part of the Messiah on earth? Assuredly nothing in His sorrow or His suffering was lost. "For it became Him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings." And so through this Divine mediation, we believe the greatest possible number will be saved. Infinite wisdom and infinite goodness only are the limits. In the Divine economy nothing will be lost that can be saved. All will not be saved, but God puts it to man and says, "Whosoever will, may come." And so in the history of the Church, and of the progress of Christianity, there are many dark spots and bloody periods which provoke our wonder, and sometimes excite our doubt; but we may be well assured that nothing has been, that nothing will be lost.

Such is the Divine purpose, and all God's people are intended to be fellow-workers with Him in this glorious plan. They can help, and here is the encouragement—nothing in their help will be lost. The anxious efforts of the mother in the training of her wayward boy, the earnest instructions of the teacher in his thoughtless class, the expostulations and appeals of the pastor, are not lost. They all tend to carry on the work and carry out the purposes of God. There may be opposition and indifference, but labour is not really lost. There may be persecution, but effort is not lost. No means or instrumentalities used in God's service are absolutely lost. Neither the humble prayer nor the penitential tear, nor the widow's mite, is lost. Every tear and sigh is treasured up. The immediate fruit of labour may not be seen by us. The seed which we sow may be carried by the winds of Providence to a distant clime, or down to another generation, but no seed from God can possibly be lost. And everything that we do in the cause of truth, in the spread of righteousness, and in the kingdom of Christ tends to further the Divine plans and to consummate the glorious purposes of God. Hear the heavenly maxim, and act upon it, "Gather up the fragments, that nothing be lost." Help the cause of God and humanity on the earth, and be encouraged by the assurance that no effort or sacrifice of yours will return unblest.

JAMES SPENCE, D.D.

I SHALL BE SATISFIED WHEN I AWAKE WITH THY LIKENESS.

I SHALL sleep soundly when the day is done,
A rest will come to me, a deep repose,
After the troubled tumult of my life,
Its feverish pleasures, and its bitter woes.
I know not where my resting-place will be,
Nor when the slumbrous spell may on me creep;
At morn, or noon, or eventide of life,
I only know that I shall surely sleep.

I shall awake! The grave is not the end,
Neither of soul, nor yet of soul-less clay;
Death is not ceasing—my heart tells me this,
And Thou hast told me of a waking day.
I know not when it comes, but soon the blast
Of the loud trumpet shall my slumbers break,
It may not be for many hundred years,
Yet surely as I sleep, I shall awake.

I shall awake! And with Thy likeness too,
Not with this sin-marred soul and sensuous frame,
The perfect spirit within the perfect form,
Changed, glorified, yet all in all the same.
So shall I rise, I cannot picture yet
The glorious body Thou wilt fashion me,
I only know that when I sleep in death,
After Thy likeness shall my waking be.

I shall be satisfied! Oh, wondrous thought!
I, ever hung'ring like the restless sea,
Thirsting and longing for each untried good,
Can I be satisfied? Yet this shall be,
I hunger for deep love! and Thou art Love,
I thirst for life! and endless Life is Thine,
I long for good! and Thou art perfect Good,
And all Thou hast and art will then be mine.

I shall be satisfied! No want, no void,
No more wild cravings for a fuller bliss,
Will my soul then be narrowed to a state
Of lesser instincts, lower hopes than this?
Filled not by having more, but seeking less?
Ah, no! not thus, but one exhaustless tide
Of deep calm joy will set towards my soul
And fill it; so shall I be satisfied.

I shall be satisfied! Not here, not now:
Now one eternal "Why?" doth vainly vex
My soul with riddles, whose answers are not found,
And here dark doubts and mysteries perplex.
Oh! much I long for light! But I will wait;
Light will come to me and all good beside
After that deathly sleep to which I go,
When I awake, I shall be satisfied. A. E. A.

BERKELEY CHURCH, GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—II.

THE GRAVE OF DR. JENNER.

JENNER became famous in foreign countries; five medals were struck in his honour. His request was a word of power with Napoleon, in the midst of all his triumphs; and when the allied sovereigns visited London in 1814, the greatest military and political men eagerly sought an interview with the Berkeley physician. What were his rewards in England? He had received the degree of M.D. from the University of St. Andrew, and afterwards from Oxford, and naturally wished to be a Fellow of the College of Physicians. This learned body formally intimated to him that he must pass the preliminary examination, which was mainly classical! As Jenner was then a member of twenty-six medical institutions, and famed through the world, he resented this, exclaiming, "No; not for John Hunter's museum." To put such a man to construe a chorus in Sophocles may seem an original mode of acknowledging his merits.

As Jenner had spent much money in carrying out his numerous experiments, many friends advised that application should be made to Parliament for a national grant. It was therefore proposed, in 1802, that Parliament should vote £10,000 to Dr. Jenner. The grant was not only vigorously opposed, but one M.P. sagely remarked that the physician should have kept his discovery a secret, and thus have made his fortune! The money was, nevertheless, voted by a majority of three. The grant was not paid for two years, and then about a thousand pounds were deducted for fees, while another thousand was absorbed by the costs of the petition. Many men felt this to be a very insufficient acknowledgment of services which had benefited the whole human race. Above six thousand pounds were subscribed in India; and in 1807 the Marquis of Lansdowne carried a motion for a further grant of £20,000. Sixty voted for the grant and forty-three against.

At Berkeley Jenner inhabited the remains of an old monastic foundation—a house still called "The Chantry"—close to the churchyard. The detached church tower rose close to his shrubbery, and was gradually clothed with ivy planted by Jenner, and said to have been brought by him from the ruins of Tintern Abbey. He was accustomed to vaccinate the poor of the neighbourhood in a summer-house close to this shrubbery; where, during an outbreak of small-pox, nearly three hundred persons would sometimes assemble.

The last years of Jenner's life were happily spent in professional occupation, in watching and aiding the spread of vaccination, and in the study of natural history. The first decisive intimation that the close of his useful life was at hand was given on the 6th of August, 1820, when he was attacked by an ominous giddiness while walking in his garden. But the end did not come until the 26th of January, 1823, when a paralytic stroke, which had seized him on the preceding day, ended the life of Dr. Jenner. He was buried in the chancel of Berkeley Church, on Monday, 3rd February, though many had urged that so great a benefactor of the human race should have a grave in Westminster Abbey. It is better as it is. Berkeley was the field of his victories, and to Berkeley is justly given the honour of guarding his tomb.

How was it that the attempts to raise a statue to such a man were so feebly supported? With considerable efforts, a statue was raised in Gloucester Cathedral; and after many attempts and disappointments, a public statue of Jenner was placed in Trafalgar Square, London, and uncovered by Prince Albert on the 17th May, 1858. This memorial was subsequently removed to Kensington Gardens.

The character of Dr. Jenner may be described in a few words. Great kindliness of heart, perseverance in benevolent objects, and deep religious feeling were his most evident moral qualities. His office, as the great vaccinator of the world, engaged much of his time and attention, and his chief relaxations were found in the cultivation of his garden and the study of natural history. His observations and notes on the habits of animals were continued to the close of life, and his paper "on the migrations of birds" was read at a meeting of the Royal Society, ten months after his decease. He had little taste for science, especially for subjects connected with mathematics; but this defect was not accompanied by any vagueness or feebleness in his reasonings on medical subjects. Jenner had acquired a habit far more important for general purposes than ability in abstract logic; this was a power of close observation. Every new aspect of Nature, any peculiarity in vegetable or animal life, and each special variation in the symptoms of disease were instantly noted in a small book which he always carried with him. To this important habit he owes his great fame, and he continued the practice of thus "making notes" to the last day of life. The final entry, written the evening before his fatal attack of paralysis, refers to the effects produced on a friend by severe cold.

Some one may ask, what sort of a man was this famous doctor in appearance? The answer is short; there was nothing remarkable either in his face or manners. A kindly, quiet, and unaffected man, he looked just what he was—a simple-minded, educated English gentleman. It is said that the few portraits which exist give a very imperfect idea of his countenance, which, though not characterised by any remarkable intellectual expression, indicated benevolence and quiet thoughtfulness. The best likeness of Jenner is said to be given by the bust at Kingscote Park, Gloucestershire. The world, probably, requires neither marble nor painter's colours to keep his fame ever fresh. Each person saved from the small-pox plague, every epidemic of this terrible pestilence checked, and even the possible deliverance of mankind from the desolating infliction, are, and will be, the noble monuments of Jenner's life and work.

The grave of such a man would add a deep interest to a Westminster Abbey or a Notre Dame, and it will certainly secure for Berkeley Church an honourable mention in the long and diversified history of human progress.

THE BLIND MAN OF BETHSAIDA.

"And He cometh to Bethsaida; and they bring a blind man unto Him, and besought Him to touch him."

IN all the miracles of healing performed by Jesus the condition was one and the same: faith on the part of the recipient, or at least on the part of those who brought the sufferer to Him. Sometimes He wrought with means, sometimes without means. Very often He wrought readily and with words of blessing. Once He wrought as it were reluctantly and with expressions almost of harshness. Very often He wrought instantaneously and completely: the word or the touch, or both combined, was followed immediately by the cure. The circumstance which distinguishes this miracle is the progressiveness of the cure. We see that Christ wrought this miracle gradually, and by two successive operations carried the work of healing to its accomplishment. True, we perceive something similar to this in other cures, as in that of the man born blind, who only after he had been to Siloam to execute there the injunction laid on him, "came seeing" (John ix. 7). In this instance, however, the steps of the progress are more marked than in any other.

"When He had spit on his eyes, and put His hands upon him, He asked him if he saw aught." When the healing hand was first laid on this blind man the result was imperfect and inconclusive. Till now he had been in utter darkness; now he can not only see the light, but can perceive objects, certain moving forms about him, but he has not the power of discerning their shape or magnitude. His vision is but partial and incomplete. He sees things, and they are in motion. Trees he should have accounted them from their height, and men from their motions. To his half-enlightened eye a man might be a tree: the walk of the one might be the sway and swing of the other. But the Great Physician leaves not His work unfinished: He designed not to leave him in this state of incompleteness. He would have Himself remembered and trusted in, not as one who can half heal, but as one whose power and whose love is infinite.

"After that He put His hands again upon his eyes and made him look up; and he was restored, and saw every man clearly." This is the second and final step in this miracle. The merciful and gracious Lord, all whose works, like those of the original creation, are not halt and maimed, but very good, thus completed the work He had begun. With what gratitude must the eyes thus opened have looked on Him who had caused blank nothingness to give place to light peopled with objects—who had transferred his helplessness to independence, and from a life of dull monotony into a life of conscious vigour and of sweet enjoyment—who had literally brought him out of darkness into His marvellous light.

"And He sent him away to his house, saying, Neither go into the town, nor tell it to any in the town." Our Lord had led the blind man out of Bethsaida to heal him, and tells him not to enter the place again after he is healed, and in order to show the emphasis of this injunction St. Mark adds that an additional command was given to the effect that he should not "tell any in the town. The first command contains the second, for it is certain that if he did not "go into the town," he could not "tell it to any in the town." How very different this to the command Christ gave to the man out of whom He had cast devils: "Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and hath had compassion upon thee." Perhaps other works of power had been performed here, and no heed was paid by the inhabitants of the town to these evidences afforded to them that a mighty Deliverer had visited them, and would do them good, if only they would receive Him. This may be a reason why Christ will not allow this man to go into the town to noise abroad what has been done for him. The town was spiritually blind, and would not discern Christ, and is therefore left in its darkness.

The healing of the blind man is an example to many of their spiritual experience. The hand of Christ may have been laid on them, not only in bringing them within the sound of His Gospel and the strivings of His Spirit, but also in some deep inward convictions, in true repentance for sin, in hearty prayer for pardon and amendment. But not all at once are old errors put to flight, and not all at once do they see clearly; for a time there may be clouds which, drawn across, bedim their vision: they see men, but as trees, walking. Yet in good time Christ completes the work which He has begun; He who was the author becomes the finisher of the healing process in their case; He lays His hands a second time on them in answer to their prayer of faith, and the result is that objects before misty and inaccurate, become clear and distinct. QUITS.

ON the Monday following the bazaar, Mr. Huntingdon sat reading in what served for study, dining-room, drawing-room, and all. His sister Clara sat opposite to him, reading also, when the servant brought in a couple of letters, and handed them to her. The first which she looked at was addressed to her brother, and was deeply edged with black, so that when Clara had read the postmark—"Norwich," her hand shook with the quick apprehension of a sensitive organisation, as she handed it over to him.

"A letter from home," she faltered, "and I don't know the handwriting; but somebody is dead."

He tore it open, and exclaimed, when he had glanced at it for a moment, "Poor old Symmonds! he is gone at last."

But Clara was already reassured, for her own letter was from her mother, and contained the intelligence of the death of a distant connection, resident in their neighbourhood.

"I am summoned to the funeral," said Mr. Huntingdon.

(Drawn by R. Barnes.)

"You will win her yet"—p. 411.

"You will go?" said Clara; "mamma hopes you will be able."

"I think I ought," he answered. "We have had very little to do with the family, and they might think it unfriendly—a keeping up of old misunderstandings and rancours—not to go."

"How strange!" exclaimed Clara, still going on with the reading of her letter; "his wife died only a week ago. You know she was young enough to be his daughter."

"Yes, his grandchild almost. He must have been nearly seventy when he married, and more than eighty when he died."

"Eighty-five," said Clara, referring to her letter. "But who has invited you?" she continued. "He was always surrounded by her relations."

"It is his lawyer, who is also executor," he replied.

"Perhaps the old man has left you a legacy," suggested Clara.

He smiled, and shook his head.

"Well, we had better settle about your journey at once," she said.

The funeral was to take place on Wednesday, so that it was desirable that he should start on the morrow, and take up his quarters at home, returning on Friday evening, so as to leave a day free for preparation for Sunday.

Mr. Symmonds, to whose funeral Mr. Huntingdon was summoned, had married an elder sister of Mrs. Huntingdon's something like half a century before. The two families had been very closely united during the lifetime of this lady; but she had died childless, and her husband had subsequently married a young woman quite in the lower rank of life—in fact, the servant who had waited upon his wife in her last illness. The girl, who was very good-looking, had been tempted by his wealth and position, and by the likelihood that she would very soon be left rich and free. She had obtained great influence over him, and alienated him completely from the family of his former wife, surrounding him with her own relations, while these held aloof.

Clara saw her brother off to Norwich on the morrow, and beyond a note received on Wednesday to satisfy her as to his safe arrival, she heard no word of him, till he presented himself to her on Friday evening, as they had settled. She was at the window watching his arrival. He jumped out of a cab with an air of unusual alacrity, and ran up-stairs to find her at the door.

Taking her thin white face between his hands, he kissed her breathlessly.

"Well?" cried his sister eagerly, for there was good tidings in his face.

"Well, Clara," he re-echoed, "old Symmonds has left everything he had in the world to me."

"Is it possible?" cried Clara, overwhelmed with the tidings.

"It is true," said her brother, drawing her to him, and setting her down on the couch beside him. "It seems he had made a will several years ago, leaving everything to his poor wife, and merely putting in my name in case of her dying before him, an event which did not seem at all likely to happen. And yet that was just what did happen. She was nursing him in his last illness, when she herself had a sudden seizure, which carried her off before him—she in the prime of life, and he tottering for years on the brink of the grave. If she had lived a week after him, instead of dying a week before him, everything would have gone to her relations. We had a rather unpleasant scene with them after the funeral. They abused the old man terribly, though, as I pointed out to them, they could hardly blame him for a disposition of his goods, in the case of his wife's death, which did not touch them, but his own relations. He has some remote ones, I fancy, somewhere in the North. But for the insertion of my name he would have died intestate, and they must have come in for the property."

"And how much is it?" said Clara.

"It is not nearly so much as was supposed," replied her brother. "Some of his investments, it seems, turned out to be failures, and altogether those that remain bring in some five hundred a year."

"But that is wealth for——" she was going to say, "us," but the word was but half uttered, and she substituted "you."

"Why not 'us,' Clara?" he asked, reproachfully. "It has always been 'us' hitherto. Is it to be so no longer? Am I to be allowed to take everything, and give nothing?"

"Yes, it is 'us,' Charles," she returned, smiling up at him; "we are rich if you are rich. But some one else ought to share it with you. This will alter all our plans, will it not?"

"I think not," he said; but a vivid and painful flush came to his cheek, and burnt there. He looked on the ground, and remained silent.

Clara laid her hand upon his arm caressingly. "You must not let us stand in the way of your happiness, Charles," she said, with grave tenderness. "Remember that your happiness is our most precious possession—far dearer to us than all the wealth in the world. I am sure I speak for both our parents, as well as for myself, when I say that you must not allow yourself to carry out arrangements for our comfort which would interfere with any other prospect of yours."

"I have offered to make a home for you here," he said, "and I cannot disappoint you. The old folks are looking forward with pleasure to joining us in London before the year is over."

"I speak for them as well as for myself," she returned; "and I am sure we could not be happy if we withheld you from making a home for yourself, and having a wife and children of your own, as you might have now. Besides," she pleaded, "wherever we three are together we can make a home; only you took me up here, and we could not manage in that way much longer."

"You are always generous, Clara," replied her brother; "and the truth is, I am in a painful dilemma." He paused, and looked more embarrassed than before.

"I wish you would tell what there was between Mrs. Austin and you, Charles," said his sister in a low voice.

"I will tell you," he answered; and he told her how he had believed he was not unacceptable to her, and how he had proposed to win her, having enough for his wants and for those who were strictly dependent upon him, and calculating upon the wealth she would bring to maintain her position as his wife, and give her all the luxuries to which she had been accustomed; how he had learnt that she must renounce that wealth upon making a second marriage, and how he had been obliged ignominiously to retreat from, almost to retract his proposal.

Clara listened with a troubled face; the recital pained her exceedingly. She knew too well that she herself had been one of the hindrances in her brother's way. But she put aside all thoughts of self as she answered, "You must go to her again, Charles, and prove to her that it was herself and not her money you wanted. And," she added sweetly, "I have never seen any one yet whom I should like so much to have for a sister."

"Ah, Clara, it is ten times more difficult to go to her now. How can I ask her to renounce wealth for me, when I was afraid to risk anything for her?"

"If you were afraid of risk, it was the risk of her comfort and your own duty, Charles. I think you have an excellent plea. A man has no right to risk not being able to provide for his own house, nor yet being unable to do his duty to his parents. These are risks which no high-minded woman would wish him to run."

"I think I shall send you to plead for me, Clara," he answered, smiling. "You always know how to say the right thing in the right place."

"Perhaps I may plead for you," she replied; "but not now. You must lose no time in pleading for yourself."

"When do you think I ought to see her?" he asked.

"There is no time like the present," replied Clara; "I should go to her this very evening if I were you. Now you are going to have some tea;" and she rang the bell, and sent him off to his room with the air of mock authority which she often assumed with him.

Their meal was a very quiet one, and Clara kept away from the chief subject which filled their thoughts, and asked him to give her all the details of the last two days, which he did.

A very anxious hour was that which followed for Clara Huntingdon, when her brother had gone upon his mission. Those who are engaged in active effort little know what the hours of waiting are, which are to bring events over which the waiting ones have no control, but which may alter the entire tenor of their lives. And in giving up the life which her brother had planned for her, Clara knew how much she was yielding. The life to which she returned with her rapidly-aging parents was an altogether stagnant one. All its movement came from the books she read, or the thoughts that stirred in her own soul. With him she had all the interests of an active life added to these, for Charles Huntingdon had no friend save her. He consulted her in all his difficulties, whether they came from without or from within. She had been in the habit of receiving the minutest details of his life—a habit begun to interest her in her long confinements, and continued because on his every thought and action her spirit threw its own clear, illuminating light. It was no small thing for her to renounce such a position as this. To renounce it in favour of one whom she considered unable or unworthy to fill it would, however, have been more difficult still. He, too, had given her much in exchange. He had brought all the brightness and freshness into her life. He had been her strength and her stay from the time when he left his bats and balls to wheel her about the garden, where he could hear the shouts of his companions in the field beyond. There was only one other to whom she could betake herself—the Friend who is closer than a brother to those who are able to realise His Divine companionship, as she could realise it.

And now on her brother's return, too early, she wisely judged, to betoken success, she was ready to meet him without one thought of self, and to sympathise with him in any event. In answer to her inquiring look he only shook his head. It was failure. Before the evening was over he had told her all that had transpired.

It had been very difficult for Mrs. Austin to reject Charles Huntingdon after she had listened to the confession which he had to make. But about the mistake under which he had laboured she said nothing, acting in this with her usual delicacy; feeling that it would only embarrass him the more to be made aware of it. She had been very delicate and very kind, and had softened her rejection so much, that Clara, after listening to her brother's recital, instead of sympathising with his dejection, said brightly. "Now you are quits. My dear Charles, you will win her yet."

He shook his head. "It is only her gentleness, which I dare not presume upon," he said.

"We shall see," returned Clara, "you have often called me a true prophet before now."

CHAPTER LI.

A QUESTION OF INCOME AND EXPENDITURE.

WHILE everything went smoothly with Arthur and Ada, and not a single obstruction appeared in their path, Philip and Lucy were doomed to see the great obstacle to their union increase rather than diminish. After a variety of delays and excuses, Francis Tenterden failed to advance the two thousand he had promised, as his share of the repayment of Fanny's fortune, thus leaving once more the whole burden to fall upon Philip.

Mr. Tabor, like the cautious man he was, had been contented with Philip's proposal that he should marry Lucy as soon as he was free, while he gave up the greater part of his income, as before, to that end. Thus Philip and Lucy had entered on a long engagement, and even if Mr. Tabor had been desirous of accelerating their union—a thing which he by no means contemplated—Philip would hardly have agreed to it; he and Lucy therefore saw that happy consummation recede still further into the future, and it was impossible that they should do so without suffering a little of the sickness which comes from hope deferred.

Francis Tenterden had been engaged, even before he came to England, it appeared, in certain mining speculations, and in these he had invested that portion of his wife's money which it was possible for him to obtain. From these investments he had derived the large income on which he had been living, having only recently come to the knowledge that that income was entirely fallacious. The mines from which it was ostensibly drawn were, in fact, losing money instead of making it, and all the while they went on quite comfortably, paying the large dividend they had declared by increasing their liabilities, diminishing their assets by way of making an income. But the time had come when their credit was shaken, and it was impossible any longer to realise the money invested in them, that was sunk beyond recovery, and the two thousand pounds were not forthcoming.

Moreover, Mrs. Francis Tenterden, having learnt to distrust her husband with a deep and bitter distrust, made herself mistress of this and other facts, connected with their income and expenditure, and refused for her part to go on any longer as they were doing. She was determined that no more excuses should be offered to Philip. But instead of these a full explanation of how matters stood. She had also come to a secret resolution which she was about to declare, and which she calculated upon Philip's help to aid her in carrying into action, and that was to assume the reins of government, and to hold the purse-strings henceforth in her own hands. Ever since she had come to a knowledge of the respective parts which her husband and his brother had played in the matter of the missing fortune, she had exalted in her own mind the latter at the expense of the former. Thus it was that, rather against his will, Philip had found himself called upon to arbitrate between Francis and his wife, and to witness the change which had taken place in their relations towards each other.

"You will agree with me, Philip," she said, after Francis, acting under strong compulsion, had made a statement of his affairs to Philip—which, however, was far from putting them at their worst—"you will agree with me that even in that case we ought not to live as we are doing—at more than double our real income. But it is a great deal worse than that. I believe that we ought to set down the whole of that money as lost."

"I quite agree with you," said Philip, looking from one to the other. "In any case it would be the better course."

"Nonsense," said Francis; "because I cannot lay my hands on two thousand pounds all in a minute, you jump to the conclusion that the money is lost. Have you not had money regularly to meet all expenses?"

"But we shall not have it long," replied his wife; "and we ought never to have had it at all, I suppose. I have taken advice on the matter, Francis," she continued, while her husband looked more and more discomfited and annoyed. "I went to-day to an old friend of my father's, and he tells me that these mines are turning out ruinously."

"I do not think you ought to have taken such a step without my knowledge; you ought to have consulted me," said Francis gloomily.

"Perhaps not," she answered coldly; "but I had my children's interests at heart."

"It is not their money that will be lost, if it is lost at all," he returned.

"No," she answered bitterly. "My late husband left all that he possessed in my power. My own fortune—what I had from my father," she explained, turning to Philip, "is settled on the children, and amounts to about a thousand a year."

"I do not see that it is necessary to trouble my brother with our affairs," said Francis hastily.

"I would not like him to suppose that it was through any fault of mine that you had been rendered unable to help him, or rather, to take your share of a responsibility which ought to have fallen equally on both."

It was the first time she had spoken out plainly on the subject, and allowed her husband to see the full extent of her disapprobation. Francis felt at once humiliated and resentful. The mode of treatment which his wife had adopted was far more galling than any amount of reproach or anger. It was also a mistake on her part, seeing he was her husband, to destroy his self-respect so completely.

Mrs. Tenterden was a good and conscientious woman. She would have thought it shame and sin to be angry, but worse in its effects than any anger was her cold, severe disapproval, and worse still, her desire to exonerate herself. It was like a sentence of separation between them, which would rise up hereafter to prevent her from stretching forth her hand to save him while he might be saved.

Much as he had learned to like, and to respect, his sister-in-law, Philip pitied his brother exceedingly. "It could do no harm to decrease your expenditure, Francis," he said kindly.

"You might as well advertise our failure," replied Francis gloomily. "We must keep up our establishment at least."

"And help to deceive people," said his wife.

Philip blushed for his brother.

"I cannot be a party to it," she continued. "I should consider that it was bringing disgrace upon my children; I wish to take a smaller house and have only a couple of servants, as the children's education and other expenses have to be considered."

"And among other expenses," said Francis bitterly, "the expense of keeping a husband."

She did not contradict him.

"You can easily find work at your profession, Frank," said Philip, with a look of the old brotherly kindness which went to that brother's soul. Philip had pointed out the one way by which Francis could redeem himself, and that touch of tenderness inclined him to accept it. There was still a struggle, but at length he yielded, and the scheme of work and of retrenchment was begun. As this story has little to do with Francis Tenterden, here we shall leave him, but not seldom in the future was Philip's hand stretched forth to help him, and recall him from wavering. Philip himself had learned the lesson of patience and long-suffering with wrong-doers.

Thank God it is not alone among the high in place and power, not alone among the learned and the famous, that there are such men as Philip Tenterden. A modern poet had described the host of mankind marching through the world as a feeble wavering line, ready to perish in the wilderness, plagued with thirst, overawed by the rocks that rise around them, divided by faction, threatening to break and dissolve but for the servants of God who lead them. They, in the hour of need, appear like angels radiant with Divine ardour. Languor is not in their hearts, weakness is not in their word, weariness is not on their brow. At their voices panic and despair flee away. They move through the ranks recalling the stragglers, refreshing the outworn, re-inspiring the brave. Order and courage return; eyes rekindle, and prayers follow their steps as they go. Thank God there are non-commissioned officers, too, among that host to whom even such a description as this would apply without exaggeration, and Philip Tenterden was of the number. He had not only striven to do right himself, but in order to set right that which was wrong he had been content to suffer for others, the great test of one who would save.

From the scene of his brother's humiliation Philip had gone straight to Lucy, in order that he might tell her at once that all hope of help in that quarter was at an end. Mr. and Mrs. Tabor were present, for Philip loyally returned their parental confidence, and looked upon them much as if they had been father and mother of his own. "One would have thought Francis had had a lesson sufficiently hard to have kept him from this," he said as he concluded, alluding to his father's ruin.

"But he did not accept the lesson," said Mr. Tabor, "and the temptation is great, and to resist it is harder still. The love of display, the desire to be rich and to seem rich, and to be and to seem richer than their neighbours, is the great vice of our class. The selfish desire riches for themselves, and the unselfish for their children; all are drawn into the vortex, till true nobleness and simplicity of life are destroyed."

"It would be more intelligible to me," said Mrs. Tabor, "if people got any comfort or pleasure out of it; but they don't."

"Some do," said Mr. Tabor cautiously; "some who are living above their means are doing it not solely for display; still it is a mistake, if not a vice. To live on a slightly lower scale might mean, even for them, greater comfort in ease of mind and freedom from anxiety. A smaller house, a servant less, a simpler style of entertainment, make an immense difference throughout."

"Yes, it is the scale that does it—not a pinch here and a screw there," said Mrs. Tabor.

"Unfortunately," said Mr. Tabor, "our society is so penetrated with the love of display that all our houses nowadays are built so as to foster it. They almost all have rooms which the people don't live in, and rooms which they oughtn't to live in, that they may keep up the fiction of a large reception-room."

"Yes, and when I have seen how people managed to make a great show upon little, the slavish lives they led, the worries they went through, and even the privations they suffered, I was thankful that I never was tempted to try it," said Mrs. Tabor.

"And I hardly think we shall," said Philip, looking at Lucy.

"So much the better," said Mr. Tabor; "and I hope the time may come when people of our class will have sufficient cultivation to choose their associates not from the kind of house they live in, or the kind of table they keep, but from the manner of mind they are of, from their tastes and acquirements, and general elevation and purity of character and manners." (To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART III. THE TEMPTATION. PART II.

Scripture to be read—Matt. iv. 1—11.

INTRODUCTION. The first temptation was one addressed to the body—viz., to gratify with particular kind of food when God would mortify. Then show how the second temptation was more to the mind, or reasoning powers—to argue wrongly from Scripture. Ask which is the highest part of man's nature? Why is the soul the most important? Then begin the third temptation.

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES. (Read Matt. iv. 8—11.) (a) The place. Ask where Satan now took our Lord, and why. Remind of Moses taken up a mountain to be shown a glorious view; but point out the difference of being alone with God just before entering heaven, and alone with Satan tempting to corrupt the soul. Ask who made the world, showing from John i. 3 that Christ aided in creation: could He then have more shown Him than He already knew? Remind how Satan is called the prince of this world, and therefore could easily put together a dazzling picture.

II. THE TEMPTATION. (a) The offer. What did he show Christ? Perhaps an Eastern court—beautiful halls and palaces, guards, soldiers, courtiers, soft music, bounteous feasts, &c. What did he promise Christ? Could such things dazzle or tempt Christ? Remind of promise that Christ should reign for ever (Ps. ii. 8); but in what manner was He to reign? (See Phil. ii. 10; 1 Cor. xv. 25.) (b) The condition. Now notice the condition—"If fall down." Could there be any pretence for doing this? Was some slight pretext, perhaps, for first or second; could be none for this. Ask children if know anything of history of Satan. Read Rev. xii. 7—9, to show that Satan has always been ambitious—aspired to highest place in heaven; now when cast down to earth tries to induce men to worship him—i.e., to put themselves under his sway. (c) The answer—"Get thee hence." Notice short and decided answer; no parley possible. Ask which commandments insist on worship of God: will He allow of divided heart—part to Him and part to world? (d) The end. What did Satan do when thus told to go? Who came and ministered to Christ? Read Ps. xxxiv. 7, to show that this was one of their proper missions. Picture out the scene. The angels in heaven watching the temptation; the news of the victory over Satan spreading through the ranks; the shouts of joy; some summoned to go down and minister to Christ—perhaps the same who announced His birth, and afterwards watched His tomb. Picture Christ lying on ground, faint, exhausted; one angel raising His head; another providing food and drink (as to Elijah in the same wilderness, 1 Kings xix. 7), whispering words of comfort—reminding of His Father's love, and of the joy set before Him (Heb. xii. 2), and of the effect of His victory in setting His people free.

III. PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) The gradual nature of temptation. Let children see how Satan begins with apparently little things, and tempts to worse things afterwards; and if he does so when resisted, what will he not do when listened to? Best plan, therefore, to resist beginnings of evil. Check little sins, lest they become great; like water when once set running soon burst lake. (2) Need to guard eyes. Ask for instances of the eye leading to sin. Eve, who first saw, then took; David, who saw Bath-sheba, and was led to sin; Dinah, who went out to see the daughters of the land; Achan, who saw and coveted the wedge of gold; Ahab, who did the same to Naboth's vineyard. Hence prayer should be, with David (Ps. cxix. 37), "Turn away mine eyes." Warn children against books of evil tendency, &c. (3) The emptiness of Satan's offers. What did he offer? Could the world and its pleasures make any one happier? Remind of Solomon, whose wives led him astray; of the rich man in the parable (Luke xvi. 19), enjoying his good things here and tormented for ever. Where are we told to set our affections, and why? (See 1 Peter i. 3, 4.) Press this home to the children, showing how little worldly grandeur can possibly conduce to happiness, and show the blessedness of contentment.

IV. SUMMARY. From the whole story draw two great lessons. (1) Satan resisted will flee. Remind that temptation itself, though an evil, is not sin. Christ was as pure after as before. The danger lies in dallying with sin, as Eve. Remind of Judas—covetous; kept the bag; stole the contents; led on to sell Christ. So a passionate child—not try to overcome—perhaps become murderer. On other hand, Satan resisted with authority will flee. Remind of Joseph, who would not do great sin against God. So all must strive against him. (2) Christ helps to overcome. From Heb. ii. 18 show the object of His temptation, to give comfort and succour to those tempted. The means to resist are the Word of God—as Christ Himself used it—and the Holy Spirit, given to all who ask. Read Eph. vi. 13, to show how God has provided us with defensive and offensive armour, and how we may come off victorious.

Questions to be answered.

1. To what part of man's nature were the three temptations addressed?
2. Describe the third temptation.
3. What practical lessons does it teach us?
4. Describe the angels ministering to Christ.
5. What lessons may be learned from the whole subject.

WILLIE'S SISTER.

IN TWO PARTS.

PART II.

THE servants at the hall were very much alarmed as it became dark and the children were still out; they made inquiries in the village, to know if any one had seen or heard anything of them, but without avail; then two were sent off in different directions to try and find them, but they returned home tired, without having received any tidings of them, and all were in a state of hopeless despair. The nurse, however, could not remain indoors, but went to the outer gate. After having stood there some few minutes, straining both ears and eyes to no purpose, she was startled by the sudden dash of a horse round the corner and into the yard, with one shaft still in the strap at its side; the other servants hearing the noise were also very soon on the spot. The poor animal, panting, and one leg profusely bleeding, was taken into the stable and attended to by the coachman; whilst the nurse, in her excitement, and vaguely connecting this circumstance with the absence of the children, hastened, followed by the housemaid, in the direction from which the horse had come. They had not gone very far before they heard the sound of wheels, and stopped to listen whence the noise came, when the groom slowly approached them, ruefully dragging along the gig, with the children inside. They had not been able to see him until he came near, for it was quite dark, and neither of them had thought in their hurry of bringing a lantern; but as soon as they recognised him, and saw the plight he was in, with considerably lighter hearts they helped him draw the children home in triumph. The old nurse cried for joy as she hugged the children in her arms; the immense relief she felt at their safe return, quite overcame the curiosity natural to her sex, for while the other servants were asking the groom for a full account of everything that had happened, and were worrying the poor man almost to death with their questions, she busied herself about their tea, and did not think to ask the cause of all the misfortune until she had seen them both comfortably in bed.

Willie, although tired out, could not go to sleep for some time after he was in bed, but kept turning the events of the day over in his mind. What he had most feared was nurse's anger when she should find out where they had been, but after he had penitently told her all, instead of scolding him, as he had expected, she could do nothing but rejoice at their narrow escape—in fact, she was so kind to him that he almost forgot that he had been to blame at all in the matter, and his last thought as he turned to sleep on his pillow was that, after all, no real harm had resulted from the fair business, except that the horse was hurt, and that he would get well long before his papa came home. He got up later in the morning than usual, so that he had not time to go for his walk in the garden before breakfast with Jenny, but as soon as he was dressed he ran down to the breakfast-room, and there found the meal laid only for one. He went into the kitchen to ask the reason, and was told that Jenny was to stay in bed to breakfast, and that nurse was having hers with her. Willie, thinking that his sister had remained in bed only because she was tired, ran up to her door directly after breakfast, shouted out to her not to be lazy, and without waiting for an answer ran off to see how the horse was. When he arrived at the stable he found a strange man there, bathing the wounds, and the coachman looking on with a troubled countenance.

"Good morning, Master Willie," said he; "have you come to see poor Tommy? I'm afraid you'll never have any more rides on him."

"Oh, John!" then turning to the stranger, Willie said, "is he very bad, sir?"

"Oh, that 'e be, sir; why, yer see, it's a wonder 'e wasn't killed outright, runnin' 'is 'ead bang agin the corner of yon post. Look at this 'ere leg too; it's my belief 'e's cut through the tendon, for I never see a thing bleed more; if 'e 'as, why, it'll be all up with 'im afore a week's over. It's just a mercy ye wasn't all killed."

"Don't you think he will ever get well again?" asked Willie, his eyes filling with tears.

"Well, yer see, sir, as regards that, it all depends if 'e gets the lockjaw; but, bless yer, I've cured many a worse case nor this. And now I guess you'd better be off while I bandage 'im, it's an ugly sight for your young eyes. There now, be off and cheer up; I dare say 'e'll be all right agin some day."

Willie went into the house with a very heavy heart, to think that his friend Tommy should be in danger of dying. Finding Jenny was not yet down, he went up to her room, where he found her in bed, reading. She told him that nurse said she was to stay in bed all day, but that she thought it was all nonsense, as she did not feel very bad. Nurse understood her constitution, though, much better than she did herself, having watched by her through two or three very serious illnesses; she saw in her the first symptoms of cold, and knew from experience that when once it got on to her weak chest, there was danger. She did not send for a doctor for two or three days, wishing, if possible, to cure her without her illness becoming known in the village, lest it should reach Mr. Howard's ears; but when she found that, instead of improving, her little patient was becoming rapidly worse, she went herself to the doctor who was in the habit of attending the family, and begged him not to let her master know of it, as she felt sure he would not be able to remain away from home if he knew his little girl was ill. He promised to comply with her request, and went back with her to see Jenny, and found she was very seriously ill with inflammation of the lungs.

Willie was quite inconsolable; her illness in any case would have been a great trouble to him, but when he heard the servants saying that it was all caused by excitement and fatigue, becoming overheated and receiving repeated chills whilst out with him, it was almost more than he could bear. He begged nurse not to send him to school, that he might be at home to do any little thing in his power to assist, and she, thinking that he would not be able to give much attention to his lessons, granted his request. Regularly every morning he paid a visit to Tommy, who in the course of a fortnight was very much better; then he would go and work at Jenny's garden, rake it over and pick what few flowers there were in bloom for her to have in her bedroom, and so anxious was he that no one but himself should touch it, that he was quite put out one day, because the gardener had ventured to take cuttings from some of her favourite plants. By the time he had finished gardening, he was allowed to go and sit by Jenny (except when she was at her worst); sometimes he read and talked to her alternately, doing all in his power to make the time of her imprisonment seem shorter. No boy of his age could have been more attentive and entertaining, or more loving and gentle than he was to his little sister, and she fully repaid him with her loving smiles of gratitude.

One day, when she was considered convalescent (it was almost a month since she was first taken ill) he was reading to her out of a story book, when he dropped the book on his lap and commenced crying.

"Why, what's the matter, Willie," said she; "aren't you well?"

"Oh yes." Then brushing away his tears, he said, "Wasn't he a horrid boy?"

"Yes; is that what you were crying about?"

"Yes; I was thinking he was exactly like me."

"How can you say so, Willie? He was a wicked, selfish boy."

"And so was I, to take you to the fair and make you walk so quickly. It was all through my being selfish that you have been ill."

"No, it wasn't. That was different altogether; you never meant to make me ill, and he hurt his brother on purpose; besides, it's all over now, I'm very nearly well again, and instead of crying you ought to be happy."

"Yes, so I am; but you nearly died, and if you had, everybody would have been right in saying I killed you;" and Willie was not far wrong, but Jenny was too kind and forgiving not to do her best to console him.

"Oh, Willie! don't talk like that, I'm sure you've been the kindest brother in the world. Nurse told me this morning that my garden looks lovely; and do you know Tommy was let out into the meadow to-day, and John says perhaps he will be well enough to ride in two or three weeks; that isn't all the good news, but I oughtn't to tell you the rest yet."

"Oh! do, Jenny; what is it?"

"Well, I think I must tell you. Dr. Simmonds wrote to papa about me the other day, told him how ill I have been, but that I was well again, and he told him he thought I ought to go away for a change; so, what do you think? Papa is coming home on Thursday, and on Saturday you, nurse, and I are going with him to Madeira, and we are to stay there all the winter. I didn't mean to tell you, until everything was ready, but I couldn't keep it in any longer. Now you must promise me not to say any more that it was your fault I was ill, because if you do I shall ask papa to leave you at home!" F. N.

MAY-DAY.

I.

HALF through the night I watched the moon wade through
The lightening rain-clouds till they passed away,
And left the sky one field of shimmering blue,
Serene and cold, to meet the coming day;
The moon died out upon the twilight grey;
Then, starting up, the cock his neck stretched out
And greeted the new morn with shrilly shout.

II.

So April died away in fruitful showers,
The gentle tears that weep in smiling May,
To glad the world with odorous breath of flowers.
The cheery song of birds proclaim the day;
The snowy bloom is on the hawthorn spray:
Up! up! no laggards on this festal morn
When the young Summer with the dawn is born.

III.

Up! up! and forth amid the dewy meads
And pleasant lanes, ere yet the sun is high,
To watch the lark, as now his wings he spreads
And tuneful rises in the brightening sky;
While the brown thrush, with lowlier melody,
Carols his welcome to the breezy day,
And hamlet-folk go out to seek the may.

IV.

Oh, fresh, young life of Nature! Nursed and fed
By shower and sunshine of the changeful Spring,
Whose subtle juice through every vein is spread
To make her lusty blood flow revelling
Through the green Earth, and on her face to bring
The blush of flowers, whose bloom hath now begun
To deck her bridal with the amorous Sun.

V.

The trees grow thick with leafage, and the shade
Deepens within the forest till the Sun
Finds but scant space to look into the glade
Between the laden branches; one by one
The timid conies from the burrows run
To browse on sweet young herbs; from tree to tree
Skips the lithe squirrel ever playfully.

VI.

In the warm sunlight through the buoyant air
The painted butterfly goes fluttering,
A thing of wondrous beauty, pure and fair,
Risen from the cerements that erewhile did cling
Around its life—the dead grub mouldering;
Mysterious symbol of the life to come—
The soul resurgent from its earthly tomb.

VII.

Over the clover fields upon his quest
Roves towards the yellow gorse the humble-bee
In coat of sable, streaked with orange dressed,
And ever in the air rings drowsily
His droning chant: a cheerful toiler he,
Who lightens work with song till close of day,
When, honey-laden, home he wends his way.

VIII.

And all the world is filled with melody,
From morn till night throughout the jocund day:
The grasshopper is chirping merrily;
The blackbird from the covert pipes; the jay
Chatters and rocks upon the waving spray;
And falls upon the ear, as in a dream,
The babbling laughter of the sunlit stream.

IX.

From morn till night so speed the golden hours
Of the young Summer's birthday, till the shades
Of Eve come creeping o'er the closing flowers,
And through red seas of cloud the broad Sun wades
Down to the nether world; and daylight fades
Into grey twilight, and the twilight brings
The solemn Night upon her starry wings.

X.

But ere the twilight brings the solemn Night,
Comes from the grove the cuckoo's mellow note;
And last, in throbs of musical delight
Whose measured pulses on the ether float,
The nightingale pours from his tuneful throat
Strains that the echoing woods in love prolong
Making the darkness bright with light of song.

XI.

O love! thou wilt remember well the day
When first we talked of love, long, long ago;
'Twas the birth-morning of the gleeful May,
And forth we went a-maying to and fro
Till we grew weary, and it happened so
That neath a poplar-tree our rest we took,
Whose leafy branches hung above a brook.

XII.

Dost thou remember, sweetheart, how I brought
The water in a leaf to give thee drink?
And how my furtive fingers, toying, sought
The mazes of thy hair, and felt thee shrink
From my bold wooing, until I 'gan think
Thou heldest me as cheaply as the may,
Whose flowers thy trembling fingers rent away.

XIII.

Until at last the flush upon thy cheek
Told that thy heart was fluttered with the flame
Of kindling love thy lips not yet would speak,
Thine eyes looked up with joy, then down with shame,
And sweet desire through all my being came
To clasp thee to my breast, thy brow to kiss,
Nor didst thou chide my act, ner check my bliss.

XIV.

O wife! the passion of my love was told
To the wild song of skylark and of thrush;
And still I bless each year as I grow old,
Whitening my hair and paling thy cheeks' flush.
Yet still sweet May-day memories on me rush,
Though now a softer strain beseems the tale,
Like cuckoo's note or song of nightingale.

JOHN FRANCIS WALLER.

CHRIST AND HIS CHURCH:

BY THE REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A., CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN, ETC.; AUTHOR OF "AIDS TO PRAYER," ETC.

"We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver. While the King sitteth at His table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof. A bundle of myrrh is my wellbeloved unto me; He shall lie all night betwixt my breasts. My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of En-gedi."—Song of Solomon i. 11—14.

THE former of these verses, we have intimated, is to be considered as standing in some kind of contrasted relation with the verse which had gone before. "Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, thy neck with chains of gold. We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver." The figure before us is that of a beautiful woman, who, after the Eastern fashion, is represented as wearing rows of precious stones entwined with the head-dress, and the ends of which hung down by the side of the face; and it is proposed to enrich and adorn her still further with some costly ornament of gold, embossed and studded with devices of silver. Of the two conditions of the Church, thus emblematically represented, two interpretations are open to us—one, that they represent respectively the Church under the Law, and her greater glory under the Gospel; the other, that the two conditions, of less and more magnificent attire, set forth the spiritual comeliness of the Church in the earthly state, compared with that which she shall put on when brought into the palace of the Great King in heaven. Adopting the latter interpretation, we contemplated the Church, in the last chapter, as adorned with all the graces of sanctification to which she could attain in this imperfect time-world—having her frontlet of Gospel jewels, and her necklace of Gospel gold, with her faith of burnished jasper, and her hope of sapphire blue; her patience of enduring amethyst, and her charity as a rainbow, spanning God's whole creation, "in sight like unto an emerald." We beheld her with row on row, chain on chain, with ornaments of grace about her head and chains of spiritual beauty about her neck—love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, meekness—till we almost wondered what more Heaven could do for her.

But the half has not been told to us. All God's gifts are for "a great while to come." We may take up language like that of David, and say, "Who are we, O Lord God, and what are our souls, that Thou shouldest deal with us after this sort? That not only Thou shouldest give us a new heart, and a new spirit, and a new nature, and a new creation, but also that Thou shouldest write upon us Thy 'new name,' and instruct us in 'the new song,' and bring us to 'the new heavens and the new earth,' and refresh us with the 'new wine' in the kingdom of the Father." Hardly could it have entered our hearts to conceive of Christ as saying of the Church in her militant state, "Then washed I thee with water, and I anointed thee with oil, and I clothed thee with broidered work; I decked thee also with ornaments, and put a beautiful crown upon thine head," but what ineffable progressions "from glory to glory," we ask, can be included in the further promise of the Bridegroom, "We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver?"

I. In considering this promise, however, there is one incidental expression worthy of notice, and for the full import and significance of which we are under obligation to the Jews. It will be observed that, for the first time in this book, the Bridegroom in addressing the Church speaks in the plural number: "We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver," an expression which learned Rabbis would have us read in the same way as we read that sentence in the first chapter of the book of Genesis, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness,"—that is, with a latent reference to a plurality of persons in the Godhead. We have testimonies of great weight and authority to the fact that the Jews, from the earliest times, had a traditional belief in this sublime mystery. But it was a doctrine which they held in reserve; one which they spoke of only in the presence of persons of advanced spiritual culture. Here and there a pious Israelite might be entrusted with a knowledge of it, but from the nation at large it was kept secret, as a truth which they must wait for a more refined condition of "the colossal man" to acknowledge openly. Accordingly the Rabbinical rendering of this word "WE," both here and in the passage referring to the creation of man, is, "I and my hall of judgment:" "I and my hall of judgment will make thee borders of gold." Now "a hall of judgment," according to the legal constitution of the Jews, must never consist of less than "three persons," and therefore we can hardly doubt that under this subtle and ingenious allusion, their Rabbis taught—or rather half taught—a doctrine, which was but partially understood in their own times, and which to their posterity became lost altogether.

We may claim, therefore, to be reading this verse as an ancient Hebrew expositor would have read it, when we interpret it as expressive of some joint resolve or purpose of the Holy and Everlasting Trinity, in regard to good things to come, whether such good things have respect to the development of Gospel promise, or the beatific disclosures of the heavenly world. Take it as referring to the Gospel, and this use of the plural form is very suggestive. For it is precisely in connection with the unfolding of the plan of our salvation—with the disclosure of all those restorative and remedial means by which fallen man was to be brought back to the favour of his Maker—that the doctrine of Three Divine Persons in the Godhead assumes all its practical value and significance. Regarded merely as a dogma of schools, as a fruitful source of metaphysical or dialectic strife, the mystery had not been worth contending about. But a DIVINE atonement is our life; a DIVINE regeneration is our life. Make either the one or the other finite, and we are yet in our sins. The Church could never have had her garments "bordered" with the "gold" of a perfect righteousness, nor "studded" all over with the "silver" of an infinitely sanctifying and all-quickening grace. She must still have "lien among the pots," a slave to her ancient bondage and corruption, instead of rising in all the dignity of an emancipated nature "on the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold."

Nor less fitting would an allusive reference to the Trinity be, on the supposition that the imagery of "silver" and "gold" is meant as an emblem of the heavenly state,—that city of pure gold, garnished and studded with all bright things, Jerusalem the golden. For the distinctions in the Divine personalities must be eternal distinctions. We cannot conceive of them as adaptations to an economy; modes of subsistence assumed to meet the wants of a being, who is but an infinitesimal link in the chain of created intelligences; phenomenal presentments of the Godhead, which will dissolve and disappear when, in the sunlight of the Infinite, we shall be made like God, and "see Him as He is." They are distinctions which shall remain. The virtues of Christ's propitiatory sacrifice are illimitable. The sanctifying and upholding grace of the Divine Spirit is bounded neither by space nor time. Imagination loses itself in computing how many worlds there may be—worlds bygone, worlds existing, worlds yet to be—all benefited in ways that we know not of, by the offering of the Eternal Son of God; neither can any say to what extent the countless hosts of the glorified, now standing before the throne, are, by the continually-imparted grace of the Holy Spirit, maintained in their immortality. Enough that the Church of Christ, in her anticipations of the glory that shall be revealed, includes in that "clothing of wrought gold" which her Lord shall put upon her, a robe of "everlasting righteousness;" and in the silver wings of the dove, hovering over the river of life, the pure linen of an infinite and eternal sanctity on which spot or blemish shall be no more seen. "We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver."

II. At this point the dialogue is taken up by the Church. Encouraged by the Bridegroom's kind words of commendation and promise, she renews her protestations of grateful attachment, as well as of the delight she has always found in His service, "While the King sitteth at His table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof. A bundle of myrrh is my wellbeloved unto me; He shall lie all night betwixt my breasts. My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of En-gedi."

Here we have Christ set forth as the comfort, and strength, and quickening power of ordinances. "While the King sitteth at His table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof." The table is the "feast of fat things;" the Gospel banquet of "marrow and fatness," of grace and mercy, peace and pardon, holiness and salvation—all typified, no doubt, in the blessed sacrament of Christ's body and blood. And this table Christ not only prepares and spreads for us, but, as it is further intimated, He comes and sits down at the table with us; admits us to terms of holy and ineffable intimacy with Himself. We eat and drink with our "near Friend." We hear the voice of Him who stands at the door and knocks, "His head filled with dew, and His locks with the drops of the night;" and He cries out to us "If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." And then observe what follows upon this near presence of Christ with us in ordinances, whether in prayer, or in the Word, or in sacraments: "my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof." Here it is intimated that, just as the genial winds blowing over the garden bring out the fragrance of the spikenard, so the presence of Christ in the soul draws out the aroma of all devout affections, causing the incense of our prayers to come up before God, "an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing unto God." Would that in these days, when we hear so much of mysticism, and speculation, and about the nature of "the real presence," people would only take a lesson from the Canticles. They would there learn that the presence of Christ is best discerned by the presence of "the spikenard,"—the whole soul filled with the odour of sacredness; the desires yearning after holiness; the thoughts taken off from the world; the mind lifted up to heavenly things; the spirit holding fellowship with Christ's spirit; "the heart and the flesh thirsting for the living God." "While the King sitteth at His table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof."

"While the King sitteth at His table,"—so long, and no longer. The words should lead us to distinguish between ordinances and the presence of Christ in and with them. The spikenard is ours while fellowship with Christ is ours. If the King should withdraw from His table, grieved by our negligent participation of His feast, offended at our slight appreciation of His love, driven away by our worldly and unspiritual tempers, wearied by our cold formality and heartless worship, then is discernible no longer the presence of the spikenard. It remains locked up in the alabaster box. He is gone on whose head love should have poured out the ointment, and made the room to be filled with the smell thereof.

And what is this "spikenard?" Why, it sets forth the anointing of the Holy One, supposes all the powers of the regeneration to be in a state of quickened exercise; not dead things, like withered flowers that have lost their savour,—not useless things, like unbeaten spices, from which come no balmy smell: but grace in action; the work of the Spirit, evidenced by the fruits of the Spirit, diffusing an odour around it, "as the smell of Lebanon, as the smell of a field which the Lord hath blessed." Hence the words are added, "Sendeth forth the smell thereof," for herein is a note that in the ordinances of worship we have Christ present with us—namely, that there is a diffused spiritual fragrance, filling the place where we are sitting, and perceived by all that sit at meat with us. Men will take note of us "that we have been with Jesus;"—more than that, that Jesus has "sat down" with us. If we are of those who love to sit with the King at His table; if we have spiritually eaten of the bread of life; if we have entered, by the power of faith, into the full mystery of the Incarnation; if we have had that fellowship with the Spirit which feeds all our springs of duty, and strength, and service; in a word, if we have had Jesus Himself feeding us with that bread of which it is declared that "if any man eat, he shall live for ever," the "smell thereof" will make itself felt. The Spirit will come upon the soul as "the dew upon herbs." The revived graces of the soul will sprout up in all their quickened and regenerate strength. They will shed a holy fragrance on our daily path, and, being "strong in the grace which is in Christ Jesus," we shall cause "the savour of His knowledge to be made manifest by us in every place." "While the King sitteth at His table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof."

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

V.—WITH THOSE WHO ARE LEFT DESOLATE.

THERE is something about the aspect of Nature as seen from the railway station at Lower Norwood on a damp and misty day which, if not depressing, can scarcely be regarded as conducive to unusual hilarity. I speak guardedly because of my respect for the district, and lest I should in any way be suspected of depreciating any particular locality as an eligible place of residence. In the latter regard I may mention that the immediate neighbourhood of Lower Norwood Station is not at present converted into a small township by the erection of long rows of tenements on freehold or long leasehold plots. My remarks apply only to the general outlook from the road, amidst an atmosphere threatening drizzle and beneath a sky betokening rain. As far as houses are concerned, there seemed to me on the occasion of my last visit far more probability of pulling down than of building. In fact, I went for the purpose of inspecting a whole series of very remarkable tenements which I had heard were soon either to disappear from the oozy-looking green quadrangle of which they form three sides, or were to be converted to another purpose than that of the dwelling-places of a few elderly ladies who occupy one dreary side, whence they can look at the desolation of the closed houses on the other.

It will not be without regret that I shall hear of this intention being carried out, for the houses are devoted to the sheltering of alms-folk; and the alms-folk are the elder pensioners of that admirable association, the Society of the Friends of Foreigners in Distress, which, for above ninety years, has been doing its useful work among those who, but for its prompt and judicious aid, would feel that they were "alone in a strange land."

As a part of its original provision for the relief of some of the applicants who, after long residence in this country, had fallen into a distressed condition at an age when they were unable any longer to maintain themselves by their own exertions, the society instituted the alms-houses at Lower Norwood. There is now an impression among the directors of the charity that their intentions may be carried out in future by some better method than placing a number of aged and frequently infirm persons in a comparatively remote group of dwellings, where they are peculiarly lonely, and lack frequent personal attention and general sympathy. There can be no doubt that almshouses have frequently been associated a little too closely with that monastic or conventual practice with which they mostly originated, and that the retirement, almost amounting to seclusion, into which the inmates of such places are removed, may be very far from affording to the aged the kind of asylum which they most desire. Alas, in many instances, to be placed in an almshouse is to be put out of the way,—to be conveniently disposed of; with the inference that every possible provision has been made for comfortable maintenance. Thus, susceptibilities are quieted. The aged pensioners are supposed to be periodically visited; their wants attended to by somebody or other who "sees that they are all right," and the whole matter is conveniently forgotten, except when a casual traveller passes a quaint, ancient, mouldy-looking, but still picturesque block of buildings, and inquires to what charity they belong; not without a kind of uneasy fancy that there is a custom in this country of burying certain old people before their time—shutting them out of the light and warmth of every-day companionship; or, to change the metaphor, making organised charity a kind of Hooghly, on the tide of which the aged, who are supposed to be nearing the end of their mortal life, are floated into oblivion until the memory of them is revived by death.

It is no part of my intention to represent that the almshouses at Lower Norwood bear such a significance, but the conditions to which I have referred appear to be so inevitable where places like these are concerned, that I cannot question the good sense of the directors of the charity in determining to supersede them, and to carry on the work by annual or monthly pensions only. On behalf of the few remaining inmates of these queer, half-deserted, and failing tenements, it could be wished that the proposition could be acted on at once, and a more comfortable provision be made, at least, for those who wait on, with the constantly deferred hope, doubly heart-sickening when so little time is to be counted on, in which something will be done before the houses themselves, crumbling to decay, become but a type of their own forlorn old age.

It is with some such thoughts as these that I stand at the entrance to the green, with last year's weedy aftermath still dank and tangled with wind and rain. The queer little one-storied dark-red houses of the quadrangle bear a melancholy resemblance to a set of dilapidated and discarded toys, the box for which has been lost. They are built too, on a kind of foreign-toy pattern, with queer outside staircases, leading to street-doors under a portico, which is the only entrance to the upper storey, the lower doors in the quadrangle communicating only with the ground-floor. The crunch of my footsteps along the moist path, gives no echo; the place seems to be too dull and lifeless even for that kind of response. The left wing and far the greater portion of the centre block are still with the silence of desertion. Peering through the dim leaden casements, I see only small bare empty rooms. There is a sense of mildew and of damp plaster peeling from the walls,—of leaky water-pipes, and a humid chill, which no glowing hearth nor bright July weather could utterly subdue. Such is the feeling with which the whole place strikes me on this leaden wintry day, when the vapour from the engine on the railway trails slowly upward to meet the ragged edge of the dun cloud that streams slowly downward; when a big black dog crouches on the threshold of the village chandler's shop, to get out of the drizzle, and the butcher, who has sold out, closes his half-hatch, with the certainty that he may take his afternoon nap by the fire, undisturbed by customers.

Even when I pause before one of the little narrow portals to which I have been directed, there are few more signs of life except that at the same moment I hear other footsteps behind me, and a baker stops to deliver a loaf. This is promising, as far as it goes, and enables me to present myself unostentatiously, under cover of the baker's basket, to a lady who opens the door. Unless I am greatly mistaken, that lady has a French face, and as it is a French lady for whom I am to inquire, I begin to think I have come to the end of my quest. It is evident, however, from the surprised questioning look which greets my appearance, that visits from strangers are not of very frequent occurrence there. I can trace in the rather shrinking recognition accorded to my request to see the lady to whom I bring an introduction, the sensitiveness that belongs to that kind of poverty which has learned to endure in seclusion, reverses that would be less bearable if they were exposed to a too obtrusive expression of sympathy. It is a positive relief to be left alone for a minute, standing in that narrow lobby, looking into a room which has the appearance of a disused scullery, while my errand is made known in another room on the right, to which I am presently bidden. It is a poor little place enough; poor, and little, and dim, even for an almshouse, and scarcely suggestive of comfort though a bright fire is burning in a grate, which somewhat resembles a reduced kitchen-range, and though the table which stands beneath the casement bears some preparations for the evening meal, and the cheap luxury of a cut orange on a plate. The walls are dim, the ceiling cracked and discoloured by the evident overflow of water in the room overhead; the furniture consists of a kind of couch which may do duty for a bed by night, and of two or three windsor chairs, one of which has already been placed for me. It is a poor place enough; and yet the lady to whom I am at once introduced is ready to do its honours with a grace and dignity that well become her appearance and her name. Madame Gracieuse B——, for more than forty years resident in England, and speaking English with a purity of accent that is only rivalled by the more perfect music of the French in which she addresses me, has passed the threescore years and ten which are counted as old age. Yet seeing her sweet calm face, her smooth, broad, intelligent brow; the mild, penetrating scrutiny of her gentle eyes; the soft hair put back under the quaint French cap, shaped like a hood; those years remain uncounted; until with a pleasant smile, only just too placid for vivacity, she tells how she came to this country in 1830, after the ruin of the fortunes of her house by the revolution which dethroned Charles X., and made her a governess in England, where so many of the old nobility sought a refuge and a home.

But before this is said, she has presented me to a third lady, to whom, indeed, my original introduction extended; already long past the limit of that short period which we call long life; for she is more than eighty years old, and by reason of the infirmity which has lately come upon her, does not rise to receive me, but remains seated in the couch by the fire. It is a very limited space in which to be ceremonious; but were this lady sitting in one of a suite of grand rooms in some aristocratic mansion, with all the surroundings to which her birth, her high connections, and the recollection of her own personal accomplishments entitle her, she might not lack the homage which too often only simulates respect.

It is possible that she may long ago have learned to assess it at its true value, for she has seen it at a court where it could not save a king from banishment; and if we may judge from a face with strong determined lineaments, a brow of concentrated power, and eyes the light of which even the recent paralysis of age has not extinguished, she has been one who could undergo exile, poverty, and even the sadder calamity of being forgotten, with a wonderful endurance.

Yes, Madame la Comtesse Marie de Comoléra, friend and fellow-student of that Madame Adelaide whose name has become historical, when your father was Monsieur l'Intendant of the Duc d'Orleans, and when you lived within the atmosphere of the French court, spending quiet days at the easel in your painting-room, or preparing the delicate pâte of Sèvres porcelain, on which to paint the roses and lilies that you loved, the grim visions of exile and poverty may never have troubled you. When the house of Bourbon crumbled and you escaped from the ruin it had made, you had still your art left to solace if not to gladden you; and for a time at least you lived by it, and took a new rank by the work that you could do. There were flowers in England, and your hands could still place their glowing hues on canvas. Witness those pictures of yours that now hang on the walls of the gallery of the Crystal Palace, or adorn some private collections. Witness, too, the recognition of some of our own painters when Sir Charles Eastlake was president of the Royal Academy, and when you found a friendly patron in Queen Adelaide of gentle memory. Alas, the hand has lost its cunning; and if its work is not altogether forgotten, those who look upon it are unaware that you are living here in this poor room—pensioner of a charity which, were it but supported as it might be, could better lighten your declining years. Yet I will not call you desolate, madame. Two faithful friends are with you yet. The sunset of your calm life, whereof the noon was broken by so terrible a storm, is dim enough; but it goes not down in complete darkness. Gentle and admiring regard survive even in this dull place; and with them the love that can bring tears to eyes not over ready to weep on account of selfish sorrows, and can move ready hands to tend you now that your own grow heavy and feeble.

As I become more accustomed to the subdued light of the room, I note that amidst the confusion of some old pieces of furniture or lumber there are pictures, unframed and dim, leaning against the walls. One of them—a large painting of some rare plant, formerly a curiosity in the Botanical Gardens at Regent's Park, while the rest are groups of flowers and fruit. Just opposite me, on the high mantelpiece, the canvas broken here and there near the edges, obscured by the dust and smoke that have dulled their surface, are two oil-paintings which I venture to take down for a nearer inspection. Surely they must have been finished when madame was yet in the prime of her art. Exquisite in drawing, delicate in colour, and with a subtle touch that gives to each petal the fresh crumple that bespeaks it newly-blown, and to fruit the dewy down that would make even a gourmet linger ere he pressed the juice, it is almost pain to think that they are left here uncared for; and yet, who knows what influence their presence above that dingy shelf may have upon the wandering thoughts and waning dreams of her who painted them when every new effort of her skill was a keen delight?

Nay, even as I hold them to the light, and in a pause of our chat (wherein Madame la Comtesse speaks slowly and with some difficulty) say some half-involuntary words of appreciation, she has risen, and stands upright by the fire with an earnest look in her face and a sudden gesture of awakened interest. The artistic instinct is there still, after more than eighty years of life, and the appreciation of the work animates her yet. Not with a mere vulgar love of praise (for Madame is still la Comtesse Comoléra, even though she spends her days in an almshouse), but with a recognition that I have distinguished the best of the work that is left to her to show. I shall not readily forget the sudden look of almost eager interest, the effort to speak generous words of thanks, as I bow over her hand to say farewell, and feel that I have been as privileged a visitor as though madame had received me in a gilded salon, at the door of which a powdered lacquey stood to "welcome the coming—speed the parting guest."

And so with some pleasant leave-takings, and not without permission to see them again, I leave these ladies—the fitting representatives of an old nobility and an old régime—to the solitude to which they have retired from a world too ready to forget.

If by any means for the solitude could be substituted a pleasant retirement, and for the sense of desolation and poverty a modest provision that would yet include some grace and lightness to light their declining days, it would be but little after all. Let us hope that the Society of the Friends of Foreigners in Distress may so increase its list of supporters before the roses are again in bloom, that the pictures in the dreary room at Lower Norwood may decorate some wall more worthy to receive them.

CHAPTER LII.

WEDDING GUESTS.

ADA LOVEJOY'S wedding-day came round at last. It was the time of harvest—an early one, like the harvest of earthly happiness which had been yielded to her so early and so abundantly. But after all there is a great deal of such happiness in the world. Every day is a wedding-day somewhere, and everywhere there are rejoicings for the spring-time or the harvest of love. We might pass over this wedding, as no brighter and no happier than the rest. It was but the starting-point of Ada's career. Her life has yet to be lived, her story yet to be written. She was standing on the threshold of a new world, both literally and metaphorically, for on the morrow she will quit the shores of England, to visit scenes the grandeur of which it has not entered into her heart to conceive. Before she returns she will have seen all the grandest that Europe has to show of glory and of beauty, both in Nature and in Art, for the pair are to start from Paris to Rome. They are to glance at the great Italian cities, to travel through Switzerland, and to return homeward by the Rhine. She is waking to the light of a new day; may it be as calm as it is brilliant, as she stands there with her bridegroom by her side. Pale as a lily she is, and she neither blushes nor falters, but looks out with her melting eyes, like one who is seeing a vision.

It is with the wedding guests that we have most to do before we finish our story. Almost all in whom we have been interested thus far were present on the occasion. Among them, of course, was Mr. Lovejoy, who was there to give away the bride. For once in his life his dreams had been equalled by the realities that surrounded him. He was moving in the midst of the society among which he had been born and educated. Fanny's rooms, through the united efforts of Lucy and Mrs. Austin, were tastefully adorned with the choicest of flowers. That beautiful stately girl in silk and jewels, for she wore a necklet of pearls and brilliants which had been Arthur's mother's, and which had been his wedding gift, was his daughter, his darling Ada. It was more than his imagination had pictured, and it overwhelmed him. Instead of exhibiting his usual gaiety, he was trembling, and almost in tears. Next comes Mrs. Lovejoy, who has put on, under protest, the attire suitable to the occasion which has been got ready for her, but who is in no way changed, in no way mollified. Being so matter-of-fact, she is forced to believe in Ada's good fortune; but she goes no further. She will not believe that it is good fortune for her, or her husband, or the rest of the family. She is giving up another child, that is all she will allow herself to feel.

Lucy and Philip are the principal accessories—Lucy is bridesmaid, Philip is best man. Lucy is aided by other two bridesmaids, the little daughters of Mrs. Francis Tenterden, who have opportunely come home for the holidays, and have been pressed into the service.

Mrs. Austin and Mrs. Tabor, with Clara Huntingdon, are a little in the background; Beatrice and her husband are further still. There had been some debate as to whether these two last were to be asked to the marriage and the marriage breakfast. Mrs. Lovejoy's verdict had been "no;" but Mr. Lovejoy was unhappy about the exclusion. Ada sided with her father, and they had been invited accordingly. The pair having found Ashmead Grange untenable, had at length gravitated to London, and notwithstanding her very cold reception, Beatrice had visited her mother more than once. Beatrice was not happy, and neither was her husband. They were not happy in themselves, nor yet in each other, and the sources of their dissatisfaction were hidden from them both. They had plenty of money now—at least John Baselow had, for he held the purse, and was not over-generous with its contents. They lived in comfort, if not in splendour, and yet Beatrice could not tell why she sat and sighed over her last new bonnet; nor her husband why he felt so low and wretched that he was obliged to resort to the public-house in the evening, in spite of a conviction that it was not good for him, neither physically nor socially. The truth was, their occupation was gone. They had neither work nor society, nor resources in themselves, and their fancied paradise of leisure and idleness had turned out to be no paradise after all, but something much more resembling a purgatory. The people with whom they might gradually have come to consort were busy people of the upper middle class, who looked askance at them as idlers and nondescripts. Under these circumstances Beatrice had sought her mother, and almost pathetically asked leave to help her. Money she found she could not give, unless she gave it without her husband's knowledge, and that somehow she did not dare to do. She was losing both health and spirits in her new life, for once upon a time she would have done it without scruple. And her mother had rejected her offer, and said some bitter things about the past, which Beatrice had resented; but which went home to her conscience because of their truth. She had resolved on the last occasion never to go near her again, when she met her gentler father at the door, and was turned back with words of welcome.

And now she had come with her husband as a guest to Ada's wedding, with very mingled feelings of satisfaction and regret. She was satisfied to show her family and friends to such advantage to the man she had married, and yet she regretted that marriage with all her heart. She was clever enough to know that there are things which money cannot purchase, and that her husband was deficient in these. It may be that the friendly hands held out to him and her to-day may help them to rise to higher things, to a truer appreciation of the two great talents of time and money committed to them, to a nobler estimate of the things in which purer and higher satisfaction may be found. These friendly hands will not be withdrawn in unchristian exclusiveness. Neither Philip, nor Lucy, nor Mrs. Austin will say, "These Baselows are not nice people; let us quietly drop them." They are penetrated with another and a wider and sweeter spirit—a spirit which gives a finer and more unselfish meaning to social life than is to be found in the best maxims of the world's best society.

After the service Mr. Huntingdon joined the wedding party, who "partook," as the journalists say, of an elegant "repast." He made the speech of the occasion in toasting the bride and bridegroom. It was a trifle grave, perhaps a trifle sermonising; a cleverer man might have lightened its gravity with a touch of humour, and it was almost too tender, for it left more than one or two of his listeners moved to tears. He spoke of all the wedded pair ought to be to each other, of the sure comfort, the sweet companionship of the union in its most perfect form, and then of what they ought to be to others—each home a little centre of light and heat, not selfishly shut up and caring for its own welfare only, but letting others share the genial warmth of its atmosphere of love. It was in the poisoned air of selfishness that the lamp of love refused to burn. Its sacred flame was fed by every generous thought and every pure emotion, by every sacred joy and every sacred sorrow. He spoke of the love which should be kept alive because of the long years which might be before them, and of the love which should flow forth because of the inevitable parting, till Mrs. Lovejoy's hard eyes let fall another tear, and Ellen Austin's hands were clasped together trembling.

And when Arthur had replied, and Philip had given "The bridesmaids" in a very pretty speech, Ada rose from her place and went away, followed by Lucy and Mrs. Austin, and Clara Huntingdon. The elder ladies and Fanny, together with the juvenile bridesmaids, remained, and the defection on the part of the others was caused by the necessity for unrobing and redressing the bride as speedily as possible, and getting her ready to catch the train they had fixed upon. While this was being done, Arthur had said his adieus, and was already in the hall, and when Ada came down, it was to a whirl of parting kisses, embraces, and blessings, from which she was rescued and carried off by Arthur to the carriage.

Mrs. Austin and Clara had hastened up-stairs again, with a purpose of their own. "Nobody has thought of the shoes," Clara had whispered laughingly, and they had determined to remedy the oversight. But while they were looking about for a solitary slipper, they heard and saw a whole volley fired from the upper regions, only just missing the bridegroom's head.

Then they stood still at the window, and saw the carriage roll away, and when it had disappeared the signs of emotion were on both their faces, and it drew them together. They sat down, holding each other's hands.

"One would not think there was much in common between us," said Clara, looking up in Ellen's face, with a meaning in her own, which told that she was thinking of the contrast between them—her own deformity and her companion's shapely beauty. "It is not often," she added, "that I feel the pain of isolation, that shuts me out even from feeling as others feel, which brings to such as me the 'lowliest depth of human pain.'"

"Better even that," said Ellen, "than to have shut yourself out by fault of your own, not only from happiness, but from sympathy, as I did."

"Do not blame yourself so harshly," said Clara. "I cannot fancy you doing anything to exclude yourself from sympathy. And only see how you are loved."

Ellen knew what she meant; but Clara suddenly clasped her beseechingly, and whispered, "Could you not love him in return? He is so worthy of being loved."

"Of that I am sure," said Ellen. "It is I who am unworthy of him; it is I who cannot love him as I feel sure he deserves to be loved."

"You have heard him picture the kind of love he needs," said Clara. "I am sure you could give him that. You could give him the companionship he craves for. You could help him to be to others all that he longs to be in his life and in his work. The life of a clergyman in the midst of his people is often difficult, and it is always conspicuous. It matters so much that it should be a life of ardour and unworldliness, and not of languor and self-seeking, because of the many who will copy it. A clergyman and his wife may spread the tone of their own household through a whole district if they choose; and if that tone is a low and worldly one, whether they choose or no."

"And you think me fitted for all this?" said Ellen. "Indeed—indeed, I am not."

But Clara could see that her pleading had had its effect, and she wisely said no more.

Ellen kissed her tenderly, and they went downstairs together and joined the rest of the party, which soon after broke up.

"I shall be as lonely as ever now," said Fanny, as she stood bidding her guests adieu; but she laughed her usual good-humoured laugh as she said it, and was assured by all and sundry that she would not be suffered to be lonely,—that she was making friends, not losing them.

CHAPTER LIII.

WAITING.

A YEAR has passed away, and Philip is still working on hopefully—at least he is generally hopeful, for if his dark, despairing mood comes upon him now, it is speedily dispelled in Lucy's sweet presence. She bears the waiting better than he does—indeed, would be perfectly happy if he would only be the same. But there are times when, in common with all keenly and delicately organised natures, who have to come in contact with the rude forces of the world, he suffers. At times, when he has overworked his brain, he thinks his nervous energy is failing, and that he will fall before the end is attained. In this shadow he and Lucy have both walked of late.

Arthur and Ada are flourishing. They have long been in possession of their new home. After returning from her foreign tour, Ada sat down therein to cultivate her mind, under Arthur's directions. She read and studied; she had masters for music and for drawing, and made great proficiency, especially in the former. But there had come another master to the pretty cottage, and the new master drove out the old ones, Arthur included, and was, for the time at least, a veritable tyrant. The name of the tyrant was Master Baby. Arthur is doing some legal work, and doing it well, and much unpaid social work besides. If his friends do not come a dozen at a time, they come pretty often. In spite of Ada's youth and inexperience, there is always a good dinner, a pleasant evening, and a bed for the belated there. They have no grand companies, but a great deal of hospitable entertainment, and "it does the fellows good," Arthur says behind their backs, "to see how happy we are." Some of the fellows feel it too, and they are a clever set on the whole, whom Arthur attracts, and is attracted by. The world may be the better for some of them one day; and they are learning there that it is not only the sirens who can sing—that the cup of joy sparkles not the less, but the more, for being pure.

Albert Lovejoy is a sore grief and burden to his parents. He has become quite unmanageable. He is tied and bound by the chain of his sins so that he cannot be freed. He is one of those infatuated creatures who will do anything for drink, and whom it would be merciful to place in asylums; but, as they are supposed to be rational beings, they are left at large, to be a curse to themselves and to all who are connected with them. His health, too, is being undermined by his follies and excesses. He, too, has that fatal disease which has carried off so many of his family. His mother thinks he will not last long to trouble any one.

And the old people watch over him as well as they can. They are no longer suffered to feel the pinch of poverty; Arthur and Ada are liberal. Fanny, too, is kind, and Mr. Lovejoy still retains his situation in the office of Tabor and Tenterden, and is advancing there in estimation and usefulness. He and his wife are far more united now than ever they were in their lives. They share their last and sorest trouble faithfully, though Mr. Lovejoy escapes from it oftener and more completely while he contemplates his infant grandson, and predicts for a creature so amazing the most extraordinary and brilliant future.

But for the encumbrance of their unfortunate son, Mr. and Mrs. Lovejoy would doubtless have taken up their abode with Fanny, who persists in saying she is lonely; but she says it laughing good-humouredly still, and nobody believes that she feels it.

Philip is in one of his heavy moods. He has been trying hard, on behalf of a client, to punish a highlyrespectable swindler as he deserves to be punished, and has failed; the laws of the country, according to Philip, being framed so as to afford the greatest amount of protection to respectable swindlers, and as little as possible to their victims. Indeed, he is inclined to believe in a general failure of justice throughout the universe — that things are going wrong with honest people in general, and with himself in particular, and so he betakes himself to Park Villas, and to the society of Lucy and her parents without delay. He seldom dines there, except on Sundays. The dingy lodgings have not been left behind yet; the greasy mutton chops are still an institution; but he goes there on Saturday evening and stays till Monday morning. That is considered settled.

It is not Saturday evening; however, there he is.

"I have such a piece of news for you!" cries Lucy; "you couldn't be made to guess, could you?"

"I can't guess," he says, shaking his head. "The things you are asked to guess are either so obvious that it would never occur to a sane person that they were the least of a riddle, or else they are such improbabilities that they would never occur to a sane person at all."

"This is neither the one nor the other," said Lucy, laughing.

"Philip will be sure to say he has known all along how it would be," put in Mrs. Tabor.

"No, he won't," said Lucy, confidently. "Guess."

"Won't even try," said Philip.

"Somebody is going to be married. Will that help you?" said Lucy.

"Fanny, then," answered Philip, perversely.

"I'm a good mind not to tell you at all," said Lucy, shaking her head at him.

"Very well," he returned; "I shall not exhaust myself in the effort to find out." But even with the playful nonsense the smile was coming back to his parched lips, the furrows were smoothing from his brow.

"Then I will tell you," cried Lucy, magnanimously; "it is Mrs. Austin. She is going to marry Mr. Huntingdon."

Philip started. He had not known it, he had not imagined it, and yet it was no improbability. Mrs. Tabor had, it seems, conceived its possibility; but she had kept it to herself, as it never in her thoughts went beyond a possibility. She says she mentioned it to Mr. Tabor, but Mr. Tabor refuses to corroborate the assertion. At any rate, the idea had never entered Philip's mind, and now it entered, along with other ideas which had been remote from his thoughts just then, and which startled him with their sudden rush.

"I suppose it is very selfish to think first of ourselves," he said; "but it will make such a difference to us;" and he looked at Lucy with kindling eyes. Lucy put her hands in his, and Mrs. Tabor disappeared in a twinkling. "All the difference in the world, darling," he went on, drawing her to his breast. He had not at the first realised the release it brought them. "Half of the income Mrs. Austin relinquishes falls to me, and I have but to hand it over—or rather a part of it—to your father, and I am free."

It was the very arrangement Mr. Tabor had already been suggesting as likely to be proposed by Philip; but they had left it to him to make, as a matter of course, and he did make it, and found it accepted with a heartiness which left him nothing to wish for. Mr. Huntingdon and Mrs. Austin had thought it well to keep their intention private, until they were fully prepared to carry it out. They were to be married quietly in about a month. Clara had accomplished their happiness at the cost of her own, perhaps. Mrs. Torrance had accepted the inevitable in the shape of Mr. Huntingdon, who (she speedily discovered) was manageable to any extent; but she had transferred her animosity to Clara, who was distinctly unmanageable, and whom she resolved to keep at a distance. Clara was too clear-sighted to be blind to the faults of others, and when she saw them, could not, or rather would not conceal that she did so. She would never have believed that the little ruse which Mrs. Torrance had practised in order to get rid of Mr. Huntingdon was an innocent slip of the tongue, as he did. As long as Mrs. Torrance reigns she will be more or less separated from the brother on whom her whole heart is fixed; but, perhaps, they may reign alternately; or Ellen, in security and happiness, may gain the firmness which she needs, to use her gentle force against aggression, instead of bending to it as heretofore. (To be concluded.)

A WOODLAND NOOK.

HERE spring all sweet shy flowers that court the shade—
Bright hyacinths that mimic heaven's blue,
The wild woodsorrel, and the pale, white-rayed
And virgin wind-flower ever fresh and new.
Beloved of birds it is, this sweet, cool nook,
And vocal 'tis with warblings morn and night;
And, singing night and day, a bickering brook
Winds glistening through it like a thread of light.
Bees hither wing from far outlying leas,
Of their one purpose—flow'ret-rifling—full,
As bees e'er seem to be. The branching trees
Stir slumberously, as though 'twas theirs to lull
All things around; and far above the rest
Of neighbouring places, Nature here seems blest.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS. SECOND SERIES. No. 15. CHRIST. PART IV. AS A MAN OF PRAYER.

Scripture to be read—John xvii.

INTRODUCTION. Having seen our Lord's example under temptation, it will be well now to see Him under different aspects, in order to trace out His example, as far as possible, in each. This lesson will speak of Him as a man of prayer, and the next as using the means of grace.

I. THE NATURE OF PRAYER. Ask for instances of men eminent for prayer, and what they prayed for, viz., David praying for forgiveness after great sin (Ps. li. 1, 2); Solomon for wisdom in governing his kingdom (2 Chron. i. 10); Hannah for a son (1 Sam. i. 11). Now ask whether Christ need ask for any of these things—reminding how He did no sin, and therefore needed no repentance (1 Peter ii. 22), He daily increased in wisdom so as to be called the wisdom of God (1 Cor. i. 24), and being Lord of all needed not to ask for temporal blessings. For what then did He pray? (Read John xvii. 1—11.) Describe the circumstances under which that prayer was said: the last night before the crucifixion—probably while in the vineyards (see John xv. 1), lifting up heart and voice to God—just before His death. Point out two things in the prayer—(1) that God might be glorified. Ask what might have fancied our Lord asking for—strength to bear the approaching trial, &c., but not thinking so much of Himself and His own personal feelings as that in all things God should be glorified. Ask how God was glorified by Christ—by His finishing the work given Him to do (ver. 4). What was that work? the salvation of man. Now read Luke xi. 2, to show how we are to pray for the same. What prayer has Christ taught us? how does it begin? what are the first three petitions about? Not ourselves, but the glory of God—that His name may be known, His kingdom spread, and His will be done. Then follow petitions for ourselves. Now contrast our wants with Christ's wants, and show that true prayer includes (a) confession of sin. Ask for the parable which teaches us that God accepts such (Luke xviii. 13), and remind of Abel, who was accepted because he brought the sin-offering. For examples of such, see David (2 Sam. xxiv. 14), and many others. So in Lord's Prayer, say, "Forgive us," &c. (b) Faith in God, as One who hears and answers prayer. Show the need of this by example of the Christians praying for Peter (Acts xii. 5), their astonishment when their prayer was heard. (c) Submission to God's will. (Read Matt. xxvi. 39—44.) Try and picture out the scene: a dark night; Christ with three chosen disciples—leaves them—they tired, fall asleep. He alone under olive-trees—prays—how? intense earnestness; show prayer repeated three times—what was it? that if possible He might be spared the agony coming upon Him; still asks that not His but God's will be done. Here a model for us engrafted in words of Lord's Prayer. Easy to say, not easy to feel submission. (d) Thanksgiving—for past mercies (see 1 Tim. ii. 1). Show how this has always accompanied prayers by examples of Noah on leaving ark (Gen. viii. 20), Israelites at Red Sea, &c.

So far spoken of prayers for ourselves, but in Christ's prayer in John xvii. another great part, viz., (2) intercessions for others. Prayer not to be selfish. God's glory concerned in others as well as ourselves—we glorify Him by means of making others know Him; hence our Saviour's prayer for His Church. Remind of Abraham praying for Sodom (Gen. xviii. 26), Moses for Israelites (Exod. xxxiv. 9), &c. For what do we pray? Their conversion to God—i.e., spiritual blessings. Remind of the four men who brought their friend sick of the palsy to Christ (Mark ii. 2), of Peter's friends praying for him in prison. Press home this duty upon the children, to pray for relations, friends, &c. See James v. 17, for promises to fervent prayer.

II. THE PRACTICE OF PRAYER. (Read Mark i. 35, vi. 46; Luke vi. 12.) Show from these that Christ rose early to pray, though always active and busy, He made time for early communion with God. Ask what (in the Parable of Sower) were the thorns choking the seed, and show how cares, &c., have tendency to draw heart from God. Perhaps to think no time for prayer. Must follow Christ's example. Again, when tired with day's work, not hurrying off to rest, but going up a hill late at night for quiet prayer: sometimes so earnest in prayer as to stop all night! Suggest to children to ask themselves before get into bed, "Have I really prayed?" and if conscience says, "No," to get out and pray again. Now read Matt. vi. 5—8. Show the importance of privacy. Ask for examples of such. Isaac praying in the fields, Peter on the house-top, Paul and Silas in prison (Acts xvii. 25), and show how may pray on way, school—in kitchen, &c., as well as in crowded bedroom. Get desire for and spirit of prayer, the time and place will soon follow.

Questions to be answered.

1. Give from the Old Testament examples of prayer.
2. Show the difference between Christ's needs and ours.
3. What are the two subjects of Christ's last prayer?
4. What four things does true prayer include?
5. Give instances of intercessory prayer.
6. How is Christ an example as to the practice of prayer?

COMFORTABLE WORDS.—IV.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK-ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND CHAPLAIN TO THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

"Jesus answered and said unto him, What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter."—John xiii. 7.

THESE words were addressed to the Apostle Peter, who was greatly perplexed by the Saviour's behaviour. After "the Last Supper" was over, the Lord Jesus took a basin of water and a towel, and went round amongst the assembled disciples for the purpose of washing their feet. The action, of course, was understood by the disciples to be symbolical; but, at the same time, they thought it so inconsistent with the relation in which they stood to their Divine Master, that they were perfectly aghast at it. No one, however, dared to express his feelings, and stillness reigned in the little company, interrupted only by the sound of the splashing water and the movements of the Saviour, until Peter was reached. Then the impulsive apostle could no longer restrain himself. In a tone in which surprise and reproof were mingled, he ventured to expostulate with his Lord on what he considered to be an unworthy and unnecessary self-abasement; and then received the wonderful far-reaching reply already quoted—"What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter."

Now, there can be little doubt that the Saviour's primary object was to enable the disciples to confront the mystery of His approaching ignominious death. After all His teaching, plain and explicit as it was, they could hardly bring themselves to believe that their Master was going to die; and the death of the cross, with the infamy attached to it by the Jewish mind, would be sure, as Christ well knew, to shake their confidence in Him to a painful extent. He would prepare them, then, for what was coming. He would employ this strange and startling symbolical action to show them beforehand what Calvary, when rightly understood, would show them afterwards—that there are no depths of self-abasement to which God Himself will not descend for the purpose of recovering and restoring the objects of His love.

But in addition to this primary intention of the thing, the Saviour, no doubt, had in view the encouragement of His people in all ages. He meant to comfort suffering and perplexed disciples with the thought that a day of explanation was coming, in which all the reasons of all His dealings with them should be made perfectly plain.

There are mysteries in the Divine management of the world. Every thoughtful mind must have felt the presence of them, and been troubled, at times. These mysteries give occasion for the enemies of God to blaspheme, and occasionally it seems hard to provide a sufficient reply. One can, perhaps, only fall back upon our own unshaken conviction, that our God and Father in Christ is righteous in all His ways, and holy in all His works. And there is comfort for us in the words, "What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter."

With regard to ourselves, too, and the Divine treatment of us, there are many things which we might wish to understand. "Tell me," says the heart to God, "why Thou dealest with me thus? Give me an explanation?" "No!" is the reply; "thou canst not know now." Partly because it is impossible for us to know. The little child cannot enter into the fulness of its father's schemes and plans. Its faculties are not sufficiently developed to admit of its grasping the whole. By-and-by, but not yet, it will understand perfectly. And we are yet but in the infancy of our being. And we must leave Him, who sees the end from the beginning, and who loves us far better than we love ourselves, to judge for us what is best. Partly, also, because even if it were possible for us to know, it would not be well for us to know. We tell our little ones to trust us unhesitatingly. We think it a bad sign when a child demands a reason, before he will repose confidence. We feel that our experience and our love ought to be implicitly accepted, as the guarantees that all is well. Just so, God expects of His children: trust without explanation; belief in the Fatherly wisdom, and love, and grace, and care—even when we cannot trace out distinctly that these Divine attributes are engaged on our behalf.

And let us notice before we quit the subject, the condescension of this assurance of the Lord's. Our hearts may crave for an explanation of the Divine dealings. They do crave for it; but surely we have no right to demand it. Christ's people, however, are not His servants merely, they are His friends!" "I have called you friends," He says. He will not keep them out of His secrets. He will admit them into His confidence. Nothing shall be hid from them. Not now, perhaps; not immediately; but when it is possible,—when it is right,—they shall be made acquainted with the whole of His matters. "What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter."

SHAG AND DOLL.

A STORY OF TWO HOMELESS LITTLE ONES, IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

SHAG and Doll were little gutter children, whose short lives had been passed amidst the squalor and wretchedness of some of the most densely populated and most depraved of the many crowded courts and alleys which are to be found in London. Their father they could not remember. Their mother, a slovenly, drunken woman, much addicted to quarrelling with her neighbours, had, a short time before her death, deserted her old quarters, the place having become, to use her own expression, "too hot to hold her," and had wandered into a fresh locality, equally bad, but possessing the one recommendation, that no one there knew anything about her or her antecedents. But when, a few days later, her life was suddenly terminated by an accident, Shag and Doll were left utterly friendless and desolate, none of the neighbours knowing or caring anything about them. So the two little creatures (who perhaps were scarcely worse off than they had been ever since their mother had taken to drinking) were left to wander out, hand-in-hand, into the wide world, to beg, or steal, or starve, as the case might be.

Shag had acquired his odd name in virtue of a head of hair so thick and curly and rough that it was indeed as shaggy as any uncombed dog's head could well be. Doll's tiny features, blue eyes, and pretty flaxen locks made the name Shag had given her appear a very suitable one, especially as her whole figure was so diminutive, that, though she was nearly six years old, and Shag little more than seven, he could easily lift her, and even carry her a short distance when she was very tired.

Shag was a kind brother, and very proud of his little Doll, taking good care that she always had a clean face, even if his own were begrimed with dirt; but then, to be sure, he could not see himself, so it mattered not, as in Doll's eyes he was perfect. She never thought it possible he could be improved in any one respect; nay, she even loved that motley complexion, and that shock of tangled hair, because they were a part of him; and he was all she had to love.

Had it not been for Doll, Shag would, no doubt, by this time have become an adept in all the evil ways and practices of the boys around him; but as he seemed to live only to guard and watch over her, making her his chief, and almost sole companion and playmate, he was thus preserved from much that would have been hurtful; Doll's very helplessness, and timidity, and clinging ways serving to draw him away from those baneful influences into a purer, healthier atmosphere.

Poor little Shag and Doll! The only ray of sunlight amidst all the gloom and darkness by which they were surrounded was the deep affection each bore the other; the only bright spot in all that dreary waste of human misery, and sin, and degradation, in the midst of which they walked with weary, aching feet, was this wondrous love of theirs—wondrous because it had taken root and sprung up in that withering atmosphere of harsh words, and hard blows, and evil deeds, which had been around them from the first moment they drew their breath. Far different from the kind looks, and loving ways, and tender ministries which fall to the lot of some favoured children, who yet, with it all, have not such brave, faithful hearts as my little Shag and Doll.

Strange! but so it is sometimes, that where one least expects it one meets with the choicest fruit; that in the barren, sandy desert is occasionally found the life-giving spring of water, and the little island of freshest, brightest emerald green. And so that heavenly flower called love can flourish wherever He, the Great Husbandman, wills: by the hard, stony, dusty highway, as well as in the most carefully tended and sheltered garden; as if to show that there is no restraint with Him to work by this means or by that.

To keep out of the reach of policemen was the chief care of the little brother and sister; not because they were conscious of having committed any offence which merited punishment, but more because they had caught up the spirit of those around, who had good reason for looking upon the policeman as an individual to be diligently avoided, and unceasingly shunned.

And then, too, Shag and Doll had heard of the workhouse—heard of it as a dreadful place where the crowning misery of all would be that they would be torn one from the other. And what misfortune could be so great as that? So they felt that they, too, had good cause to keep well out of the way of all policemen, lest they should be seized and imprisoned within the walls of that terrible workhouse.

Shag had grown quite sharp through constant watchfulness, and knew the doorsteps or the arches where it would be safest to spend the night, and where he and Doll would creep in, and nestling close together get the sleep which their weary little frames demanded. But such a sleep could scarcely be called rest; for when, as daylight fell upon their eyes, they bestirred themselves, they felt their limbs aching all over from the hardness of their bed.

"Doll, how is it?" said Shag one day when he had been washing her face at a pump, and trying to straighten the hair which was so fond of straying over her face and into her eyes—"how is it you don't seem to get bigger like other little gals do? Real dolls don't grow, I know; but then you aint a real doll like they sells in the shops. So you know, Doll, you ought to be growing, but it 'pears to me you don't; you seem lighter to carry every day. And then some dolls, and some little gals, has such rosy cheeks, and yours is as white as can be. I wonder if 'tis that I wash 'em too much!" continued Shag, as if a new light had just struck him; "perhaps I wash off all the colour rubbing of 'em so. I think I'll leave 'em for a day or two, and see what comes of it."

"Just as you likes, Shag," replied Doll, meekly; "the water's very cold sometimes, and makes me shiver. I'd just as soon leave it alone."

"Still, Doll, I shouldn't like you to be dirty, you know; 'cause you're a little gal. It's different for boys like me—it don't matter what they looks like: but I do like the people when they see you to say, 'What a pretty little 'un,' as that woman did the other day when she give us a crust of bread."

"Just as you likes, Shag," returned Doll again, too hungry and weary to care one iota about her personal appearance. "But don't you wish somebody 'ud give us a crust again this morning? I'm so very, very hungry," sobbed the child in piteous tones, whilst the tears dimmed her great wistful blue eyes.

Shag silently kissed away the tear-drops, and then, taking the little hand in his, said bravely, "Come along, Doll, let's go and see what we can get. I dare say we shall pick up something before long;" and patient Doll prepared to trudge wheresoever it seemed right to Shag to go.

So the days went by; and whether the cheeks were washed or not they still grew whiter and whiter, whilst the little features looked sharper and sharper, and the child's weight seemed less and less. Shag, too, was not much to boast of, his bones appearing as if they must soon wear through their slender covering of flesh and skin, and even through the rags which he had such difficulty in keeping together on him.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

168. God, in His wrath, says one of the greater prophets, "will sift the nations with the sieve of vanity." A similar threat is recorded by one of the lesser prophets. Quote the two passages.

169. By whose advice were the women of Moab and of Midian instigated to turn the Israelites to idolatry?

170. Who was the father-in-law of Caiaphas, and where do we read that he and the rest of the council threatened two of the apostles?

171. The prophet Isaiah (lx. 3) seems to speak of the visit of the magi to the infant Jesus and to hint that they were kings. Quote a passage from the psalms to the same effect.

172. Which of our Lord's disciples wished to destroy a Samaritan village by fire from heaven; and what was the rebuke the Saviour administered?

173. We read in one of the historical books that the acts of Solomon were written in the "book of the acts of Solomon." Name other books not extant in which a similar record was made.

174. State the manner of the death of the Apostle James, and by whose order he was martyred.

175. Name any circumstance from the fourth Gospel which would lead us to expect that when Peter and John were brought before the council, as recorded in Acts iv., they would be recognised as disciples of Jesus.

SCRIPTURE HEROINES.

THE GOOD SHUNAMMITE.

2 Kings iv.

SHE loved and lost her darling child, God-given
When hope was dead. And earth had no relief
To calm the anguish of that mother's grief,
For, oh! that heart with agony was riven.
Not till the holy man with death had striven
Knew she her child safe in the angels' keeping,
Knew to her joy he was "not dead, but sleeping."
So ye who say, "We have a child in heaven,"
And deem that all now left on earth is dross,
Have felt one magic word wipe off the tear
E'en as ye bent above your darling's bier
And learnt its gain in your most bitter loss.
Then let the storm-cloud lower, the wild waves toss;
That little bark you seem e'en now to see
Safe in the haven where you too would be,
Guided to glory by its blessed Saviour's Cross!

THE HERDSMAN.

ONE dim even, on a hill,
Looking bleak o'er vale and sea,
Where the wind was seldom still,
Ever moaning gustingly,—
On a patch of mossy mould
Sat a herdsman lean and old,
Tears upon his cheek were falling, blanched in the whistling cold.

Keenly through the rustling heath
Reefs of granite, weather grey,
Round him rose; and far beneath,
In the hazy valley, lay
Quiet sheep flocks, white and low,
Like long drifts of thawing snow,
Or the crispy foam of waves, when murky night begins to blow.

Eastward, all was misty dim,
Save an isle, that loomingly
Raised above the fog its rim,
And streaks of wind-drifts on the sea.
Through the lurid clouds of drouth
Flamed the low sun from the south,
Like a glare athwart a moor, reddening from a furnace mouth.

Toward his grassy-roofed hut
Moved the herdsman o'er the moor.
The place was drear, the door was shut,—
He stood forlorn a while, before;
Then entered with a mournful tread,
Where gloomed the hearth in ashes dead,
And turned him to a little nook, wherein there stood a little bed.

Quiet, as if in breathless sleep,
Fair as a late-pulled lily, lay
The grandchild, who was used to leap
To meet him at the droop of day,
Whose light, now slanting through the pane
Wavered the shrubs in shadowy wain
Upon her cold and innocent cheek, still piteous with a trace of pain.

Then at her side, in hopeless swoon,
The old man sate, her hand in his,
Many dark hours without a moon,
Until his brain bethought, I wis,
How soon for ever from his sight
His comrade should be laid in night;
On which he rose, and lit a brand, and watched her in the morning's light;

Murmuring, "My darling," while the clay
He wrapped within its simple shroud,
"Who cheered my aged hours away
As cheers a star some wintry cloud;
No more shall I, her grey old sire,
Hear her clear laugh when by the briar
I turn, nor hold her in these happy arms before the evening fire."

"And sure the lambs will miss her too,
When she will take their heads no more
Upon her lap, to have their due
Of love; and by the evening door,
Where in the thatch it used to sing,
Bright-eyed, unto her in the spring—
Her bird will die;—thank God, I too shall follow soon on broken wing."

So mourned he, till the neighbours brought
The tiny coffin for the child;
When he rose wistful, heeding nought
Save that poor little ringlet mild
Which he had cut from her cold brow,
Trembling; and sate apart; till now
They took the little one away, he following in his hopeless woe.

A month went by, when one bleak dawn
Into the cottage, from whose hearth
No smoke was seen, they came. Withdrawn,
In a dim nook, from griefs of earth,
They saw the herdsman sleeping there,
On his worn face a death-smile fair;
And wept the good folk, finding in his hand a gentle ring of hair.

And ere a week a storm o'erturned
Upon the moor that lonely speck;
And his poor sheep, as though they mourned,
Moved, dumb and dismal, round the wreck,
Nosing the mouldered planks; but by
The grave where child and grandsire lie,
A small blue bird that knew her, chanted their sweet requiem to the sky.

FANNY'S FORTUNE.

BY ISA CRAIG-KNOX, AUTHOR OF "ESTHER WEST," "TWO YEARS," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER LIV.

CONCLUSION.

ANOTHER year, and Lucy and Philip have been married throughout the greater part of it, and are thoroughly happy; neither of them has developed any of that wonderful incompatibility which, according to some writers, the state of matrimony almost invariably calls forth. That some such incompatibilities exist it would be useless to deny; but the general truth lies very much in the opposite direction. So great is the capacity for loving in most women—and, to say the truth, in most men also—that all kinds of compatibilities are created by the very closeness of the marriage tie. To outsiders is not the surprise general, how it is possible for Mrs. So-and-So to get on with the man she is united to for life? or what Mr. So-and-So can see in the poor creature to whom he has given his name, that he should keep up his blind devotion? Of course, there are marriages more or less perfect, and more or less imperfect, and the latter, perhaps, are the more numerous of the two classes. A perfect union of mind and heart must in this world, as yet, be somewhat rare; but the tendency, especially where there is a sense of duty on one side, or on both, is for the union to become more perfect as time goes on.

Mrs. Huntingdon fancies, for instance, that she could never have loved any one as she loved Mr. Huntingdon; but then it must be allowed that they were both distinctly lovable, and possessed of a high sense of duty. Mr. Huntingdon is becoming the very model of what a clergyman in such a charge as his ought to be. His congregation is composed not of the poor and wretched, but of the rich and comfortable. The latter have their special temptations, their special sins and vices, as well as the former, and they are far more difficult to deal with. But Mr. Huntingdon tries to understand and to deal with them fearlessly. He does not trouble himself or his hearers with minute shades of doctrine or of ritual; but insists on the grand characteristics of the Christian life, its faith and hope and charity, its simplicity and veracity, and—still more difficult to practise—its humility and self-denial, virtues which he tries to live as well as to teach.

It is a Sunday morning in September, and the bells are ringing for church. The well-dressed people are streaming out of their comfortable houses—fathers and mothers and troops of little folks, for these houses swarm with the latter, and fairer children than these middle-class homes of England can boast there are not to be found in the world. Fresh bright colours—pure whites and blues chiefly—set off the fresh faces, and look brilliant in the sunshine. The grass is still green in the gardens, and the borders are glowing with many-tinted asters and dahlias. The sky is blue as that of June, and a soft breeze is blowing with apple-scented breath. It is a day when all Nature seems to enjoy ineffable repose and peace.
